He said: Honourable senators, the government has made a commitment to resolve comprehensive land claims in the North through the fair negotiation of settlement agreements. This commitment is an important part of the government's overall northern framework. Settlement agreements will make clear and certain all rights to the ownership and use of land and resources throughout vast northern areas. In the absence of clear, final agreements in the North, social and cultural developments are affected. Inuit and other native northerners face uncertain futures. The relationship between native and non-native northerners becomes strained. And, unfortunately, the orderly economic development which all northern citizens desire is considerably jeopardized.

When the government took office in 1984, it found that much work remained to be done in the area of comprehensive claims. Although the policy decision to negotiate such claims had been established in 1973, few final agreements had actually been reached. In Quebec agreements had been signed between the Cree Indians and Inuit of northern Quebec in 1975 and with the Naskapi Indians in 1977.

One northern claim to be finalized was that with the Inuvialuit of the Beaufort Sea region, which was completed in mid-1984. However, throughout the rest of the North no agreements had been reached. Although much negotiation and discussion had taken place, major agreements were still outstanding with the Council for Yukon Indians, the Dené and Métis people of the Mackenzie Valley and the Inuit of the eastern Arctic.

Our government found that negotiations were generally dragging due in part to concern by native groups involved that the claims policy then in effect was outdated. They wanted from the government a more flexible and responsive set of policies for comprehensive land claims, and the government listened and responded to this need.

The first stage was the appointment of a federal task force to make a comprehensive review of the whole area, and I point out that this was not the task force of the Senate which Senator Molgat so capably chaired—this was a government task force. Its mandate was to meet extensively with leaders and citizens alike and to provide an informed, thoughtful and independent appraisal of the situation along with appropriate recommendations. The task force's report was made public in the spring of 1986.

It was well received by native northerners. Its findings and the discussion which followed paved the way for a new and more effective claims policy. This new policy was announced by the Honourable Bill McKnight, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in December 1986. It deals in a positive way with the concerns of the native groups involved, and it has opened the way to more active negotiations on the three remaining northern claims—negotiations which are proceeding in earnest and which, we are hopeful, will lead to final agreements in the not too distant future.

With this action the government has demonstrated its willingness to listen and to respond when change is needed. This has been our policy, and this is the major point of the legislation we have before us today.

Honourable senators, I mentioned earlier that one northern claim has been made final. This was popularly termed the COPE, or Council for Original Peoples' Entitlement agreement, otherwise known as the Inuvialuit Final Agreement, reached with the Inuvialuit people who inhabit the Beaufort Sea region. Honourable senators, I am not too confident of my pronunciation of some of these terms—I have trouble with Gaelic and Arabic as well!

Senator Roblin: They sound all right to me.

Senator Macquarrie: Thank you!

The agreement was ratified by Parliament in 1984 through the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act.

The Inuvialuit are a small group of some 2,500 people, living mainly in six communities that border on the Beaufort. But the area which they have traditionally inhabited and in which they have hunted and fished for their livelihood is enormous, covering some 435,000 square kilometres of land and water in the western Arctic.

The agreement covered a wide range of concerns: title and ownership of land, water rights, wildlife harvesting, financial compensations and the establishment of various bodies by the Inuvialuit to manage and administer various aspects of the agreement.

Honourable senators, over the past four years, since the Inuvialuit Final Agreement was signed, its implementation has generally progressed smoothly. However, as with any complex agreement, amendments of one sort or another prove to be necessary from time to time. The drafters of the agreement recognized that this would be so, and the Inuvialuit Final Agreement makes direct provision for amendments by the parties to the agreement.

The process by which the Inuvialuit may give consent to amend the agreement is quite clear. The Inuvialuit Final Agreement stipulates that this may be given by resolution of the board and of regional councillors of the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation. However, neither the agreement nor the subsequent act of Parliament specifies the process by which Canada may give consent to such amendments. As a result, there is currently a need for parliamentary approval of amendments, unless they are purely technical in nature.

Such a procedure makes unnecessary demands on Parliament's time and hampers the government's capacity to respond in a timely fashion to amendments that might be required to the Inuvialuit Final Agreement.

Bill C-102 seeks to clarify and simplify the consent procedure. Amending the Western Arctic Claims Settlement Act will enable the Governor in Council to authorize the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to sign amending agreements arrived at with the concurrence of the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation.

Honourable senators, this procedure has been discussed with the Inuvialuit and they are in complete agreement with the amendments embodied in Bill C-102. They, like the government, want to see a streamlined procedure established so that necessary amendments to the Inuvialuit Final Agreement may be made expeditiously when they arise.

Honourable senators, as I have said, the government is anxious to be responsive in all matters relating to these comprehensive claims agreements. It wishes to demonstrate to the Inuvialuit and to other groups with whom negotiations are still under way that it can and will act when necessary to amend those agreements when and if such amendments are needed.

I hope that all honourable senators will support the amendments proposed in Bill C-102, which will help clear the way for such response. As honourable senators no doubt know, this measure passed the other place last week, all stages at one sitting, and with unanimous support of all three parties.

Honourable senators, I have a related matter to mention. Unfortunately, a printing error has been made in clause 1(c) of the bill relating to the date of the amending agreement. I believe that it will be appropriate in committee to have a technical amendment proposed to correct this error. I suggest that this bill be given the commendation of the Senate and that it be referred to an appropriate committee for further study and elucidation.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Adams, debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act—(Honourable Senator Cogger.)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that there is some anxiety among senators to get this bill moving. Senator Cogger is prepared to speak on this bill as soon after Easter as possible. In the meantime, he would be happy to yield to any other senator who wishes to speak.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Doody for the opportunity of speaking today, before Senator Cogger delivers his speech, on second reading of Bill S-15, an act to amend the Patent Act. Of course, I was also pleased to second the motion by Senator Bonnell introducing Bill S-15. I believe that this bill is both necessary and urgent in order to protect the public interest from rapid and excessive price increases of prescription drugs.

In the last week of December I was shopping for an antibiotic at a pharmacy operated by a young, concerned pharmacist, Andrew Musial, in the heart of Parkdale, a workingman's community in Toronto's west end. I was shocked when Mr. Musial told me he had just received some manufacturers' price lists on prescription drugs which exceeded the Consumer Price Index of 4.4 per cent in 1987. He stated that the prices of some drugs had exceeded 5 per cent and that other drugs were to cost from 20 to 100 per cent more in 1988 than in 1987.

I could hardly believe that such an awful thing could be done, that such bad news could come just after Christmas and before New Year's Eve. And to come so soon after Royal Assent to Bill C-22 on November 19 last year; so soon after verbal commitments in November and earlier by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and other committee witnesses representing the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada that Bill C-22 would limit drug price increases to the rate of inflation.

What many of us on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in this chamber and throughout the country feared all along would happen, did happen. Bill C-22 was, as we felt all along, weak, and the PMAC and minister's commitments were unreliable. That is why the majority of senators in this chamber did not support Bill C-22. I, for one, voted against it.

On February 9, 1988, Andrew Musial, a member of the Society of Independent Community Pharmacists of Ontario, and Jerry Taciuk, a member of the Ontario Health Committee of the Consumers' Association of Canada, who are both present in the gallery this afternoon, brought me their "labour of love" and concern, a report of a study they had conducted along with members of the Society of Independent Community Pharmacists of Ontario. This study related to the extent of the excessive price increases of drugs manufactured by five companies: Janssen, Merck Frosst, Merrell Dow, Sandoz, and Smith, Kline and French. The Musial-Taciuk study confirmed the original fears and suspicions that many drug prices increased 10 to 15 times the annual inflation rate in Canada in 1987.

However, I would like to state that one of these five companies that were studied, Merck Frosst, not only restricted a few price increases to a tolerable level but also reduced prices by approximately 3 per cent on over 90 per cent of their products.

I ask you, honourable senators, how can the PMAC or their individual members justify or even explain why the majority of the pharmaceutical companies belonging to that organization increased their prices to such an extent while Merck Frosst was able to reduce their prices on so many of their prescription drugs? Is Merck Frosst the good boy of the PMAC, or is it the sacrificial lamb of 1988? Why did the majority of the PMAC members break their commitment and Merck Frosst keep it? What about that Code of Conduct for the PMAC members? Does it not honour reasonable drug prices? Was the code breached by any or all or most of the PMAC members? I ask: Is a Code of Conduct for the PMAC members enforceable, or is the PMAC impotent to control the actions of its members?

I also ask: Is the PMAC still a voluntary association? If it is, can the PMAC not afford $350 to incorporate and, therefore, be more in control of its members? What is the PMAC doing about their broken commitments, their betrayal of trust? Why has not the PMAC told their members to voluntarily roll back their excessive price increases for 1988 instead of casting stones; hurting the sick; fleecing the poor; gouging the unprotected; imputing false motives to me; attacking retail pharmacists who cannot protect themselves; and trying to defend the indefensible?

And why hasn't the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs lived up to his commitment? Why does the minister have to be always so subservient to the multinational pharmaceutical industry? Why doesn't he act upon the admonitions that he put in his letter of January 7, 1988, to all the pharmaceutical companies? Why doesn't he also publicly apologize to Musial and Taciuk for using his comfortable parliamentary immunity in the House of Commons to ridicule a properly executed study and report?

It has been said that in that study oranges were mixed with apples. But that is not true. Doesn't the minister know that the federal sales tax is not applicable on prescription drugs, because it was removed by a Liberal government in the late 1960s? The federal sales tax on drugs applies only to non-prescription drugs. It was imposed on the people of Canada by a Conservative Minister of Finance of this present government.

Honourable senators, the increased cost of drugs has fallen heavily upon the poor, the unprotected, the uninsured and the overtaxed consumer of Canada as well as upon the insurance plans and the provincial governments' drug benefit plans.

Since the January 1988 announcement of increased drug prices, Dr. Psutka, the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Ontario Ministry of Health, whose drug plan cost is running close to $1 billion a year, announced that 1,088 drugs had their prices increased by more than 5 per cent—69 per cent of these increases were made by the PMAC companies—and only 31 per cent by the CDMA generic companies, which contradicts the figures given to us by Senator David in his speech of March 15 in this place. It is also a fact that as so many drugs in the Ontario drug formulary are single sourced, the Ontario government will eventually have to pay the total cost of more than the 5 per cent price increases that we have been hearing about. The same burden awaits the other provincial governments across this country.

Furthermore, honourable senators, we have noticed dubious or devious practices by the multinational pharmaceutical companies. It is said by some knowledgeable people in the CDMA that multinational pharmaceutical companies are taking unfair advantage of the public, the provincial governments and the drug insurance plans.

I have been told that the genuine Canadian, solely generic companies have complained about the anti-competitive practice of some multinational pharmaceutical companies, which, apparently, circumvent the provisions of the Ontario Prescription Drug Cost Regulation Act and thereby increase drug costs to the provincial health ministry and the public. They were referring to the incorporation by the multinationals of their own generic subsidiaries for the purpose of offering the identical products at two different price levels.

One example, honourable senators, is the company Syncare, a division of the parent company Syntex. Syncare offers a so-called generic anti-arthritic noprofen tablet under the brand name Naxen for $6.40 per 100 tablets as an alternative to Syntex's Naprosyn brand drug which sells for $20.03—more than three times the cost of the generic brand.

The complaint is that the intent of these companies is to use the so-called "generic brand" to compete at low prices in the generic market without having to reduce the prices of their brand products. At the same time, these multinational companies do everything possible to encourage physicians to write "no substitution" prescriptions for their brand products. This compels the Ministry of Health of any province to pay the "brand" prices under special authorization, notwithstanding that the identical products are available from the same companies under the generic labels at generic prices, which are a fraction of their brand prices. The public is also compelled to pay the exorbitant prices for these brand products, again notwithstanding that the identical products are available under different labels at much lower prices. This practice by some of the multinational pharmaceutical companies has been described by the CDMA as unconscionable, as no knowledgeable consumer would willingly pay the brand price if he or she knew that it was available at a fraction of the price under another label. Similarly, they say that it appears unconscionable for the health ministry, a provincial ministry, to pay for the brand prices under special authorizations when the ministry knows the facts. Such an arrangement has been described by the CDMA as a circumvention of the federal Competition Act.

Honourable senators, in order to meet the challenge of excessive drug price increases in the face of broken commitments by the PMAC and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, further amendments to the Patent Act are urgently required in order to strengthen the powers of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and to ensure that the pricing commitments of the industry and of the government are met. Bill S-15 would require the board to examine, on an annual basis, the prices at which patented medicines are sold in Canada, to note the increases in price, and to make a determination as to whether such price increases are excessive.

Under Bill S-15 these prices could be judged as being excessive whenever their rate of increase exceeds that of the consumer price index. All price increases that occur after June 27, 1986, will also be subject to the scrutiny of the board.

In the event that the board determines any price to be excessive, it must—and I underline the word "must"—take some remedial action, and not "may," as provided in Bill C-22. Under Bill S-15 the new powers could also remove exclusivity from the drug in question or one other patented medicine of the patentee. In the event that the board chooses not to take this action, it can order the price to be reduced to a level which is not excessive and/or limit future price increases in order to recoup the overcharge.

In the event that a patentee has been found to be charging an excessive price for only a short period of time, the board would order a reduction in the price of that drug. However, where a drug has been sold at an excessive price for a longer period of time—12 months or more—the board can limit future price increases in such a way as to recoup the overcharge for consumers.

Honourable senators, I hope that the points I have made illustrate the necessity and the urgency of giving second reading to Bill S-15 and of sending it, without further delay, to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In this way we will be showing our concern and our caring for the disadvantaged people of this country who are unprotected by any drug plans, whether offered by provincial governments or private insurance companies.

Honourable senators, in view of the high cost of the health care system in Canada, which is reaching unmanageable proportions, I urge that we, both in this chamber and in the other place, should act. There is also a necessity to establish a royal commission to examine the high cost of medical services in Canada, including the pricing and marketing practices within the drug industry.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, it is important to pass Bill S-15 since we are facing an impending general election. I therefore urge honourable senators to give second reading to this bill quickly, study it in committee and then send it to the House of Commons without further delay.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I have three questions for Senator Haidasz, if he is agreeable.

Senator Haidasz: Please proceed, Senator David.

Senator David: My first question is this: In a number of English-language newspapers I read that you sponsored pharmacists Musial and Taciuk to carry out the study mentioned in the report, of which I read five pages.

I would like to know whether my information is correct. My second question is—

Senator Haidasz: Senator David, do you want the answer to your first question right away?

Senator David: By all means, Senator Haidasz.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: As I mentioned in the opening remarks of my speech this afternoon, I just happened to walk into a drug store in December in order to shop for an antibiotic, and Mr. Musial brought to my attention a manufacturers' drug price list indicating increases of over 5 per cent for many drugs. Also, some time later the Ministry of Health for Ontario stated that approximately 1,088 of their more than 2,000 listed drugs were subject to this increase of 5 per cent or more.

As I said, I was shocked at this news and asked them to give me some more information. To my surprise, they did. I am sure it took a lot of time and effort for busy businessmen to amass such a study. I thank them for having responded to my request for more information respecting these increases to prescription drug prices of 5 per cent or more, as indicated on the manufacturers' price list.

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Haidasz, I assume from your answer that the pharmacists did the work at your request but on a voluntary basis, free of charge.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, Senator David.

Senator David: Thank you. That was not the impression given in certain articles in the English-speaking press. I am glad to hear it was done this way.

The article I quoted reported that 55 per cent of the products on the list given to the Government of Ontario, the list to which you referred, were generics.

The author of this article, which you have probably read, said that he obtained the information from the Ontario Department of Health, while your information, which was also obtained from that department, mentions a percentage of 69 per cent for innovative companies and 31 per cent for generic products.

Would it be possible to obtain a copy of the list or of the information you have?

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Senator David, I will, with pleasure, supply you with a copy of the letter sent to the CDMA by Dr.

[Senator Haidasz.]

Psutka, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Health for Ontario, stating that according to their figures, 31 per cent of the increases were imposed by generic companies and 68.5 per cent by the multinational, so-called innovative pharmaceutical companies.

[Translation]

Senator David: My third question is as follows: You suggested appointing a royal commission on health care costs, which would include drug costs. If I am not mistaken, one of your colleagues, Senator Argue, asked for a special committee of the Senate on preventive health care, and in fact a committee is being set up.

In that case, would we have a special committee of the Senate and a royal commission working on practically the same subject at the same time?

● (1510)

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, if I understood the motion, and the speech by Senator Argue, to set up the special committee on health care costs, the purpose of that committee is to emphasize the preventive side of health care. Senator Argue is here, and he can elaborate on that matter for you. However, if there is to be a dissolution of Parliament and an election this year, this will take up a number of months, so a royal commission would be better, because it could continue to do its job. A federal election will postpone any work by Senator Argue's committee.

[Translation]

Senator David: Honourable senators, my last question is this: Senator Haidasz, do you think that a report covering five companies, four of which exceeded the consumer price index of 4.4 per cent, is enough to blame all sixty-nine industries that constitute the association of innovative products?

Do you think it is statistically acceptable and sufficient to discuss only the prices of innovative companies, which you refer to as multinationals, and blame them exclusively for price increases?

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, two retail pharmacists do not have the time and the money to compute the price increases of more than 66 members of the PMAC and, who knows, about 30 more other drug companies in Canada. That is why a royal commission could be helpful in this case. Let me ask the honourable senator a question: Why is the Patented Drug Prices Review Board not operational? Why is it not doing any studies? Why is the PMAC not doing any studies on their member companies? Why is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not investigating this matter? They have the resources and money to do so.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate on Bill S-15 in the name of the Honourable Senator Cogger.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to raise a point that may not be terribly important, but I am told that Senator Thériault is not here today but is anxious to speak in this debate.

If I understood Senator Cogger correctly, he is agreeable to Senator Thériault taking the floor before he himself rises to speak to this question. In that case, it might be better to adjourn the debate in the name of Senator Thériault.

[English]

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would have no problem with that proposal.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Orders of the Day:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been informed that Minister Bouchard is now available and waiting outside the chamber. Therefore, I move that the Senate resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and that the minister be invited to appear before us on Bill C-116.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Pursuant to Order of earlier this day, the Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-116, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Benoît Bouchard, P.C., Minister of Employment and Immigration, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to introduce to you the Honourable Benoît Bouchard and Mr. Gordon McFee, Director, Policy and Legislation Development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, as there is no short title for this bill, I now call upon the Honourable Benoît Bouchard.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard, Minister of Employment and Immigration: Mr. Speaker, I have no particular statement to make with respect to Bill C-116, which was passed in the House of Commons. We await the approval of the Senate.

[English]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt clause 1?

Senator Frith: Are we not going to have a brief explanation?

The Chairman: The minister has no statement to make. Would you like to begin questioning on clause 1?

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Mr. Minister, could you briefly explain to us, from your perspective, the purpose of this bill and the nature of the problem that has made this bill necessary?

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, the amendments we are proposing to the Unemployment Insurance Act are based on one specific case that occurred in Kitchener and is referred to as the McInnes case. Mr. McInnes lost his wife upon the birth of his child. He was not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits because of certain provisions of the Act.

We have now added the case of women with a disability rendering them incapable of drawing unemployment insurance benefits, which will allow the husband to do so.

Furthermore, we considered the case of infants, whether or not premature, who must be hospitalized for some time, in which case the mother is forced to "waste" the unemployment insurance benefits she is allowed. Under Clause 6 of the bill, a period of time equal to the period during which the infant is hospitalized may be made retroactive so that the mother will not lose her benefits. That is the gist of the amendments we are proposing to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Marsden: Mr. Minister, could you explain, in a general sense, clause 3(2)(a), which refers to the week immediately following the week in which the mother became disabled? Suppose you had a mother who was in the paid labour force, entitled to unemployment insurance, but who had an on-going disability, which meant that childbirth was particularly onerous. Would that mother's situation make it possible for a father to receive the benefit of these amendments? Have I made myself clear?

Mr. Bouchard: If the mother is entitled to receive benefits, she could not be replaced by the father. We restricted the application to mothers, because that was firmly requested by women's groups who said that if we gave those benefits to fathers, we could face abuses by men who could forcibly insist that women continue to work so that fathers could receive the benefits. When wives are not entitled to receive maternity benefits and yet they are disabled, men are entitled to receive their own, what we call "parental benefits."

Senator Marsden: I am in complete agreement with the women's groups who have argued in favour of mothers retaining their benefits.

Mr. Bouchard: The decision to pass the bill as it is was, because women's groups were worried about the fact that we could transfer the rights of women to men.

Senator Marsden: My point is somewhat different. I am thinking of circumstances—which I hope and trust are highly unusual—where a mother has a disability and giving birth makes it even more difficult for her to look after the child. Therefore, even though she is entitled to benefits, and would be receiving those benefits as a result of maternity leave, but is not because of her disability able to look after her child, would the father of the child then also be entitled to receive benefits? Is that included in the definition of “disability” in this bill?

Mr. Bouchard: No, the only option we would have in those circumstances would be to transform the maternity sickness benefits to sickness benefits. In other words, there would be a change in terms of the benefits she would be entitled to receive.

The Chairman: Are there any further questions?

Honourable senators, shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Mr. Bouchard, I want to thank you for coming here to explain your bill to us, and we hope to see you again.

Mr. Bouchard: It was a pleasure. Thank you, honourable senators.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Bouchard.

[English]

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

[Mr. Bouchard.]

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which Bill C-116, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, was referred, has considered this bill and has asked me to report the bill without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 6, 1987-88

SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-119, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today deals with Appropriation Act No. 6, 1987-88. I wish to thank honourable senators on both sides of the house for their cooperation in allowing us to deal with this supply bill today. It provides supply for all of Supplementary Estimates (E) for 1987-88. The final supplementary estimates for this year total approximately $1.643 billion and brings the total tabled estimates for 1987-88 to $116.8 billion. Supplementary estimates represent approximately 6 per cent of the Main Estimates level for the year.

These estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 3, 1988, and were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 22. These estimates were also discussed with Treasury Board officials on March 9, 1988. The total of $1.643 billion consists of a net increase in statutory requirements of some $882.8 million and some $760.6 million of new spending authority is being recommended to Parliament for approval.

As indicated to the committee, the vast majority of the increase in the statutory requirements is an item of $745 million for public debt charges, bringing the total estimates of public debt payments for 1987-88 to $29,220 million.

There are a number of other statutory adjustments representing a further net increase of $137.8 million.

Honourable senators, the new spending authority being recommended includes the following major items: $200 million returned to the Department of National Defence originally deferred in fiscal year 1987-88; $84.1 million for reimbursement to the Canadian Wheat Board for the 1986-87 barley and designated barley pool accounts deficits; $82.1 million to the Department of Justice as contributions under the Young Offenders Act; and $42.2 million to RCMP for airport security. There are some 46 $1 votes in the supplementary estimates. A listing of those votes containing additional explanation for the last eight votes has been provided to members of the committee. Those votes were discussed with Treasury Board officials at the March 9, 1988, meeting.

Should honourable senators require additional information, I will be pleased to try to provide it. As I have said, the committee has examined these supplementary estimates.

I should also like to add that the bill is in the standard form and contains no surprises of which I am aware.

I should also like to table, and ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings, a list of supply to date for 1987-88 as well as the estimates tabled to date for 1987-88.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I commend these supplementary estimates to you for second reading.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, now that the Deputy Leader of the Government has yielded the floor, perhaps he would answer a question. When the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance was looking at the supplementary estimates, questions were asked about a series of items, and the committee was told that the information sought by the committee would be made available. I wonder if the honourable senator knows whether that information is now available; and, if it is not now available, whether it will be available when we return after Easter.

Senator Doody: The honest answer, Senator Stewart, is that I do not know if it is available at this point. Certainly, I have not seen it; but I will make inquiries and will try to ensure that it is available when we return.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, traditionally, we do not in this place deny the government supply unless there is a very good reason to raise questions about it; also, the National Finance Committee has studied these estimates and reported on them, I believe, without criticism—perhaps someone on the committee will correct me if I am wrong about that. When we couple these facts with the fact that we have the usual undertaking about the form of the bill, it seems to me that the bill should receive second and third reading today—second reading for the reasons I have mentioned, and third reading because the present plan is to adjourn later this week; and it is understandable that the government will want to have supply before we do so. If Royal Assent can be arranged, this will be a convenient day to have it.

I take it from the question asked by Senator Stewart that he is content to have that information appear in due course, having notified the sponsor of the bill of his desire to have that information.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the answer to Senator Frith's question is "yes." Perhaps I should add that I think it is desirable, when the Treasury Board makes a commitment to give additional information, that it should endeavour to get that information to the committee and to honourable senators just as quickly as possible. I realize that the Treasury Board has to deal, in certain instances, with departments, which tend to be contemptuous of questions from the Treasury Board; nevertheless, I think it is a good principle that the government should move as quickly as possible to satisfy these questions. It would be highly desirable if that could be done before the consequent bill is given third reading. However, I realize that there are cases when it is not possible to move as rapidly as that, and certainly in this instance I have no thought that the bill should be delayed until the information has been produced.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Senate for its concurrence in the passing of this bill. As I have said, I will make every attempt to obtain the information for Senator Stewart. I agree that it would be much better if the information were available before the supply bill arrives. However, time constraints sometimes make that impossible. It is our hope that we will have Royal Assent later this afternoon, and, in view of that, we would also ask for third reading. We are getting very close to March 31, the end of the fiscal year. We have certain events scheduled for tomorrow and the following day which make it perhaps more convenient and less awkward to have Royal Assent today and will enable us to proceed without that complication to our business tomorrow and Thursday.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1988-89

SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-120, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1989.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is the appropriation bill No. 1 for 1988-89, the annual interim supply bill, which covers the first three months of the new fiscal year. The 1988-89 estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 9 and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, where they are being studied at the present time. At least one meeting has been held with the minister, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, and I am sure that other meetings will be held as the year goes on.

This appropriation bill contains $1,152 million of "voted" items, which are required to meet government expenditure requirements to the end of June, while the Main Estimates are being reviewed by the various committees—in our case mostly by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. We have had estimates referred, this year at least, to the Joint Committee on Official Languages and we have had the reference vote referred to that committee.

A second appropriation bill will be tabled prior to June 30, 1988, to secure release of the balance of the estimates.

The bill contains a general proportion of three-twelfths of all votes, plus additional proportions for some 33 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments of a seasonal nature in some programs, to meet payments in accordance with certain agreements, and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June.

I should point out that, as usual, in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of the vote.

Honourable senators, the proportions requested in the bill are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the Government of Canada up to June 30, 1988. In no instance is the total amount of an item being released by the bill.

The form of the bill is the usual one for interim supply bills, and, of course, the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee; and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of these estimates.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with those undertakings, and recalling that this is interim supply that is being requested, and since clause 5 of the bill states that:

Amounts paid or applied under the authority of this Act shall be accounted for in the Public Accounts in accordance with section 55 of the Financial Administration Act.

[Senator Doody.]

I believe we should deal with this bill as we did with its immediate predecessor.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on second reading, I should like the schedules setting out the amounts for each department, the three-twelfths, eleven-twelfths, ten-twelfths, and so forth, appended to the proceedings of today for the information of all honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Are you referring to the schedules to the bill?

Senator Doody: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of documents, see Appendix "B", p. 2972.)

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF TURKISH NATIONALS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hébert calling the attention of the Senate to the fate of 1500 Turkish nationals threatened with deportation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.)

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I want to speak about Canada's immigration policy and the government's attitude towards immigration.

Canada has benefited over the years from the arrival on its shores of large numbers of people from many countries of the world. I think it is time once again that, as a nation, we take a broad look at Canada's need for immigrants. We have a wonderful country, a huge country, and a country with a relatively small population. I think we should be looking at a major increase in the population over the next number of years, and that plans should be undertaken to see that that happens.

Much of Canada is virtually uninhabited. Our resources are great. My judgment is that if we double the population of this country over the next number of years we will not only accommodate the increase in population but will also improve our own standard of living.

It seems to me that the government's general attitude on immigration at this time is one of restriction, of making it more difficult for people to come to Canada, of having a long, complicated and time-consuming administrative process. Immigration applications are greatly delayed. Ottawa and Nepean have already benefited from the presence of people who have come from many lands. They are our good neighbours and friends.

I say we should double the number of immigrants. We should raise our sights. When we do that, and when we accept people from many countries of the world, we will enrich our culture. We will add people who have tremendous technical qualifications. They will help increase Canada's production and increase its prosperity. In my judgment, the history of Canada shows that during times of high immigration we have had high levels of prosperity.

Senator Haidasz: Right!

Senator Argue: It is fine to say to prospective immigrants, "We welcome you if you have capital. We welcome you if you are highly professional." We should go beyond that and say that we welcome people in the trades, such as bricklayers and plasterers, we welcome people with general technical qualifications, and we should go even further and welcome large numbers of rank and file citizens from other countries who desperately need to improve their circumstances.

I think we should be very generous and open and quickly process applications from prospective immigrants who have families in this country and who, by coming to this country, reunite with their families. If we do that we will not only help give opportunities to others coming into our country but we will increase our own prosperity and well-being.

We need immigrants for another reason; Canada's birth rate is declining. It is projected that if one does not take into account immigration—if one leaves that aside—and one projects the population of this country based on the trend in birth rates, by the year 2050 Canada's population will shrink from 25 million to 18 million. So there are many reasons for Canada to increase its immigration quota.

If we allow our population to shrink while that same population is aging, fewer and fewer people in Canada will be in their productive years, and it will be more and more difficult for the country to maintain reasonable pension levels and health and other services for an aging population.

I congratulate Senator Hébert on bringing forward this inquiry. This has afforded me an opportunity to point out to honourable senators that it is time the government of this country and the people of this country looked at increasing immigration quotas. That would enrich the cultural life of Canada, increase productivity, and make it possible for many citizens from other parts of the world to have a better life and improved opportunities.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak this inquiry is considered debated.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion for the adoption of the Thirty-fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have circulated copies of this report, as we undertook to do earlier this afternoon. I have only a couple of comments to make about Parts I and II. On Part I, I want to assure Senator Roblin and others that there is budget for the amounts contained in paragraph (1) for Salary and Benefits Revision for Unrepresented Senate Employees on Fiscal year 1988-89. There was an increase of 3.5 per cent—senators will notice that the increase here is 4 per cent—up to 1988-89, and the budget is adequate for those increases also.

Next, on the Taxi Regulations, there has been an increase in taxi fares. Senators have found that even the amount here provided for—namely, $18—may not always be enough to avoid requiring a receipt. The committee felt, however, that $18 was a sensible and reasonable adjustment. Of course, as I implied earlier, this is only the amount that can be claimed without a receipt.

Honourable senators, that is the background and the explanation. I would be glad to answer questions.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 8:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Final Report on the 1987-88 Main Estimates), presented in the Senate on 15th March, 1988.—
(Honourable Senator Marsden.)

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Leblanc for his courtesy in adjourning in my name this debate on the eighteenth report of the committee. Senator Leblanc, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, is so economical, effective and efficient that the report slipped by without review, and there are three aspects of it on which I would like to comment briefly.

Honourable senators will recall that the Eighteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance had to do with our study of comprehensive auditing. It is the aspect of value-for-money auditing on which I would like to comment. There are clearly some benefits to value-for-money auditing, but, on the other hand, in some respects it represents an additional devolution of legislative surveillance to an administrative level of government. In relation to financial and legislative accounting, the role of auditors is clear within the public and the private sector. However, in the value-for-money aspect of auditing, the distinction between the public and private sectors represents a difficulty. It is that difficulty which our report addressed.

Profit making is a clear "bottom line" in the private sector and in many of the crown corporations that are profit oriented, but such is not the case with respect to government departments and agencies. By allowing comprehensive auditing, which has been in the Auditor General Act for a decade now, we have opened public finance to a potential struggle between public officials and auditors over the definition of the limits of policy in departmental activity. The question is where that struggle may end. In similar situations—for example, in the control by experts in law and medicine—it has largely been the relatively powerless groups and members of our society and minorities who have lost out. There was no evidence whatsoever in that evidence brought before the National Finance Committee that auditors dealing in the public sector have taken into consideration the need for sensitivity to the concerns of Canadian minority groups—those defined in terms of language, culture, gender or disability. The definitions of efficiency, economy and effectiveness, which form the bedrock of the value-for-money component of comprehensive auditing, appear to be culture-bound, and the culture they represent is that of white, able-bodied males. As Judge Abella provides in her report "Equality and Employment", they tend to impose their definition of the situation on everyone else.

None of the evidence we received showed that auditors are sensitive to the obligations on federal departments and agencies to comply, for example, with employment equity or pay equity. There is no evidence that they understand or see the complexities of multiculturalism or the culture of Canada's aboriginal peoples. I am not suggesting for a moment and I do not believe that this is deliberate, any more than I think employment practices are, by and large, deliberately discriminatory. On the contrary, this acceptance of the values and beliefs of the majority is systemic—it is built into the daily round of the daily practices at work and it forms part of the subculture of auditing. I suggest, therefore, that this problem has been misinterpreted in our committee report, at page 2041 in the top paragraph. I would like to clarify the report, or, at least, to give my view of the situation on this feature of our report.

First, I do not agree with the report that middle class values are synonymous with those of white, able-bodied males. As Abella points out, white, able-bodied male values come in all class categories, and are not confined to the middle class. Further, I was not one of those committee members who felt that "the element of equity should be considered when establishing criteria for economy, efficiency and effectiveness." I dissent from that statement. I would argue, rather, that public sector commitments to a wide range of policies cannot be considered under the current terms of value-for-money auditing, which is, by definition, narrow, ethnocentric and controlling in its definition and, therefore, must be open to suspicion in its application to public sector goals. Aspects of this problem were addressed by witnesses such as Professor Sharon Sutherland. Indeed, our witnesses—the Auditor General and the Comptroller General in particular—are sensitive and sophisticated in their appreciation of the problem. However, it is their mandate which shows some confusion on the part of Parliament about the meaning of accountability and responsibility.

The decision in the Canadian Institute for Comprehensive Auditing concerning value-for-money auditing standards to allow the auditor to select his own suitable criteria or limit the scope of the examination to those areas in which agreement can be reached is, in my opinion, misleading. Such disputes should be referred to the level of political accountability, and not resolved at the level of auditors and public officials.

Apart from these three specific points of contention I have made, I am in agreement with the conclusions of this report, and have found the study most interesting and edifying. My criticisms of auditors in general, and the Auditor General and Comptroller General in particular, are not intended in any way as comments directed toward them personally. All the witnesses were most helpful and most searching in their comments about their ambiguous situation.

I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify my views on aspects of the eighteenth report of the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak this order is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Henry D. Hicks, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 30, 1988

The Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-76, An Act to provide for emergency preparedness and to make a related amendment to the National Defence Act, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, March 24, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

HENRY D. HICKS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED—MESSAGE TO COMMONS

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its nineteenth report, respecting the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz dated February 11, 1988, and the Message from the House of Commons dated February 3, 1988, relating to certain amendments to Bill C-84, an act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code, in consequence thereof.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 3024.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Neiman: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at great length about this report of the committee, because I think you will find fairly full explanatory notes in the report itself. However, because of the type of report it is, one which includes amendments and amendments to amendments, it may be rather incomprehensible to most people, as it was to members of the committee. We had to take quite some time to work our way through the amendments to really appreciate the different areas with which we were dealing.

I should like to point out to you that this is a response to the message from the House of Commons which dealt with our earlier amendments to Bill C-84. As honourable senators undoubtedly know, the committee took some weeks to hear from various people and organizations—not a great number, but a few of the most significant witnesses whom we had heard previously, who wished to come back to comment not only on the amendments which we had originally proposed but also on Minister Bouchard's response to them.

That was completed, and since then we have had some time to consider the position that we would take.

As honourable senators will note, the committee is recommending in this report that the minister again consider certain provisions in Bill C-84.

We were grateful—as I believe was indicated before—that the minister was very flexible in his response on a previous occasion; but I think it is obvious that a majority of the members felt that there were still certain elements, certain provisions, of Bill C-84 which required further careful consideration.

The minister himself made some amendments; he also made amendments to some of those which we had proposed and he rejected others.

In brief, what we have done here is to ask him to look again at three different clauses of the bill which we considered to be the most important. The first deals with the provisions in the bill relating to turning around at sea ships suspected of containing illegal claimants for refugee status.

The committee continues to feel that even though we wish to deter, as does the minister, any type of abuse of the refugee determination system, this particular provision is so Draconian and so in contrast to Canada's humanitarian traditions that we should not support it. Indeed, our feeling on this has been supported again and again by the various groups who appeared before us and who have got in touch with us by letter and telephone since our first report to ask us to remain firm in this particular area.

The other two provisions that we felt were important were those which a large number of witnesses also felt were of extreme importance to Canada's humanitarian traditions and, indeed, to our Charter obligations. The first of those is the one that covers the threat of prosecution to refugee organizations and other groups that try to assist genuine refugees. The threat was still there and the concern was still there that, in spite of the minister's assurances, these groups which were acting in good faith could be prosecuted.

The minister rejected our amendments to that clause for reasons which, I am sure, he considered sufficient. However, the committee continued to be aware of the implications, especially with regard to refugee-assistance organizations. I think we have arrived at what I consider to be a very good and workable compromise, and that is that we have differentiated between the two clauses that cover possible penalties for aiding and abetting individuals, or groups up to nine in number, and groups of ten and more. We have continued to insist, with some modification, that the minister should not treat humanitarian acts respecting the first group as criminal acts, provided the assistance given was not given in a clandestine manner, and it was done with the conviction on the part of the refugee-assistance organizations or individuals that the claimant had a credible basis for his claim. Therefore, we have modified our original amendment somewhat, but we have agreed that for groups of ten or more the minister's original provision should stand.

The minister has said on numerous occasions that he was very concerned with large groups or hordes of people with bogus claims arriving on our shores or arriving by airplane. So, for groups of ten and over we have agreed that the minister's original criminal sanctions should remain as he formulated them.

There was one other area that caused concern to refugee-assistance organizations and the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees, and that had to do with the determination of security status for certain persons who wanted to claim refugee status. There, again, the minister rejected the amendment that we had proposed, but we have reached what I think is a reasonable compromise. We have simply said that we would accept the minister's reasoning for rejecting our proposal, but we ask that the minister himself sign the security certificate, as he is required to do in similar circumstances for other security matters.

There were other areas in the bill regarding search and seizure about which the committee felt very strongly. However, after considerable discussion in committee, we decided that we would not insist on the amendments we had originally proposed, because we are confident that other provisions in the Criminal Code will serve as, at least, a partial deterrent to using the powers which will be given in this bill, and which a majority of the members of the committee continue to feel are excessive. The thinking is that at least there are provisions in the Criminal Code which will moderate the use of those powers.

Honourable senators will notice that the report is not unanimous. However, I have to say that the majority of the members of the committee felt confident that there is a spirit and conviction within the Senate—a spirit not confined to members on this side—that the minister should reconsider those portions of the bill which we have stressed in this report and which we are asking him to think about again. We hope that perhaps he may be persuaded by the arguments we have put forth.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few comments with respect to this report. I would first like to commend the chairman of the committee, Senator Neiman, the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Nurgitz, and all of its members for their very lively and active participation in the review of the minister's suggestions and proposals with respect to Bill C-84. The intent as set out in this report is very clear. I would like to quote a few sentences, if I may, which appear at page 4 of the report:

We commend the Minister for his flexible response to the Committee's prior Report on this matter. We recognize that significant improvement in the Bill has already taken place. The Committee continues to believe, however, that certain other changes remain essential, particularly if Canada is to adhere to its international obligations. In the past, Canada has been a world leader in refugee matters; those now coming to our shores seeking sanctuary must not face refoulement.

That paragraph concludes with these words:

The Committee wholeheartedly supports the objective—that is, the minister's objective, —of deterring abuse and we feel that the amendments we propose will give the government an effective legal tool to that end, while at the same time preserving Canada's humanitarian traditions.

Honourable senators, there was a very positive consideration of the evidence in our second round of hearings on Bill C-84, which was both strong and sweeping in support of the Senate's amendments. We on the opposition side believe that these amendments are transmitted to the minister and to the other place in a very good spirit in the anticipation that they will be given the positive support that they were given by groups from all across Canada and from one end of the country to the other. Once again, I want to thank all honourable senators who travelled across Canada and who participated in all aspects of the study leading to this report. I think it will be of benefit to the Senate, the government and the people of Canada.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have little to add to what has already been said in this regard. The general problems regarding refugees/immigration and the response of the government to them are of urgent national importance and interest at this time. I think it imperative that the government, through the House of Commons and the Senate, be given the tools it requests to try to deal with these problems. To that end, I commend the committee for its report on this bill and for getting it to us so that we can pass it and send it to the House of Commons for its action.

I would be lax if I did not say that the government side of the Senate would have preferred to see the bill in its original condition. However, the majority of the members of the committee felt otherwise, so we would much rather let the House of Commons deal with the report as it is.

Having said that, honourable senators, I would ask that we send this message to the House of Commons this afternoon and let them deal with it as they deem appropriate.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Senator Doody: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax) that this bill, as amended, be read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I take it that the burden of the report is to say that the Senate is accepting the report, recommending that we insist on the amendments, and that a message be sent to the House of Commons accordingly. Is that what the report effectively says?

Senator Neiman: Yes. We are only insisting on certain amendments. We have accepted other amendments that were in the Message from the minister.

Senator Frith: We will work the procedure out, but I am not sure that we now pass the bill the third time, as amended. I think what we do is simply send the message to the House of Commons telling them that the Senate, on division, is insisting on these amendments. In any event, it will be worked out and done the proper way.

The Hon. the Speaker: I believe the bill has to be sent back, as amended.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Doody: No, a message and the bill.

Senator Frith: There is a debate in jurisprudence on the question that if a message comes to us from the House of Commons, and there is a motion here that we do not insist on our amendments, that motion then goes to a committee. If the committee says that we should insist on our amendments, and the Senate accepts that report, the question at that point is: Where is the bill?

The Hon. the Speaker: As amended.

Senator Frith: There has not been a motion to amend the bill. There has been a motion adopted to send a message back to the House of Commons saying that we have told you what we want to do with this bill and we are insisting on certain of these amendments.

I just raise that question to ensure it is done the right way. If the bill itself does not have to go back, as I suspect it does not, that is the way it should read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this bill, originating in the House of Commons, intituled "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof", has been read the third time and passed, as amended. It is ordered that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has passed this bill, on division, with amendments, to which they desire their concurrence.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday, March 31, 1988, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

BILL C-60—REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN COUNCIL OF MINISTERS OF EDUCATION OF CANADA AND FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS MINISTER

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is really directed to the Honourable Senator Murray in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations and Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I understand that Mr. Roland Penner, on behalf of the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada, wrote to the Honourable Senator Murray in the second half of February and raised with him significant problems that the council felt were in Bill C-60, particularly as they relate to the fair-dealing section of the Copyright Act. Could that letter be shared with the Senate, together with the reply that I am sure Senator Murray gave to Mr. Penner?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly pass that message along to Senator Murray. Senator Sinclair was kind enough to mention this to me as I came into the chamber this afternoon, and there was not sufficient time for me to get any information on it between then and now, but I will certainly pass on the content of the question to Senator Murray. I am sure that he will supply an answer.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCHOLARSHIPS—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I too, would like to ask a question addressed to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. It is a question concerning the announcement of a federal government program of scholarships. This announcement bears the date March 28, 1988. It states that there is to be a program of Canada scholarships, and that these scholarships are designed to recognize and encourage outstanding students to pursue undergraduate degrees in natural sciences, engineering, and related disciplines. In the first year there are to be 2,500 scholarships worth $2,000 each.

My question for the minister is: Will this scholarship money be transmitted directly by the Government of Canada to the several universities, or will the money go to the appropriate departments in each of the several provincial governments? Or, to put it another way, will these scholarships be made available under the banking clause of section 91 of the Constitution Act, as was necessary in the case of the Canada Student Loan Program?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure it will come as no surprise to Senator Stewart that I just do not have the answer at the tips of my fingers, not being all that familiar either with the duties of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations or, indeed, with scholarships. Nevertheless, I will do what I can to get an answer as swiftly as possible.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I hate to think that the minister has been put under detention, but perhaps when he is no longer detained he will deal with the question that I have just now asked, and he will establish the distinction between the Canada Student Loans, a program that has been in effect for over 20 years, and these scholarships. In what way will they be treated as different—if, indeed, they are treated as different—from a constitutional viewpoint?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will try to find out.

LABOUR

ALLEGED UNFAIR APPLICATION OF RAILWAY BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of a report that certain railway workers in Vancouver feel that the back-to-work legislation of last year is being unfairly applied at this time. The back-to-work legislation passed last August that ended a railway strike at that time is being used to lay charges against union members at CP Rail who are now honouring legal picket lines set up by other unions. There is a rotating strike in effect by some 3,500 shop workers. However, when the current railway employees honour the picket line, they are threatened with the penalties that were provided for under the legislation that was passed in August directed towards getting the railway workers back to work.

Honourable senators, at that time the workers went back to work; the operation of the railway resumed. However, the threat has been made that under this legislation fines of from $500 to $1,000 per day will be levied against those railway workers who cross a legal picket line.

My question to the deputy leader is: Would he take up this matter with the Minister of Labour and suggest to him that this matter be looked into, since it does seem to be a wrongful use of legislation that was originally directed towards getting railway workers back to work? Since that primary purpose has been accomplished, this legislation should not now be used in a retroactive manner.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I, obviously, will not comment on the last part of the honourable senator's question as to whether it is proper or improper. However, I will certainly send the content of his question to the appropriate minister and request an answer.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—REACTIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns the Prime Minister's attitude to the emotional and irresponsible reactions to the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier.

Actually, it was not the report, a balanced and well-written document, that upset Quebec's ultra-nationalists and their followers but a single sentence, I would almost say a single word, and I quote:

... the salvation of French, in Quebec or elsewhere, must surely lie in positively asserting its own demographic weight, cultural vigour and innate attractiveness, and not in humbling the competition.

The false impression was given that Mr. Fortier meant the English-speaking community in Quebec had been humbled, while he was, in fact, referring to the language.

Do English-speaking Quebecers feel humbled by the excesses of the legislation and other impositions? I cannot speak on their behalf, but before going any further I want to make myself quite clear: I feel humbled; humbled by the fact that no one in the Quebec National Assembly had the courage to defend the commissioner's right to say what he said and especially by the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada, by his failure to speak out, fuelled the flame of controversy in Quebec and undermined the authority of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

I therefore want to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us whether the Prime Minister intends to stand up for the commissioner and support him when he criticizes certain unfair practices imposed on the English-speaking minority in Quebec, as he did so eloquently in the case of the French-speaking minority in Manitoba.

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I certainly will pass that question on to the Prime Minister, and as soon as I get an answer from him I will pass it on to the honourable gentleman.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to direct a question to the deputy leader, mostly because he is the only person here to whom we can direct questions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is not very flattering.

Senator Olson: I ask the deputy leader to do what he usually does, which is diligently pursue answers to the questions we raise and bring them here. As I said, I do not have any complaint with him, but today I do have a very serious complaint in relation to Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government, because over the past three weeks or so I have raised questions which cover three separate and very important economic areas to western Canada, and particularly to that part of western Canada from which I come, and I have not received any answers.

[Senator Hébert.]

Yet the Leader of the Government in the Senate did, in fact—and I can give you chapter and verse—give an undertaking that he would take the questions as notice and come back with replies. For example, on March 2 I asked him about the Western Economic Diversification Agency, because we wanted to know and to be able to advise people out there as to where they should make application, and so on. I realize that from time to time we can read the comments made in the press about the activities of this agency. In fact, my office receives a communiqué from the minister's office almost every day about some new grant that has been approved by his office. However, honourable senators, that is a wrong way of pursuing this. This matter has not been passed by Parliament as yet. The whole policy has been worked out to such an extent that it is now being administered—which is what appears from the communiqués—so, surely, Parliament ought to know. But they have not yet been advised of the questions I asked about this, and we have not yet been provided with an answer. I think that is some kind of discourtesy, and, if not, it amounts almost to contempt of Parliament to proceed with this without even answering questions.

The second matter I raised, honourable senators, deals with the initial prices that will be paid for cereal grains by the Canadian Wheat Board in the coming crop year. There has been a long-standing practice of announcing these prices early in March so that farmers can make plans to seed whatever they are going to seed, based on this extremely important information, which is part of the information that goes into the management plans. Now, near the end of March, no announcement has yet been made.

I can understand the situation somewhat, because once or twice, when I was in the government, my colleague, Senator Argue, was responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and it was somewhat later than early March when this announcement was made, but, at least, a reason was given as to why that was the case. Usually the reason was that there were rather significant variations in the international market for wheat. That is going on now to some extent, and the price has gone up 40 cents or 50 cents from its low late last year. Yet the minister gave an undertaking that he was going to come back with an answer. It is fairly important to deal with these matters on the floor of the chamber, because there are no members of the opposition in the other chamber to ask questions directly of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board or the Minister of Agriculture. Therefore, I think the government, and especially the minister, has an obligation to come forward with these answers.

The other area I asked about concerned whether or not they were ready to announce government endorsement of a new processing plant for tar sands. Claims are being made by some people that 15,000 person-years of employment would result from this. The minister undertook to come back with the answers as to what stage this was at so that people could make plans. Yet, we do not know when and we do not know what the terms and conditions will be. We know that there is quite a lot of slack in the oil industry, and particularly in the construction sector. It is, therefore, important that we have those answers.

I complain because tomorrow, as I understand it, we will be adjourning until April 18. My experience has been that we do not receive answers from this government during adjournments. I have never yet received from the government during an adjournment an answer to a question that I raised. Therefore, I hope the minister will come in here tomorrow with full and complete replies to all of these questions to which he promised to bring back answers.

I come back to the point that I have to direct this to the messenger, because he is the only person here who can carry that message to the people who, hopefully, have and will provide the answers to these questions.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Before the deputy leader rises in his place, I want to support my colleague.

Senator Doody: I might forget the other question.

Senator Argue: There is no danger of that. In any event, it would have the same result if the questions were forgotten—we probably will not receive any answers in any event. However, we keep trying.

What Senator Olson has been asking of the government is for an announcement of an increase in the initial prices for grain.

Senator Doody: Oh, that is what he was saying. Now I get it.

Senator Argue: There has been a large increase in the price, because the American price on the international market is going up, and that affects the Canadian price. The farmers think that now, when the international price is going up, this government should recognize that and take action to put that money into the pockets of the farmers, come the new crop year. Things are tough out there.

All we have got out of this government in the last few weeks is some new banking legislation which guarantees banks 95 per cent of every loan they make to every farmer.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Argue: That applies even to the consolidation of debts. The act has become a great act for the banks, but it is not of much value to the farmer. It protects the banks against loss. I am sure the farmer would like to see an act which would protect him up to 95 per cent of his income. That would be really wonderful. However, the banks now have that, and we would like a spin-off for the farmers.

My further question is: Why does the Prime Minister of this country not include a demand of the President of the United States that they cease the subsidies on grain on the market? When our Prime Minister is speaking in the United States about the evils, as they are, of acid rain, why would he not include something in that statement in protest for western farmers?

Senator Doody: Another one?

Senator Argue: We have another 12 minutes!

Senator Doody: Oh, I see, we are just filling in time. I am just a preliminary for the main event.

Senator Argue: I would not even put it that high.

Senator Doody: In that case, I am not expected to score any points.

I have to admire the gall of Senators Argue and Olson to stand up there and talk about the lack of action by this government in terms of assistance to farmers. I, a little boy from Newfoundland, sit here next to the minister and I hear about $1 billion for a particular grain assistance program and another $1 billion for another grain assistance program. I wonder how much political clout they must have in the West.

Senator Argue: It is an insurance policy.

• (1440)

Senator Doody: I just sit here and wonder at how much political clout they must have in the West. I must say that it is very interesting to hear Senator Olson say that there is no one in the House of Commons who can ask a question on behalf of the farmers in the West. I find that a very interesting and telling tribute to the western members of the House of Commons, and I am sure that it will go down in the record. Nevertheless, I appreciate fully Senator Olson's concerns. He says that he never gets an answer from the government while this place is adjourned. I am not sure if he is absolutely accurate on his April 18 date. I have not yet heard that verified; but I can take it from him that it may be a possibility. I would not bet on it if I were you, senator, because we have some important legislation left on the order paper.

In any event, I will note the various questions that were buried under that mélange of verbiage and try to pull out the wheat.

I have ten minutes to kill yet. As a practising senator, the least I can do is to add something to the record. Whether or not it is of any value is irrelevant. However, senator, I fully understand your concern. The farmers who have been represented so poorly by whomever will certainly get all the attention they need from this government, as they have done during the past few years. I will certainly try to get the information he needs. Now, if you want to fill up another seven minutes, the floor is yours.

TEACHING OF SECOND OFFICIAL LANGUAGE IN QUEBEC— FUNDING PROVISIONS OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL PROTOCOL

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and in his absence I address it to the deputy leader. Can he tell me if there is any change in the amount of money for the teaching of a second language in the province of Quebec in the new federal-provincial protocol which has just been signed?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, senator, I cannot; but I will certainly try to get that information for you.

THE CONSTITUTION

TIME LIMIT FOR CONSIDERATION OF AMENDING RESOLUTION BY THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Deputy Leader of the Government. It is one which I do not expect him to answer today; but perhaps he could get the research going, because we will require the answer by the third week of April.

As the Deputy Leader of the Government is aware, section 47 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that amendments to the Constitution:

... may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue ... if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution ...

The question is: What is the deadline date, because there appears to be some possible hesitation? When the resolution was passed by the House of Commons, I proceeded to make a calculation, which gave me April 23. Subsequently, I saw in writing some comment that it was April 19. I then asked our legal counsel to verify the date for me. There could be some contention as to whether the day on which it is passed by the House is day one, or is day one the following day? That could have an effect on when our deadline is, and I think we should have a clear understanding in this house as to what the deadline is so that there can be no possibility of disagreement at the final stage.

We might also note that April 23 is a Saturday. If we had not completed our work here by the Friday, would we be able to sit on the Saturday and report on the Monday? What exactly would be the situation?

Senator Bonnell: Three days' grace!

Senator Molgat: I ask my honourable friend if he would undertake to check that and report back to this house so that there can be no possibility of any disagreement when we come to the final stage.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly make inquiries from my side; but I think it might be advisable if Senator Molgat were to consult with the law officers of the Senate and get an interpretation from them. Certainly our own legal counsel and his assistants would be in a position to comment and advise us. April 23 is the date that I have heard mentioned most often, but whether or not it is accurate I cannot say at this point.

Senator Molgat: The interpretation I have is April 23; but the proviso is made that some people could argue that it might be April 22.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, it is important, as Senator Molgat has said, to obtain an answer about the date. However, he has—I am sure inadvertently—used the word “deadline.” There is no deadline on Senate consideration of constitutional amendments under the 1982 formula. No door slams after 180 days. There seems to be an impression that the Senate lacks capacity to deal with constitutional amendments 180 days after the House of Commons passes an amending resolution. That is not what section 47 of the Constitution says. It simply says that after 180 days, if a resolution is not passed, the House of Commons is then free to re-pass its resolution.

So I think it would be useful if we all stopped using the word “deadline.” We should remember that the origin of the word “deadline” is a line that was created, I believe, on Devil's Island. If someone crossed that line he was shot. That is, I think, the origin of the word “deadline.”

Senator Doody: I didn't remember that.

Senator Frith: Well, there you are—a little parenthetical edification for the benefit of Senator Doody. But I think it is quite important that we remember to pick a metaphor other than “deadline.” What happens is that 180 days afterwards no door slams on the Senate. But it is then possible for the House of Commons to open a door and detour the Senate.

So let us not have a misunderstanding that 180 days after the House of Commons passes its amendment we are no longer able to deal with an amending resolution.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REVIEW OF CONVENTION ON CONSULAR RIGHTS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question, which is for the Deputy Leader of the Government, concerns the disastrous fire which occurred yesterday in the Cuban Consulate in Montreal. I am aware of the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Rights, ratified by Canada in 1974, which provides that authorities such as police and firemen in the host country cannot enter consular premises without permission. However, in view of the history of disasters in consular offices in various parts of the country, I wish to inquire whether there might be a review of that convention. For example, I gather that the fire which occurred in Montreal yesterday resulted in the death of three people. That fire could have spread. Interestingly enough, in the report on the fire which appeared in the Montreal Gazette it indicated that the fire occurred across from the residence of our former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Buckwold: Last year there was a five-alarm fire in the Soviet Consulate. In 1972 the Cuban Trade Mission was bombed. The Gazette of March 30 says:

... the Cubans held firemen and policemen off with submachine-guns.

The Cubans were reported to have used the time to destroy documents with acid as one Cuban lay dying of his wounds.

I think that all of us share a concern about this. My question is: Will the Deputy Leader of the Government take up with the Department of External Affairs the possibility of reviewing this particular convention in order to protect Canadian property and possibly Canadian lives?

● (1450)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I appreciate Senator Buckwold's concerns, and I will certainly see that they are passed on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

ABORTION

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government will table in this place or in the other place legislation or proposals, before Easter, regarding the rights of the unborn?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I am not sure I heard the question. I think the honourable senator asked me if I intended tabling in this place or in the other place—

Senator Haidasz: Or the government.

Senator Doody: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Haidasz: It has now been two weeks since the Minister of Justice met with his provincial counterparts. Could the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us whether there was any consensus reached at that meeting regarding the rights of the unborn, and, if no consensus was reached, then what is the policy of the government today? What is the government doing to prevent the killing of 60,000 potential Canadians a year?

Senator Doody: My understanding is that the government is attempting to formulate a policy that is acceptable to Canadians. I am not in a position to say where that stands at this particular time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Deputy Leader of the Government can refer this question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question follows questions I have asked previously with respect to the safety of Maître Wade, the Leader of the Opposition in the Republic of Senegal.

Back in 1983 the President of Senegal, President Diouf, made representations that the election that was recently held in Senegal would follow democratic forms and be free of electoral abuses. It now appears that, based on widespread reports, there were widespread electoral abuses, including the incarceration of Maître Wade and the leadership of the opposition in Senegal.

A number of parliamentarians in Europe have protested to the Republic of Senegal and, through their representatives, to President Diouf that he should release immediately Maître Wade and his colleagues in the opposition party in order to conform to democratic practices.

I understand as well—and this is different from the answer given to us by the government—that impartial international observers were not permitted to scrutinize this election, which makes it reasonable now to assume that election abuses were such that they could not bear the scrutiny of independent observation.

Therefore, I ask the government to make a protest to the Republic of Senegal for the release of Maître Wade and his colleagues, joining other parliamentarians from Europe in this cause.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was just groping through Hansard of the past few days trying to find an answer to that question which I tabled in Delayed Answers. I do not know if Senator Grafstein has seen that answer. In any event, if that is not the information he was seeking, I will attempt to get an update on this for him, but he can let me know.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the answer to which Senator Doody referred is not an answer to the question Senator Grafstein is now asking.

Since the acting leader is following up on Senator Grafstein's question, would he also inquire of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The Senate is scheduled to rise for other business at 3 o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I was just about to raise that point.

Honourable senators, pursuant to order of your honourable Chamber, I do now leave the chair and Senator Molgat will chair a Committee of the Whole.

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, prior to calling in our witness for today, I wish to table the first and final report of the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord.

Senator Doody: The first and final?

The Chairman: Yes, the first and final report of the Submissions Group.

Honourable senators will recall that the Submissions Group was established on February 2 in order to give an opportunity for more witnesses to be heard. The order of reference called for a report on March 30. Therefore, I present the report.

The report itself is fairly brief. I suggest that it be printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate and to Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

In addition to the report itself, I am tabling five copies of the proceedings for the five days on which the committee sat.

Documents tabled.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I move that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of today.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "B", p. 3037.)

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C., was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, our first and only witness today is the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Mr. Trudeau, I would like to welcome you on behalf of all my colleagues.

[English]

I need to say no more about our distinguished witness for today. We are very pleased that you are able to take the time to come and share your expertise in this field with us, Mr. Trudeau. The normal procedure of our committee is to hear an opening statement from the witness and then have questions from the members of the committee. We are prepared to proceed.

[Translation]

So when you are ready, Mr. Trudeau, please proceed.

Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C.: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Just a minute to get my papers, and I will be ready to proceed.

I would like to say, first of all, that today I intend to speak mostly in English, since before the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons I spoke mainly in French. Of course during question period, if there is one, I should be happy to use either official language.

[English]

I would like to say, first of all, that I am extremely happy to appear before the Senate for a variety of reasons. I have been given by you, Mr. Chairman, a generous amount of time. Discussion of the Constitution can sometimes be tedious, but can also be interesting. For my part, I thought rather than get into legal technicalities, which I did, to a certain extent, when I appeared before the joint committee, I would try to put the discussion in historical perspective and show the dynamic forces which are at work in building a country, and try to draw conclusions as to where this particular 1987 Constitutional Accord might lead us.

I am also happy to be in the Senate, because it is the place for sober second thought, and it is my impression that neither the First Ministers nor the members of the House of Commons, for reasons of their own, were able to go into that sober second thinking, the First Ministers because there was a certain amount of euphoria at having brought Quebec into the Constitution, as the expression goes. Therefore, they had a reluctance to look back and say, "Well, we might have made some mistakes and we should correct them"—something, mind you, that was done after the agreement of November 5, 1981. Senators will recall that in the negotiations we had dropped a clause on the protection of equality of the sexes and a clause on the aboriginals. After the thing was signed, it was still possible to put those clauses in without destroying the agreement. As to the House of Commons today, well, it is well known that the three political parties, lest they be accused of offending Quebec, did not want to re-open the accord. Therefore, the second thought, though it might have existed, was not translated into action in the House of Commons.

Incidentally, I think that in itself is a reason to argue that special status or distinct society, or whatever you want to call it, is not really necessary for Quebec. Politically, the importance of Quebec in making or breaking governments is so great that the three political parties did not dare vote the slightest amendment to the accord lest the Government of Quebec, and, perhaps, the people, would not like it. In that sense, then, Quebec has a special status under its place in the Constitution by its electoral force. It was, I think, also slightly futile, since I have no evidence that in the polls, at any rate, there was a surge of support for those who had initiated the Meech Lake Accord. Since then the premiers have gone, and I guess the federal government is not in the best of positions. But the danger of not having second thoughts is that that can bring Parliament into disrepute. That is why I am glad that the Senate will compensate for any second thought that hasn't been in evidence in the House of Commons.

Legislators by profession, if I can say that, are supposed to look at the bills or resolutions, the projects that are put before them, with a view to improvement, if they see faults. It is not expected that they should vote them as they are. If legislators see contradictions or inconsistencies, it is their role to move and vote on amendments. It is a laughable proposition to think that a legislator could be told, "Well, pass the bill, imperfect as it is—you will get some other chance in some other bill to correct it." Yet, in a constitutional matter, where the second chance is very unlikely ever to arise because of the rigidity of the amending procedure, this is what the House of Commons has decided to do—pass a resolution with its known imperfections, its known contradictions or known vaguenesses, which still have to be interpreted, and make no effort to correct them. In that regard, I must say that in reading the joint committee report I was surprised to see at page 51 that that committee calmly envisaged that minority rights under the Charter might be diminished, yet made no recommendations for clarifying or changing that. The report says:

In law, the distinct society clause is unlikely to erode in any significant way the existing extended constitutional rights of the English-speaking minority within Quebec.

Well, as far as reassurances go, that is not the strongest one I have ever heard—“unlikely in any significant way to erode.” It would seem to me that this is a clear case where, at least, every party would have been able to agree or, perhaps, not to agree, but then we would know that the accord was built on a misunderstanding.

The third reason I am happy to be here is that it is the role of the Senate to guarantee a balance in a federation. That is usually understood as protecting the provinces. That is the role of the second or upper chambers in most federations. In that regard, many of you will recall that that was what was done in this chamber in 1978, when Bill C-60 purported to make some changes to the Senate. The Senate really threatened obstruction until we had a clarification of whether that could legally be done by the federal government alone. The government complied, and we sent Bill C-60 to the Supreme Court on a reference. We saw that, in fact, the Senate had been justified in casting doubts on that proposal.

I suggest that in the case of the 1987 accord we are also in a situation where the Senate should be ensuring balance in the federation. This is an accord which transfers large amounts of power from the central government to the provinces. I think I will have time to go into that later on, but since no signing premier is prepared to speak for Canada, nor is any federal political party, and even the Queen herself is forced to say that the accord is a good thing, it seems to me that if balance is to be brought, it should be brought by this house. This Senate can become a focal point for the most important constitutional debate, or certainly one of the most important, in this period of our history.

Finally, the reason I am happy to be here is that the father of the accord, the Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations in this government, sits in this place. I am not sure if he is here or not, but I feel that the debate can be joined in this house between those who support and those who do not support the accord. So far we have had something like a dialogue of the deaf. Some experts have appeared before the joint committee and before this house, arguing that this was good or bad, that this was clear or not clear, and that this had effect or did not have effect. But here is a place where I think we can discuss the thing together, where we can ask each other questions—I hope there will be time for that. If Senator Murray is not here today, he might be here tomorrow, and, in a sense, it will be another dialogue of the deaf, but I feel he and I have already begun our dialogue. I did publish a letter in Le Devoir and in the English press on May 27, 1987. Senator Murray, on May 30, just three days later, replied to my letter, in the Globe and Mail. I had expressed some mild reservations about the accord, and the senator answered in kind with, I must say, a very good letter. I say this without any sarcasm. I have, really, no disagreement on facts that he used in his letter and very few though perhaps major disagreements on opinions. So it was a good letter, and I think I will use it as a theme for the rest of the discussion.

In a sense, Senator Murray alleged that the November 5, 1981, agreement was flawed because it had a dark side, or “un côté ténébreux” is what he said in French, arising from three points. First, obviously, Quebec had not signed that agreement. Second, there was an opting out provision in the amending formula, which I, myself, had denounced as bad, yet here it was. Third, there was a notwithstanding clause, which I also believed was bad and which remained in the Charter. I want to show in the rest of this presentation how those flaws came about. That means going into the history of the negotiations to a certain extent. I then want to show how those clauses, far from being corrected in the 1987 accord, were made infinitely worse. Finally, towards the conclusion, I would like to suggest what can be done by the Senate, by the provinces and by the people to prevent irreparable damage to Canada's integrity.

Dealing with the history of this whole matter, I will not say anything about the earlier years, except to remind everyone of what they know. From John A. Macdonald's day on the history of federal-provincial relations in Canada has been one of frequent disputes and discords between the two levels of government. That is a constant of our history, as it probably is of most federations.

Rather than go into any detail, I will start, as the joint committee did itself, with the Balfour Declaration of 1926, which, you will recall, set Canada on its path to full nationhood.

Essentially, one thing was missing for Canada to achieve that status, and that was the fact that, through no fault of the British government, but because it was a self-imposed obstacle, Canada had not agreed on an amending formula which would permit it to bring back the Constitution and so to have a Constitution of its own. Therefore, in 1927, the year after the Balfour Declaration, MacKenzie King convened a federal-provincial conference—Dominion-provincial conference, as they were then called—and asked the provinces to try to seek an agreement on an amending formula.

I will not read the whole story, of course. I will only read from Professor McNaught's History of Canada, at page 246:

The decade's surge of provincialism was symbolized by a Dominion-Provincial Conference in 1927 at which the Tory Premier Ferguson of Ontario and Liberal Premier Taschereau of Québec joined in proclaiming the “compact theory” of Confederation—a position which would give near autonomy to the provinces and which saw federal powers as being merely delegated to Ottawa by the provinces.

So that ends in failure, and exactly 60 years and eight prime ministers would pass into history before the provinces were able to find a prime minister of Canada who was prepared to capitulate to that view of Confederation—that is, a compact between the provinces to set up a federal government.

I intend discussing that today, but before I do I want to say that during those 60 years federal governments were very active in trying to create a national will, a sense of national identity that would lead Canadians to believe that Canada was more than the sum of the wills of the provinces, but that it had a will of its own—“une volonté générale,” as Rousseau said, or “un vouloir-vivre collectif” is the less heathen way of explaining things. There is some national will which is more than the sum total of the provincial wills.

Various prime ministers attempted in various ways to create this body of values to be shared by the Canadian people. MacKenzie King did it by establishing a network of social security that would bind the people together. Mr. St. Laurent, you will recall, did it, first, by amending section 91, or having the British Parliament amend it, so that Canada, at least in things which did not involve the provinces and language and education, could amend its Constitution.

Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. St. Laurent also, of course, stopped the appeal to the Privy Council so that we had a supreme judicial tribunal of our own. Mr. Diefenbaker brought in the Bill of Rights. He was unable to constitutionalize it, because his minister, Mr. Fulton, had not been able to get the provinces to agree to a formula for amending. Therefore, Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights, which was certainly a nomenclature of values which bound Canadians together in the sense that they all shared certain basic beliefs, was never put into the Constitution, but it remains as an important law.

Mr. Pearson attempted, with the B and B Commission, to seek ways in which the dissatisfaction of the French-speaking people in Canada—and, to a certain extent, some ethnic groups—could be met in a way which would not divide Canada but which would, rather, create dualism, which, as we shall see later, is what the 1987 accord does. Dualism, by definition, is a division of people. Mr. Pearson was proposing bilingualism, which is a quality of individuals or institutions which tends to unite them rather than separate them. Of course, one of the more recent prime ministers brought in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which was entrenched in the Constitution and which was meant to create a body of values and beliefs that not only united all Canadians in feeling that they were one nation but also, in a sense, set them above the governments of the provinces and the federal government itself. So, they have rights which no legislative body can abridge, therefore establishing the sovereignty of the Canadian people over all our institutions of government.

But all of them—indeed, all of us failed in our attempts to assert the national will by patriating the Constitution. The reason is very simple to explain. Every attempt was predicated on the idea that patriation and an amending formula—and, even more, a Charter—could only proceed with unanimous consent, that is, the consent of each and every province. So there was no national will possible beyond that defined by the 11 First Ministers. Of course, that permitted every province to hold the country to ransom by saying, “Well, I will agree to patriation which is, perhaps, good for the Canadian people. It's the way to express ourselves as a nation. But I will only do it if you give me some rights in exchange.” I do not like to use the word “blackmail,” but certainly there was a process of leverage being used which ended with the result that Canada could only exist as a full and complete nation by leave, not of its people but by leave of each and every one of the ten provinces.

The story goes on and time goes by, which it does in this place also. I have figures from National Accounts-Income and Expenditures, July 1965, table 37. There was a period in the early 1950s to the middle 1960s where there was an extraordinary amount of growth in the provinces for reasons which everyone knows—new areas of legislation were coming into play, and the provinces say that it was within their jurisdiction. They were acting to replace the private concept of schools and hospitals. In a sense, there was a complete reversal of the proportion between federal and provincial spending. From 60/40 federal-provincial, it had gone to 40/60 federal-provincial during those years. The provinces were not only spending a lot and taxing a lot, although some of it was tax from the federal government and they got it by way of remissions, but the provincial governments grew proudly; they developed expertise; they had competent bureaucracies; and they felt they could manage their own affairs and also manage all of the affairs that, until then, had been managed by the federal government.

This is just a continuation of the tensions which, I recall, had begun in John A. Macdonald's day of a struggle for power, a struggle for money, and generally a struggle for both between both levels of government.

In post-World War II a whole new operation was put into place. The provinces began acting collectively to force the federal government to transfer powers to them in exchange for their consent to patriation. We start with the Fulton-Favreau formula of 1964. The repatriation process came unstuck, because Premier Lesage and his principal minister, René Lévesque in those days, both backed out of an agreement that they had not only agreed to but they had also begun to publicly defend. They were made to understand that they might have a good amending formula, but they had not won more powers for Quebec in the process and, therefore, they backed out.

Two years later Premier Daniel Johnson, whose slogan was “Equality or Independence!”—presumably, equality between the two nations or independence of one from the other—was demanding all the powers needed to safeguard Quebec's identity “in the preparation for what was to be the Robarts Conference—Confederation For Tomorrow” held in Toronto in 1967.

It then came to June 1971, when Premier Bourassa withdrew from the patriation agreement that he had proposed—a formula that he had actually worked out, in which he got a lot of other things for the provinces, including some role in the nomination of judges, and so on—alleging that in exchange he should get something of substance in the social area. In concrete terms, that meant, for instance, that in Family Allowances the federal government, which taxes the money in order to pay them out, would hand the money to the provinces and they would hand them out, courtesy of the provincial government, in a way which might be different for socio-economic reasons in that province. We had a minister, Marc Lalonde, who had worked out an administrative arrangement whereby that might be done without actually transferring power and money, just permitting the province to decide how it should be distributed. That worked well, but it was not a constitutional amendment, and therefore it was not enough. We will have the same story later on when we come to immigration agreements. It is not enough that the provinces get to manage their own affairs; they want it to be put into the Constitution so that the federal government actually gives up its power forever rather than just signing a contract.

By 1976 Mr. Bourassa had added cultural sovereignty for Quebec, but by then every other premier had caught on, because every premier realized that his consent was needed to patriate the Constitution. Therefore, he would trade his consent for as much power as he could get in whatever area he thought was important for his province. In other words, each province was in the position to exact its own price for permitting the Canadian people to have a Constitution of their own.

So that I am not talking too abstractly, at this point I will read the provincial demands put together at the interprovincial conference in the summer of 1976, chaired by Premier Loughheed. This is the list taken from the 1976 consensus. You will see a familiar number of items in this particular list, which dates back to 1976. It covered the following areas: immigration; language rights—they were dealt with in the accord of 1987; resource taxation—that was dealt with in 1982; the federal declaratory power—that is section 92(10)(c) of the Constitution, which could only be used with provincial consent; annual conference of First Ministers—that was dealt with in the 1987 accord; creation of new provinces—we get that in the accord, too; culture, which really was saying provincial paramountcy in culture and all the arts, literature and cultural heritage. The federal government could deal with it, but there would be federal-provincial paramountcy. That was dealt with also in 1987. Then there was communications. I will read you some speeches later on from Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Rémillard, saying that in culture and communications they feel they have achieved what they want with the “distinct society” clause. The Supreme Court of Canada was included in the 1976 list; the federal spending power—also in the 1976 list; and regional equalization, which we had dealt with in the 1982 accord.

You can say one thing for the provinces: they are bloody consistent! I do not mind saying, as a Quebecer, that Quebec's hand is clearly seen behind all of this. After all, it was Quebec's five demands at the 1987 accord, which proves that we Quebecers are quite consistent in our opinions—and I am one of them! That is the story of 1976.

Let us go to the summer of 1978. The interprovincial conference was chaired this time by Premier Blakeney, a Social Democrat. The first one I mentioned was chaired by a Conservative; this one was chaired by a Social Democrat, but he had been joined by a Separatist, Premier Lévesque. As he came to the conference, Quebec made a declaration. Quebec said that, while committed to its option of sovereignty association, it could generally go along with the 1976 consensus and most of the other constitutional points raised in Regina. We will come to those. Quebec went on to state that “this approach falls within the mandate of the Quebec government to reinforce provincial rights within the present system and also illustrates some of the minimal changes required to make the federal system a serious alternative in the forthcoming Quebec referendum”—forthcoming, but some four years later.

What were these “minimal changes”? Here is the 1978 consensus: “In addition to the 1976 list”—that I have just given to you—“the premiers, in the course of their discussion in Regina, have reached agreement on a number of additional substantive matters on which federal views are invited. First, abolition of the now obsolete federal powers to reserve or disallow provincial legislation.”

Well, obsolete, but maybe some people sitting in Ottawa some day will be glad that they are still in the B.N.A. Act, in the Constitution Act, because it may be the only way that at some point you will be able to disallow some provincial acts which attempt to destroy the federal government. Nevertheless, in 1978 the provinces were asking for the abolition of that.

“Second, a clear limitation on the federal power to implement treaties so that it cannot be used to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction.” We are hearing about that nowadays.

“Third, the establishment of an appropriate provincial jurisdiction with respect to fisheries.” Well, we have that in the agenda of the next conferences.

“Fourth, confirmation and strengthening of provincial powers with respect to natural resources.” That was done in 1981, and, incidentally, for those who say that the provinces got nothing out of 1981—and I will come back to that later—quite a bit of power was transferred from the federal government to the provinces by the November 1981 accord, which became the Constitution Act of 1982.

“Fifth, full and formal consultation with the provinces in appointments to the superior, district and county courts of the provinces.” That would be the next step.

“Sixth, appropriate provincial involvement in appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada.” This is a modest agenda, as you will see.

“Further, there was a consensus that a number of additional matters require early consideration: the federal emergency power; the federal residual power dealing with peace, order and good government; the formal access of the provinces to the field of indirect taxation; amending formula and patriation"—I am prepared to discuss that—"and the delegation of legislative powers between governments. All premiers expressed grave concern that section 109, concerning provincial ownership of natural resources, had not been carried forward into the proposed new Constitution."

So, after this modest beginning in 1976 and 1978, so it went until we reach September 1980.

What happened in September/October of 1980? By that time it had become obvious that the greed of the provinces was a bottomless pit, and that the price to be paid to the provinces for their consent to patriation with some kind of an entrenched Charter—which had been requested as far back as 1971 in Victoria—was nothing less than acceptance by the federal government of the "compact" theory, which would transform Canada from a very decentralized, but, yet, a balanced federation, into some kind of a loose confederation. That is when our government said, "Enough. We are going to move unilaterally and we are going to give the people their Constitution and their Charter of Rights. You can like it or lump it, but this is what we intend to do," and honourable senators know the rest of the story: The matter went to the courts—and I will come to that in a moment.

Quite frankly, the reason we were determined, and almost desperate, to move without paying this enormous price that the provinces had brought to me in September of 1980 was that we had promised renewal of the Constitution when we were fighting the referendum. At that time we had said we would put our seat at stake, that we would bring renewal. However, I will come to that in a moment.

Honourable senators, let me just read the somewhat immodest agenda that was put before the federal government in September of 1980 by all of the provinces. Quebec had made a proposal and it became a common stand of the provinces. It was discussed by the provincial ministers on September 11, and then by the premiers at breakfast on September 12; it was then brought over to the Prime Minister of Canada the same day, and here is what the Prime Minister of Canada was told would need to be done to the Constitution if we were to proceed some day with patriation:

The provinces of Canada unanimously agree in principle to the following changes to be made to the Constitution of Canada. It is understood that these changes are to be considered as a global package and that this agreement is a common effort to come to a significant first step towards a thorough renewal of the Canadian federation.

I do not intend to read all of the details of it, but on the list there is natural resources; communications; Upper Chamber; Supreme Court of Canada; judicature, which repeals section 96 which permits the federal government to appoint judges of superior and provincial courts; family law; fisheries; offshore resources; equalization. Then when we come to item 9, "a Charter of Rights;" at last I was getting something, but it had to be brought in with a non obstante clause, and with a clause that all existing laws would be deemed valid. In other words, it was grandfathering government rights over the people.

Under item 10 we would get patriation, but with the Alberta amending formula, which, in the event, was the one that we ended up with. Item 11: powers over the economy; item 12: a preamble. That is a Quebec proposal, which I might take time to read to you, but you will not like it.

The document that I was handed at that time goes on to say:

If a satisfactory interprovincial consensus is reached in this way, it must be accompanied, when tabled, by announcement of the following measures:

As soon as the federal government has given its assent to this consensus, the matter will be returned to the ministers for drafting;

Another list of subjects must be established to be covered by the constitutional discussions at the ministerial level in the following months. These subjects are: The horizontal powers of the federal government—spending power; declaratory power; power to act for peace, order and good government—culture; social affairs; urban and regional affairs; regional development; transportation policy; international affairs; the administration of justice . . .

And so on. Therefore, I do not think history will blame us for having said, "Enough; we are not going to trade all of these things just so that the people of Canada can be sovereign in their own land." After all, we had won the 1980 referendum by making a promise of renewal, and it had become obvious that the rule of provincial unanimity, particularly with a Separatist premier heading the government of Quebec, would continue to render impossible the first step towards renewal, as it had, indeed, without interruption since the 1927 conference.

Therefore, in a sense, we were in a Catch 22 situation. The federal government was told that it must renew the Constitution, and that had begun with Premier Robarts' meeting in 1967. I am not saying that he was saying that, but that is what the meeting was saying. Therefore, the federal Government of Canada must renew the Constitution, but, on the other hand, they must be prevented from renewing the Constitution until the federal government gave the provinces all the power they were asking for. In other words, the renewing of the Constitution could only mean one thing: transferring more powers to the provinces.

There is an allegation that is frequently made not only by Quebec nationalists but by more serious people such as academics. It was made by the Prime Minister of Canada; it was made by Senator Murray in an article that he sent to La Presse and to the Globe and Mail on June 15. I only have with me today the French copy, but let me read it:

[Translation]

The solemn promise made to Quebecers during the referendum that federalism would be renewed and the Constitution amended to reflect the distinct identity and aspirations of Quebec was unfortunately not kept.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney said the same thing on October 21 of last year, which is quoted in Hansard. At that time he said that the federal forces—and I know who he means—had promised that we would renew the confederation, and, in order to prove our good faith as reformers, the allegation is made that we would have had to bring in renewal of a kind that would carry the assent of the very premier, Mr. Lévesque, who was taking his province out of Canada.

If the absurdity of the circular reasoning contained in that proposition is not obvious, let me state it otherwise: I had been writing, speaking and publishing for some 20 years against any form of special status, such as two nations or the two-Canada concept. Of course, I never said that I would renew the confederation or renew federalism by giving Mr. Lévesque what he wanted and by giving the provinces what they had asked for in this enormous list of September 1980. I said we would renew the federation, and anyone who had listened to my campaign speeches or the debates on federal/provincial affairs could not possibly assume and, in turn, write in good faith that we had promised to give Quebec some form of “distinct society.”

[Translation]

“distinct identity and aspirations of Quebec, unfortunately that promise was not kept.”

[English]

Honourable senators, how could it reasonably be inferred that I was attempting to win the referendum by setting Canada on a course that I consistently had denounced as deleterious to the integrity of Canada; as deleterious as even losing the referendum itself would be? I really take objection to not only Senator Murray but to the Prime Minister and the devil of a lot of academics in implying that, somehow, we had made promises to give the Province of Quebec, in a reformed Constitution, what the Separatists and some ultra nationalists were asking. There was no point in winning the referendum if we were going to give to those who had lost it everything they were trying to get by winning it.

We proceeded unilaterally and the resolution we introduced on October 10, 1980 contained none of the flaws which Senator Murray says “tainted” the November 1981 agreement with the provinces. There was no opting out; there was no notwithstanding clause; and, of course, Quebec would have been in on the same basis as every other province. I have here the October 2 proposed resolution for a joint address, but, of course, I will not read it. However, let me point out two things. Sections 1 to 30 set people above governments. They were getting a Charter with no notwithstanding clause in it. That was the first step in our history to recognize the sovereignty of the people, but, through the amending procedure, it was done even more clearly, because what it says in this resolution is that if we cannot get unanimity on an amending formula—we were hoping it would be the Victoria formula—then we would ask the people to decide what amending formula they wanted.

We would give them a choice. Either the people would vote for an amending formula put forward by the provinces—and to make it a serious one there had to be eight provinces agree on an amending formula, and there was a “gang of eight” which was developing, so it was not a figure taken out of thin air—or an amending formula put forward by the federal government which, in our view, was going to be the Victoria formula—it says so in the resolution. However, it could have been changed as a result of negotiations. The people would have had a clear choice.

This was recognizing the sovereignty of the people over the fundamental act of the Constitution, but, better still, we had a section 42, which also set up a referendum process in a free-standing way so that at any time, if there were a deadlock in Canada, the people, as in most democratic countries, could be called upon to express their views. That is what we put before the people and the Parliaments in October of 1980.

You will remember what happened. Three provinces asked for a reference to the Supreme Court, saying that we could not do it unilaterally. A lot of Indians and premiers went and had dinner in London. There was a House of Lords committee saying that we were very nasty, but, until the Supreme Court judgment in the middle of spring, we were doing what seemed, at least to me, what circumstances had forced us to do after 54 years, that is, from 1927 to 1981.

If Canada could not give itself a constitution of its own, perhaps we should ask Britain to give it to us. Margaret Thatcher, God bless her—I do not say that on everything—told me, “If the Canadian Parliament asks me for something and it has a majority supporting a resolution, there is nothing much I can do to prevent it.” I think the Britons had in mind—and, I think, wisely—no independence without majority rule in Rhodesia, which became Zimbabwe.

However, the courts decided otherwise; they decided that what we were doing was legal, but, you will recall, they decided it was not conventional by virtue of a convention which was so obscure that they could not define it. They knew that it did not have to be all provinces, but they knew that, somehow, two provinces was not enough. However, they did not know how many in between. That was a vague convention, to say the least. They said it was legal, but it was not nice. Since I was known to be a person who liked to do things nicely, I met with the provinces again and we hammered out the November 5, 1981 agreement. It had the flaws in it that Senator Murray deplors. It had other flaws. I note that Professor Tony Hall was before you recently saying that aboriginal rights had been left out in the bargaining with the provinces. I could add, too, that women's rights had been left out, not in our draft of September, 1980, but in the negotiations with the provinces. Two of them wanted Indians and women excluded; so, in order to get our Constitution and the rest of the Charter, we took them out.

They, too, were put back in after the signature of November 5, and that is why I return to the Meech Lake and Langevin Block agreement. Everybody signed that original accord on November 5, 1981, but, still, we were able to improve it to help women and the aboriginals. Something like that happened between Meech Lake and the Langevin Block. If that could happen, one wonders why other amendments, which were necessary, could not have been brought in.

I think it is important to say here that the November 5, 1981 agreement, which became the Constitution Act, 1982, gave a lot of new powers to the provinces, including Quebec. Apart from the Charter and patriation which we were getting, that agreement of 1981 was based essentially on the Alberta amending formula and on various agendas that I read to you which did several things to transfer powers to the provinces.

Remember that the November 1981 accord did not give any power to the federal government. In a sense, it limited the power of all governments, federal and provincial, by a charter, but it actually transferred a lot of power from the federal government to the provincial governments. It did so in the area of natural resources, giving the provinces the power of indirect taxation and the power of external trade. It entrenched equalization payments. These are all things that Quebec had been asking for since 1976 and beyond. I am sure you will remember the list I read to you. It included more power over natural resources, equalization and the right to opt out of certain constitutional amendments, which I had not offered in the Victoria formula, but which the provinces demanded. Well, they got it. They got the right to opt out of certain constitutional amendments, which was something that, until then, they had not had under the British North America Act.

More important still, under section 41 they gained the right of a constitutional veto that no province alone had until then. That is the famous section that gives a veto to each and every province over everything federal: the Supreme Court, the Territories, the House of Commons, the Senate, and God knows what else. Every province can stop the federal government and a national consensus from reaching reform on those areas. Until then, under section 91, the federal government could, at least, amend all those things.

There was a vast amount of new power given to the provinces from the list drawn up by the "gang of eight," of which Quebec was one of the more notorious members, so, to those who say that Quebec got nothing I would point out that they did not say, "Thank you," but they got a lot.

I can come back to that, but I know that time goes on. That is how we get to Quebec's five demands. They had not got everything in November of 1981. Quebec came up with five demands, and that was called the "Quebec Round." Mind you, on every one of those demands the federal government had made some concessions and offered some concessions in the past, during the 1968-1980 negotiations. Therefore, I completely understand Premier Bourassa saying, "Well, this is our package. We were offered something before. We got a lot in 1981, but we would like some more, since you offered it in the past. Let's get it now." The situation was different from our point of view, because we had offered a lot, bargaining to get a Charter of Rights in the Constitution. No, Quebec was not offering anything in exchange that I know of, but it was bargaining for five more powers in five more areas.

I want to examine them in detail, because frequent allegations have been made that the 1987 process flowed naturally out of the 1968-80 negotiations. I have the quotes of Mr. Mulroney, Senator Tremblay and practically all of the members of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. I have all of these quotes, which I can get into, but they all say, "Well, after all, the Trudeau government had offered all of these things. What is the big fuss, that they are objecting now to the fact that we are giving them at Meech Lake and in the Langevin Block?"

I want to go into some detail with each one of these five demands to show that the way they were met in 1987 brought Canada diametrically into an opposite direction to the way in which Canada would have gone in each of the other cases. In other words, when, between 1968 and 1980, we were offering certain concessions to the provinces, it was always in a way which was not destructive of the national will, of the reality that there was a Canadian "vouloir vivre collectif" which would bind everyone, even if everyone and his brother had not said, "Yes, okay." In other words, we were never doing it in a way that unanimity would have to prevail.

I will take the demands in turn. I will start with the veto on constitutional amendments. Well, of course, before Meech Lake—that was the first demand—there was no veto for Quebec; and the Supreme Court made that quite clear—when the matter was brought before it in 1982; and the judgment was in early 1983—that there never had been a veto for Quebec or for anyone else. There was some kind of convention, that you needed more than a couple of provinces, but none had an absolute veto.

We offered a veto to Quebec in the Victoria Charter. It was a formula—I will not go into details again—which essentially called for the federal government and six provinces. Quebec had a veto, and everyone agreed, except Quebec! But Quebec had proposed it. It was Quebec and six provinces; but the idea of a national will was defined at least in a way which did not permit every province to exercise some form of blackmail.

We offered that formula throughout the 1970s, including in the October 10, 1980 draft. But it was rejected by Premier Bourassa in 1971, and it was rejected by Premier Lévesque and the "gang of eight" in 1980 and 1981. What they were asking for was something not unheard of but something that had been offered to them and all the rest of Canada. But they did not want it. Why? Because as soon as they said "Yes" to something, then we would have a Constitution and they would not be able to use that leverage to get more.

So I take exception to Senator Murray's saying that I proposed unanimous consent on March 31, 1976. On the page that I am looking at, it says, "Senator Murray says that..." Senator Murray, in his testimony on August 4, at page 286 of the proceedings, said:

I should note that applying unanimity to this narrow range—

He is talking about section 41:

—is much more modest than the March 31, 1976 proposal of Prime Minister Trudeau, which would have required unanimous consent for all major amendments.

I never proposed that. Senator Murray or his people misread the letter that on March 31, 1976 I sent to Premier Lougheed, with a copy to all premiers. I will not read it all. It comprises several pages. Let me sum it up, and I challenge Senator Murray to contradict it tomorrow—if someone wants to work all night to look that up.

What I suggested was three methods of getting patriation with an amending formula. One called for unanimous consent, in which I say, "This approach would introduce a rigidity which does not now exist." Then I suggested two other methods: "The second and preferable alternative would be . . ." and so on. Then I said that "A third and more extensive possibility would be to include . . ." and so on. So there are three possibilities there. I sum it up by saying:

As you can see, in my letter to Premier Lougheed, there are several possibilities as to the course of action now to take. So far this is clear. So far as the federal government is concerned—

My preference:

—our much preferred course would be to act in unison with all of the provinces. Patriation is such an historic milestone and it would be better if we could get unison.

I read on:

But if unanimity does not appear possible, the federal government will have to decide whether it will recommend to Parliament that a joint address be passed seeking patriation.

What I am saying, in essence, is that we would like unanimity to get the thing back with an amending formula, and we are prepared to wait for unanimity to get it back with an amending formula; but the amending formula itself will not call for unanimity.

So, for Senator Murray to say that Trudeau's proposal would have required unanimous consent for all major amendments is wrong. I was still saying in 1976 that we need to get everyone in in order to get it back from Great Britain. But, once it is back, no unanimity rule; the Victoria rule.

With Meech Lake there is no national will left. Any province can opt out of a constitutional amendment transferring power to the federal government and get full compensation. So a province can opt out in the matter of powers. But then, more importantly, under section 41, any province has a veto; any province can prevent a constitutional amendment wanted by nine other provinces and the federal government on all federal institutions of government—as I said, the Senate, the House of Commons, the Supreme Court and the Territories.

When you remember that some of the western provinces are not, shall we say, all that cooperative with the desire of natives to achieve some of the aboriginal and native rights, it is, I think, wrong to have given each province the right to prevent the Government of Canada—and perhaps six or seven other provinces—from exercising the right to agree, for instance, that the Territories should be established into provinces so that in some way the place where the majority of the native people live could achieve some form of self-government, as the provinces themselves had.

So that is why I say that with Meech Lake, on the first Quebec demand, the solution was not like our solution, which respected the idea of a national will binding all; but it was a solution which destroyed the existence of a national will and submitted it to the unanimous consent of every province.

The second Quebec demand was on limitation of the federal spending power. Before Meech Lake we had made a proposal in June of 1969 which, once again, was predicated on the existence of a national will, and we defined it then as "an affirmative vote on a majority of senatorial divisions," which could mean five to seven provinces plus the federal government could establish a shared-cost program in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Under that proposal, if a premier did not want to go along, he was not forced to go along, but, rather than have compensation, as we have in the Langevin formula, the federal government would give the money back to the people so that provincial popular sovereignty would have been respected in the sense that the people would not have been penalized because some premier wanted to thwart the national will.

That is a lot different from what came out of Meech Lake, where there is no effort to seek to establish a national will. On the contrary, there is encouragement given to provinces that want to opt out of national programs by compensation, providing the province carried on "a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objective." Who sets national objectives? Is it Parliament, or is it the 11 First Ministers? That is something that should be clarified before the members vote on this, and what does "compatible" mean? Is it something which is not a complete denial of the federal program, or what?

The third Quebec demand was a provincial role in appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. Before Meech Lake, the B.N.A. Act, of course, in section 101, stated that all aspects of the Supreme Court were under the jurisdiction of Parliament.

In the 1971 Victoria Charter, article 27 provided for, as Quebec was asking in its third demand, a provincial role in appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. That did not work out with Quebec and the other provinces and it had been agreed to. What was it? It was that the Attorney General of Canada would always consult with the attorney general of a province from where he proposed to appoint someone to the Supreme Court of Canada. If there was no agreement, the Attorney General of Canada would set up an electoral college, appointed in agreement by both sides, and chaired by someone, if they could not agree, appointed by the Chief Justice of Canada. So there was a proposal for an electoral college to which the federal government would submit three names that had been tested with the province, and that college would choose one.

This was provincial involvement; it might not have been enough, maybe it was too much, but, at any rate, it was provincial involvement of a kind that had been rejected by the ten provinces at Victoria. What we did in Bill C-60 in 1978 repeated somewhat the same scheme.

What is in Meech Lake? The federal government gives up its absolute power under section 101 of the B.N.A. Act by having to select judges exclusively from a provincial list. The Meech Lake Accord, in section 101C.(1)—and I am sure you have all read it again and again—states that the government of each province “may” submit names, and the federal government “shall” appoint a person whose name has been submitted. That is what I call remote control of the Supreme Court by the provinces, but it may mortally wound the Supreme Court because of the not unheard of proposition where a province wants to break up Canada and be a spoiler. It says the province “may” submit names, but what if it does not? Is there some emergency power that will permit us to break the Constitution and fill the vacancies on the Supreme Court anyhow? Or does it mean that, for instance, in the example I have in mind, if Premier Lévesque were operating under this and there were to be six out of nine Supreme Court judges all named by the Anglos, with many cases coming on from Quebec—and they would be judged fairly, I am sure—but to the extent that the judgments were not favourable to the Quebec government, you can imagine the kind of mess it would make, apart from the fact it is doubtful whether the court could operate legally if it had, over a long period of time, only six out of nine judges sitting. So there is no provision for breaking that kind of logjam.

As you know—and I will not go into it, because it is not one of Quebec's five demands—the same applies to the Senate. Some of us in this place—if I can say I am in this place, at least, for this afternoon—were in the House of Commons when one man, Gilles Grégoire, was able to cause a devil of a lot of obstruction by refusing unanimous consent on a lot of things. He really slowed down the work of Parliament. So what would it be if a province sent up twenty-four or six or ten senators? It would be something like when the Irish Home Rulers disrupted the work of the British Parliament.

So I do not think it is a satisfactory way of respecting or establishing the national will. Certainly it is not fair to say, since I had proposed something on the Supreme Court, I should not object to this particular way of appointing judges. That is like saying: You do not mind if something is white. Why object if something is black?

The fourth demand of Quebec was for a greater provincial role in immigration. Before Meech Lake, section 95 of the B.N.A. Act said that Parliament may make laws in relation to immigration with all and any of the provinces, and provincial laws shall have effect only as far as they are not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

But we recognized that the provinces, though in a subordinate position, had particular demands as to what kind of immigrants they would need for work purposes or language purposes, so we made contractual arrangements. We made them with Quebec, and we made them with other provinces. Otto Lang began in 1971, Robert Andras in 1975, and Bud Cullen in 1978. They were agreements which were renegotiated from time to time to meet different circumstances, but there was no transfer of constitutional power. In fact, because they were contracts they could be changed and renegotiated, but an immigrant who comes to a province is also an immigrant who comes to Canada. You don't cease to come to Canada just because you are going to a province. Most immigrants come to a province because they want to be Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, our contracts were in respect of the national will of Canadians.

What do we have with Meech Lake? Well, the federal government gives up much of its paramountcy, but it gives it up irreversibly. Once a contract has been signed it will be constitutionalized, so the accord says, and it can only be changed by using the constitutional amending formula, which means that any province can prevent an accord which is favourable to it from being amended in the slightest way.

There are some funny provisions in there, but I will not go into them in detail. Again, there is a guarantee in the Langevin Block agreement that Quebec will be guaranteed a share of immigrants proportionate to its share of the total population of Canada. What happens if people don't want to go to Quebec? Presumably, that means the other provinces cannot take the immigrants they want, because they will be diluting Quebec's share, but, also, Quebec has a right to have 5 per cent more, and similar agreements may be signed with all other provinces. How you can guarantee 5 per cent more to all of the provinces is something I cannot work out.

These are silly things drafted in haste, and the people were told that they could not ever change them no matter how silly they were, because the whole thing might fall apart.

The most offensive clause is the one that says Canada will withdraw services for the reception and integration, including linguistic and cultural, of all foreign nationals wishing to settle in Quebec with reasonable compensation.

Well, we are all grown-ups. I do not have to make many drawings to get you to understand that if you have government and immigration officials who are determined to make sure that everybody coming into Canada has a conception of Canada as being a pact between provinces, as being a country where only French should be spoken in one province and only English in all of the others, you could have a situation where the national will is thwarted. I keep coming back to the same expression, because I have to answer those who say: “Well, I proposed something on immigration in Cullen-Couture, therefore, why am I objecting to this particular proposal in the Constitutional Accord?” It is completely different, because once the provinces have got into that area of reception and integration of all foreign nationals, and are being paid to get into that area, they are not going to get out even if the federal government says, "Tut, tut, tut, now, you are not teaching the love of Canada to these people, you are teaching the love of western alienation, or whatever it is."

Once again, I think that if immigrants are going to be taught the theory of provincial sovereignty, it will not make for a strong Canada. We are having trouble enough now to try to build a nation with common values without starting to work on immigrants. We can already work on children, since children are under provincial jurisdiction in schools. But are we now to start to work on immigrants so that they have a conception of Canada which corresponds to that which we defined in the Chateau consensus of September 1980? I repeat that an immigrant to a province is an immigrant to Canada, and that Canada has no moral right to give up its jurisdiction in that area.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Finally, as to the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, it is a tough one, but, in essence, what is federalism? It is a form of government where the exercise of sovereignty is divided into two levels of government so that each can legislate, tax and spend in areas of its jurisdiction concerning people within its territory. That is what federalism is. When the Fathers of Confederation discussed the B.N.A. Act in 1867, that is what they had in mind. They gave to the provinces all of the powers outlined under section 92, which were, as jurisprudence tells us, generously interpreted by the Privy Council and by the Law Lords in favour of provincial rights. They gave all of this to the provinces so that they could develop as distinct societies. So what is the big deal?

Of course, Quebec is a distinct society with its own language and its civil law, which it has a right to have under section 92.13. Of course, it became even more distinct with the "quiet revolution," when Premier Lesage began to use the organs of a modern state to mould that society as a distinct one. And, of course, it became even more distinct when a Separatist premier was elected and tried to move the people of that province and that society in a completely different direction. It is a distinct society, and nobody is denying that. Nobody would probably even deny that, if you want, we can put it into a preamble somewhere. That might cause some pique with the Newfoundlanders, though, who only came into Canada in the lifetime of most of the people in this room. They could certainly say, "Well, why not us? Newfoundland and Labrador are a distinct society." There might be some dissatisfaction, but, at least, it would be doubtful that any legal confusion would arise. So you have distinct societies, some more distinct than others. I agree, if you like, that I am more distinct than Senator Marchand here—no, no, that's right, he was distinct before I was.

All right, we are all distinct. But particularly after people have been discussing preambles for a long period of time, when you deliberately do not put it into a preamble but put it into an interpretative clause, that can mean only one thing—you are giving to the government of that distinct society powers that it did not have before. If you are entrenching the distinctiveness as a special provision, you can only be doing it because you want to give special powers. That is why every time Quebec asked our government for special status or the recognition of its distinct society or sovereignty associations, we would resist. It was not a fight for the distinctiveness of the Canadian people—they had that. It could only be a fight for more power for the provincial politicians, which might or might not have been an arguable thing, but no more arguable for the one than for the other. This is particularly true in view of the fact that Quebec's distinctiveness, I am proud to say, was probably served as well, if not better, through organs of culture like Radio Canada, the CBC, the Film Board and the Arts Council, who rewarded equality of production, equality of French and equality of artistry, which was not always found in Quebec institutions.

So why not put distinctiveness in a preamble? If that is what you want, you can encapsulate it there. We had drafted several preambles, one in Bill C-60, which I will not bother reading to you. There was one drafted in June 1980, which I will bother reading to you, but I will not get far, you will see. I see that the first I mentioned was not in Bill C-60—it was in the prologue to Bill C-60. On June 10, 1980, which can be found in the House of Commons Hansard at page 1977, I was tabling in the House of Commons an appendix. I suggested an agenda for a meeting of the First Ministers on the Constitution. This reads:

A STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES FOR A NEW CONSTITUTION

We, the people of Canada—

I do not have time to read it all, but I wish I did, because it was not bad prose. It was panned by the press and by the premiers, but it is a good preamble.

Some Hon. Senators: Read it!

Mr. Trudeau: All right, for those who want to feel nostalgic:

We, the people of Canada, proudly proclaim that we are and shall always be, with the help of God, a free and self-governing people.

Born of a meeting of the English and French presence on North American soil which had long been the home of our native peoples, and enriched by the contribution of millions of people from the four corners of the earth, we have chosen to create a life together which transcends the differences of blood relationships, language and religion, and willingly accept the experience of sharing our wealth and cultures, while respecting our diversity.

We have chosen to live together in one sovereign country, a true federation, conceived as a constitutional monarchy and founded on democratic principles.

Faithful to our history . . .

I think it was pretty hard to beat, but, look, it was panned by the English-speaking columnists, and do you want to know what happened in Quebec? It did not get beyond the fifth word. When we said, "We, the people of Canada," one hulabaloo broke out in Quebec.

(Interruption by individual in gallery)

Senator Cools: They can't speak in here!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: In response to what I just heard, I don't have it in French, but I can translate. I can speak French if you prefer. I just want to say that I spoke in French before the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, and as far as I know, the French-speaking media did not appear that anxious to report what I said before the committee.

I speak here to a press which, I hope, will be less reluctant to report opinions contrary to their own.

[English]

So there was one great scandal, because we started the preamble with the words, "We, the people of Canada." The outrage of not only Premier Lévesque but of Quebec intelligentsia and the Quebec media was enormous. Somehow we could not even talk about the people of Canada. Of course, we could not talk about the Canadian nation, but we found that we could not even mention the people of Canada without offending the Premier of Quebec. Now, I ask you: Do you expect that we could have reached an agreement with the government of that province when we were trying to get a constitution for the Canadian people?

Unfortunately, I go back to Senator Murray, at page 2A:2 of his testimony of August 4. He says:

... in September 1980, Prime Minister Trudeau was willing to recognize "the distinctive character of Quebec society with its French-speaking majority" in a preamble to the Constitution, and a "best-efforts" draft to achieve this end was produced.

Prime Minister Mulroney goes a step further, and is even more wrong. He says the same things in his October 21 speech to the House of Commons, but he leaves out the words "in a preamble." The allegation is made by these two distinguished gentlemen that I had offered to recognize the distinctive character of Quebec's society with its French-speaking majority. Therefore, what was wrong with doing it in an interpretative clause of the Langevin accord?

I will ask historians to go back to the record on this one, because I have a lot of papers here and I will not pretend to sum them up. However, they are available for anyone who would like to follow it up. They are papers that were distributed to the provinces and, therefore, are not secret. They can be found, I am sure, by asking in the House of Commons. I inquired of the officials in Ottawa where Senator Murray had obtained his information. All the evidence they were able to dig up—and I have a letter here from the secretary to the cabinet sending it to me—is a document entitled "Federal-Provincial Conference of First Ministers, being a report of the continuing committee of ministers on the Constitution, to first ministers."

[Mr. Trudeau.]

In the preamble, which is not a very good one, there are square brackets between two phrases, which are obviously phrases where no agreement had been reached and they were referred to the First Ministers for a decision. One phrase is "recognizing the distinct French-speaking society centred in, though not confined to, Quebec." The other phrase is "recognizing the distinctive character of Quebec society with its French-speaking majority." In the first case, "recognizing the distinct French-speaking society centred in, though not confined to, Quebec," if it is a sociological fact, if it is a historical reality put in a preamble, I might not have objected. I probably would not have if it had bought a Charter of Rights in the Constitution. But I am nowhere on record saying that I accepted that. It is in brackets, so it is something to be decided by the First Ministers.

The other phrase, "recognizing the distinctive character of Quebec with its French-speaking majority," that is the one phrase that I never would have put in a preamble, let alone an interpretative clause. Of course, that is the one that comes up in the Meech Lake Accord.

For greater surety, I got a copy of The Summary Record of Proceedings of the First Ministers' Conference between September 8 and September 13, 1980. There is an agenda item entitled "The Preamble of Principles." There are three pages dealing with it. It is mainly a quarrel about the people of Canada and whether or not the provinces are freely united. Mr. Lévesque does go on to say that he objects to the preamble, because it did not, in his view, "accurately reflect the duality which lay at the base of Confederation." Consequently, the Quebec government suggested the following wording:

Recognizing the distinct character of the people of Quebec which, with its French-speaking majority, constitutes one of the foundations of Canadian duality.

Now, perhaps, we know where the idea of duality came from for the 1987 accord.

As far as the chairman is concerned—that is me—I raised two items of concern, which I have just quoted to you. In the conclusion I do not draw any concerns, because there is no agreement among anyone. To draw out of that the authority to say that Trudeau was willing to recognize the distinctive character of Quebec society, with its distinctive French-speaking majority, is really going a bit far.

I would like to deal with the difference between the five Quebec demands as met in the 1987 accord and the way they were met before in various attempts, always trying to trade something in exchange for something else, something the federal government did not do, which I will get into if I have time. Over a period of ten years we were trying to negotiate. We would offer one thing. If it would not work, we would try something else. We would take the first one back and put something else on the table, always trying to trade to get a patriation of the Canadian Constitution.

To take all those things as a whole and say, "You were prepared to give them all when they were completely different.

Why are you objecting to the 1987 accord now?" is really now an operation of duplicity or ignorance. There is a great difference, because what do we have with the Meech Lake Accord?

In paragraph 2(1)(a) there is linguistic duality. In subsection 2(2) there is the role of Parliament and legislatures to preserve the duality. Duality divides groups. We did not use the expression "French-speaking Canadians" and "English-speaking Canadians" in any of our constitutions. We used the concept of bilingualism. Bilingualism unites people; dualism divides them. Bilingualism means you can speak to the other; duality means you can live in one language and the rest of Canada will live in another language, and we will all be good friends, which is what Mr. Lévesque always wanted. You speak English, we will speak French, and we will be friends. That is an option. It was a respectable one, one that I fought, but we knew what it meant.

I think we should know what it means also in the Meech Lake Accord. That is subsection 2(2) on linguistic duality and the role of Parliament and the legislatures to preserve that duality. No wonder the French-speaking minorities in the rest of Canada and the English-speaking minorities in Quebec do not like it, and some of them are humiliated.

Paragraph 2(1)(b) says that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society. Subsection 2(3) mentions the role of the legislature and government to preserve and promote that distinct society, including, as I will read to you later, the right to self-determination, which is part of the deal, according to Mr. Bourassa. I am anticipating myself.

What does Meech Lake mean? First, it is amusing to notice that subsection 2(4) says that this section does not derogate from powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or legislatures. Of course, the sections where the federal government is giving up its authority over the Senate, over the courts, and over the spending power does derogate from federal powers. But this particular subsection does not. The politicians are protecting their turf. It happens again in paragraph 101E(2), where there is no derogation from powers of Parliament over the Supreme Court. After Parliament is given away in paragraph 101A to E, it says, in paragraph 101E(2), "except for what we have just given away on the Supreme Court, it will not derogate from our powers."

Paragraph 106A(2) says that nothing extends the powers of Parliament or the legislatures on the spending power. After it had just reduced the power of Parliament, it says, "nothing extends the powers of Parliament or the legislatures." Politicians are very generous with themselves when they are in power, but what is the effect of these clauses on the Canadian people? Well, we do not know. Because it was not put in the preamble, but it was put in an operative clause, in an interpretative clause, we do know that it is a clear instruction to the court as to how they should interpret every other part of the Constitution.

Since the business of the court is to interpret laws, we must ask ourselves: How will the courts interpret this particular section? Opinions are divided. You have had experts, as have the House of Commons, saying, "Well, it is an interpretative clause; it does not mean anything," or, "It is an interpretative clause; it can mean a lot." We have different opinions even among people around here. I will read Senator Murray again on 2(A)(2) of the same date. He states:

Let us be clear on two points. Nothing in the proposed amendment changes the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments.

Nothing changes distribution of powers.

Nor does anything in the proposed amendment override the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including women's equality rights.

If I can read English, it means that the proposed amendment of "distinct society" and French and English duality does not change anything. It is there to make Quebec feel good, I suppose, but nothing changes. The joint committee is a little less categorical.

First, you have read what they say on page 51. I am reading from the 1987 Constitutional Accord report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons at the top of page 51. It states:

... in law the "distinct society" clause is unlikely to erode in any significant way the existing entrenched constitutional rights—

It shows a little less certainty than Senator Murray, but then you get to the "Distribution of powers", on page 45, paragraph 64, and there is even more uncertainty. Quite frankly, I do not like it, because, although it goes in my direction, the joint committee is not taking the responsibility for saying something. It states:

It might therefore appear difficult to see how the "linguistic duality, distinct society" clauses could affect the division of powers without derogating from the powers, rights or privileges of one level of government in favour of the other.

They are protected by the famous section 2(4). They go on to say:

Nevertheless, the Joint Committee was advised—

"We are not taking responsibility for this and we are not doing anything about it, but we were advised that:"

The definition of the scope of the legislative power is an ongoing process of allocating subject matters to heads of jurisdiction. Take, for example, the regulation of markets for financial securities. Would such a law be classified as an aspect of the federal "trade and commerce" power, as some say, or of "property and civil rights" within exclusive provincial jurisdiction, as others contend? And what about a new law purporting to regulate the content of radio or television broadcasting?

Yet, there is nothing in the Constitution about broadcasting. The Fathers of Confederation had not read Jules Verne, and there is nothing in there about aviation as well as a lot of other things that they have not thought about. What about a new law on those matters? It goes on to state:

As new laws are made and challenged before the courts this process of classification of laws into federal or provincial jurisdiction continues. The court docket is limited only by the imagination and productivity of Canada's legislators and lawyers. The ongoing process of the constitutional "classification" of laws by the courts is one of the important areas where the interpretative provisions of the "linguistic duality" and "distinct society" clauses will come into play.

This is not a preamble. These are "interpretative provisions of linguistic duality" and "distinct society" which will come into play. Indeed, if this were not so, then the "linguistic duality" and "distinct society" interpretative provisions would be meaningless—a result that can hardly have been intended by its framers, except, of course, Senator Murray!

Really, the joint committee was advised of this and came to no conclusion, but they were honest enough to say it. Other people were even more honest. Read Premier Bourassa. This is from June 18, and is on page 8708.

—proceedings of the National Assembly.

I hope the guy who wanted it in French hasn't left. Here is the French, and this is what Mr. Bourassa had to say, and I quote:

—the entire Constitution, including the Charter, will be interpreted and applied in the light of this section on the distinct society. The exercise of legislative authority—

[English]

So, not only the Charter but also legislative powers.

[Translation]

The exercise of legislative authority is included, and we will thus be able to consolidate existing positions and make new gains.

[English]

Page 9031 also elaborates on that.

Mr. Bourassa's Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations, Senator Murray's counterpart, was quite clear, also on June 19, at page 8784. He states:

[Translation]

—the distinct society gives us a tool with which to interpret and give real significance to this sharing of legislative authority, because there are grey areas and ambiguities.

[English]

In other words, sections 91 and 92 do not say it all. The courts will use the "distinct society" clause to say, "Well, because Quebec is a 'distinct society' it can extend its rights in this or that direction." Mr. Rémillard goes on and gives examples where Quebec's powers can be extended into broadcasting, banking—the very example of the joint committee report about the economic matters—and international relations. On that matter he says:

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[Translation]

The possibility of expressing our views very clearly on the international scene in terms of our specific identity.

[English]

I suppose we can say that there is disagreement. At best, this clause is a prescription for discord, but, at worst, it says that Quebec will evolve under a different constitutional rule than the rest of Canada, because only Quebec is a "distinct society." Therefore, when it comes to a matter of interpreting the Constitution for Quebec, there is more than the possibility, there is a probability that the Constitution will be interpreted differently for Quebec than for the rest of Canada. I will come back to that in a moment when I talk about the consequences of this, but I want to draw a conclusion now. Quebec's five demands were all met in ways which weakened the fabric of Canada by denying the existence of a national will over and above the will of the provinces. The 1970 accord brings us back to the "compact" theory of the 1927 conference, that Canada exists as a country not by the will of its people but by the leave of ten provincial governments. To those who say that what we proposed in the 1970s had this consequence, I say that they did not go back to read what we said, or when they went back they made things up.

I come now to the negotiations. I would like to leave time for questions also.

It is important to point out that not one of the five demands was correcting some injustice that had been caused to Quebec in 1982. I am not blaming Quebec—I have always said that it is the job of provincial premiers to try to get more powers. It is the nature of politicians to think that they can do things better than politicians at the other level. However, Quebec was making five demands—not, once again, because it had suffered injustices in the 1981 deal, but because it wanted completely new powers. The proof that Quebec was not badly treated in 1981 is that it was not attempting to correct the things that happened in 1981; the whole operation was one of leverage; of trying to tell Canada that it could have its Constitution if it gave the Province of Quebec more power. That was the sole grievance after 1981 and the Constitution Act, 1982. Quebec had not succeeded in using its leverage to acquire more power. That is where Mr. Lévesque went wrong. He had ganged up with the other seven and had tried to bargain; he was ditched by his partners, and therefore he was not able to bargain for all that he wanted.

However, what he had bargained for within the "gang of eight" was, as I said earlier, largely given to him, so, I repeat, it was not that Quebec was short-changed; it was that Quebec did not get as much power as it was hoped it could have had if it had found in Ottawa a Prime Minister who believed in the "compact" theory.

Therefore, Bourassa was perfectly justified in trying to get more power, because Mr. Mulroney had declared during the 1984 election, and I quote:

We will have to make commitments to convince the Quebec government to give its consent to the new Canadian Constitution.

It was really up to Mr. Bourassa to trade in that consent for the most power he could get for his province. I always thought he would get some. After all the things we offered in the 1970s, he should be able to get some. I did not think he had much hope for the veto, because he, himself, had thrown it away in 1971, and then Mr. Lévesque threw it away in 1981 and had added that all provinces were equal. Therefore, I thought Mr. Bourassa would fight for it, get, perhaps, four out of the five demands, and grudgingly rejoin the constitutional family.

However, I knew one thing: I knew that the Prime Minister of Canada was in a superb negotiating position. He had campaigned on a program of national reconciliation; he had won with the largest majority in history; he could have convened a federal-provincial conference to end constitutional squabbles, and told all of the premiers that they had better cooperate or else the Canadian people would conclude that the past ten years of bickering were not Trudeau's fault after all, since, even with a nice, new Prime Minister, the premiers were proving to be as quarrelsome as ever. Instead of doing that, he made it clear that he was the one who needed peace at all costs.

Then, I think, everyone must have watched in disbelief, because he proceeded to throw away all of the trump cards he had: Premier Lougheed wanted the abolition of the National Energy Program; he got it. Mr. Peckford wanted administration of the offshore that we had only offered to share with him; he got it. Mr. Johnson wanted to sit in at international summits; he got it, and then it was inherited by Mr. Bourassa. Mr. Peterson wanted to be involved in the free trade negotiations; he got that, too. Even President Reagan got the dismantling of FIRA and the abolition of the National Energy Program even before they were sitting down to discuss acid rain.

Therefore, in such circumstances, the Prime Minister of Canada and his entire cabinet were absolutely no match for Bourassa and his able Minister of Intergovernmental Relations, Mr. Rémillard, because soon after the 1987 election Mr. Bourassa really judged with whom he was negotiating, and he moved in for the kill. When Meech Lake was all over, Mr. Bourassa was able to say—and I quote from the Toronto Star of May 4, 1987, under the byline of Robert McKenzie. This quote is en anglais, I am sorry, but it is contained in the Toronto Star:

We didn't expect, after 20 years, to reach an agreement. Then suddenly without warning, there it is—an agreement . . .

We could have waited until next year; we could have waited until after the next federal election. We were under no pressure. I was serene, but when I saw that it was falling to us piece by piece, I said to myself "Bien voilà! There it is."

So much for the federal government's argument, picked up by many of the provinces, that there was and still is a great urgency to the whole matter. Bourassa could have waited until after the next election; why shouldn't we? As for Mr. Mulroney's so-called negotiating skills, I think they should be assessed in the light of Mr. Bourassa's further comment, made at the same press conference, to the effect that he had obtained more in the field of immigration and in the appointment of Supreme Court Justices than he had been seeking. At that point in the press conference Mr. Rémillard chimed in and said that Mr. Bourassa, at the meeting table, successfully argued for even tougher wording, which made the "distinct society" clause more powerful than Quebec had originally dared hope. In short, on three of Quebec's five demands—namely, immigration, Supreme Court and the distinct society—Quebec got more than it was asking for. Yet, for good measure, the Prime Minister throws in two items not asked for: the Senate, which we know about, and federal-provincial conferences, of which there were to be two per year, with an agenda which is fixed until the end of time—or, at least, until there is an agreement between Parliament and seven legislatures to change it. However, until the end of time, you will have on the agenda—with no sunset clause—fisheries and the Senate.

It is no small wonder that Premier Pawley could say—and I am quoting now from the Winnipeg Free Press under the byline of Francis Russell:

The Prime Minister did a very good job of mediating. He was fair and sensitive throughout. He did not try to bully or pressure us at all.

No, he did not try to pressure the provinces into accepting more powers; no sir, he would not do that.

Premier Pawley goes on:

Mulroney never once defended the national government's powers, but I felt he was not unhappy that Peterson and I (Pawley) were doing it.

That is, defending the national government's powers.

The Prime Minister wanted to find an accommodation. He put pressure both ways. While he never really came out, I felt he was sympathetic to us.

That is, Peterson and Pawley—

After all, we were trying to maintain national power.

Very helpful, Mr. Pawley. When the future of this country is decided at a conference of 11 First Ministers, when no one speaks for Canada except a couple of provincial premiers, encouraged by a little wink from the Prime Minister, that is a pretty sombre day.

So Prime Minister Mulroney gave Quebec much more than it had asked for in its Quebec Round. What did the federal government get in exchange? I will have to leave that for my next appearance, because I have a lot to say on that subject.

The federal government certainly did not trade in what the provinces gave to correct the flaws with which I was reproached in the article in Le Devoir, namely, the opting-out and the notwithstanding clause. Certainly, even in the agenda you would think that the federal government would have put in one or two items, such as native rights, to be discussed at the next conference, or, at least, something payable to the federal government. Or was it to be another agenda, where Mr. Mulroney would give the provinces their choice?

I now refer you to Senator Murray's testimony, at page 210:

I have heard it said that the federal government gained nothing in these negotiations, and that it gave but did not get.

I reject these contentions totally. Canada is the clear and undisputed winner in the current round of constitutional negotiations.

I think it is good to have Quebec in. It would be better if we had it in on better terms. In the short run, it is good; in the long run—I will talk about that in my conclusions.

What did the federal government gain? I will read on. He says, "The strengthening of our country. The reconciliation of Quebec. Opportunities for economic policy coordination and future constitutional reform." You could always have federal-provincial conferences. That is not a great gain in terms of a bargain. You could always call them, so that was not a gain for the federal government. The reconciliation of Quebec? We will see. In terms of the strengthening of our country, I just want to ask the question: How do you make a country stronger by weakening the only government that can talk for all Canadians? That is the story of the 1987 negotiations.

Mr. Mulroney's government of national reconciliation was able to bring temporary peace to federal-provincial relations by negotiating a sweetheart constitutional deal whereby enormous amounts of power were transferred to the provincial governments, and particularly to the premiers—powers over vital institutions of the federal government and power over the people of Canada through a weakening of the Charter.

Viewed in perspective, that involved much more than the struggle that we had between two levels of government over the past 20 years. It was a struggle to establish the sovereignty of the people over all levels of government, and, by the proclamation of the Constitution Act, 1982, the battle for the people's rights was won. The war was not over, the Charter was not perfect, and we still have no referendum process, but the legal community was seeing to it that the Charter was having a real meaning, and the media was reporting the rights of the people over the rights of government, and people began to discover that they had a community of values, that the bonds of Canadian nationhood existed, and so on.

But that process of constitutionalizing the people of Canada, which had begun in 1982, was stopped in its tracks by the 1987 accord. Eleven heads of government were to meet in secret, in the dead of night, transfer unconscionable amounts of power from the national government to the provinces; submit the whole of the Constitution to an interpretative clause which entrenched the primacy of two collectivities, and, finally, decreed that no amount of participation by the people of Canada could ever lead to a modification of that accord or of the Constitution itself.

In 1982 the Quebec government was not in, because that government had stood for the division of Canada, but the people of Quebec were in. I refer you to a nice article by one of your colleagues, Senator Stollery, in The Globe and Mail, dated February 11, 1988, where he makes a tally of those who voted against the 1982 agreement. I do the additions, but the figures are his. Seventy-one Quebec members of Parliament voted for the 1982 Constitution; four of them voted against, and in the National Assembly, on December 1, 1981, there was a vote as to whether we would condemn Ottawa's and the nine provinces' accord or not, and 38 courageous Liberals voted against the Péquistes. That is for a total of 109 Quebec elected representatives for the 1982 accord, against a total of 74 against it, four in Ottawa and 70 in Quebec City. That is just tossed out for the benefit of some of those professors who teach that, somehow, Quebec was not in in 1982. It was in legally, and everyone knows that it was in legally and constitutionally. It was not in "morally" or "politically"—I think those are the words of the former President of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Yves Fortier. It was in legally, but not morally. Let us count heads of elected representatives and you will see that the Quebecers voted in favour of the 1982 accord.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In 1987 the Quebec government is in, but the Quebec people stand divided between themselves and from the rest of Canada as a distinct society. In 1980 there had been a victory of people over power; 1987 was a triumph of power over people.

The Supreme Court, at some point, is going to have to decide, does "distinct society" mean something or does it not? By the time they will have decided it will be too late, either the Quebec nationalists will have been had or the Canadian people will have been had, because if it is decided that "distinct society" and "duality"—linguistic duality—do not mean anything, then the province of Quebec will revert to the position it was in after 1982. It will be bound legally by the accord. But do you think it will be in politically and morally? Do you think Quebec is going to accept that it has been fooled by this phoney drafting, and that it will accept a decision by some five, six or seven judges of the Supreme Court—whatever is a majority—named by Ottawa, centralizers, anglos for the most, that "distinct society" has no meaning? Do you think that is a prescription for peace?

If the courts decide that "distinct society" has no meaning, won't we be in exactly the position we were in after 1982, where Quebec was bound legally, as it will be by the 1987 accord, but it is not bound morally and it is not bound politically?

We have Senator Murray again saying that he could not vote for the 1982 accord because, in conscience, he thought it was not right. I hope that some of you feel that, in conscience, this is not right, either. Senator Murray said, "Without Quebec's participation in our constitutional family, Canada's future would remain in doubt." It will remain in doubt now, believe me, if the Supreme Court goes against it in a deal it thought it made, in a deal that Bourassa and Rémillard spelled out in so many words in the legislative assembly of Quebec. They may say, "He said it meant this and now the courts are saying we were fooled, we were had, we were tricked." Yves Fortier said, "Politically and morally the Constitution Act, 1982 does not apply to Quebec. Those who claim it does are guilty of constitutional heresy." This brings the matter back to the Supreme Court in 1981 where it was decided it was legal to go to Westminster, but it was not nice.

But it will not be nice if Quebec has been had in this deal. "Distinct society" would not have any force in law, but it would have tremendous force in the politics of separation, because already Mr. Bourassa, in the quotes I was reading to you, was warned by the then opposition leader, Johnson:

[Translation]

You will have to pay for this.

[English]

"You will have to pay for this . . ." if you don't get from Ottawa what you were supposed to get. I do not think Mr. Parizeau will be any more gentle than Mr. Johnson.

What if, on the other hand, the courts decide that "duality" and "distinct society" do have meaning? I think Canadians would discover, to their surprise, that the accord has empowered one provincial government to subordinate the rights of every individual Canadian living within its borders to the rights of a chosen community, presumably, the French-speaking majority. I know what that would do to French-speaking Canadians in other provinces, and I think they know. You cannot go around saying that the anglos will not have a right to put English even on the French signs in Quebec, but, in the rest of Canada, we are asking you to be good, and bilingualism is the way of the future. So we will have what? The possibility of building one Canada will be lost forever. Canada henceforth will be governed by two Constitutions, one to be interpreted for the benefit of Canada and one to be interpreted for the preservation and promotion of Quebec's distinct society—two Constitutions, two Charters, promoting two distinct sets of values, and eventually two Canadas—well, one Canada and something else; and lest the mistake be made of assuming that the Quebec Round gave Quebec everything that it wanted, we already have Mr. Bourassa in the Legislative Assembly on June 23, reported at page 9031, telling the Leader of the Opposition:

[Translation]

May I remind the Leader of the Opposition there will be a second round?

[English]

No. That staunch federalist, Premier Bourassa, had made his position very clear in the Legislative Assembly on June 18, at page 8709. He said:

[Translation]

. . . the Liberal Party recognizes Quebec's right . . . to freely express desire to maintain or put an end to the federal union with Canada. Basically, it recognizes the right of the people of Quebec to determine their future as they see fit.

[English]

He had just got Meech Lake and Langevin—the works, but, "We still have a right to be independent. We have just signed a marriage contract, but clause 1 says I can divorce at any time."

• (1700)

So our government on national reconciliation will have bungled its way into a no-win situation for Canada. There will be a showdown if this thing goes through. I know what is going to happen; but, as I was saying earlier, there are still some blunt tools left in the B.N.A. Act: disallowance, taxation—all modes of taxation; the declarative clause; expropriation for federal purposes, and so on. I would not like to be here to have to use them, but I can tell you one thing: It will be the end of the "peaceful kingdom;" and it is in vain that hundreds of thousands of French-speaking Canadians will have settled in the rest of Canada and tried to preserve their identity; it will be in vain that Acadians will have fought for generations against indifference and frequent hostility; and it will be in vain that many generations of Quebec politicians will have fought for the establishment of the French fact in Canada—not in Quebec, in Canada. I refer to Henri Bourassa, the great Bourassa; and Le Devoir, in those days fighting for Maillardville and fighting for Rivière de la Paix—

An Hon. Senator: Even L'Abbé Groulx.

Mr. Trudeau: —and maybe even L'Abbé Groulx. That dream will be gone; and even those who thought they could show that "French power" could exist in Ottawa, that it was not such a forbidding place to French Canadians who wanted to exercise their own, will find it to have been in vain. It will be in vain also that many thousands, and even hundreds of thousands, of Canadian children will have learned French across the provinces in immersion courses, and everything else, because they thought that this could be a country working on the basis of two official languages, bilingualism rather than dualism; that they could be united. So, in vain, we would have dreamt the dream of one Canada.

So what do we do with the conclusion? Well, the 1987 accord is unlike the parson's egg; it is not only bad in part, it is completely bad. I think it should be put out in the dustbin. And of course the Quebec nationalists will be pretty mad, and there will be some wishy-washy federalists who will be pretty mad, too—those who want to eat their cake and have it too. We should simply remind them of two things: First, that provincial governments have been holding up the process of constitutional reform for 80 years, and, in particular, that Premier Lesage of Quebec backed out of a deal in 1964, Premier Bourassa backed out of a deal in 1971, and Mr. Lévesque was left on the corner by his seven partners in 1981. But no-one broke down and wept. Once again, these experts from Queens or Toronto, or elsewhere, say that "Quebec is in a state of anguish since the 1980 accord because it wasn't in."

Life went on in the provinces. Sure, the Quebec nationalists will be a bit frustrated if the accord does not go through. That's the real world: "You don't always get what you want. You were offered it before, but you didn't take it. Now we are not offering it to you."

But more important, the second point is that Mr. Bourassa himself said that he could have waited until after the next federal election. Well, my conclusion is that we should do precisely that. In the meantime, what can be done by the people, by the provincial legislatures and by the Senate? Well, the people should demand that every candidate in every federal or provincial election or by-election should state his or her position on the accord. The Meech Lake Accord had not been debated in any Parliament or legislature before being agreed to in April 1987 by the 11 First Ministers. Therefore, the people should ensure that the same mistake is not made again, that it will be debated. And if a majority of federal MPs want to campaign in favour of the accord, and if they win their seats, then the governments of Canada and the provinces can put Meech Lake into the Constitution by using the amending process that exists.

That is what the people can do. They have the right to vote, and they have the right to know what their members of Parliament or the legislatures stand for from here on in. It has been done in New Brunswick already, and it is being done now in Manitoba—and I admire the courage and the independence of mind of a Premier McKenna or a Sharon Carstairs, who have the courage to stand up, not against Quebec, but to ask what the Meech Lake Accord means; and they want to make sure that they stand up for Canada after they have been told what it means.

So in the provincial legislatures, where the accord is not yet passed, members should consider that any amendment to the Constitution of Canada imparts a new orientation on Canada's destiny. So, voting on it should be a matter of conscience and not of partisanship. Members of those legislatures should force the government to ask for a reference to the Supreme Court, as was done by three provinces in 1980-81.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Before voting on constitutional amendments which will bind Canada for all time, the members have a right to know what will be the effect of the "distinct society" clause on women, or on the Charter in general, or on the linguistic minorities. They have a right to know. You don't vote when it is obvious that even the experts don't agree; and when negotiators in Quebec say one thing and senators in the federal government say exactly the other. They have the right to know what is the meaning of such phrases as "programs or initiatives compatible with national objectives." They have a right to know if the doctrine of necessity can be invoked if there is a paralysis of the Supreme Court.

So, in provinces where there might be an election of a new premier who had not signed the accord, and in those that have not yet decided, they should make a reference to the Supreme Court. That is in the law; that is in the practice; and I say, once again, that it is to the dignity of a member of the legislature not to vote on something the meaning of which he does not know; and if ever there was a case where the meaning of the Constitution was not clear, it is in the case before us now. So before they vote, let us get a reference. One was obtained in the 1980-81 period. It took something in the order of three or four months, and then we knew. On this occasion we still have another two years or more before time runs out.

● (1710)

What can the Senate do? Well, it is too late to use tactics, as you did on me in 1978, to threaten obstruction in order to get a reference, which we gave you. I do not think you have the time between now and April 23 to obstruct in any sensible way or any meaningful way. I suggest that the Senate pass amendments that will ensure that the resolution is corrected so that it means, if you believe in it, what Senator Murray says it does mean, that "distinct society" has no effect on the Charter or on the distribution of powers. That is the minimum amendment that you can make, but there are many others that, for a fee, I would be prepared to suggest to you.

Unless you fear that you are offending someone, remember the Langevin accord, paragraph 1 of the operative sector, which states:

The Prime Minister of Canada will lay or cause to be laid before the Senate and House of Commons, and the first ministers of the provinces will lay or cause to be laid before their legislative assemblies, as soon as possible, a resolution, in the form appended hereto—

So they did that. They did not say the Senate could not amend it. They did not say the members of the House of Commons could not amend it. They tried to amend it. The Liberal Party proposed amendments that were not carried, but nothing in the accord says that the Senate cannot amend it.

I would suggest that if you want to know what you are voting on, you should make it clear and say what you think "distinct society" means, and maybe even within this chamber you will find that some Quebecers do not agree with some Ontarians on what it means—I do not know—but the stock-in-trade of legislatures, from time immemorial, has been to vote on something the meaning of which they assume they know, and then, when they realize they do not know, they clarify it with an amendment.

Therefore, I conclude that the Senate can and must send an amended resolution back and ask the House of Commons to vote on that.

There is nothing in the Constitution of 1982 that says the Senate has to believe exactly the same thing as the members of the House of Commons. So, if you want clarification, you should amend it and send it back, and the members of the House of Commons can discuss whether the clarification has made it worse; but, at least, the people will have been enlightened as to the real meaning of Meech Lake and the real direction in which the country is going.

I think we should take our chances. Let the people decide once they know what it means. If the members of the House of Commons and senators and legislators of the provinces want to vote against the accord because they do not want it, then the accord should be discarded. The Quebec government might be a bit disappointed, but, then, it set the rules. In 1981 Premier Lévesque agreed that all provinces were equal. That is what they would get: They would get no Meech Lake, but everybody would be equal.

On the other hand, if the people of Canada want this accord, and that is not beyond the realm of possibility, then let that be part of the Constitution. I, for one, will be convinced that the Canada we know and love will be gone forever, but, then, Thucydides wrote that Themistocles' greatness lay in the fact that he realized Athens was not immortal. I think we have to realize that Canada is not immortal; but, if it is going to go, let it go with a bang rather than a whimper.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Trudeau, for a very detailed exposé of your views on this most important subject. Your exposé has created a long list of questioners. At present there are 20 names on the list. I will have to ask my colleagues how they wish to proceed, or if they will simply control themselves so far as time is concerned. There is a 6 o'clock rule in the Senate.

The first name on my list is that of Senator MacEachen, to be followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, before I put the question, could we agree that if we are not finished at 6 o'clock we will continue for a while? That would make it easier for me to begin my questioning.

The Chairman: If it is the wish of the committee, I will not see the clock at 6 o'clock.

Senator MacEachen: That is what I am suggesting.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the members of the committee that the chairman not see the clock at 6 o'clock?

Senator Frith: The alternative, under our rules, is that at 6 o'clock you would leave the Chair and return at 8 o'clock. If we continue, that will avoid that two-hour period in between.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, you said you already had twenty names on your list.

The Chairman: Yes, I do.

Senator Tremblay: Were all twenty names handed to you during the speech or before this afternoon's sitting?

The Chairman: I received some names before the speech by our witness and others were added during this speech. Yours is on the list.

Senator Tremblay: That is because I just gave it to you. I waited until the end of the speech. I thought that was the usual procedure.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, one usually asks questions after the person has finished speaking.

The Chairman: Senator Tremblay, I can assure you I had your name on my list before we started.

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, in that case somebody else gave you my name. So I am more or less in limbo.

The Chairman: I don't want to inconvenience anyone, and I think we can manage something. First on my list is Senator MacEachen, followed by Senator Marsden.

[English]

Senator MacEachen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Mr. Trudeau, for your presentation and your presence in the Senate. I certainly want to add my voice to the voice of the chairman in welcoming you to the Senate.

I know that in your presentation, which was very thorough, you dealt with the views of the Prime Minister, Senator Murray, Premier Bourassa and other people who might be regarded as actively partisan or biased in their views. I should like to put before you views expressed before the joint committee by someone I might say is a more unbiased witness, namely, Mr. Gordon Robertson, who is not involved in government now, and who is knowledgeable and experienced in this field.

I want to put my question in two parts, one being a series of tests which Mr. Robertson applied to the Meech Lake Accord, and which he found the accord had passed satisfactorily, and the second being a description which Mr. Robertson put on the record with respect to events around the referendum and what has happened since.

Now, to the first part. Mr. Robertson asked, and I quote:

Are the proposed arrangements damaging to other fundamentals of the Canadian Constitution: the Charter of Rights, various protections for groups such as the aboriginals, multicultural groups, and that kind of thing? I cannot see that the accord is damaging in those senses.

That is the first test. The second is, and I quote:

Another question is whether the agreement weakens the federal government in any significant and important way. Here one has to note that the accord does not change the distribution of powers in any way; nothing is changed in sections 91, 92, and 93.

Then the third test is put as follows, and I quote:

● (1720)

Another question is whether there is a reasonable prospect of getting a better arrangement than the present one. Mr. Robertson answered his own questions in these words:

From my own experience in constitutional negotiations, I would think it is most improbable that it would be possible to get any arrangement significantly better than the present one.

That is the end of that quote and the three tests which he applied.

I then want to read what I described as an observation on the political scene in Quebec at the time of the referendum and later:

In 1980, at the time of the referendum, a promise was made to the voters of Quebec that a "no" vote in the referendum would not be a vote for the status quo; it would be a vote for renewed federalism. What that renewed federalism was to be was not spelled out, but I think virtually everybody understood that it was to be something along the lines of what had been sought by Quebec governments over the years.

So in effect what we have now is a situation in which the province that was the source of the constitutional negotiations has received none of the arrangements and adjustments it sought at the outset and those who thought there was going to be renewed federalism have received nothing of the kind that I am confident they thought was going to be produced. I would think it is an extremely dangerous situation for the future if we leave it one in which there is that sense of grievance, frustration, even perhaps of betrayal.

Mr. Chairman and Mr. Trudeau, I know that some of these matters have already been addressed broadly, but I wanted to put them in a pointed way because of the authoritative source of these comments made before the joint committee.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I will try to answer briefly. The first question asks whether the arrangements of 1987 are damaging to the Charter or to certain groups. I would say offhand that they probably will not be helpful to the aboriginal people, but they will not be damaging, because section 16 has an exclusion that says that the Charter and other sections will continue to operate towards aboriginals and multiculturals. As I indicated earlier, however, the clause on the Yukon and the Northwest Territories certainly can have some very deleterious effects on the possibility of those Territories ever becoming provinces in places where the aboriginals, if they are larger in number, can exercise a role in government.

As to the rest of the Charter, from what has been advised to the joint committee people, as it appears in their report, it is quite clear that the Charter will be affected by the "distinct society" clause. It is quite clear that Mr. Bourassa says it will, that Mr. Rémillard says it will, and that the experts, in whom the committee believed in their report, say it will. I give a different answer from that of Mr. Robertson. He says no; I say yes, the arrangements are damaging to the Charter.

Will the accord weaken the federal government? Mr. Robertson says no, because there is no change in the distribution of powers. That is true, because sections 91 and 92 have been protected under section 2, paragraph (4). But it seems to me that the joint committee did not follow Mr. Robertson's argument. It followed that of Mr. Rémillard and Mr. Bourassa, who said that the list of items under section 91 will not be changed, but as to those things that are not listed—things such as aeronautics, communications and external affairs—it is the interpretation of the courts which will determine whether they are exercised by the federal or provincial governments. So far the courts have said that aeronautics and communications fall, generally, under federal jurisdiction. Now, however, the Supreme Court will have a new interpretative clause, which was put in there, presumably, for a reason. Constitutional authors do not constitutionalize something unless they want it to have a meaning. So the authors of this constitution have said to the Supreme Court, "You must henceforth interpret a judgment on aeronautics or on external affairs in the light of the 'distinct society' clause." That is the job of the courts. They must interpret laws as they are told to interpret them by the legislators. Once again, that is what Mr. Rémillard and Mr. Bourassa think this means.

Mr. Rémillard even gave an example of banking, which is something clearly defined under section 91; he argues—and I have not read all of it, but it is contained in the pages from which I quoted—that federal jurisdiction over banking may be all right, but, obviously, so far the caisses populaires have been authorized by judgments of the court, because they are not quite banks. He argues that they will be able to extend their powers. How far they will go is something the courts will decide. But it is not right to say there have been no changes in the distribution powers. There has been no change in the black letters of 1867, but there has been change in everything that flows from them in what has happened since.

Senator Frith: Even those black letters, under section 16, might be subjected to the distinct society interpretation.

Mr. Trudeau: Exactly; you have a point, because who knows? If ever we want to invoke section 92.10(3) on the declaratory power, the courts may well decide that the declaratory power is something the federal government has but should not use against a distinct society. For all I know, the courts might even say that reservation or disallowance should not be used against a distinct society. That is why I was arguing that, if these words have any meaning at all, they mean there will be a different constitution for Quebec than there is for the rest of Canada. Hence, Canada will be two nations.

Third, as to the prospects of better arrangements, here I agree with Mr. Robertson. It is not probable that there will be better arrangements than those contained in this accord—certainly not in the short run, anyhow. But the Portuguese have a proverb that goes like this: The worst is never certain. Some day there may be a party running for election in Quebec which would be prepared to take its chances with the rest of Canada. It could say, "OK, we Quebecers are as good as anyone else. We have a lot of powers under section 92. We do not need those distinct society powers. We have economic rights; we have rights over natural resources; we have rights over education; we have rights over our laws; we have rights over property; we have rights over a whole gamut of social legislation. It would be nice, because we are so great, to have more rights than the other provinces, but we are not that immature that we have to have some toy that the other guy does not have; we are prepared to make a go of Quebec with the rights we have. We are not asking for more than Ontario, because we are just every bit as good as the people of Ontario, and we can run our business without getting special status or special power." Maybe. I know some people who, if they had gone into provincial politics, probably would have argued in that way. I think they probably would have been elected just as easily as those who asked for special status for Quebec.

Naturally, it is nice to be treated as special, and that is why the Quebec intellectuals have been so silent on the Meech Lake Accord. The people couldn't care less, but Quebec writers, intellectual thinkers, lawyers, and so on, have been silent on this agreement. Why should they refuse something given to them for free?

From the point of view of the ordinary Canadian, whether he lives in Quebec or British Columbia or anywhere else, what is important is the way the federal government spends its dollars and makes its laws and the way the Quebec government spends its dollars and makes its laws. It is not important whether a little more power resides in Quebec City and a little less in Ottawa, or vice versa, or a little more in Quebec than in New Brunswick. People want to be well governed.

Remember that the people of Quebec always voted against separatism when the Parti Québécois was asking for it in 1970 and 1973. In 1976 the PQ did not ask for separatism. They said they wanted to give good government, and the people voted for that. They went back to separatism in 1984-85 and the people voted against it. They want to be well governed. They don't care whether or not politicians have a few more powers.

The rising bourgeoisies do—the political elites. It is nice to be able to say that we are speaking for Quebec people, and those guys who get elected to Ottawa from Quebec are really not our gang. These are rivalries which exist amongst elites everywhere.

I think that a good writer, a good artist, a good musician, a good poet in Quebec is very much likely to succeed whether or not Quebec has special status. But if he is a bad writer, a bad poet, a bad artist or a bad musician, then he has more chance to succeed in Quebec, because he does not have to compete with the rest of the country. That is why I always thought federalism was such a great system, because it forces Quebecers to do what they are darn good at doing—competing with the other guys, competing with those people in Nova Scotia who think they are everything. He can show them, "We are as good as they are." That is what makes people better. If you lock yourself up with special statuses and special powers, then you only have to compete amongst the members of a clan, and it is easier.

Back to whether there ever will be a better arrangement, from the point of view of the Quebec people, I am prepared to take my chances, as I did in the referendum. I did not say, like Abe Lincoln, "You will break up this country and you will have war on your hands." If the people of Quebec want to vote yes for some fuzzy-minded question about the possibility of eventually separating, I will resign and somebody else can deal with how it will be separated.

I think that is what I would say to Gordon Robertson. Let the nationalists take their chances; let them try to get elected as Separatists again; let them—as I suggested after they won in 1976 and they said they would have a referendum—have a referendum soon; let it be clear and let it be final. I do not mean final for 100 years, but final perhaps for a generation. But, no, the PQ, and the separatist, plays the game of "heads we win and tails you lose." If they had won the referendum, they would have been all right; but they lost it, so they will have another one soon.

If the people who want Quebec to be a separate country really believe that, let them campaign quite clearly on that. It is not my option, but I respect those who have it. So far we have not had anybody able to go above 15 or 20 per cent of the vote when they talk about separation. Quebecers like to see the fight between the federal government and the provincial government, and sometimes it is as good as hockey.

You were talking about 1980, when Mr. Robertson was arguing that we would have said that if Quebec voted "no" they would get something along the lines of what the Quebec government wants. Let me remind you that Quebec got a lot of what René Lévesque wanted. He was part of the "gang of eight." Although he was not there on the fatal day, he had been there for eight or ten months. They are the people who put together what Quebec wanted, what Alberta wanted, and what Nova Scotia wanted. So Quebec was there for all but the signing ceremony. As I pointed out earlier, Quebec got a lot out of the November 1981 agreement. It got a right to control its natural resources in a way it had never had before, including indirect taxation and including negotiating externally. It had a veto which it had never had before. It now has a right to get out of the Constitution. By opting out under the 1981 agreement it did not have compensation, except in cultural matters, but then you ask yourself, "Why should Quebec get compensation on economic matters?"

You can understand the language problem, and perhaps those guys in Ottawa cannot deal with it too well. Next it will be that if you want to operate on somebody for appendicitis you will have to have special status, because Quebec appendixes are not like the rest of the country's. It is not right to say that Quebec got nothing, but it is worse to say that it had been implied that they would get some of their promises along the lines of what the Quebec government wanted.

I read you everything that the Quebec government wanted and what Alberta wanted and what Blakeney from Saskatchewan wanted and what Bennett wanted. I gave you the list of the September 1980 demands. Sure, they wanted more, but when November 1981 arrived the "gang of eight" had reduced it to a certain number of things, because they saw that we were prepared to go unilaterally if they were completely unreasonable, and Quebec was part of that. It is wrong to say that Quebec got nothing. It got a veto on all the articles contained in section 41, which it had never had before.

Whether or not it will be a dangerous situation in Quebec I do not know. Somehow I do not think that Mr. Robertson is all that qualified to say that. If, for some reason, Meech Lake does not go through because of Frank McKenna in New Brunswick or Sharon Carstairs in Manitoba, I do not think any of us here who live in Quebec will be afraid to go home, and I do not think we will see people weeping in the streets. Will it be dangerous? Life is a dangerous business—dangerous, but not beyond the limits of all imagination.

Senator MacEachen: Thank you, Mr. Trudeau.

The Chairman: Next on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Olson, followed by Senator Doyle.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Trudeau, your statement this afternoon has been very helpful, not least because you referred to the fact that women's equality rights were added in 1981 after the agreement had initially been signed. The bringing out of that fact is very helpful.

You know, as everyone else here does, that the struggle put up by Canadian women and many sympathetic men, against some of the premiers and in favour of section 28 and other equality rights, gave the women of Canada—both anglophone and francophone, and from all the provinces and territories—a sense of being stakeholders in the Constitution and in the future of the country.

In current times we are being told three things.

The first thing we are being told by witnesses appearing before this committee—constitutional lawyers and others—is that there is a hierarchy of rights being created by provisions of section 16 that indirectly weakens the access to the Charter in the courts and, therefore, threatens the Charter of Rights with respect to women's equality rights.

The second thing we are being told is that if you come out and say there is a possibility that women's equality rights will be abrogated through this clause, somehow or other you are against Quebec. There is a "divide and conquer" strategy going on there.

The third thing we are being told by premiers and other politicians is, "We didn't mean to weaken your rights, or we didn't think we'd weaken your rights, but you should trust us, because somehow or other there will be a political solution that will overcome the situation which is being put in front of the courts."

This afternoon you have commented on the Meech Lake Accord from the points of view of political, historical and legal frameworks. Would you comment on those three messages that are being sent out to the women and the people of Canada?

● (1740)

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I would agree with your words "hierarchy of rights." It is quite clear that if "distinct society" means something—and I have argued that in the intention of its most important framers, those who are asking for it, it does mean something—then the protection women have under the Charter will be somewhat lessened. I may not argue exactly the way you would want, because, in a sense, I think that women, under section 28, are not as privileged as the aboriginals and the multi-ethnics under section 16, but they are more privileged than the rest of us males and other—no, I shouldn't talk about males, because section 28 talks about equality of the sexes.

If you read section 28—and the women were very clever when they made us put it in in that form—notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons. So "notwithstanding anything in this Charter" could mean notwithstanding even section 1, which talks about reasonable limits prescribed in free and democratic societies. So perhaps there is equality of the sexes which will stand even that test, and no provincial government or federal government will be able to invoke "reasonable limits" in order to put women or men in their place because of the "notwithstanding" of section 28. That is a "perhaps."

It is amusing, and perhaps interesting, to realize that Quebec chose the words "distinct society," I guess because if they had said "distinct nation" they knew they would have a fight. But they could have said "collectivity," or they could have said "people," or whatever. However, they used the word "society," because here will be one distinct society using section 1 of the Charter to say, "Well, our 'distinct society' is a democratic society, and these limits are demonstrably justifiable. Therefore, we can trample on freedom of conscience or freedom of peaceful assembly because it is a 'distinct society.' But maybe we cannot trample on women or men under section 28, because it has a 'notwithstanding' claim." It is a chance you must take, but in the hierarchy I would say that women are perhaps a bit better off than those who think that freedom of association will not be able to be touched under it. However, they are certainly worse off than they were under the 1982 accord.

I know the tendency among the Quebec intelligentsia is often to say, "Well, we have our own Charter of Rights in Quebec and women will be every bit as well protected by our Charter. We do not want to be told by these people in other provinces that we cannot look after our sexual equality as well as they can." But there is a misunderstanding there. No one says that Quebec cannot have more progressive laws than anyone else. What one is saying is that that should not be used as an excuse to escape from the fundamental Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which should be Canadians' birthrights whether they are Quebec or Ontario residents or not. In other words, what I do not like about the Quebec argument is the suggestion that "we can look after justice in our own way and it will be every bit as just." I believe that with the kind of governments we have been having in the past years it can be every bit as just, but, to me, as a Canadian, that is not enough, because that is the argument that we would hear from everyone, and which we heard for years against the Charter: "Ah, the legislators can make good laws, so why do you need a Charter?" Well, the courts and the bar are showing us now why we need the Charter. A lot of Canadians are beginning to realize that it is important to have it. If we follow the Quebec reasoning, then we will say, "Well, the 'distinct society' will deal with women fairly, but in its own way."

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Your other point was about being against Quebec. I think I have answered that. It is not because we are against Quebec's potential to be just and fair in the matter of human rights. On the contrary. It is not being against Quebec to oppose this; it is being for Canada. If Quebec wants to do even better than the Charter provides, so much the better for the women there.

The Chairman: The next questioner is Senator Olson, followed by Senator Doyle, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: Mr. Trudeau, I want to ask you one question about the prospects of finding a remedy some time with respect to the veto or the unanimity requirement in the amending formula, because it may be that after April 23 the Senate's 180 days will have expired and the process will be able to go on to circumvent this chamber. But governments do change from time to time, and it may be that another federal government will have a different attitude about that and many of the other things that you have referred to, and there may, at least, be the possibility of their happening.

Based on your experience, having been at perhaps more negotiations and federal-provincial conferences than anyone else, at least that I know of, can you tell us what the prospects are of getting out of some of these problems and the straitjacket of the unanimity requirement in the amending formula?

Mr. Trudeau: The irony is that we had gone pretty far in 1982 in giving a veto to the provinces. We did it somewhat reluctantly, but in section 41 of the 1982 accord we had amendment by unanimous consent for the Office of the Queen; Governor General; Governor of a province; right of a province to the number of members in the House of Commons being not less than senators; the use of English and French languages; the composition of the Supreme Court, and an amendment to this part. So we had gone a short distance towards giving everyone a veto. It was a concession, and, returning to Mr. MacEachen's question on Gordon Robertson's remarks, it was something that the provinces had never had before under the Supreme Court judgment, but now they were getting it. But for most of the other things which now have been put in "unanimity" by the Meech Lake accord, we put them under section 42(1).

That section said that what is needed is seven provinces, the federal government, and a majority of 50 per cent. I will not read all that this accord contains, but it covers the whole lot of all federal institutions and throws in the Territories to boot. So, in that sense, there was a veto before; but now it is so unconscionably wide and so completed by the fact that in the changing of powers from one level of government to the other there is an opting-out that we will never have the national will or the volonté générale; we will always have one province that either can be out or can prevent everyone else from being in.

You say to me: "Can that be remedied?" Here again I sort of quarrel with the negotiators, because Quebec was never asking for everybody to have the veto; it was asking for a veto for itself, and, as I pointed out, under the Victoria formula the provinces were prepared to give it. We never mentioned it, but we said that any province now having more than 25 per cent of the population will, in effect, have the veto. But here is an important point I want to draw to your attention: If the other provinces were so willing and so anxious to bring Quebec in—and they still are today, because they are still using that argument: "Don't turn out Meech Lake, because then Quebec won't be in." Quebec did not need Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba and the rest of them to have a veto in order to get Quebec in. So if these provinces are such good Canadians; if they are so interested in getting Quebec in, I think you and I could probably have lived with a veto for Quebec, because of historic reasons, and size, and everything else.

However, all of these generous premiers who were fighting for Canada and finally let Quebec in said: "Me too." That is why we now have such a universal veto. You say to me: "Can we back out of that?" My reply is that I think we can; I think the electorate and the members of the various legislatures can take the attitude that, I think, is being taken by Mr. McKenna, the Premier of New Brunswick. He is saying: "I will have the right to name senators under this accord, but I do not have it yet. It is probably illegal to tell me that I have that right, because I do not think the federal government can delegate that right to me until the Constitution is really amended and until Meech Lake is part of the Constitution." He is saying: "I am not going to use this privilege; why do we not ask the rest of Canada, the Gordon Robertsons, and so on? You want to be generous to Quebec; you think there will be a tragedy if Quebec is not in—so let's let Quebec in." Okay. I would not give it special status, but I would give it something more on a veto; I would give it something more, perhaps, on the Senate. I would not give it very much, but someone generous like Mr. Mulroney could give it quite a bit—but not to the rest of Canada. Therefore, that is my answer.

Now that Quebec has said: "We are all equal—" and that was what Mr. Lévesque said in the spring of 1981, and that was what Bourassa signed at Meech Lake—"We are all equal, but somehow we are going to have a veto and you will not." It would take a lot of staunch Canadianism on the part of the other premiers to go that distance, so I am not giving you much hope.

However, it is a thought. If it is so important to get Quebec, why did they fill their pockets at the same time, and why did Mr. Mulroney fill their pockets at the same time?

Senator Olson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Olson. Next is Senator Doyle, followed by Senator Frith, who will be followed by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

Senator Doyle: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Trudeau, I do hope that you have been impressed by a typical afternoon in a Senate committee.

I have only one question. We have heard at length this afternoon your views on the roles played in this debate by the Prime Minister and by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We also heard a question by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, to which you replied. What we have not heard this afternoon is your view of the position of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place.

I have a quotation here from an interview with Mr. Turner, which appeared in Macleans on January 11, 1988. In that interview Mr. Turner said:

The Meech Lake Accord achieved the overwhelming purpose of bringing Quebec fully into the Canadian family. I would in no way re-open Meech Lake. Meech Lake is closed.

What are we to make of that?

Mr. Trudeau: You can make what you want of it, senator. Mr. Turner is a public figure; he stated his position; I take it you agree with him. I have, as you say, pointed out my disagreements with members of the government. I was not shy to do so. It would be even easier for me to do it with mere opposition leaders, but why bother? I am dealing with the people in power; the people who made Meech Lake; the people who can unmake it, if they want, and I do not have to express my opinion on leaders of the opposition or other parties. It is the governments I am after.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Doyle. Next is Senator Frith, followed by Senator Stewart, followed by Senator Argue.

Senator Frith: Mr. Trudeau, I want to ask you about something relating to the powers of the Senate arising out of a comment that you made twice about addressing the question as to what the Senate could do. It is a constitutional point, but it seems to be a bit of a heresy. However, if I am right, it would have quite an important political consequence. You are both the former Prime Minister who was, of course, very much engaged in the amendments in 1982, and you are also a professor of constitutional law. Therefore, I would like to take about three or four minutes with you, if I may, on this point.

Mr. Trudeau, do you have with you the Constitution Act, 1982?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I do.

Senator Frith: Do you have the amending formula, section 47?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, sir.

Senator Frith: With respect to section 47, first, the understanding or the conventional wisdom is that the Senate has only a six-month veto; that is to say, that some people think there is a deadline, that the Senate cannot do anything after six months; but, of course, that is not so.

It is generally accepted that the Senate, because of section 47, can do nothing to amend the Constitution; that its powers are more limited than the powers of the House of Commons or of the other amending partners.

However, let me pause here. Up to section 47, it is quite clear that the Constitution cannot be amended except by a resolution of the House of Commons, of the Senate and of the necessary numbers of provincial legislatures. Without section

[Senator Doyle.]

47, the Senate has an absolute veto over constitutional amendments. What does section 47 say? To attempt to reduce that power, it says:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under sections 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

To put that in practical terms, and to put it into the context of the amending resolution that has been proposed to us here and that has been passed by the House of Commons, for section 47 to operate and limit our otherwise absolute veto 180 days will have had to pass without the Senate's adopting such a resolution. What can "such a resolution" mean? What is the antecedent of "such a resolution"? People assume it means a resolution in the same words as the resolution of the House of Commons, but it does not say that. It simply says, "such a resolution." The only antecedent to "such a resolution" can be a resolution authorizing the issuance of a proclamation.

If we pass a resolution authorizing a proclamation we will have blocked the operation of section 47. It is even clearer, Mr. Trudeau, in the French version, which you may not have before you. In the French version, if I read it correctly, it does not even say, "such a resolution." It says:

[Translation]

47.(1) Dans les cas visés à l'article 38, 41, 42 ou 43, il peut être passé outre au défaut d'autorisation du Sénat si celui-ci . . .

"Celui-ci" refers to the Senate.

. . . n'a pas adopté de résolution . . .

It does not even say "une telle résolution" but only "... de résolution dans un délai . . .", and so forth.

[English]

I would be interested in your observations. It seems to me that if section 47 is intended to have the effect that people seem generally to assume it will have, namely, that we will have no absolute veto, then it has not succeeded in doing that, except in one circumstance, namely, if we have not passed such a resolution. Therefore, if this week or next week—that is, before the expiration of 180 days—we pass a resolution authorizing a proclamation—that is what the section says—we will have paralyzed section 47, knocked it out, and we will have an absolute veto.

Mr. Trudeau: That is pretty revolutionary, senator.

Senator Frith: I said it was a heresy, but I like "revolutionary" better.

Mr. Trudeau: Getting back into the context in which section 47 has been put in there, I think it is pretty fair to say—and I am talking as a political practitioner rather than as a constitutional teacher—that what was envisaged was a process whereby the Senate could not frustrate forever the House of Commons in passing a resolution, but whereby it was intended that the Senate would still have a role to play. I think I can say without any doubt at all in my mind that those who adopted this section in November of 1981 and passed it into law in December, both in the provinces and here, envisaged that, ideally, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada—which calls for this difficult amending process, unanimity and so on, unanimity of the provinces, presumably—would need, hopefully, unanimity on Parliament Hill too.

That is why I was urging you so much to pass amendments to this resolution. I would rather throw the thing out, but, if you can improve it with many amendments, I am bold enough to hope that members of the House of Commons, now that they have had time to think it over, will hear witnesses, reflect, and perhaps talk to their electorate, will be prepared to accept your amendments, and therefore the framers of this amending process will have achieved not only the consent of all provinces but the consent of both houses of Parliament. I think that is the framework in which we should put it.

Therefore, let us take the peaceable way. You amend it, hopefully, considerably; send it to the House of Commons; they look it over; they accept many of your amendments; they have doubts on others; they want to reject some; the usual processes of consultation and so on take place and the wisdoms of both houses are put together and you come up with a much improved resolution. I think that would be the normal situation.

Suppose the House of Commons does not want to play ball, and says, “No, no, we cannot reopen it. We said we never would. We know there are mistakes. We really know there are egregious errors, but we don’t want to say so. We know that once it is done, because of the unanimity thing, we are unlikely to be able to correct it forever without giving more powers away, but we just cannot do it.” Some of them might be thankful for the interpretation you will give them.

Let us see if, in law, it stands up. You quite correctly quoted the words “... the Senate has not adopted such a resolution ...” There is only one other place where the word “resolution” appears in that paragraph. It is “... resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation ...” Except for one word, I would say your case is airtight. If you issue a resolution authorizing the issuance of a proclamation, then the 180-day rule does not give any power to the House of Commons, because you have done that.

The one fly in the ointment is the definite article “the.” It says, “... issue of the proclamation ...” I do not know what a court would judge. I would hope it would judge along the lines I have just argued, that in equity, perhaps, there are two houses of Parliament and they should try to agree. When you say issue of “the” proclamation, then you come back to the word “proclamation” that appears in line 2. It says, “An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation ...” Does “the” proclamation mean that particular one, or does it really mean the proclamation of what we are talking about when we bring in constitutional amendments? I think you can argue both ways.

I will get to the French version in a moment. You could say, “the” proclamation can mean the one that the House of Commons made, or it could mean “the” proclamation called for under section 38, which calls for “... a proclamation in order to ...,” and so on. The “the” may refer to section 38 or to the beginning of section 47. Therefore, you are in doubt. But for greater surety we go to the French, which, you are quite right in pointing out, has no definite article. It has an indefinite article.

[Translation]

... n’a pas adopté de résolution ...

[English]

It does not say “la résolution.” It says “de résolution.”

[Translation]

Senator Frith: —or “une telle résolution”.

Mr. Trudeau: —or “une telle résolution”.

[English]

It really says “any resolution.” In reality, if you read the French, you could go ahead and adopt any old resolution talking about—well, Charles Dickens and something about the Constitution. But if you adopt a resolution which—

• (1810)

Senator Frith: Authorizes a proclamation.

Mr. Trudeau: —authorizes a proclamation, I think the House of Commons is stuck with it; and the 180 days will cease to run until they work on theirs and send something back, and then you accept it or you send it back again, and so on.

Senator Frith: May I ask one further question, and then I will stop?

Mr. Trudeau: I think that is an interesting point. I wish I were in my office.

Senator Frith: Make me an offer. For the record—and I know that you are rushed for time and there are others who wish to speak—I recognize the point you made on the English “the,” and I appreciate your pointing out that if there is doubt about that the French helps by not using the definite article. Also, in the English text, something that might argue for an indefinite rather than “the” proclamation, in the sense of the proclamation undertaken by the House of Commons, is the fact that we do not send anything back. Under your formula, under the 1982 formula, anyone can start it. In other words, a province can start it; Prince Edward Island can start it—and they do not send it anywhere. I take it that in administrative ways they circulate it; but they do not formally have to send it along; and, similarly, we do not treat it like a bill. That is why I was against the idea of a joint committee—because a joint committee made sense under the previous system, which was a joint resolution. But we now have separate resolutions, everyone does his own resolution, and it seems to me that that would be an additional argument—although I like the comparison with the French best—that it might be any proclamation, since so many resolutions, and resolutions authorizing proclamations, are possible under the new formula.

Mr. Trudeau: I would think that that does not strengthen your case, although I wish it did. It might weaken it slightly, because you would then have to argue that the legislator did not intend anything when he put in the 180-day rule; and, presumably, if it is in there, there is the beginning of an argument that the House of Commons wants to have some leeway against the Senate; that they are not, as you argue, too independently linked. Technically, you are right, and when I say, “referred to the House of Commons,” I am not saying “referred” as you would refer a bill that you ask to be amended, but, rather, “Here is what we have done; and you have done that. Now, we have discharged our duty and you have discharged yours. Let us get together, fellows, and try to do something.” So I think your case is very strong on the first point, reinforced by the French.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

The Chairman: The next questioner will be Senator Stewart, followed by Senator Argue and Senator Marsden.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My question for Mr. Trudeau concerns the spending power. I am a senator from Nova Scotia, one of those provinces that have not been enriched by extension into territories well endowed with natural resources.

Consequently, we have a strong interest in shared-cost programs. So I am interested in what you will say on the proposed new section 106A. As I read it, that section would permit a provincial government to opt out of any new shared-cost program and to receive reasonable compensation if it carried out a program or initiative compatible with the national objectives.

I remember what you said in your initial presentation. You felt that there was a good deal of uncertainty as to the meaning of compatible and national objectives. On March 2 of this year the Canadian Nurses' Association appeared before this committee. They told us that because of progress in the medical sciences, if health care in Canada is to be kept up to date, there will have to be new and reformed programs in the health care fields. They went on to say that the experience of the Canadian Nurses' Association was that even without the proposed new section 106A the ability of the Government of Canada to ensure that money transferred to the provinces for the purposes of shared-cost programs is used for the intended purpose is less than they would like it to be.

They did not disagree with the position you are now asserting, but they went beyond it. They said that they were certain that section 106A would have the effect of endangering, first, future health care programs and, second, reformed versions of existing health care programs such as hospitalization and Medicare. They told us, for example, that they were quite sure that the uniformity and portability of health care programs in these fields, under 106A, would be a thing of the past.

[Senator Frith.]

As a Nova Scotian representing Nova Scotians, the thought that the people of that province, a have-not province, would not be assured of uniform treatment in other provinces is really unacceptable. What I want to ask you is this: On the basis of your long practical experience with shared-cost programs, is there merely a sort of legal dubiety, or is there, as the Canadian Nurses' Association suggests, almost certainly that the possibility of new or reformed health care programs will be frustrated by the proposed new section?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, thank you for referring to my expertise. I wish I had the expertise of Al Johnson, the former Deputy Minister of Health and Welfare, who testified before the joint committee.

Senator Stewart: And here.

Mr. Trudeau: And here also?

Senator Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not see his testimony here, but I think he would very categorically have said that your pessimism was justified. I would say the same thing. Just thinking in terms of politics, other provinces might say, “Well, what are you complaining about? In Nova Scotia, if you want to have your health care thing, we will give you the money to have it. You will have full compensation if you opt out of the national program. Therefore, you won't get universality and portability, but you will have the diversity which is Canada, and you should be prepared to live with that.”

• (1820)

That is probably an unsatisfactory argument for you, but I have to go on and say that it would not even be that good, because in a matter such as health care, without even trying to improve it in the way you say, we know from experience and from the fights we had with several provinces during the 1970s and the 1980s that we would not have the same system in Alberta or in Ontario or in Quebec. Quebec has a better system in that there are no extra taxes, but there is no portability, and that is the price one pays for living in a distinct society.

It would be worse than that, because federal politicians would say: “Why should we do the taxing and bear the problem of being the tax collector simply to give the money to Nova Scotia or Alberta, or to a rich province like Ontario, just so they have their own system”? That defeats the whole purpose of using the spending power—as Mackenzie King used it and as everyone else since him has used it—to create a feeling among all Canadians that they belong to the same country and that the federal government is not just a tax collector; that the federal government is not something that is going to remain strong and vigorous by being identified in the citizens' minds as that “far away power that takes our taxes but never gives us any benefits, except in wartime when it gives us guns, but we get Medicare and other programs administered by the provinces.”

Family Allowances, of course, is a case that is not in provincial jurisdiction, because those moneys are given directly as grants, but, as I was about to say, that is the way Premier Bourassa and Premier Levesque wanted to operate.

I am drifting a bit, but getting back to your question, shared-cost programs within areas of provincial jurisdiction just will not happen if the federal politicians only get to tax and do not get to ensure some form of Canadianization and portability and national will, which would underlie that.

You gave one example, but I think as we go on we will realize, for instance, that in the future we will have to integrate a lot of our welfare and social assistance programs. Unemployment insurance benefits are under federal jurisdiction, workplace accidents are under provincial jurisdiction, and other social benefits are under municipal administration. At some point it would be important to integrate all of those programs and, perhaps, to reform the Unemployment Insurance Act by not giving power back to the provinces but making sure the provinces legislate in the same way.

If each province can say: "No, we are going to take the money but not pass the laws," then you would be damaging the whole area of social programs that benefit all Canadians.

The Chairman: Are you finished, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): It may well be that other senators want to pursue this.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I think we should stop for a moment and see how we wish to proceed.

We have had questions now for one hour, and we have only gone through six names on the list. There are another 12 names on the list. On that basis, we would be two more hours. I think it is unfair to the witness—who has been in the stand for three-and-a-half hours—to continue.

There are two ways we can proceed; we can go on for another half hour and then break, or we could break now for three-quarters of an hour and return at 7.15 p.m. to complete the list then.

What is the wish of honourable senators?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I can undertake to answer much more briefly, if that is of help, provided you hold me to it. I am sometimes afraid of being insolent if I just answer in a few sentences, but if you order me to do so—

The Chairman: No. I have deliberately not attempted to interfere with the questions or answers, because I think it is important that there be an opportunity for full questioning and that you have an opportunity to give full answers. It is not my intention to limit the questioning or the answers, or, indeed, the questioners, except that I would propose to close the list now and not add any more names.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, as you have implied, there are two considerations, the consideration of the Senate and senators, and also the convenience of the witness.

Mr. Trudeau: I am okay.

Senator Frith: Can we have your reaction, Mr. Trudeau, to our continuing for three-quarters of an hour and then finishing at 7.15, or would you rather break for 15 minutes now and go until 8 o'clock?

Mr. Trudeau: I would rather go right through, if I am given a choice, but I can come back in 45 minutes.

Senator Frith: If the witness is prepared to go straight through, I think we should do so.

The Chairman: I gather the consensus is to continue.

Senator Pitfield: Mr. Chairman, some of us have not asked that our names be put on a list because we wanted to ensure that there was a full opportunity for others to ask questions. There is another possibility that I would ask you to consider, and that is whether or not the witness could return at a later time, perhaps tomorrow. Do we have to finish in three-quarters of an hour?

Mr. Trudeau: It would be difficult for me to return tomorrow, but thank you for the suggestion.

Senator Frith: If the witness is prepared to continue, I think we should.

The Chairman: I hear no objection.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be better to go right through. Perhaps we should try to abbreviate this a little, although we do not want to miss a syllable. Nevertheless, if things were a little more concise, perhaps we might get more opportunity to ask questions.

The Chairman: I hear you, and I hope that others have heard you as well, Senator Doody. I gather that the consensus is to continue.

Next on the list is Senator Argue, followed by Senator Marchand, to be followed by Senator Fairbairn.

Senator Argue: Once again, this has been a first-class performance.

Since the Meech Lake Accord was announced, and since the discussion has gone on, do you think that within that period of time there has been any strengthening of the separatist element in the province of Quebec or elsewhere in Canada?

I bring to your attention quotes from a Globe and Mail article which reports the Speech from the Throne in British Columbia. The article is in the Globe and Mail of March 16, and I quote:

Mr. Vander Zalm indicated his Government will study areas of federal jurisdiction with British Columbia and determine which would "more appropriately be administered by the province."

"We will target our actions towards key sectors of economic growth, such as communications, airports, port facilities, boards and commissions and other agencies."

The article goes on to state:

Mr. Vander Zalm then made clear that he intends to put Canada on probation.

"We will develop ways and means . . . and make public on a regular basis, an evaluation of our status and treatment within Confederation."

● (1830)

Since that was announced, do you think it has kept Canada more united or amicable, or has it added to separatist elements in various places?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the expression in French is l'appétit vient en mangeant, which means that if you eat, you get hungrier. I used the expression in my presentation that the demands of the provinces were really a bottomless pit.

The reason I went through the 1976 Premiers' consensus, the 1978 Premiers' consensus and the 1980 Premiers' consensus is that the longer they discussed things with me, every time I gave a package, the greater was the possibility they would say, "Oh, but we have thought of something else we want." I think that is where Premier Vander Zalm is going now. He is saying, "Well, it was Quebec's round, and they did get a pretty nice deal"—forgetting that British Columbia also has the opportunity to name senators and judges and has opting out powers—"but now it is somebody else's turn." This government of national reconciliation has a lot of reconciliation ahead of it to bring about, as you can see.

In Quebec, I do not think anything has happened. The people care very much, but, in terms of political parties, what we have seen is the replacement of a somewhat moderate leader of the Péquistes by a hardliner. Obviously, Meech Lake has not had the effect of creating what used to be called "fédéralisme rentable ou le beau risque du fédéralisme." That is the expression René Lévesque brought out after Mr. Mulroney became Prime Minister. Federalism under Trudeau was not a good risk for Quebec, but under Mulroney it was a beautiful risk. The people of Quebec could see what they could get out of Canada and maybe they would not have to leave. Mr. Johnson told Mr. Bourassa that he did not get enough, to which he replied, "Well, there will be more rounds. I got a lot this time, but I have more up my sleeve. I always have the threat of separation, because it is part of my party's program, too, the ultimate self-determination of Quebec."

I think what is happening is they have got a soft Prime Minister and they will try to get as much as they can out of him in the next round. Mr. Peckford was given the offshore, but now he wants fish. Mr. Vander Zalm wants to have his share of the next round. I do not think it would really mean anything if Mr. Mulroney decided to stand tough and say, "The bar is closed, there are no more free drinks. You guys can line up if you want to, but I ain't pouring any more." I would not think that that is a serious threat of separation, but it certainly proves that you do not quench thirst of drinkers by giving them a few free drinks. You cannot think that they are going to stop there.

Senator Argue: I want to project something that has a lot of assumptions attached to it. You asked some time ago why you should comment particularly on the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. But the Liberal Party in the House of Commons put forward a number of amendments that were supported. I read the papers and my impression is that if Mr. Turner is elected as Prime Minister in the next election, his position will be—and I believe he has stated it publicly—to try to get certain amendments made to the present accord, amendments having to do with native rights, the rights of the northern Territories, and so on.

If Mr. Turner, as the next Prime Minister, put forward all of his proposed amendments and nothing is changed, perhaps that government will take the attitude that it cannot accept Meech Lake as it now is and that, therefore, it will say no to the present Meech Lake Accord. My question is this: What will that do to Canada? What will that do to the possibility of separation? Could a new government taking that attitude deal with all of the strife that would follow and come out with a Canada that is in fairly good shape?

Mr. Trudeau: What do you mean by "all of that strife that would follow"? What strife?

Senator Argue: Well, arguments.

Mr. Trudeau: I have had arguments and they never made me lose elections, except for one. I was attacked all of the time in much of the Quebec media and, I would say, even much more by the British Columbia media. You take your chances. I do not want to comment on Mr. Turner for the reasons I stated earlier, but I spring to attention when I hear somebody threaten strife.

Senator Argue: All right, that is the wrong way to put it. I did not mean strife in a physical way. I meant arguments, strong arguments and difficulties.

Mr. Trudeau: Sure, that is the stock in trade of federalism. Strong arguments started with John A. Macdonald. For heaven's sake, we had British Columbia going to Westminster directly in 1904 to get more money. There were terribly strong words used all of the time—that is what politicians do. The people do not cause strife because the government suddenly does not have a little bigger share of the pie.

Senator Argue: So if we revert to the current Constitution rather than the proposed accord, you would think that Canada could be strong and that, perhaps, other amendments could be made after that?

Mr. Trudeau: I am saying that if Meech Lake goes through, Canada will be weaker. I do not see how you could make a country stronger by making it weaker, particularly in today's world. It has always been a tough game out there, but now nations are cutting things pretty close to the bone. If you want to bargain out in the world, whether it be with a free trade agreement or bilateral agreements or fisheries agreements or anything, you have to have a pretty strong federal government. Put yourself in the situation in which the provinces can triangulate between Ottawa, Paris and Washington, for example. Canada will not be a strong country under the Meech Lake Accord. That is why, basically, Canadians, with all their gripes against the federal government, still go to the polls and elect and change governments. Nobody wants to change the federal system. I do not think the Vander Zalms really mean it any more than the western separatists did in the seventies when they were threatening separation.

[Senator Argue.]

As I said in my concluding remarks, however, if the people want to go that way, I will probably go on living in Quebec and you will probably go on living in Saskatchewan, Ottawa or wherever. It will be a worse country for it, but I do not think you can worry about possible dissatisfaction or strife in a way that prevents you from doing what you think is right for the country. You take your chances. I have great faith in the Canadian people and also in the people of the provinces, particularly my province. They play a beautiful game of checks and balances. They voted for Lévesque; they voted for our party. If the Prime Minister of Canada gets tough, they will probably vote for him more than they would if he gets soft, whether this Prime Minister or another one.

The Chairman: The next senator on my list is Senator Marchand, followed by Senator Fairbairn and Senator Lucier.

Senator Marchand: Mr. Trudeau, the aboriginal peoples of this country are pretty angry about the Meech Lake Accord. They are left off the agenda. They are not even as important as fish.

When the last amendments were passed in 1982, perhaps you will recall that I had a conversation with you, and I told you about the amendments that were put in. Section 35, I thought, was some of the most important legislation brought forward on behalf of our peoples since the Royal Proclamation of 1763, and I still believe that.

Do you believe that agenda items can only be added by unanimous consent, especially relating to aboriginal issues? The other question I have is this: What are the implications of the distinct society for Quebec in relation to our people, especially in the province of Quebec where there is a lot of despair in the groups who have appeared before us? Perhaps you can comment also on people outside Quebec.

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to your first question, senator, I would say that you do not need unanimous consent either to add or subtract agenda items. I am looking at subsection 50(2), which says:

The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

The word "shall" is imperative. They name "the Senate, fisheries and such other matters as are agreed upon." The last clause, "and such other matters as are agreed upon", is one of those vague clauses. Who will agree? Does it have to be ten provinces, or can it be seven, or only the federal government?

I would say that in order to subtract amendments you need to go through the amending process. Part VI, Constitution Conferences, is sloppy drafting because of haste. It says, "shall have included on their agenda," and it does not have any sunset clause. The Senate and the fisheries will be there forever. To take them off you would not need unanimous consent, but you would have to use the amending procedure provided by section 38, where you need seven provinces, 50 per cent of the population, plus the federal government.

To take fish off you need to have the agreement of seven provinces. You could probably manage if you gave Mr. Peckford everything he wanted. I do not know what some of the other provinces might say, but to take something off you need to make a constitutional amendment to change the agenda.

To put something on the agenda, it is not defined. It says, "such other matters as are agreed upon." I would guess that if that had to be interpreted by the courts they would say, "We will presume it is agreed upon by the same number as needed to take it off." So you need seven provinces to add aboriginal rights to the next constitutional conference. You had better start lobbying!

Regarding your question about what the distinct society would do to aboriginals in Quebec, one of the things that the Quebec government did when it decided to boycott the constitutional conferences was not to be there when we were discussing aboriginal rights. They were there as observers, but did not participate. Obviously, that was not good for the Indians, because Quebec is more favourable to the recognition of some form of aboriginal rights than some other provinces that we know of. It would have been better had they been there, and I think they did not attend in order to make the Indians feel that the 1982 accord was not such a great thing after all, because Quebec was not there.

I should not be talking to an expert on the matter, but, by and large, Quebec has dealt, and will deal, with the aboriginal people as fairly as any other province in Canada. That does not mean that that is what the aboriginal people or the native people want. They want a specific deal, and I think they are right in wanting it in the Constitution when they ask for some form of self-government—not self-determination, but that is another subject.

I think they would have to have it on the constitutional conference agenda, and Quebec being in on the Meech Lake Accord would give you one more vote to get it on the agenda. On the other hand, being in the accord means that there is a distinct society, and here I come to your second question.

The distinct society is not defined anywhere, but, at first blush, I would not think it includes the aboriginal people, because subsection 2(1) talks about French-speaking Canadians concentrated in Quebec but present elsewhere in Canada. It does not say much about Indians or anything like that. The Indians and aboriginal people would be protected under the Charter rights. As I argued earlier, Charter rights can be weakened by the "distinct society" clause. I am not saying that they will be; I am not even saying that the English-speaking Canadians will be worse treated after Meech Lake than before, but I am saying that they will not be as protected under the Charter.

I think it is safer to stick with the protection you have rather than to try and get some hypothetical improvement by going for an amendment which does not give you any special rights.

Senator Marchand: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marchand. Honourable senators, I will give you the list of names that I have. Some senators are asking for supplementary questions and I have not accepted them. I have the following names on my list: Senators Fairbairn, Lucier, Adams, Cogger, LeBlanc (Beausejour), Bosa, Ottenheimer, Grafstein, Tremblay and Hicks.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Mr. Trudeau. At the beginning of your remarks earlier this afternoon you talked about correcting mistakes and you talked about some of the flaws of 1982 being made infinitely worse in 1987.

From our hearings, particularly in the North, we would conclude that what was seen as a flaw in 1982 in terms of the establishment of new provinces in the North in the future has been made infinitely worse in 1987, because you may remember how angry northerners were when their future came within an amending formula in 1982. Now it is locked into the unanimity clause.

First, I would like to ask you why the change had to be made in 1982. Was that one of the compromise trade-offs? What hope do you see with the unanimity formula, if this thing goes through, for the future of provinces in the North with all that implies in terms of sovereignty?

Mr. Trudeau: To answer the 1982 question first, it was a trade-off based on the fact that there are sort of conflicting interests between the provinces and the federal government. From the point of view of the federal government, theoretically, the more provinces there are the easier it is to divide those provinces into groups, or clans, or conflicting groups of interest.

To take an obvious example, the United States, with 51 states, has a situation where the states have considerably less power than if they only had ten states down there. Ten states the size of New York and California would be a big threat to Washington. But the more there are, the less the central power is subject to being ganged up on. Now, the provinces have the opposite view. They would rather be few in number. Adding a couple of new provinces—perhaps two or three by carving out the Territories—would dilute the powers of the other ten, and dilute it all the more seriously, so that you would be getting provinces with interests, particularly in land, which are not the same as, for example, the normal attitude of, say, the Government of Alberta or British Columbia. Also, there is the fact that those provinces have drawn hypothetical maps where they see themselves stretching up into the Yukon and stretching up from Alberta to the North. They would like to get that some day. It is that kind of thing where they say, "We said unanimity never, but, okay, we will rely on my old saw and national will. If seven of us representing 50 per cent of the population cannot agree to have new provinces, then we will wait a while."

Do not put me in the position of defending the 1982 amending formula. I think it was much too rigid and had the opting-out position, but there it was. When we talked about the Victoria formula, my recollection is that we did not even mention the Territories in that it was understood throughout the seven days that the Territories were under federal jurisdiction until the day that the federal government would establish new provinces under the rules, under the concept of the provinces themselves, or under the two new frontiers. You have to get the agreement with the other side and do some work. It was a bad compromise, just like the opting-out thing was, but it permitted us to get a Charter, entrench aboriginal rights, and patriate the Constitution. We had no choice once the Supreme Court said, "You cannot go it alone without giving the Lords in Britain a chance to review it." This is all water under the bridge, but there is the explanation. That is why it happened in 1982.

Why it happened in 1988 is even more of the same. The provinces had taken a giant step in 1982. Honestly, I think those provinces are worse than the federal government ever was in that they will never be in a hurry to give provincial status to the Territories. The federal government, at least, had the precedents of 1905, or 1911, when it gave Quebec and Ontario the great North, and it had the precedent in 1931 when the federal government gave resources to the western provinces. They had been erected as provinces since 1905, but only got their resources 25 years later, while in the case of the central provinces they were provinces in 1867, but only got their resources in the North more than 30 years later. That is what is going on in the minds of the provinces. They want to stave off the day forever where those Territories will become provinces, particularly if there will be a majority of native people in some of them. It will then give the native people a government which will be sitting at the interprovincial conferences and can get into the game of bargaining fish against rights, and so on.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Fairbairn. Next is Senator Lucier, followed by Senator Adams and Senator LeBlanc.

Senator Lucier: It is nice to see you, Mr. Trudeau.

We have heard a lot of talk today about special rights. I would like to start out by saying that the people from northern Canada do not ask for more rights than other Canadians; they just want the same rights that are enjoyed by a Canadian who lives in a province, and that will not be the case under Meech Lake.

A task force of this committee travelled to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to hear submissions on Meech Lake, and, believe me, we got an earful. We were told that since the Senate and Supreme Court appointments shall now be made from provincial lists supplied by premiers, and since future provincial status has now virtually been denied to them by the "unanimity" clause, they would now be second-class citizens and that that status would be entrenched in our Constitution. It has been stated repeatedly by the elected leaders of both northern Territories that at no time were they involved in the discussions that led to the Meech Lake Accord. They were not invited to Meech Lake; and they were not invited to the Langevin conference. We feel that we were denied the same privileges as other Canadians of being represented when the accord was being drawn up. Our position is not that we lost the argument, it is that we were never permitted to argue.

[The Chairman.]

The Constitution Act, 1982, which you have before you, on page 12, section 37.1(1), dealing with constitutional conferences, states:

In addition to the conference convened in March 1983, at least two constitutional conferences composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada, the first within three years after April 17, 1982 and the second within five years after that date.

Section 3 is the key to the question that I want to ask you, Mr. Trudeau. It states:

The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of a conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Trudeau, as you know, I was involved in the joint committee at the time. I remember that clause being put in there, and I remember why it was put in there, because we really felt that if any meeting should be convened to deal with anything that affected the Territories, we, at least, wanted to be there. My question, sir, is: How could Meech Lake have happened when that section is there? Is Meech Lake not a contravention of that section of the Charter?

• (1900)

Mr. Trudeau: As you point out, it does say "shall invite" when it affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. There is no doubt that the Meech Lake Accord and the Langevin accord affect those Territories in the way we have been talking about in discussions with Senator Marchand and Senator Fairbairn. So that "shall" is imperative.

Senator Frith: Except for the "in the opinion of the Prime Minister."

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, "in the opinion of the Prime Minister." However, as we know, in the courts, when they talk of opinions, unless the clause is spelled out otherwise, they are always interpreted as reasonable opinions. In other words, an opinion that can reasonably be held.

It would be hard to argue that when you are affecting the Northwest Territories, as does the Meech Lake Accord, it could reasonably be held that they do not fall under this clause. Therefore, I agree with Senator Lucier that those meetings were held in contravention of section 37.1(3). However, there were amendments on further conferences, which I do not have. I have the earlier text here.

However, to return to my argument, you read subsection (1)?

Senator Lucier: Yes, subsection (1), I think, is important.

Mr. Trudeau: I have:

... within one year after this part comes into force.

However, later that year that was amended to spell out certain dates.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Trudeau, in dealing with constitutional conferences, it says:

In addition to the conference convened in March 1983, at least two constitutional conferences composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened ...

It does not say that there will be only two; it says that there will be at least two. Therefore, I would think that subsection (3) would apply to any future conferences.

Mr. Trudeau: Senator, my answer is yes and no. That is why I wanted you to mention the dates to me. I did not remember them exactly. In subsection (3) it says:

... of a conference convened under subsection (1) ...

And subsection (1), as amended, puts in these new dates. It also mentions at least two constitutional conferences, but it does not mention further conferences. So I am not sure you could argue that subsection (3) applies to any other conferences but the ones specifically pointed out in subsection (1).

Regardless of that, even if you were right, the question is: What kind of redress is there for this?

The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite ...

However, he did not invite. I do not think a court would invalidate the decisions taken at Meech Lake or Langevin because the Prime Minister did not discharge his duties. There may be some damages that should be paid, but I do not think the decisions would be invalidated by the fact that people were not invited, provided that the amending process was followed. That is the operative element, provided the Senate, the House of Commons and the provinces do it.

However, you have been left out, and you probably could have taken a mandamus against the Secretary to the cabinet or the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, or something like that.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is interesting, but I am on my own time now and I do not think I can add anything further.

Senator Lucier: Just one more question, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it is any secret, Mr. Trudeau, that I, as a northerner and as a Canadian, would love to see this Meech Lake Accord go down the tube, which is what it deserves. I am wondering if you have ever considered going to other parts of Canada, other than around here, and explaining to Canadians what is really contained in the accord. I think if a person such as yourself were to go to other parts of Canada, such as the West, and tell them what was contained in the accord, they would listen to you. I do not think there is anyone else doing that, and I wonder whether or not you would be interested in doing that if you were asked.

Mr. Trudeau: Senator, I suppose the simple answer is that I have been invited at various times to participate and I have always refused. I wanted to appear before the Senate and before the joint committee because of my relationship with those places in a former avocation. However, I am not in the business of politics any more. As I told Senator Doyle, I am trying to influence governments, but I am not on the campaign trail trying to influence people, including Leaders of the Opposition.

Senator Lucier: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you, anyway, for the invitation.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Lucier. Next is Senator Adams, followed by Senator LeBlanc.

Senator Adams: Thank you. Mr. Trudeau, it is nice to see you again, and especially here, appearing before the Senate Committee of the Whole. Most of the questions I wanted to ask have already been asked by other senators. However, I have one question I would like to put to you.

Since the signing of the Meech Lake Accord on the last day of June, as Senator Lucier has said, some of the people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories feel kind of left out, especially since we consider that our Territories are also a part of Canada.

However, under the Meech Lake Accord, the ten premiers now have a veto. When you were Prime Minister some negotiating was under way with the native peoples as to their aboriginal rights, and I believe that you yourself took part in some of those negotiations. Now, since the signing of the Meech Lake Accord, if the subject of the territorial rights of the people in the North is even mentioned, especially to some of the premiers, it is quite clear that they would like to acquire parts of those two Territories.

In the meantime, we who have lived up there in the North for a long time would like to see ourselves gain control of that part of Canada so that, in turn, we are able to control our environment and any kind of activity that might endanger that environment. Mr. Shultz, the Secretary of State of the United States, said that he would come to Ottawa and make an agreement with Mr. Clark on Arctic sovereignty, but we who live in the North have nothing to say about the matter.

I hope that the premiers and the Prime Minister have further negotiations at the table, because, according to the Meech Lake Accord as it is presently worded, if one premier says no, then the Indian people will have no more rights.

● (1910)

Mr. Trudeau: I do not see the direct connection between the land claims, commonly understood, and these particular agreements. I think what concerns me, and probably you, is the possibility that there will be, some day, in the Territories, an electorate composed of a majority of native people, whether Inuit or Indian. That concern is really justified, because the unanimity rule seems to be pushed very far into the future. That is not to say that land claims existing in the provinces as they exist now or in the Territories as they exist now have, in any sense, been diminished by these acts. From that point of view, you are no better and no worse off, but, from the point of view of ever thinking that you can have a province up there where, perhaps, the proportion of native people will be infinitely higher than it is in Ontario, Quebec or Manitoba, that is pushed a long way into the future.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Adams. The next questioner will be Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour).

[Translation]

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Mr. Chairman, I will try to be very brief.

Mr. Trudeau, during a debate in the National Assembly, I think it was Mr. Rémillard, and not Mr. Bourassa, who stated clearly there would be only one distinct society, not two or three.

You spoke earlier about language minorities, and I would like to ask a simple question: Aside from New Brunswick, where we seem to have resolved our problems, and possibly Ontario, where there is a critical mass, do you think that francophone minorities outside Quebec might as well give-up trying to survive?

Mr. Trudeau: Senator, I know them too well to ever believe they would give up. They have survived in extremely difficult circumstances. They always stayed, and they always came back. And I am certainly not about to tell others to give up hope or stop surviving.

I agree that if your question points to a trend, it will be much harder for them. They will have to work harder still to protect the little they have gained.

That is why the concept of duality as defined in the first paragraph of section 2 is regrettable. I am told that francophones outside Quebec like that concept. I think there is a misconception here.

As I said earlier, duality means that you divide the population in two. To divide means to weaken. If Quebec is a distinct unit and if we want Quebec to preserve and promote the rights defined in section 2, all it means is that there is a majority of francophones in Quebec. That is all it says in section 2 to explain why the society is distinct. There is a majority of francophones.

So one could not be faulted for interpreting this as an excuse for increasing the concentration of francophones in Quebec. This means that if people from the other provinces want to come to Quebec, they will have a better chance of survival.

This is rather odd, and besides, the English and French texts are different. I am sure you noticed that. In English it says:

[English]

the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, . . .

One is centred, but, to the English reader, we are telling him he is concentrated outside of Quebec, but, to the French reader, only—

[Translation]

You are centred in Quebec if you are French-speaking but you are centred in the rest of the country if you are English-speaking.

I don't know whether the translation will get us anywhere. For all practical purposes, section 3 maintains that the role of the legislature and the Government of Quebec is to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b). If we read (1)(b), it says that Quebec constitutes a distinct society.

So one wonders what a distinct society is. There is no definition anywhere, except that (1)(a) tells us that the French are centred in that province.

So the legislature and the Government of Quebec would be perfectly justified in saying it is their role to preserve and promote the concentration of Francophones in Quebec.

So what is the English-speaking population in the other provinces going to do? It will promote the concentration of Anglophones. They will not try and threaten the existence of Francophones in the rest of the country, nor, I assume, will Quebec do so with respect to the Anglophones in that province, but for all practical purposes, their mandate is to preserve and protect their majority.

When we have sensitive issues like the signage case, and aside from what the Supreme Court is going to say or what the Government of Quebec is going to do, I simply want to make the point that, according to the law of simple political dynamics, if signs in English are gradually prohibited—I am not talking about French being compulsory. I think it makes sense to make French compulsory on signs. After all, it is a province with a francophone majority.

However, prohibiting the use of English in one province will inevitably make Canadians in the other provinces start thinking about the fact that in Quebec they don't even have the right to put up a sign in English, not even in tiny letters at the bottom of a sign. So why should Alberta or British Columbia try and make people realize this is a bilingual country, and so forth?

That is why I make a distinction between bilingualism and duality. When we talk about duality, we are saying there are English-speaking Canadians and there are French-speaking Canadians. We promote English and French. But we don't want that. We want to promote bilingualism so that people in New Brunswick or Quebec can deal with the federal government in either official language, and eventually—and in New Brunswick that is already the case—receive provincial services as well. As you know, New Brunswick had the vision and foresight to adopt sections 16 to 20 in the Charter.

We would like to see this happen in Ontario and Manitoba, so that at least in those four provinces francophones will be able to deal with both the federal and provincial governments in French.

But if that is what we want, we don't want duality in Ontario. We want bilingualism, not duality.

Does that answer your question, Senator LeBlanc?

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc.

● (1920)

[English]

Senator Bosa: A witness who appeared before the Committee of the Whole, Professor Williamson from British Columbia, suggested that if one or two provinces did not give their approval to the Meech Lake Accord the Prime Minister had the prerogative of invoking the present amending formula. I am not sure if I am repeating his words accurately, but I think that is the thought he wanted to express.

You are the father of the policy of multiculturalism, the policy that you announced on November 8, 1971; and also the policy which found a reference in section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights in the Constitution Act of 1982. That policy gave millions of Canadians of neither English nor French background a great feeling of comfort, a feeling of cultural equality, if I might use that expression. Some of the leaders of the ethno-cultural communities are now concerned that the reference to section 27, which is contained in section 16 of the Meech Lake Accord, says that nothing will affect section 27. But does it mean that multiculturalism will remain where it is now, and that it will not be enhanced; and how will it fare in the province of Quebec where the "distinct society" clause is very prominent?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, you see, the "distinct society" clause, if we agree with the report of the House of Commons, can affect—perhaps not in a significant way; I read the text to you earlier—the rights of minorities in that distinct society. I cannot predict how a government, or succeeding governments, of Quebec would treat the multicultural question. I remember that the PQ government did quite a bit with multicultural groups. They had a minister who was very active in that area. So, on general questions, excepting that of language, they might fare just as well under the Meech Lake agreement as they have in the past. There might not be any significant change.

But, then, I do not know for sure; and, in connection with the language that multicultural peoples—non-French, non-English-stock peoples—use, I do not think they can expect to make any progress. French will tend to be more and more the language in Quebec, and English more and more the language elsewhere.

For instance, in the area of education there are two things which still have to be corrected in the 1981-82 agreement. One has to do with the phrase "where numbers warrant." That was put in after the premiers had made an agreement at a meeting, in 1979, in Montreal, where they said, "We will have deals among ourselves to protect that we are English and you are French, or to educate that we are English and you are French." Then there is the other clause on education, where Quebec is exempted—the thing we call "the Canada clause." It has to favour English for children of English families coming from the rest of Canada. But if you are an English family, or even an English-speaking family, coming from Italy, from Barbados or from somewhere else, you do not get the protection that English-speaking Canadians get if they come from Manitoba to Quebec. In that sense, new Canadians will not be treated as well. But that is something that was put in the 1982 agreement.

What I was arguing earlier is that if the federal government can give all of these things to the provinces, it should at least have asked, in exchange, for a few concessions like that, such as "where numbers warrant" and on the "opting into" the education clause, which applies to the rest of Canada. Quebec should have opted into that, too.

So there will be some differences. But I think that Quebec people are as tolerant as most, and perhaps even more than most, in terms of dealing with ethnic people—provided they bloody well want to learn French.

Senator Bosa: What about my first question?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes. Your question is a very interesting one. I thought about that. You see, some of the 1987 accord would be possible under the 1982 amending formula. On section 38, with two-thirds of the provinces and 50 per cent, you could make some amendments. I see no reason why you could not make the amendment on immigration. But there are some on which you could not. You could not, under that rule, take things in section 41, such as the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada. You need unanimous consent for that; you need the legislative assembly of each province. You could not touch the lieutenant governor and the Governor General. But there is a lot in Meech Lake that could be done under the normal amending process. But they agreed that it must be unanimous; and I am not sure, but maybe it is something that the Senate could put to them. If you want to change the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting senators, you need two-thirds of the provinces. But you don't need ten of them. I don't know which professor you named—

Senator Bosa: Professor Williamson.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, he has a point. There are some things in the Meech Lake Accord that you could have done by the normal amending process. But that is not the way they decided to operate, you see. They wanted to do it in secret, quickly, and get a package deal. I think that if they had followed the normal amending process you would have had a normal conduct by the House of Commons and by the provinces. They would have said, "Well, okay, we have some time to do it, and we are going to debate this amendment on education or that amendment on the spending power. Give us time and it will come through."

● (1930)

But they wanted a package. We wanted to be able to embrace Quebec quickly and finally, and especially before the election.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Bosa. Next on the list is Senator Ottenheimer, followed by Senator Grafstein.

Senator Ottenheimer: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I know it is getting late, so I will be brief. I should like to address a question with respect to the "distinct society" concept. I believe you made some reference to that in a certain context.

We in Newfoundland feel that we are a distinct society. That comes as no surprise to you. We do not think that makes us better or worse; that is just a fact. I think that is true in a fair range of values or activities. Historically, our development has been different from that of other provinces, not that they have all been alike. Newfoundland is distinct culturally and psychologically, but not linguistically, obviously.

In Newfoundland there has never been, with the various demands that Newfoundland does make, any desire that this reality should be given a constitutional expression. I do not think people in Newfoundland would feel that their identity, or their distinct society, would be enhanced by a constitutional reference, nor is it diminished by its exclusion.

With respect to Quebec, obviously the situation is quite different, at least according to the elected representatives in Quebec provincial governments, the current government and former governments, not only the Péquiste government but those before that. There has been a fairly consistent request for constitutional recognition of Quebec being a distinct society.

I think it is fair to say, Mr. Trudeau, that you intimated that if this were only to be referred to in the preamble it might be acceptable to you and others. I believe you suggested, as well, that in a preamble it would probably be no more than rhetoric and that that could well be interpreted as an insult to the intelligence of the people of Quebec. Therefore, if it is to be given an expression, it would have to be in an interpretative clause, which this is.

If it is accepted—and this is where I have particular difficulty—that Quebec is a distinct society, whatever that means historically, sociologically, linguistically and culturally, how can it not be appropriate or logical that it be given a constitutional reference in an interpretative manner? How can one not interpret a Constitution in light of the factual or real situation?

I would appreciate your views on that.

Mr. Trudeau: That is certainly a good argument. It is the one that I think most Quebec politicians and intellectuals make. It is something you can decide to do, but I want you to make sure you know what you are doing when you do that.

When you put that in a preamble you are no longer saying that Quebec is distinct sociologically, politically and historically, and Newfoundland is distinct sociologically, and that we will put one in because it pleases them and not put the other in because they did not ask for it.

If it is in a preamble, I still would not like it, but if you are saying that you are precisely putting it in a sociological and political sense, then the courts read this preamble and they say: "Well, as courts we sometimes deal with morals, but sociology is not law and morals and politics are not law. What does the law say?"

If it is in a preamble, the courts will say: "Well, it is an effort to get some political kudos, so it is all right."

But if you put it in an interpretative clause, and you do that in such a way as to say that that distinct society is imperative in every interpretation of the Constitution, then you are saying something else completely. You are giving the Government of Quebec—and it says so explicitly in section 2(3)—an explicit mandate to legislate in a way which is conducive to the promotion of that distinct society. You are giving it a mandate to legislate to promote that society, whereas, in Newfoundland and Labrador a mandate to legislate to promote its identity. The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador can promote its distinctness under section 92, as it has been doing since it entered Confederation, but Newfoundland is not a distinct society in the sense of the Constitution; Newfoundland is a distinct society in terms of sociology, economics and, perhaps, language, with their particular accents, and so forth. Newfoundland is distinct in all of those ways, but, from the point of view of the Constitution, judges do not interpret a Constitution to permit laws to legislate that distinction. In the case of Quebec, the Constitution must be interpreted so that the Government of Quebec, under section 2(3), can pass laws to promote that distinctness.

That is the difference, and that is what Mr. Bourassa says, and that is what the report of the joint committee said when it talked about interpretation and the division of powers, and that is, of course, what Mr. Rémillard says.

Would the courts say that? I do not know. Why do we not have a reference? You and I will then be able to know what we are talking about. But until we have a reference all we know is that if the courts say it means something, Quebec is happy, and a lot of people in the rest of Canada are unhappy, and if the courts say it does not mean anything any more for Quebec than it would for Newfoundland, then you have a fight on your hands, because then we are status quo ante. Quebec may be in legally, to quote the former President of the Canadian Bar Association, but it is not in morally, and anyone who says that Quebec is bound by that Constitution is, to use his words, “committing a constitutional heresy.”

Senator Ottenheimer: I certainly assure you that I will not be seeking any reference. Newfoundland has not done very well, historically, in references to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Let me pursue this with one additional question or observation, and it is difficult to distinguish between the two.

Respecting the opponents of the Meech Lake Accord and the “distinct society” reference in the Constitution in an interpretative manner, obviously a very strong aspect of their argument, and one which you have developed, is the possible scenario of judicial interpretation and the effect that that would have on fragmentation? I will stop there, but the shorthand, I think, is descriptive. Can you not say that Canada functions, perhaps exists and continues to exist, because of a lot of goodwill, give and take, patience, pragmatism, empiricism and political reality, however one characterizes it? If those basic elements are not there, or, perhaps, if they are there, quite irrespective of certain legal documents, is that not what really counts? Can one not say that the future viability of Canada is going to be much more dependent on that pragmatic goodwill and experience we have gained together over the decades? Do you not think that perhaps we should have more faith in that kind of a collective political goodwill?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, perhaps you did not quote him exactly, but a great French philosopher said that in different terms. He said that the nation is a plebiscite of every day. That does not mean people will vote every day, but that every day they have to act as though they are in that nation. If they are not well treated, either because they are very poor or are oppressed in some sense, they are not going to vote for that nation, and the nation will experience strife and eventually can have civil wars and break up. In that sense, then, you are right. The feeling of the people is much more important, really, than the laws.

That is what I was trying to establish when I said that, since 1927, every federal government has tried to create a feeling of nationality, of nationhood. But Canada is a people. Mackenzie King did it one way, Diefenbaker did it another way, and so on. But there were all of the other things—we have the national flag; we have the words to a national anthem; we have Canada Day; we have celebrations on the Hill; we bring children to Parliament so that they will feel part of a whole. One of the things we did was to make the French-speaking people of Quebec and the French minorities elsewhere feel that the Government of Canada was really their government, because it could send out their Family Allowance cheques in French and their taxation forms in French. We asked for more bilinguals on the Hill, and so on. All of these things create a feeling of nationhood.

But how do you deal with a province, the government of which says, “But there is no Canadian people—there is the Quebec people and there may be something else, but do not start even a preamble with the words ‘the Canadian people,’ because you are offending us.” What do you do? This was not a law, it was a preamble we were trying to write. Not only the premier of the province but much of the intelligentsia and the media were saying, “The Canadian people—they are trying to say that we are not two nations and we are not going to let them get away with it.”

There are some people who do not want Canada to be united. Some of them do not want it because they want to separate; others want to be united, but they want Canada to be a pact between the provinces. They want the Premier of Newfoundland, the Premier of Quebec and the Premier of Manitoba to get together to decide what Canada should do as a country. But don’t ask the people—ask the premiers. The federal government, which is elected by all of the people of Canada, will be the result of a pact between the provinces. This is historic. The federal-provincial conferences turned around who speaks for Canada—is it 11 First Ministers or is it one government elected by and responsible to all of the people? The answer is that in matters such as education the premier speaks for the people of his province. In matters such as foreign affairs—theoretically, at least, until recently—the Government of Canada spoke for all of the people. In matters of property and civil rights the provinces speak for the Canadian people. But when there is a conflict of laws, you go to the courts and they will decide, "Well, in aeronautics, it is the Government of Canada that speaks for the Canadian people, not the provinces."

But what do you do when there is not a conflict of laws but a conflict of interest? You cannot go to the courts to know whether you should build a penitentiary in Quebec or the Chantier maritime in Nova Scotia. At some point there has to be a government which speaks for all Canadians and takes the credit—and the blame—for it.

You are quite right, senator, there is such a thing as a feeling and there is another thing that is a law, but some people have feelings which do not have the make-up of a strong Canada. That is all I am arguing. We can have a different kind of Canada; there is no doubt that after Meech Lake, if it becomes law, we will have a different Canada—one that is much more decentralized. The premiers have said that themselves. The report of the joint committee makes that clear—it will be a much more decentralized Canada. Mr. Kierans thinks that that is what was there in the first place; I think that is what he believes. I do not think all historians would agree with him, but that is a choice. Maybe that is why I try to promote the other choice. I have tried to promote a strong central government, but one under which there would be equality of the people, all sharing under the Charter certain rights which put them over and above all governments. I felt that in this century, particularly at the tail end of this century, a country needs a strong government. Newfoundland discussing with France is not as strong as Canada discussing with France.

Senator Ottenheimer: Nobody has ever suggested that, sir.

Mr. Trudeau: That is why there are two views of Canada. The premiers have one view; I have another. Canadians are free to choose. But I think we are entitled to draw the line when we get into governments whose mandate is to govern particularly for one linguistic community. It would be the same if they were to govern for one religious group or one race. That is why I never thought it would be a great idea if, in the Territories, there were a province composed only of Indians or only of Inuit. I think the country is much richer when there is a pluralistic society living within it. We have seen examples in history where governments become totalitarian when they think they are governing only for one race, and the others can go to concentration camps. That, however, is obviously an exaggeration of what is happening in Canada.

What is liberal democracy? It is a system where the people are the ultimate value. Each individual person or human being is the ultimate value and they have rights protected under a charter or given to them by the common law. They have rights. They can get together and form collectivities, whether the collectivities be called a trade union or a provincial government or a school commission. What democratic liberalism means as opposed to social democracy, if we make philosophical distinctions, is that the community is always second to the individual in our societies. We give rights to the individuals—rights of freedom of association, and so on—so they can get together and protect their collective rights, but the community itself is not a bearer of rights. The community receives rights from the individual, just as that largest community of all, the state—the national state—has rights given to it by the people under the Constitution.

Senator Frith: Or loaned to it, as Harry Truman used to say.

Mr. Trudeau: Or loaned to it, yes. They are mandated, and we can beat them at the next election. But when you say that the community itself will have rights, because it is a distinct society, I tremble for the freedom of everybody. If all the people of Quebec were to get together and use their rights under the Charter to say, "We want this kind of a government which is going to do whatever it wishes," they will elect it and that is fine. But if there is a government there that says, "Look, we are the custodians of the future of the French fact in North America and we want to govern this province in a way that that French fact is strengthened," so far so good. If they go on to say that they will use their mandate to make that French-speaking society the main aim of government rather than the freedom of the individuals in that society, I say they are making a mistake.

It is the individuals who come first. There is a majority of French-speaking individuals in Quebec and, therefore, they have a right to have a majority of signs in French. Charters are made not to protect majorities, whether in Quebec or Canada, but to protect minorities—the French in the other provinces, the English in Quebec, the multiculturals, the Indian and the Inuit in the whole of Canada. When there is a right to override the Charter, because you are a distinct society, you are no longer in a small "I" liberal society.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The next senator on my list is Senator Grafstein, followed by Senator Tremblay.

Senator Grafstein: Mr. Trudeau, I am curious about something that does not relate to the specifics of Meech Lake but relates to the run-up to Meech Lake. You have discussed the beautiful game you say Quebecers have always played by playing off the federal government against the provincial government to their natural benefit. You are also a believer in countervailing powers. Somehow there has been an absence of this in this exercise.

My question is this: What happened to the other strong francophone federalist voices in Quebec to counter the dualist ideology, the provincialist voices, that were shaping public opinion that led up to Meech Lake? If I can put it in your words, where were the francophone voices in Quebec that chose to speak for Canada? This phenomenon has obviously had absolutely devastating constitutional consequences.

You mentioned it in passing in response to a question. You partially explained this by suggesting that the Quebec intelligentsia—the intelligent people of Quebec—wanted more, and, therefore, if more was offered, they snapped it off the table.

They wanted more for Quebec, but why would Quebecers not want more in Quebec as Canadians?

That is the issue that has been bedevilling me since this started and the frustration that many of us here have suffered from. Where are those strong francophone federalist voices from Quebec, present company excepted?

Mr. Trudeau: I had them in mind when, earlier, I said that there are those federalists who want to have their cake and eat it too.

There is a certain unreality or, I am inclined to use the words, "lack of sophistication" in the arts of political sciences which makes you think you can be a strong federalist and, at the same time, have a special status. I am not the originator of the bon mot. It was a very well-known and well-liked French comedian in Quebec who said, "Really, what Quebecers want is an independent Quebec in a strong Canada." That sums it up.

I have had this argument about the so-called political elites. We can talk about the business elites and the artistic elites in another phrase, but I do not think the political elites have studied very profoundly—and it is true in English Canada also—the workings of a symmetrical federalism. At first blush it seems nice if Quebec can get more powers than every other province, with special status or a "distinct society" status, and still be good federalists and still have that French power in Ottawa. Politics do not work that way.

Let us take the area of foreign affairs. If you are a prime minister and you say, "When I go to an international conference, whether it be Summit Sevens or whether it be Commonwealth Conferences or NATO conferences, I go and speak for Canada." However, when it comes to conferences of French-speaking Canada, although my name is Trudeau and I come from Quebec, I cannot go there on my own. I have to go with the French-speaking Premier of Quebec, because we have given a special status to Quebec under the item of foreign affairs.

What happens? First of all, I am telling my power base, which is Quebec, that I can speak for it when I go to English-speaking conferences and international conferences, but I am not a true Quebecer when it comes to francophonie conferences. I need the Premier of Quebec, who can check me up, correct me, check my agenda, and so on. Incidentally, this is in the accord between Quebec and Ottawa. Ottawa's working papers will be shown to the Premier of Quebec so he can ensure everything is on the level.

I have weakened myself in Quebec and I have strengthened the international power in the government of that province. What will the result gradually be? The bright young men and women who would like to be ambassador of their country some day will want to work in External Affairs. Bit by bit, as the francophonie becomes more important and as Quebec opens bigger quasi-embassies in Paris, London, Rome and Milan, there will be a good job to be had there. Why should they go and work in Ottawa, where they are surrounded by a lot of anglos and they have to speak both languages? Bit by bit, the working of the dynamics of politics will mean the best and the brightest will go to the place where the real power is.

Eventually, it will be to the provinces, if we have immense decentralization, or to one province if we have a "distinct society" there which can do things in communications, banking, aeronautics and immigration, which are really important to that province. You want to be where the action is. You go up to Ottawa and you are in this kind of multinational group there, and you have to learn the other language, and so on. Why should we not be at home, if we can have our cake and eat it too? If we can develop as a province, then we will be in Ottawa and Quebec, but only if it works. That is why I think a symmetrical federalism is hard to demonstrate as a case unless it is limited in time and in space. This is it, as we did with sections 133 and 93 of the B.N.A. Act, and so on. But if it is creeping separatism, then, at some point, there is a winner and a loser, and the winner takes all. It will not happen by a war or a revolution, it will happen because anyone in Quebec who is interested in promoting himself politically will go to the place where the action is and where he can be someone in external affairs, in communications or banking just as much as he can by entering the Department of Finance or the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa.

So then, what will you have? You will have an Ottawa which will have the brightest and the best from the rest of Canada, but not from Quebec. I do not have to go on with the dynamic on that. When the Quebec people are not in great number and strength in Ottawa, they will say, "Well, why should we be part of the country at all? We can do it all in Quebec City; we are as smart as they are. Only the losers go to Ottawa, or the traitors,"—which is worse—"let's have our own province." That is the dynamic. I am not preaching the apocalypse, I am just trying to look at it in terms of political science. I am prepared to argue it on that basis. That is why I think every prime minister—French, English or of other origin in Canada—has always refused constitutional special status. Sure, agreements were made on immigration; Mr. Pearson made an agreement on the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan, and so on, but you can overdo that, too, and do too many of those. But within limits, it is all right.

However, you ask: Where are those who should be speaking this way? If you are looking among the people, they are the people who voted no on the referendum. If you are asking about the intelligentsia, the political intelligentsia either want to have their cake and eat it too or they want to have their cake, period. For many of those in between it is a question of, "Why should we look ahead? If we can get more powers today, why should we want Meech Lake? We will settle tomorrow." That is perhaps the hope that your Newfoundland colleague is singing. It will all come out in the wash.

I took all the time I did to go through the escalating provincial demands so that you would understand that there is a constant in the history of this country. It is a constant fight for power between the provinces and the federal government. It started with Macdonald and it will finish only when federalism finishes. If you do not realize that that never-ending appetite for more power is there, and you give it, particularly in a special way, to a "distinct society," you will not satisfy it.

Senator Grafstein: Let me ask a whimsical question, then. What if Meech Lake is adopted and we are confronted with the apocalypse as discussed? The first item on the constitutional priority list is the Senate. Do you think it is realistic for the next generation—it certainly will not be for any of us in this room—to fight the battle for the repatriation of these powers back into the federal sphere by suggesting that a reformed and elected Senate should have much larger powers which would include some of the powers that have been frittered away, if you will, through this process? Can you see that as a realistic end game when this is all done? In other words, that the Senate may be the saviour of the state.

Mr. Trudeau: It could be, if you could reform the Senate. I think all those who talk of Senate reform in the context that we are doing today do it in the hope that, much like in that giant federation to our South, the debate on national issues can be fought in Washington, because there are a lot of state people sitting in the Senate, and, therefore, you have the debate on Capitol Hill, as it were. I think that has been in the back of the mind of those who have, in one way or another, preached reform of the Senate.

Give the people of the provinces, or give the provinces themselves, if need be, a role in the Senate so that the country will be governed from Parliament Hill in Ottawa, but do not do both. At the same time as you give the provinces power in the Senate, do not decentralize the country to the extreme, because you are then getting the worst of both worlds. You are getting the provinces in your national Parliament and you are getting them at the federal-provincial conferences, where they are asking for more all the time. They did not make that mistake in Washington; they have a much more centralized country than we have here. But the states, even the smallest ones, feel that they have two men on the Hill there who look after their interests. There is a choice to be made, which, obviously, has not been made in Meech Lake. You give the provinces the Senate, but, at the same time, you give them much more federal powers than they have ever had.

Your question is: Will it ever happen? Well, the cycles of history are something that I cannot possibly predict. With the acceleration of history, I think it is unlikely to turn those things back. If we had enough time, and if we were living in the middle of the nineteenth century, it would be different. But people change. We have had the pendulum swing one way towards centralization and then swing away towards decentralization. We have also had oscillations in Canada, because the Constitution was not rigid, but now that you have rigidified it and given a veto to each province you cannot have it swing towards more decentralization without unanimous consent. I think it would take something of a miracle for the ten premiers to say at the same time, "Let's give up these powers that we had; we want to make Canada stronger." I think they will go in some other direction.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

This is not the place to talk about the Free Trade Agreement, but I liked what Professor Breton said at one point. Raymond Albert said some good things, too. He said, "At the same time you are devoluting power to the provinces and you are devoluting economic power to the continent you will end up with a weak central government. The least you can do is not do both at the same time. If you want to negotiate tough with Washington, you should have a strong central government and tell the provinces they better toe the line. Or you better start to establish a common market in Canada and tell the provinces that we should stop having tariff barriers between provinces before we try to do that with the United States." In other words, you strengthen the country and then you negotiate. If you weaken the country and then you negotiate, it does not only apply to Washington, it applies to the rest of the world. That is why I am terrified of Meech Lake. I think it is a Rubicon: Once you have crossed it, you cannot go back. You march on to Rome.

• (2010)

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Grafstein.

[Translation]

I will now proceed with the last two names on the list. I had Senator Hicks on my list but I see he has left. So the last person on my list is Senator Tremblay.

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, please thank Senator Hicks on my behalf!

Mr. Trudeau: On mine as well!

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Trudeau, while I was listening to you speak, I had the impression you missed Parliament, a place where people can talk for hours! I hope I am not sticking my neck out too far by giving you another opportunity for learned discourse.

At the beginning of your speech this afternoon, you referred to the compact theory. You went back to the years of Taschereau, and so forth, and you referred to this period again a few moments ago. If I understood correctly, there is no basis for this interpretation that sees the Canadian federation as the result of a compact between the founding provinces.

Perhaps we should take another look at the first "whereas" of the British North America Act with which you are, of course, familiar and which may have been just an oversight. It says quite clearly:

Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom

I agree this is a "whereas", a preamble. Apparently, preambles do not carry much weight.

Mr. Trudeau: It is important.

Senator Tremblay: This one seems to be particularly important, especially since, if I am not mistaken, it contains the only reference to the word "Federation" in the entire Constitution.

Nevertheless, that is what we thought we were since 1867 and what we still are. This was just a reminder. Since you took a historical approach, this particular point bothered me when you brought it up.

In fact, you continued the historical perspective in your speech when you recalled the events following November 5, after the provinces signed the Accord that subsequently lead to the Constitution Act, 1982. First we had what happened on November 5, and you very properly reminded us that amendments were made between the time the Accord was signed and the adoption of the draft resolution by the House of Commons and the Senate.

These amendments included the one about financial compensation in the event of opting out on educational and other cultural matters, as it says in the text. I think it was also during that period of time that amendments were made concerning women and native people. I do not remember very well this series of amendments.

The point which has always troubled me, and perhaps you can clear this up for me, referring to the process leading to a consensus between the federal government and the provinces, as far as I know there was no federal-provincial meeting between November 5 and December 7 or 8.

How did you reach a consensus, if that is what happened? Was it by phone, by correspondence? Who carried out the negotiations which led—unless there was no consensus—to amendments and enrichments as important as that of financial compensation? This is a historical question to which I never got an answer but which I often asked myself.

I would add a small detail. In the accord signed on November 5, there is a note in the margin which was written by the Manitoba representative concerning Section 23 where he indicated he signed the whole document, but the marginal note, initialed by the then Attorney General, I believe, says that it is subject to subsequent approval by the Manitoba legislature.

During those few weeks, did the Manitoba legislature give its consent, or was this caveat quite simply ignored?

These are historical elements which are of interest to me. That is my first question.

Senator Frith: How many do you have, Senator Tremblay?

Senator Tremblay: I will have one more after that.

Mr. Trudeau: If you have more, I will take notes.

Senator Tremblay: Well, I will ask only one more.

I think you have suggested specifically that some matters should be referred to the Supreme Court for clarification. If we put together all the matters requiring clarification which have been raised here and there, the list would be rather impressive.

This might serve as an argument in favour of a reference in that there are so many of these matters. You know better than anyone that when the Canadian government refers a matter to the Supreme Court, it is generally a very precise question. That is what happened in 1981: Is it constitutionally possible to act unilaterally?

On what specific point and how would you phrase the question you would want to refer to the Supreme Court? That is my only question.

Mr. Trudeau: First, Senator Tremblay, you asked me if I miss Parliament. If I gave you that impression it is wrong. As I said, I am pleased to be here, but I would not want to be here every day or even every week.

Senator Frith: It is boring!

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed, I find the discussion I am having here quite pleasant and useful to me. But I have other friends with whom I have discussions and also my children with whom I have a great many discussions.

I appreciate your concern, but do not worry about me: I am not sorry I left this place however hospitable it might have been.

Senator Tremblay: So you deny what was only deductive reasoning on my part.

Mr. Trudeau: Definitely.

Senator Tremblay: I stand corrected.

Mr. Trudeau: When you referred to the pact, I assumed that you were going to talk to me about this first preamble. I was thinking about it. I have even a quotation which I am almost tempted to read to you.

It is about the history of our federation, of colonies wishing to get together to form a country, following which, the colonial power created a country in which they were united as provinces; in other words, the colonies stopped existing and became provinces in a different entity.

The British North America Act therefore created Canada and at the same time what had formerly been Lower Canada and Upper Canada, with their institutions as well as and especially Nova Scotia which had well developed parliamentary and legislative institutions. A country was created and provinces were created at the same time. That is what happened historically.

That is also what happened in the United States, but in a different way, because they had first been involved in a revolution. There was no longer any motherland. They created a Confederation. As you know, the original states were extremely autonomous, much more than the Canadian provinces today and of course much more than the states are today.

When they got together to rewrite the clauses of the Confederation, through a subterfuge which Jefferson complained about a lot because he was in Europe at the time as a minister; they did not rewrite the clauses of the Confederation, but created a real federation. That was the end of their Confederation. They kept certain things, for instance, the senators which had to be appointed by the constituting states. They were not picked out of a list which was sent to Washington but the states themselves did the picking. They wanted to create a more centralized power, but the states refused to budge on this.

My point is that in Canada, our Founding Fathers created a federation. Whatever existed before that, whether a sort of pact in a confederative power, this had nothing to do; now that we have a federation rather than a confederative power, the idea of a pact is maintained. The pact disappears when a new country is created.

Now, this is history, so I should like to indulge and perhaps give you the pleasure of listening to a remark made by Abraham Lincoln who was commenting on the tragic events which occurred at the time under his presidency. Dealing with that, he said:

[English]

This issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or a democracy, a government of the people by the same people, can or cannot maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes. It presents the question whether discontented individuals can always, upon the pretense made in this case, or in other pretenses, or arbitrarily without any pretense, break up their government and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth. It forces us to ask: Is there in all republics this inherent and fatal weakness? Must a government, of necessity, be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?

Senator Frith: What is the source of that quotation?

Mr. Trudeau: I was quoting from Abraham Lincoln. I will have to look up the specific quotation. It is the sort of quotation you have in your files and you think that if Lincoln said it it might be helpful to you at some time. I did not know Senator Tremblay would ask me that specific question. It fits in well.

[Translation]

Lincoln was speaking as the President of a true federation. Around 1862, the pact had been broken for a long time. Therefore, it seems to me that the historic background, and I say so with a lot of modesty, of course, has nothing to do with what the Act says today. This is a quarrel which will lead me to other confrontations.

You speak about the consensus which followed November 5 and ask how it was achieved, by telephone or otherwise. I think that you wanted me to speak mostly about financial compensation.

Senator Tremblay: Something else was mentioned, but I do not recall the list precisely.

Mr. Trudeau: The native people and women protested very loudly.

"How dare you remove this? It was in the original draft. How dare you do such a thing!" There were a few indiscretions. Someone said: "In the case of aboriginal rights, we took out the relevant clause at the request of the premier of this province. As for the other clause dealing with women, it was the premier of this other province who asked us to remove it. Instead of bothering us, you should talk to them directly." The women went to see one premier and the Indians went to see the other one, and they made such a fuss that, a few days later, my Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, called the premiers and told them: "We are having a lot of trouble with that. Would you be willing to back up a bit on the amendment that you wanted us to make?" This was done on the telephone. I do not think that Mr. Chrétien went to the provinces. It was done by telephone and by mutual agreement.

In the case of financial compensation, you asked me how come this clause survived or why it is there now, because it was already there, or, rather, no, in the beginning there was no provision for financial compensation. A few days later, I phoned the Premiers and told them: "I believe that in the particular case of education and culture, we would not be creating an overly asymmetrical federalism if we granted compensation." As I said earlier, I did not want to do it in all cases because it was an incentive to withdraw: "Withdraw from this program and you will be paid."

For instance, for universities, as this is what I had in mind and it is certainly the area in which you are most interested in view of your past, I understood that the provinces could have decided to transfer the jurisdiction for university education to the federal government under the power of amendment. In that case, Quebec could have said: "We understand that you want a university system where English Canadians will be able to go from one province to another and where certain standards will apply everywhere, but as we are mostly French speaking, we do not want to be part of that; we want to keep control over our universities."

I considered it normal in such a case for the province to be able to say: "Since you are spending money in the other provinces for their universities, give us the equivalent in financial compensation."

I suggested that it was not the same if an amendment were made to transfer from the provincial level, or to clarify, the regulatory power related to securities legislation, for instance. I did not agree that it should be possible for such a power to be transferred under Section 80.

Quebec, which has its own securities commission, could have said that they were perfectly capable of managing those things as well as anybody else. As for me, I would have told them to go ahead, to opt out but that they would not receive a penny from the federal government since it is in the nature of securities to come under the whole country's jurisdiction, rather than being scattered among various provincial securities commissions. We must follow the example of the United States with their Securities Commission if we are to have a strong country. Therefore, there was no question of granting any kind of compensation. That was my argument to the Premiers who did agree with me. So, I offered to the Government of Quebec financial compensation but coupled with an opting-out provision.

Mr. Lévesque, grumbler as he was, said that they did not want that. Some of my ministers were saying that if it was needed to have him sign, perhaps we should agree. We were prepared to go a little further for Quebec. I must admit that I was prepared to go that far, but it is an old story now. I have my files, as Senator Frith put it earlier, and, as a matter of fact, I wrote to Premier Lévesque in answer to a letter he sent me on November 25, in which he dwelt mostly on the veto power.

I explained to him that that power never existed in practice, a position which was to be confirmed later on by the Supreme Court. There was a paragraph about the veto power that concerns you and the issue under discussion now. I wrote:

On November 5, 1981, you have maintained that you would accept the constitutional amending formula presently under consideration in Parliament if it did contain provisions for financial compensation. Yet, I have indicated to you on a number of occasions that I would be prepared to discuss that point with you but you turned down my invitation.

That is significant.

Senator Tremblay: Yet he did sign the agreement of April 16.

Mr. Trudeau: With respect to a certain area, I was ready to discuss the possibility of granting it elsewhere, but I knew him as he knew me. I knew that it was not only for that reason that he had not signed on November 5. It was because he wanted additional power. When I suggested that the issue could be reopened, he was unwilling to do so.

Pardon me, I interrupted you, you wanted to make a comment.

Senator Tremblay: It is merely a comment because in connection with the agreement that he signed with the seven other provinces on April 16, 1981, two days after his re-election, it seems to me that the financial compensation was included in that agreement but for the entire areas exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. You have just said that your proposal was restricted to education and other cultural matters.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, such was the proposal effectively incorporated in the agreement for which I obtained the consent of other provinces. What I read was a proposal made much later in a letter dated December 1, 1981. The compensation for education had already been included. I was then prepared to grant the financial compensation—

Senator Tremblay: Extending it to all jurisdictions?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, this is what I wrote in December.

Senator Tremblay: This is what the Meech Lake Accord does, after all.

Mr. Trudeau: This is what it does, it is true.

Senator Tremblay: On this point.

Mr. Trudeau: On this point.

Senator Tremblay: Everything is not bad in the Meech Lake Accord, is it?

Mr. Trudeau: This is like the egg of the minister I alluded to earlier. He was polite, and he said the egg was just partly good, but try to eat an egg which is only partly good. You will realize that you had better throw it in the garbage.

I say it is all bad, and Senator Murray will agree with me; ask him tomorrow. He said that the "opting out" formula was one of the flaws in the Accord, that I made on November 5, 1981. It was "one of the flaws". So I agree fully with him, and this is why I would have preferred to correct this through negotiations. But at that time I was prepared to pay a price to make a bad situation slightly worse so as to avoid that one day some weakling Prime Minister gives out the whole package to the province of Quebec.

Senator Tremblay: You will allow me to mention it. I had given you the opportunity of course, but—

Mr. Trudeau: You have the perfect right to defend your leader, and I admire you for it. Let me answer two of your other questions. In the case of Manitoba, I say with some reservation, and this is history—fortunately my memory is still good. What happened—

Senator Tremblay: We are not as old as all that, Mr. Trudeau, neither you nor I.

Mr. Trudeau: What happened is that a few days later you forgot it because you were not yet at that time a senator—

Senator Tremblay: One forgets more when not a senator?

Mr. Trudeau: No, but because you were not involved in the discussions. What happened, surely people in Manitoba will remember, is that Premier Lyon, who had written that, was defeated at the time of the election.

Senator Tremblay: Yes, that I remember.

Mr. Trudeau: Really? Well, then why are you asking me this question?

Senator Tremblay: Would a change of Premier or government eliminate this clause?

Mr. Trudeau: No. But the Premier who replaced him said: Well, I accept.

Senator Tremblay: Did he say so or did he simply let things happen?

Mr. Trudeau: No, he said it to me.

Senator Tremblay: He said that to you?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes indeed. There was that clause and, as a lawyer, I wanted to know if he would invoke it.

That's all. And your last question was about the reference. There you are right. It would make up an impressive list if we were to take all the suggestions the witnesses have put forward. The Supreme Court, you are right too, does not care very much for references; they would rather have a specific case upon which to decide, like A is suing B for a specific reason: either he is right or he is not. With references, one is always dealing in abstract. But still, by law they have to give an answer. You ask me which points I would include in the reference. If we had to choose only one, I think I would choose the distinct society and what is known as linguistic duality.

Senator Tremblay: Both of them, really? Because both are in balance in a way.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, they are in balance, in a very stable balance unfortunately since they reinforce each other. If we have a distinct society, chances are we will have a duality, that is two nations, and we should know. Well, it is only one point of view.

Senator Tremblay: We could go on for some time—

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, but we will eventually have to take leave of each other.

Senator Tremblay: Anyway, I thank you for having so obligingly answered my questions.

The Chairman: Well, that completes the list I had. Mr. Trudeau, I wonder if I may ask you a question.

You have mentioned Professor Breton. When he came here on February 10, we asked him the following question: "What will happen if the Meech Lake Agreement is not approved?" Here is his answer and I quote it in English since he delivered it in English:

● (2040)

[English]

We are placed in the position where, if we say no, in a way we are saying no to the federalist forces in Quebec, or to those who are not generally interested in separatism.

And later:

We are really in a fix. We have put ourselves in the box, where to say no . . . would be a terrible thing at this point in time, because it will be badly taken in Quebec, even by people who do not give great emphasis to constitutional matters. It will be seen as a rejection of Quebec, and it will be exploited as such.

Mr. Trudeau: Which of the two Professors Breton are you referring to, Raymond or Albert?

The Chairman: Professor Albert Breton.

[Translation]

It is Albert Breton. Do you see any danger in such a situation in Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, there is a danger, and I referred to it when I said there would be quite a fuss if Meech Lake were defeated. It is unquestionable. I do not think people would lose sleep over it. I think that for a while the provinces opposed to the agreement would not be very popular with the media and the Quebec intelligentsia. But in my opinion that would please a lot of people who are keeping very quiet about it and probably do not want to attract any attention or trouble.

I think Laurent Picard said something similar before the Joint Committee. He said that we do not have the choice of having the Meech Lake Agreement or not, that things will never be the same. If what has been offered is withdrawn, it will be much harder for Quebec to accept than if those offers had never been made. That is why the signing of that document in such an irresponsible way was very serious.

So I am not trying to minimize what the reaction would be if the 1987 agreement did not become part of the Constitution. [English]

I am weighing two undesirable situations one against the other. I think in the short run there would be a lot of indignation in Quebec, and not only among the so-called opinion leaders; even the people would say: "What the heck! They gave us something and now they are taking it away. What is the matter with these guys? What did they do that for?" There would be a lot of angry people.

But I think somebody should tell them—I would tell them, and I hope the media would tell them, too—that it was done before. Don't forget that this was done by Mr. Lesage and Mr. Lévesque in 1964. I remember they did that at the University of Montreal where I was teaching in those days. They came and very courageously defended the Fulton-Favreau formula, but the students did not like it and many nationalists did not like it. Finally, Mr. Lesage and Mr. Lévesque had to phone Mr. Pearson and say: "Sorry. We gave our word, but we just can't deliver."

That happened again in 1971 in Victoria. I do not want to go into details, because a premier who attended that conference is in office. I think he will remember well that the thing had been not only cleared by but proposed by his top official and our top official, and he was asking for a few days to go home and think it over. But the understanding was that we had reached a deal, and he had to change his mind for a variety of reasons I do not want to go into now. There was some welshing, if I can use that bit of slang, on deals that Quebec had made and did not live up to.

Now, on the hypothesis that we are looking at, it would not be a welshing by the Mulroney government, or by the House of Commons, or by any of the signing premiers. So far none of them has welshed, but Premier McKenna did not sign, and the next premier of Manitoba will not have signed, and you cannot force them to sign. They would not be welshing if they just said: "Sorry, we are not going to sign until we know what it means."

I think if you said that to the people of Quebec, and they were told that by the media rather than just reading about great cries of indignation and tearing of robes, I think they would turn the page and see who won the last hockey game.

So what would be done in this case would not be as bad as was done before by the Province of Quebec itself. I think, in the end, fairness would calm tempers and people would say: "Well, who wants to discuss the Constitution anyhow?"

I think that was a big mistake that Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa both committed. I laugh when I hear those academics, again from Ontario, who say—and I have read this in their testimony—that Quebec was in a terrible state after it had been left out in 1982. That is not true. There has never been any poll taken on Quebec's feelings, but I gave the figures of those who voted in favour of it who were from Quebec in the House of Commons in 1971 and those who voted for it, or who refused to vote against it, as Mr. Lévesque was moving a motion in his house, supported by, I must say, the then leader of the opposition, who was to be bounced from his party a few months later. If you add up the numbers, more elected representatives of Quebec—well, I am repeating myself.

Therefore, I think it is a bum rap when experts from Kingston tell us that Quebec was in a terrible state after they had been left out. That is not true. There were a lot of angry people among the nationalists, but the Quebec people were not upset. I can ask Senator Tremblay if he has any evidence of that widespread indignation? I remember the Leon Dions:

[Translation]

—the slap to Quebec and the night of the non-stars. But who was saying that? Was Mrs. Grégoire on Panet Street greatly concerned about that?

[English]

I think it would be the same thing. After a time dust goes up and then it settles.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I want to thank you, Mr. Trudeau, on behalf of all my colleagues.

[English]

This has been a very historic occasion. I think it is the first time a previous Prime Minister has come to address the Senate in this way. I think it has been a very useful exercise. Mr. Trudeau, you have given us a great deal of your time—almost six hours now without moving from the witness stand. We are pleased to see that you are in such excellent health.

● (2050)

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you for your hospitality, Mr. Chairman and members of the Senate, and thank you for a very generous allocation of time. I was speaking a little for the record, as you might have suspected, because I am a bit distressed about the way that people—particularly people from other provinces—rewrite the history of Quebec. I lived through a lot of that history, and I think it is important to put my recollection on the record, so thank you very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this concludes the work of the committee for today. I will entertain a motion.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking to any orders that remain standing in the name of senators on this side of the chamber, they all stand, and that goes for any inquiries and motions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no hesitation at all in saying that that is true for those orders, inquiries and motions standing in the name of senators on our side.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS RE AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-84

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, dated 11th February 1988 and the Message from the House of Commons dated 3rd February 1988 relating to certain amendments to Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, has examined the said motion and Message and now reports as follows:

PART I

Your Committee recommends that a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint the House that, with respect to its Message to the Senate dated 3rd February 1988 regarding Bill C-84:

- (i) the Senate does not insist upon the following amendments:
Amendments 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13(a);
- (ii) the Senate concurs with the following amendments made by the House of Commons to the amendments made previously by the Senate:
Amendments 1, 2(a), 3, 7, 13(b), (c) and (d);
- (iii) the Senate does insist upon the following amendment:
Amendment 5(a), (b) and (c);
- (iv) in lieu of other amendments with which the House of Commons has disagreed, the Senate adopts the following amendments and requests that they be concurred in by the Commons:

AMENDMENTS

16. Page 7, clause 5: Strike out lines 15 to 26 and substitute the following:

"19(1)(j);

(b) a person

- (i) described in paragraph 19(1)(c), or
- (ii) who has been convicted in Canada of an offence under any Act of Parliament for which a term of imprisonment of ten years or more may be imposed who the Minister has certified constitutes a danger to the public in Canada; or

- (c) a person described in paragraph 19(1)(e), (f) or (g) or 27(1)(c) or (2)(c), if the Minister is of the opinion that the application of sections 45 to 48 and 70 and 71 to that person would be contrary to the public interest."

17. Pages 9 and 10, clause 9:

- (a) Strike out lines 21 to 28, on page 9, and substitute the following:

"95.1 Every person who

- (a) knowingly counsels, organizes, induces, aids or abets or knowingly attempts to counsel, organize, induce, aid or abet a person to make a claim to be a Convention refugee that is without a credible basis, or

- (b) knowingly brings or attempts to bring or otherwise knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or knowingly attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet any other person to come into Canada in a clandestine manner

is guilty of an offence and liable"

EXPLANATORY NOTES

To avoid ambiguity, the following amendments are numbered sequentially from the last amendment referred to in the Message from the House of Commons.

This amendment would provide that the decision to exclude a person from the refugee determination process would be made by the Minister personally, in view of the potential seriousness to the individual of the consequences of the exclusion. It is intended that the Minister will weigh those consequences with the degree of risk the person might pose to Canada.

Part (a) of this amendment consists of two offences. It would be an offence to counsel or otherwise assist an individual to make a refugee claim that lacks a credible basis. The credible basis test will become part of Canadian law once Bill C-55 is in force. It would also be an offence to knowingly aid or abet the entry of an individual into Canada if this were done in a clandestine manner. The purpose of this part of the amendment is to protect the valuable work performed by churches and other humanitarian groups on behalf of refugees.

AMENDMENTS

- (b) Strike out lines 37 to 45 on page 9, and line 1 on page 10, and substitute the following:

"95.2 Every person who

- (a) knowingly counsels, organizes, induces, aids or abets or knowingly attempts to counsel, organize, induce, aid or abet a group of ten or more persons to make claims to be Convention refugees that are without a credible basis, or

- (b) knowingly brings or attempts to bring or otherwise knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or knowingly attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet the coming into Canada of a group of ten or more persons who are not in possession of valid and subsisting visas, passports or travel documents where such visas, passports or travel documents are required by this Act or the regulations is guilty of an"

- (v) with regard to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clause 11 and clause 16 which, to avoid ambiguity, will be referred to as amendments 14 and 15 respectively, the Senate does concur in amendment 14 and proposes the following as an amendment to amendment 15:

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Part (b) of this amendment also consists of two offences. It would become an offence to counsel or otherwise assist groups of ten or more people to make refugee claims that lack a credible basis. It would also be an offence to aid or abet the coming into Canada of groups of ten or more people who do not possess the required documents.

AMENDMENT

18. Page 24, clause 16: Strike out line 16 and substitute the following:

"48.1(c), 82.1(2) and 83(1), and any such power,"

EXPLANATORY NOTE

This amendment would ensure that a decision to preclude a person from making a refugee claim on the grounds that the person is a security risk would be taken by the Minister personally.

PART II

Your Committee recommends that a further Message be sent to the House of Commons as follows:

The response of the government to the Senate's message of December 1987 with regard to Bill C-84 was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Since then, the Committee has heard further witnesses who commented on the Senate amendments and the Minister's response. We have heard no evidence to convince us that the amendments we proposed were based on erroneous assumptions or faulty reasoning. On the contrary, we have been reinforced in our view that our arguments are valid. This is not to say that the remaining issues are without difficulty. We acknowledge the explanations of the Minister and have given his statements full and careful consideration. We realize that reasonable legislators may differ on matters of legal and public policy and so we have chosen to insist only on those amendments that are fundamental.

We commend the Minister for his flexible response to the Committee's prior Report on this matter. We recognize that significant improvement in the Bill has already taken place. The Committee continues to believe, however, that certain other changes remain essential, particularly if Canada is to adhere to its international obligations. In the past, Canada has been a world leader in refugee matters; those now coming to our shores seeking sanctuary must not face refoulement. The Committee wholeheartedly supports the objective of deterring abuse and we feel that the amendments we propose will give the government an effective legal tool to that end, while at the same time preserving Canada's humanitarian traditions.

TURNING SHIPS AROUND

In its previous Report, the Committee analyzed the various issues relating to turning ships around in our territorial sea or internal waters. After examining the law, the questions of deterrence and punishment, the safety of the passengers and Canada's international reputation, we concluded that, from every perspective, the wisest course was to bring a ship to port and ensure that the organizers of the scheme receive swift and sure punishment. We understand that the Minister feels that the lack of authority to direct a ship to leave or not to enter Canadian waters is a significant gap in Canada's ability to control its borders. With respect, we disagree. It is the difficulty of monitoring or patrolling our extensive borders and shorelines that leaves us vulnerable. No law can deter effectively if it cannot be enforced. The success or failure – from the perspective of deterrence – of either the power to turn a ship around or to bring it in to port and punish those responsible ultimately lies in our ability to find and then to closely monitor a ship in Canadian waters. Without that ability, neither provision will deter. With it, either will do the job. That being the case, we chose the alternative that carried the least risk to human beings.

We have heard nothing in the intervening weeks to cause us to change our view. Indeed, two events have taken place that have convinced us to continue to recommend this course of action. In our previous study of the Bill, witnesses reminded us of the positive example Canada set for the rest of the world in 1979 and 1980 when we urged the countries of Southeast Asia not to turn away boatloads of refugees. Recent events have again reminded us not only of the role played by Canada in the past but of the role we continue to play. In February, only a few weeks ago, Canada urged Thailand not to turn away Vietnamese boat people when that country was faced with an increase of arrivals. How can Canada exhort other countries to do that which we are not prepared to do ourselves?

The second reason we believe that it is best to bring a boat in to shore results from our study of Bill C-55, the Bill that will replace the existing refugee determination system with a new one. While we as a Committee have come to no conclusions yet about the various details of that Bill, we have been assured by the Minister and his officials that the measures proposed will result in fast decisions for refugee claimants processed by the new system. Assuming this to be the case, we are reinforced in our view that bringing boat arrivals in to port to have their refugee claims dealt with in the same manner as other claimants would not cause irreparable harm to the system and would not lead to undue delays. For these reasons, we recommend that the Senate insist on amendment 5.

PRECLUDING FROM THE REFUGEE SYSTEM PEOPLE FOUND TO BE SECURITY RISKS

In its previous Report, the Committee recommended that people found to be security risks should nevertheless be given a right to have a determination made on their claim to be a Convention refugee. We had very serious concerns that returning a Convention refugee to his or her country of origin could have consequences seriously out of proportion to any actual threat to Canada caused by the refugee's presence here. We singled out security risks for this special consideration for a number of reasons. We had doubts about the trustworthiness of the evidence leading to the decision that an individual is a threat to the security of this country because much of that evidence originates in the person's country of origin. That country may have a variety of motives for supplying false information.

We noted that the representatives of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees could assist people to relocate in third countries in cases such as these, but only following determination of their status. We observed that, of Western countries, only Belgium excludes such people from a refugee determination. Finally, we believed that both our commitments under international law and the standards of our own Charter required the proposed amendment.

The Committee continues to have these concerns. However, we also understand the Minister's fear about possible delays and we recognize Canada's right to ultimately expel these people in any event. We believe that the Minister would only make the decision to return a person to a situation of persecution for the gravest of reasons. We propose, therefore, that the decision to exclude these people from the refugee process should be made by the Minister personally.

Our complex system of government requires that most day-to-day decisions be delegated to officials. The less significant the decision, the lower the level of delegation. Important decisions are reserved for senior officials, the most important for the Minister personally. In this Bill, for example, clause 16 specifies that the power of the Minister to file a certificate that, in the Minister's opinion, a person is a security threat, cannot be delegated. The Committee believes that the decision to exclude an individual from the refugee process is no less important than the filing of a certificate. We do not fear that the Minister will have an inappropriate number of cases to consider. Public testimony has revealed that there have been only a handful of cases of this nature in the past. For these reasons we propose amendments 16 and 18 so that the Minister would be required to make the exclusion decision personally.

AIDING AND ABETTING

In our Report in December, the Committee recommended that sections 95.1 and 95.2 of Bill C-84 be amended so that the offences created by those provisions would be to aid and abet people to come into Canada in a clandestine manner rather than to aid and abet people to come into Canada without proper documents. We believed that change to be essential in order to protect the valuable work performed by church and other humanitarian groups when they assist people in danger to come to Canada to make their refugee claims. By force of circumstances, these people very often cannot have the required documents.

We continue to believe that these groups should be protected. Even if they are never prosecuted, the Committee does not think that their work should be clouded by the apparent illegality created by these provisions. The government has disagreed, citing the necessity of avoiding loopholes and curbing abuse.

In order to help clarify and perhaps resolve these differences, the Committee wishes to review certain events and statements surrounding Bill C-84. First and most basic is the fact that this Bill was tabled in response to one specific event: the arrival of an organized boatload of people off Canada's shores. In explaining, in August 1987, why a new law was necessary, Minister Bouchard stated that another boat arrival "could happen in British Columbia tomorrow morning. Just ask what the reaction of Canadians will be at that time and you will have the answer of why we are here today" (emphasis added). He also stated, "We are going to put a stop to the large-scale trafficking of illegal migrants by smugglers" and "the intent of this Parliament is to prosecute those who organize large-scale abuse." His officials referred to "large-scale smuggling by sea in unsafe conditions and in unsafe vessels." Again and again, the government stressed that the particular targets of the Bill were those who organize large groups of people.

At the same time, the Minister assured church and humanitarian groups that they did not risk prosecution under these sections if they continued to abide by the principles and policies of immigration legislation as they had in the past. He insisted that the government was not targeting those who act solely out of a genuine humanitarian concern for other human beings. Church groups and others, however, continued to be concerned that they could be prosecuted. The language of the provisions was very clear to lawyers, law professors and lay critics alike. All reacted to the provisions in the same way, despite the assurances of the Minister. One group felt that it might be compelled to stop its work; others believed that to continue their work would be to engage in civil disobedience.

The Committee has concluded that it is possible to accommodate the explicit and repeated intentions of the government with regard to large-scale abuses but at the same time protect the valuable humanitarian work of our churches and other organizations. This can be done by retaining the words "in a clandestine manner" (added to both sections in our previous Report) in section 95.1 only. It would thus be an offence to aid and abet individuals to come into Canada if this were done in a clandestine manner. Openly helping individuals or a family to come into Canada would not be an offence under section 95.1. For groups of ten or more people, the offence in section 95.2 would be to aid and abet people to come into Canada without proper documents.

We have reviewed the evidence given by church and humanitarian organizations and believe that this compromise would allay their fears, and would target the offence in a way that fits the reality of the present situation. It is clear to the Committee that they help individuals and families in immediate need. They do not organize large-scale group movements. Repeatedly, the examples they gave of the kind of work that would be criminalized by these provisions concerned individuals at risk. Often the people they helped were in danger because our consulate processing in the United States had not responded adequately or in time.

It is part of the public record that church workers advise people to apply first to our consulates abroad; only if people are in imminent danger do they advise them or assist them to report to immigration officers in Canada. None of this is done in secret. Indeed, the church groups themselves urged the Committee to focus on clandestine activity as the essential element of the offence.

For these reasons, we continue to believe that the offence created by section 95.1 should consist of aiding and abetting individuals and small groups only when the entry is clandestine. With regard to section 95.2, we accept the Minister's statements that the activities to be deterred and the very reason for this Bill relate to the organizing of groups of ten or more people to come into Canada without proper documentation.

With regard to the "purposes" clause, we do not insist on amendment 1 because we feel the Minister's stated purpose will have been achieved if he accepts our proposed wording in sections 95.1 and 95.2.

The Committee had also proposed an additional offence for sections 95.1 and 95.2 to punish those who encourage people to make refugee claims knowing that the individuals in question have spurious cases. The problem of organizers or consultants who advise claimants to make false or misleading statements in connection with refugee proceedings is already addressed in the Bill by the offence "counselling false statements." That offence, however, does not reach people who encourage entrants to make unfounded claims, but without advising those claimants to lie. In such cases, the person makes a claim but offers no evidence to back it up. We suggested that it should be an offence to aid or abet a person to make a manifestly unfounded or fraudulent refugee claim. In response, the government stated that such language was vague and that the offence would be very difficult to prove. The Committee accepts that its earlier wording might cause difficulties but, because we continue to feel that encouraging unfounded refugee claims should be an offence, we propose a more precise formulation.

In the weeks since our Report in December, the Committee has commenced its study of Bill C-55. In it, there is a provision that claimants whose claims have no credible basis will be denied access to the system. In most cases, that decision will be made at an early stage in the process. The Committee believes that if that credible basis test were to replace the test described by the words "manifestly unfounded or fraudulent," the meaning of the offence would be quite clear.

Furthermore, problems of proof could be minimized. The law could provide for a certificate to be issued by the appropriate authority stating that a finding had been made that a person's claim had no credible basis. This would serve as conclusive proof of that fact for the purposes of the prosecution of the person who had counselled the claim. Unfortunately, this addition to the procedure cannot be made at this time because it relates to Bill C-55, but would be possible in the future. The proposed changes to sections 95.1 and 95.2 will be found in amendment 17.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

Amendments 8 to 12 of the Committee's Report related to the search and seizure provisions of the Bill. The Committee is pleased that the Minister accepted amendment 8, which will bring the standard for obtaining a search warrant into compliance with the Charter. The Committee regrets that the Minister did not accept the other proposed amendments since they too are based on principles important to the protection of the rights of individuals. The Supreme Court of Canada noted in Hunter v. Southam, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145 at 169, that: "Without appropriate safeguards, legislation authorizing search and seizure is inconsistent with s. 8 of the Charter." The Committee was of the view that the search and seizure provisions as they appeared in the original Bill did not contain the appropriate safeguards. The Committee continues to have concerns that these powers are excessive and unnecessary. There was no evidence before us, other than the Minister's statements, to support the need for warrantless searches in circumstances involving destruction of evidence, an explicit "breaking open" power, and searches by night without specific judicial authority.

On the other hand, the guarantees in the Charter and the provisions of the Criminal Code regarding the use of force should operate to restrain excessive use of these powers and therefore, in these circumstances, we do not recommend that the Senate insist on amendments 9, 10, 11 and 12.

DETENTION FOR IDENTIFICATION OR SECURITY PURPOSES

Some of the most serious reservations of the Committee concerning Bill C-84 were centred on its detention provisions. When we first examined the Bill, we felt sure that deprivation of liberty for a period of up to 28 days without the right to have the reasons for detention and the circumstances of the case assessed by an independent decision-maker would violate the Charter. We are pleased that the Minister agreed. Although the Committee would prefer to see the initial review of detention take place within 48 hours as is currently required under the Immigration Act, 1976, we accept that certain circumstances may well justify the longer period of seven days and we accept the Minister's judgment in this regard. For these reasons we do not recommend that the Senate insist on amendment 13(a) and we recommend concurrence with the proposed changes to 13(b), (c) and (d).

DISSENTING OPINIONS

Members of the Committee who support the Government do not approve of the aforementioned amendments.

This Report represents the views of a majority of the Committee. The members who support the Government are in disagreement with the Report.

APPENDIX "B"

(See p. 2982)

REPORT OF SUBMISSIONS GROUP ON MEECH LAKE CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

---

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1988

The Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord has the honour to present its

FIRST AND FINAL REPORT*INTRODUCTION

On 2 February 1988, the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to (wherever Accord is used in this Report it shall mean the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to) created the Submissions Group to give more Canadians the opportunity to voice their opinions on the 1987 Constitutional Accord, known as the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord.

This Report deals with witnesses' comments on both the Meech Lake Accord reached on April 30 and the Langevin Accord signed on 3 June 1987. The Group held 5 meetings and heard from 43 groups and individual witnesses. As instructed, the Submissions Group now reports a summary of what it heard without commenting upon the testimony.

LINGUISTIC DUALITY AS A FUNDAMENTAL CHARACTERISTIC OF CANADA AND QUEBEC AS A DISTINCT SOCIETY

The Accord proposes that the Constitution Act, 1867 be amended by a clause which states in part:

2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centered in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

- (b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

The recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is an aspect of the Accord commented upon by a great number of witnesses. Most of them do not oppose this provision of the Accord. However, many who testified before us, even those who approve of this specific provision, say other parts of the Accord must be amended before it comes into force.

Many Canadians fear that the rights accorded to them by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be diminished by the linguistic duality and distinct identity clause. Women's groups, French-speaking Canadians living outside Quebec, English-speaking Canadians living in that province, to name but a few groups, want the Accord amended to ensure that their Charter rights will not be diminished by the "linguistic duality - distinct society" clause.

Women's groups argue that what constitutes discrimination under section 15(1) of the Charter would be affected by an assumption that the "linguistic duality - distinct society" clause entrenches a very important constitutional principle.

They also referred to the opinion of Madam Justice Wilson in the Supreme Court of Canada decision on the Ontario Bill 30 case (Separate School funding); she found constitutional provisions (in that instance section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867) that were part of the fundamental constitutional compromise would not be subject to the Charter.

Some groups said that clause 16 of the Accord would create a hierarchy of rights. This clause provides that nothing in the "linguistic duality - distinct society" provision affects, among other things, "section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms". Clause 16, they say, suggests that some rights are more important than others.

French-speaking Canadians living outside Quebec and English-speaking Canadians living in that province said how important it is to them that minority language education rights provided for in section 23 of the Charter are not weakened in any way. Furthermore, the former group made representations to the effect that at least the federal Parliament should have a constitutional duty to promote the fundamental characteristic of Canada that the Accord proposes to enshrine in the Constitution. Francophones living outside Quebec made the point that Canadian duality should refer to the French and English communities instead of the individuals they comprise; such a definition of the fundamental characteristic of Canada would mean, in their opinion, that the Constitution recognizes that they have collective rights.

Aboriginal organizations stated that they are left out of the description of Canada given in this clause of the Accord. While they support the recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness, they stress that there is no doubt of the distinctiveness of aboriginal people.

Aboriginal people asked to be recognized as distinct societies. Some organizations pointed out that this would have a positive effect, from their point of view, on the interpretation to be given to section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Others, while acknowledging that such recognition would be beneficial, maintain that it still does not clarify their rights.

Aboriginal organizations want constitutional negotiations on aboriginal issues to resume and seek guarantees in this regard. They want their Treaty and other rights, including aboriginal self-government, affirmed and entrenched in the Constitution.

Some witnesses say the Accord does very little to promote multiculturalism. They requested that it also be recognized as a fundamental characteristic of Canada, with duties imposed on the legislatures and Parliament to preserve and promote the Canadian multicultural heritage.

Finally, many groups suggested that before the Accord is adopted it should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. Such a reference, would, in their opinion, clarify the legal meaning of the expression "distinct society" and settle the issue of the relationship between the Charter and the Accord.

NATIONAL SHARED-COST PROGRAMS

The establishment of national shared-cost programs covering, for instance, health services, is one way in which the federal Parliament uses what is known as its spending power.

The Accord proposes to add a new section to the Constitution Act, 1867 stating:

106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

The testimony shows witnesses see national shared-cost programs as an important element of Canadian unity and identity. These programs, we were told, should form the major part of a social contract that binds all Canadians.

Aboriginal organizations say that the opting out provisions may lead provinces to set up programs or initiatives that deny treaty rights of aboriginal people, for instance, their treaty right to fish.

Witnesses did not oppose the principle that reasonable compensation be paid to a province that opts out of a future national shared-cost program. However, they criticized the vagueness of the key terms of the clause.

Many witnesses stated that this clause refers to "national objectives," while the clauses of the Accord on immigration use the expression "national standards and objectives." The witnesses recommended that the clause on national shared-cost programs be amended so that there will be some guarantee of equality in services provided to Canadians across the country. Otherwise, witnesses predicted those programs will differ considerably from one province to another.

Witnesses recognize the need for flexibility, but also believed that inequities should be eliminated by the establishment of national minimum standards for these programs by the federal Parliament. They want to make sure that federal standards, such as universality, comprehensiveness, portability and accessibility which the Canada Health Act sets out as conditions for making payments to provinces, will also govern future social programs.

Some witnesses suggested that there should be a monitoring mechanism and a system of redress for non-compliance by the provinces with the conditions of the programs. Also, some would like the governments of this country to commit themselves to public consultation before they undertake to formulate national objectives and standards.

IMMIGRATION

The Accord proposes that the Constitution Act, 1867 be amended to provide that, at the request of the government of any province, the Government of Canada shall negotiate an agreement relating to the immigration or the temporary admission of aliens that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of the province requesting such negotiations.

The preamble of the Accord contains a commitment from the Government of Canada that it will conclude such an agreement with Quebec as soon as possible: this agreement, among other things, would guarantee that Quebec will receive a number of immigrants in proportion to its share of the population of Canada, with the right to exceed that figure by 5% for demographic reasons. This agreement will also deal with withdrawal of Canada from Quebec's reception and integration services, and for reasonable compensation. The Constitution of Canada would state that these agreements will be compatible with any provision of a federal Act that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration of aliens.

One general comment we heard about this aspect of the Accord is that agreements like the one to be negotiated between Ottawa and Quebec may allow bigger provinces to grow bigger and smaller provinces to decline in relation to the population of Canada.

Another group told us the Accord would necessitate a shift in our immigration patterns. This group is of the opinion that the Accord would militate against all our immigration objectives, frustrate family reunification, make support for refugees more difficult, and weaken the performance of the Canadian economy.

In the opinion of some witnesses, the role of the federal government with regard to immigration would shrink to the point where such a fundamental matter could be dealt with solely at the provincial level. A Black organization was concerned about monitoring ten immigration policies to detect discrimination in provincial legislation and practices.

We were also told that the application of agreements such as those envisaged by the Accord would result in a further erosion of women's limited rights to reception, integration and other services.

THE SENATE

By virtue of the Accord any amendment in relation to the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the legislative assembly of each province. The Senate has a suspensive veto of 180 days on such amendments.

Two other parts of the Accord also affect the Senate.

Reform of the Senate is on the agenda for future First Ministers' Conferences on the Constitution.

As well, until an amendment to the Constitution is made in relation to the Senate, the Accord contains a transitional appointment process. Under this arrangement "any person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada".

Many witnesses who addressed the sections of the Accord dealing with the Senate expressed the view that the unanimity provision dealing with amendments to the Senate combined with the transitional appointment procedure, if adopted, will effectively terminate any hope of meaningful Senate reform.

Some witnesses pointed out that the Premiers will be reluctant to relinquish this power of appointment. One also indicated that the fact of having Senators appointed from provincial lists may disturb the federal balance in Canada.

At least one witness maintained that the question of gender equality should be addressed when the lists of Senate nominees are drawn up by the provinces.

PARTICIPATION IN THE PROCESS: THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

(i) The Meech Lake Process

We heard a great deal of evidence concerning the process used to arrive at the Accord. Those who commented on the process articulated the concern that there was no provision for public involvement prior to the signing of the Accord.

As well, witnesses also expressed dismay at the statements made after the Accord was finalized which indicated that no changes would be made except if egregious errors were found in the Accord. This contributed, in the view of the one witness to a lack of interest among members of the public in the Accord.

We also heard concerns expressed over the timing of the hearings before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution held during the summer of 1987 and the fact that many provincial governments may not hold public hearings.

Another witness when commenting on the Meech Lake process, stated it was his feeling that although the Accord may become a legal constitutional document, the lack of public input means that it lacks legitimacy.

Other witnesses were concerned that representatives of the two territories had been completely excluded from the process. They noted as well that women and the aboriginal people were also excluded and termed the method by which the Accord was reached as undemocratic.

A witness stated that there should be a country wide debate on the Accord. He claimed that the people were promised full and open debate and they have not received it.

Several witnesses suggested that the Accord should be put to the people for discussion and decision in plebiscite form. They noted the constitutional amendment process in Australia where proposed amendments are submitted to the people for approval.

(ii) Constitutional Conferences

The Accord not only entrenches yearly First Ministers' Conferences on the Constitution but it also establishes an agenda. Some witnesses expressed concern over the subject matters which are on this fixed agenda. Another section of the Accord entrenches an annual First Ministers' Conference on the economy.

The proposed entrenching of First Ministers' Conferences in the Constitution was criticized by those who commented on the process. For example, one witness stated that this would "institutionalize the repugnant process of Meech Lake".

Another witness felt the institutionalizing of First Ministers' Conferences would limit meaningful public discussion on constitutional change. It would result in the "interposition of a new governing instrument... superior to parliament".

Some witnesses stated the institutionalizing of these conferences means that Canada would be governed by a First Ministers' Conference held once a year.

Others felt that if these conferences were going to be held they should at least contain aboriginal self-government as an agenda item.

One witness said that there should be a five year sunset clause on agenda items. It was also his opinion that a constitutional requirement to hold an annual conference on the economy unnecessarily cluttered the constitution. It may also be construed as indicating that the economy is to be run by Committee, rather than allowing the federal government a strong leadership role.

THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

While the Accord deals in a number of sections with various aspects of the Supreme Court of Canada, by far the most controversial change in the view of many witnesses is the proposed method by which future court vacancies will be filled.

When a vacancy occurs the government of each province is to have the opportunity to submit names of persons who are members of the bar of that province and are otherwise qualified to sit on the Court to the Minister of Justice for Canada. The Governor-in-Council would be required to make the appointment from the names on the provincial lists. Territorial governments do not have the right to submit such lists.

A witness pointed out that the 1982 Constitutional Amendments greatly increased the role of the Supreme Court of Canada. The 1987 Accord would give the provinces the right to nominate judges and it would follow that only those who favour decentralization or provincial rights would receive nominations.

Witnesses were also concerned that there is no mechanism in the Accord to resolve the problem if the provincial nominees are unacceptable to the federal government.

Some representatives of women's groups feel that it will now be difficult to have those who support the women's movement appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada. They also are of the opinion that the lists of nominees of potential Supreme Court justices presented by the provinces to the federal government should reflect gender equality.

Some witnesses could see no reason for this proposed change in the nomination system and therefore were suspicious of the change. One witness wondered what motivated the provinces to want this power.

One group suggested that both the federal and provincial governments submit an equal number of names to an independent neutral body which would be charged with the responsibility of choosing the most acceptable nominee. It was the opinion of this group that the proposal under the Accord had a built-in potential for bias towards the provinces.

A witness stated that as these provisions of the Accord deny the elected governments of the North the opportunity to nominate Supreme Court judges they should be eliminated.

THE AMENDING FORMULA - UNANIMITY

The general amending formula for changes to the Constitution contained in the Constitution Act, 1982 requires the approval of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assemblies seven provinces with at least fifty percent of the population of the provinces.

The part of the amending formula contained in the Accord, addressed by witnesses was that which makes certain matters now subject to the seven province formula become subject to amendment only with unanimous consent of all governments. These matters are representation in the House of Commons, certain aspects of the Senate, the Supreme Court, the extension of existing provinces into the territories and the establishment of new provinces.

Witnesses claimed the unanimity provisions would make it difficult to adapt the constitution to the realities of Canadian life. They felt that even among reasonable people unanimity is hard to achieve and it may result in deadlock in federal-provincial relations.

Witnesses said the unanimity formula showed a lack of respect for the Territorial governments in that it will preclude the Territories from attaining provincial status. Another witness felt that the aboriginal people should be involved in any constitutional amendment which affected them.

A witness stated that unanimity would reduce the ability of the federal government to make decisions. It will lead to government through bargaining by First Ministers.

In fact one witness claimed this was not an amendment formula at all, but a prescription for deadlock.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 31, 1988

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we ask for leave to proceed to Committee of the Whole I should mention the adjournment plan which I shall put later today. Perhaps I should read the motion now, and if there is some discussion we should have it at this point.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 12th April, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it is our hope to have the Senate sit on the date mentioned in order to deal with various pieces of legislation that are before us. As the Senate is aware, the message amending Bill C-84 went through this place yesterday and has been sent to the House of Commons. That will be waiting for them when they return on April 11, and it could very well be that they will deal with it expeditiously. I think it would be appropriate for this chamber to make itself available to deal with that important bill when it comes back—if it comes back.

I do not need to emphasize the importance of the immigration legislation at this particular time in the history of Canada. Immigration seems to be a major item of public concern, and the government is most anxious to have the tools necessary to deal with it.

We also have before us, in committee, Bill C-55, the other immigration bill. This has been moving along, perhaps not as rapidly as we would have liked, but it certainly is a complicated bill and deserves quite a bit of attention. However, in the event that the committee is in a position to report that bill the week of April 11, it would be appropriate for us to be here for that purpose.

As well, we have Bill C-60, the Copyright Bill, on the order paper. That is worthy of our attention should we get into the debate on the amendments on it.

So, honourable senators, for these reasons and because we have a full order paper, I think it appropriate that we come back on the date I mentioned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must say that I am surprised at the decision of the government to suggest that we come back on April 12. It had been my understanding that it was the intention to return on April 18. Certainly, today I would consider returning on April 12 if the Deputy Leader of the Government had given any convincing reason why we should come back on April 12.

The fact of the matter is that we have completed the order paper insofar as government business is concerned, and what is there can be moved ahead today, with the exception of the Copyright Bill, which will not be dealt with and probably would not be dealt with even if we came back the week of April 12.

I think the deputy leader has put his main case on Bill C-84, which has been the subject of a message from this body to the House of Commons. The House of Commons will not return until April 11. I believe it is very unrealistic to expect that the House of Commons will deal with the message from the Senate on that Monday. It is probably more realistic to believe that it is unlikely that the message will be dealt with in that full week, particularly in view of the fact that yesterday the Deputy Prime Minister, who is also the President of the Privy Council and the President of the Treasury Board, announced that on Monday, April 11, the House of Commons will be completing Bill C-121, which will be followed by Bill C-117, C-110 and C-30. No mention whatsoever was made of Bill C-84.

Senator Murray: Perhaps they had not yet received our message at that point.

Senator MacEachen: I will not go into any further understandings I may have arrived at from previous discussions, but in order to ensure that we take a decision quickly and not delay the appearance of the Leader of the Government in the Senate before the Committee of the Whole, I would like to move that the motion be amended to read "April 18" instead of "April 12", in accordance with our previous understanding.

I am sure that honourable senators opposite, and particularly the leadership, will agree that the chances of having Bill C-84 returned expeditiously will be as great when we return on the 18th.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do regret if there has been any misunderstanding in regard to discussions that I or Senator Doody have had with various honourable senators opposite concerning the schedule. Several weeks ago when I participated in some of these informal discussions there was an understanding that I would open debate on the constitutional resolution on Monday, April 18. That is true, and I must confess that I had assumed at that time that the Senate would adjourn until that date.

However, I had also assumed, based on the progress that Bill C-84 was making and the deliberations of the committee and discussions that I have had with senators on both sides, that Bill C-84 would long since have been disposed of. Unfortunately, we are in a situation where late yesterday Bill C-84 cleared the Senate and was returned to the House of Commons. Mr. Mazankowski, the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, indicated yesterday the business that the House of Commons would be dealing with on April 11, but at that point he had no idea that the message was coming from the Senate with respect to Bill C-84.

It seems to me that it behooves the Senate to be here during the week beginning April 11 against the possibility that the House of Commons will deal with our message on Bill C-84 and might return that bill to the Senate.

Bill C-84 is no ordinary bill and the circumstances in the country with which Bill C-84 and Bill C-55 attempt to deal are far from ordinary. It is very important for the country that these bills be enacted into law, so that a chaotic situation, which we inherited from our predecessors in this respect—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Where were you yesterday?

Senator Murray: It is not our law; it is not law introduced by this government that is being subjected to such abuse and for which a legislative remedy must be brought to bear by Parliament.

I do believe that it is the responsible course for us, under the circumstances, to come back here during the week of April 11 to await the pleasure of the House of Commons with regard to this very important legislation so that we shall be here to deal with it if we receive another message during that week from the House of Commons.

However, as always, we are in the hands of the majority in this chamber.

Senator MacEachen: And it is a lucky thing!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion that the adjournment shall be until April 12. You have also heard the motion in amendment by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 9:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated to the Senate on several occasions in the past, I shall have with me several officials this morning and I would ask that the committee permit those officials to enter at this point.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the committee is now in session. There is a quorum. There is a request from the Leader of the Government that officials be allowed to enter the chamber. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, Dr. Norman Spector and Mr. Frank Iacobucci were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I understand the officials who have been allowed into the chamber are Dr. Norman Spector, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations, and Mr. Frank Iacobucci, Deputy Minister of Justice and Deputy Attorney General.

It is a little difficult to say that we have a "witness" this morning in view of the fact that he is one of our colleagues—the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. He is not exactly a witness but, Senator Murray, I am very pleased that you are prepared to address us on this most important subject. I would now ask you to proceed.

Senator Murray: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. When I appeared before the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on August 4 last and again on September 1, Dr. Spector and Mr. Iacobucci accompanied me. They will be available today, as they were then, to assist me in responding to questions that members of the committee may have. When I appeared before the special joint committee I spoke about the signal achievement of the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord: namely, to end the constitutional isolation of Quebec, which resulted from the agreement of November 5, 1981.

I also suggested that even if that fundamental objective were not at the heart of the accord the amendments would merit our support. This is so because what underlies the accord is a coherent and sensible vision of Canada.

While not all share this federalist vision, as was demonstrated in this committee yesterday afternoon, the present government strongly believes in it, and we consider it well suited to the nature of Canadian society.

In its report last September the special joint committee, on which this chamber was represented, concluded that "The Accord represents a reasonable and workable package of constitutional reform", and the joint committee recommended its adoption to both houses.

Last December this committee placed an advertisement in newspapers inviting submissions from "Canadians who may have concerns with any aspect of the Accord". In response to that advertisement your committee has heard from 28 individuals and organizations. You have received 88 submissions. The Submissions Group of your committee has heard from 43 witnesses; and the task force set up by the committee on the North has heard from 59 individuals and organizations.

Understandably, then, in view of the advertisement calling for people who had concerns to appear, the critics have outnumbered the proponents of the accord at those hearings. Today I would like to focus on a number of the questions and issues that have been raised before the committee. I shall, as I indicated earlier, be opening the debate on the resolution when we return after Easter.

Mr. Chairman, a number of critics have claimed that the "linguistic duality-distinct society" clause will override, supersede or take away Charter rights and freedoms, and that, in particular, sexual equality rights will be infringed.

I remind the committee that in 1982 the First Ministers agreed that it was reasonable that the substantive provisions of the Charter should be interpreted in the light of our multicultural heritage and in the light of aboriginal rights.

At Meech Lake they agreed that it was equally reasonable that the Charter should be interpreted in the light of Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinctiveness. Together those recognitions reflect, in the words of the joint committee, "Canada as it is".

As an interpretation clause, the "linguistic duality-distinct society" clause will not override, take away or supersede the substantive rights set out in the Charter, including those in section 15. Indeed, if I followed correctly the testimony of the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau yesterday, he seemed to agree with this point of view. In reply to a question from our colleague Senator Marsden, he underlined the strength of the sexual equality rights in the Charter, indeed their virtual invincibility—my word, not his—their virtual invincibility because of section 28.

During his testimony yesterday afternoon Mr. Trudeau also suggested that there is or has been some serious disagreement on this point between the federal government and the Government of Quebec, some serious disagreement about the meaning of the "distinct society" clause; in particular he referred to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs in Quebec, Mr. Gil Rémillard.

I have here a letter which I will table in a moment—copies of which I will have sent across to honourable senators—that Mr. Rémillard wrote on October 5 last to a women's group in the province of Quebec. As I said, I will table the entire letter, but I want to place on the record now a couple of short paragraphs which state quite clearly that Quebec's interpretation of the effect of the "distinct society" clause on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and ours are at one. Let me quote this couple of paragraphs for the record. This is Mr. Rémillard, in a letter to Madame Brigitte Morneau of the Association nationale de la femme et le droit:

[Translation]

However, I would like to point out that the clause relating to the recognition of Quebec's distinct identity is neither meant to have, nor will have, the effect of threatening the equality rights of Quebec women, any more than it would allow Quebec to pass legislation that might infringe on the rights of Quebecers under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In fact, this clause, together with the other parts of the 1987 Constitutional Accord, will allow Quebec to recognize and fully consent to the application of the Canadian Charter, while at the same time ensuring that both the Charter and the Constitution as a whole are interpreted in such a way as to consider those factors that together make Quebec a distinct society.

Our legal advisers have again assured us that the fundamental equality rights guaranteed under Sections 15 and 28 of the Charter are in no way threatened or compromised by the Constitutional Accord.

[English]

As I said, Mr. Chairman, at this point I will table this letter and have copies of it distributed to honourable senators.

Document tabled.

On this issue, Mr. Chairman, I would recall the testimony before the special joint committee of Professor William Lederman, one of Canada's leading constitutional law authorities. He told the committee:

It has been alleged that the proposed Constitutional Accord of 1987 would reduce the effect of the Charter in some vital respects, to the detriment of certain rights and freedoms. I respectfully think this is wrong.

I might add that the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place has stated:

There is no conflict between the distinct character clause and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[Translation]

In this respect I would like to point out that under section 1 of the Charter, the Government of Quebec is already able to stress its distinct identity before the courts, even without the interpretation clause.

If the Charter had been exempted from the application of the distinct society clause, Quebec would have lost that possibility and been left with less than it had before the accord was signed. It would have had less than sections 25 and 27 of the Charter provide with respect to aboriginal rights and Canada's multicultural heritage.

I am firmly convinced that the fact that Quebec accepts the Charter without exception or amendments should be seen as enhancing the Charter and the values it represents.

● (1120)

[English]

Yesterday, Mr. Trudeau waxed eloquent and passionate—and impressively so—about the community of values represented by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982. But, Mr. Chairman, what kind of community of values was it when Quebec refused to subscribe to that Charter? What sort of community of values was it when the National Assembly of Quebec repeatedly exempted the laws being passed by that assembly from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by using the “notwithstanding” clause? What a tragedy it would have been to perpetuate that situation in this country, but what a great achievement it was—a great achievement for the people of Quebec, of whom Mr. Trudeau spoke so passionately yesterday, and for the people of Canada—what a great achievement for the community of values that at Meech Lake we obtained the adhesion of Quebec to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms without exception and without amendment.

Honourable senators, yesterday in this discussion of the distinct society Mr. Trudeau suggested that I had somehow misread or misinterpreted positions that he and his government had taken on this question in the past. Let me try to complete the record on this point. Mr. Trudeau did acknowledge that in 1980 there had been a continuing committee of ministers on the Constitution that had put forward several options for the recognition of the distinct society in a preamble to the Constitution. I will quote those options into the record at this point. The first option read:

[Recognizing the distinct French-speaking society centred in though not confined to Quebec];

Senator MacEachen: Could the minister tell us what document he is reading from?

Senator Murray: Yes. This is another document I will table. This is from the Federal-Provincial Conference of First Ministers on the Constitution and it contains the relevant legal texts that were on the table at that time. I will table it and send copies to my honourable friend and to other honourable senators. It contains the two options that were brought forward to that conference by the continuing Committee of First Ministers on the Constitution. These are two of the options in the preamble and, as Mr. Trudeau pointed out yesterday, each of them was within square brackets. The first option was “[Recognizing the distinct French-speaking society centred in though not confined to Quebec]”. The second option was: “[Recognizing the distinctive character of Québec society with its French-speaking majority]”.

Mr. Trudeau, I believe, acknowledged that his government was prepared to accept either of those options, recognizing the distinct society in a preamble to the Constitution. Yesterday he did not quote an exchange that he had with Premier Lévesque on this point at the federal-provincial conference on September 11, 1980. At that time Quebec had proposed a form of preamble that spoke of:

[Translation]

“Recognizing the distinctive character of Quebec people which, with its French-speaking majority, constitutes one of the foundations of the Canadian duality”.

[English]

Premier Lévesque then said:

[Translation]

—but I repeat that, as far as we are concerned, our best effort until now, that is the best project we have been able to produce to take that reality into consideration, is the following paragraph:

“recognizing the distinctive character of Quebec people which, with its French-speaking majority, constitutes one of the foundations of the Canadian duality.”

[English]

Then, a little while later, “le président”, who was Mr. Trudeau, said the following—and I would ask the committee to pay particular attention to this passage:

[Translation]

The Chairman: Only two words in reply. A conciliation gesture. Your text may be outstanding; it is not bad and if you substituted the word “society” for the word “people”, I would probably find it acceptable, but if you insist on the term “people”, let us also talk about the Canadian people, the Quebec people and the Acadian people.

[English]

Those are the passages that I wish to quote. As I said, I will table them with the committee and send copies to honourable senators.

Document tabled.

Those passages demonstrate that the Government of Canada was prepared to accept one or the other of the options put forward by the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution, recognizing Quebec's distinct society. Mr. Trudeau, himself, as the Prime Minister of Canada, committed his government to such recognition in the course of the discussions at that conference.

Mr. Chairman, some have also raised questions about the "linguistic duality" clause.

Senator MacEachen: Just on your previous point, I have not examined the Debates of the Senate since Mr. Trudeau's presentation, but I have more than a faint recollection that, in connection with those two formulations, he stated he might have been prepared to accept one but not the other. However, we can check that later. Perhaps my recollection is not only faint but incorrect.

I take it that the minister is referring to the preamble in all of this?

Senator Murray: I am referring to the preamble. We can later discuss the reason why the matter was placed in the text of the Constitution in 1987. However, the federal government made it clear that they were willing to accept either one or the other of the formulations put forward by the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution. In any case, Mr. Trudeau further committed himself by suggesting a change in Premier Lévesque's draft in the passages that I have just quoted from the verbatim transcript of the Constitutional Conference of 1980.

With regard to the "linguistic duality" clause, as with the "distinct society" clause, this is an interpretative clause and, thus, cannot override or supersede substantive rights in the Charter such as sexual equality rights. It is ludicrous to suggest that a clause recognizing Canada's linguistic duality and affirming the role of legislatures to preserve this fundamental characteristic could be used in any way to authorize or justify sex-based discrimination in legislation or other government action.

A number of groups have said that the government has not explained why aboriginal and multicultural rights were included in clause 16 of the accord. Others have said that they do not accept the explanation given and have asked why substantive provisions—that is, section 91(24) of the 1867 Constitution Act and section 35 of the 1982 act—were included in addition to the two interpretation clauses.

First of all, may I say for the record that I addressed this issue during both of my appearances before the special joint committee. But let me recapitulate. Aboriginal and multicultural provisions of the Charter were included in clause 16 of the accord because they are interpretation clauses, like the "distinct society" clause and the "linguistic duality" clause, and because they also share with those clauses a linguistic and cultural dimension. It would have been illogical to have added the sexual equality rights provisions of the Charter to clause 16, as some now suggest, because they share none of these characteristics with either the multicultural and aboriginal provisions of the Charter or the proposed new "linguistic duality-distinct society" clause.

In this respect I would like to remind the committee of the view expressed by Yves Fortier, former President of the Canadian Bar Association, when he appeared before the special joint committee last August, where he said:

I don't see at all how the rule of interpretation to be entrenched in section 2 of the Constitution would supersede the substantive sections of the Charter, including sections 15 and 28.

It is true that clause 16 includes substantive as well as interpretative clauses of the Constitution. Sections 35 and 91(24), which, as a point of fact, are outside the Charter, were added for completeness since they also relate directly to aboriginal peoples.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, certain witnesses and other people have suggested that if no understanding could be reached on recognizing that the provinces have a role to play in promoting linguistic duality, we should at least amend section 2 to include a commitment by Parliament to promote official languages in the areas under its jurisdiction.

First of all, I would like to say, and I think it is now public knowledge, that attempts were made by Prime Minister Mulroney at the Meech Lake and Langevin talks to obtain a commitment to promote duality. Unfortunately, no understanding could be reached on a commitment that would have been binding on a few governments only.

Actually, it may be much easier to make this change once the accord is ratified, since we cannot reopen the accord now without the unanimous approval of the signing parties.

As far as Parliament and the federal government are concerned, they have already recognized through the new Official Languages Bill, Bill C-72 which I will have the honour of tabling and introducing in this chamber very shortly, that they have a role to play in promoting duality and are ready and willing to do so in all areas under their jurisdiction.

In his latest report, the Commissioner of Official Languages stressed that the accord was:

a confirmation of the fundamental importance of linguistic duality.

I think we have more to gain by adopting the accord as is, while reserving the option of further enhancing the cause of language minorities during the second round.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, witnesses before the committee, and others, have suggested that the Meech Lake Accord jeopardizes the constitutional rights of English-speaking Quebecers. The clause recognizing Quebec's "distinct society" is an interpretation clause and it neither creates governmental powers nor overrides substantive rights such as minority language rights in the Charter. Nothing alters section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which protects rights and obligations respecting the use of English and French in the National Assembly and before the courts of Quebec, or section 23 of the Charter, which protects minority language education rights. Under the accord English-speaking Quebecers are explicitly recognized as an integral part of Canada's linguistic duality. All legislatures, including Quebec's, will have their role in preserving that duality.

As William Tetley, the former Quebec cabinet minister and professor of law at McGill, has underlined, "no danger to English-speaking Quebecers arises from the concept of a distinct society." Furthermore, the Honourable Warren Allmand, the former federal cabinet minister, the member of Parliament from Montreal for the past 23 years, has expressed the view that the accord will not harm or reduce the rights of anglophones in Quebec. The Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place has said that the English minority in Quebec "will not lose their rights" under the "distinct society" clause. Taken as a whole, the accord represents a net gain for English-speaking Quebecers and for linguistic minorities generally, a fact pointed out some time ago by the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Mr. Chairman, the committee has heard claims, some of them rather extreme, that the accord weakens federal powers and grants provincial governments an inappropriate role in Supreme Court and Senate appointments. In the view of the government this accord proposes a balanced set of changes which respond to provincial interests while safeguarding federal authority.

Let me say a word about immigration. The federal government will continue to set annual immigration levels in this country. The accord clearly recognizes the paramount role of Parliament to establish national standards and objectives relating to immigration. This is not explicitly stated in existing constitutional provisions which provide, as honourable senators know, for concurrent jurisdiction over immigration as between federal and provincial governments, subject to federal paramountcy. However, national standards and objectives, which remain with the federal Parliament, are defined in the accord as including general classes of immigrants, levels of immigration and classes of individuals who are inadmissible to Canada. The accord also ensures that the immigration agreements are subject to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It provides that Parliament will retain its authority to provide citizenship services. We continue to set the rules for citizenship in this country for all immigrants to Quebec or elsewhere in Canada.

Finally, of course, any agreements reached on immigration matters with any of the provinces will be brought before both chambers of this Parliament, as well as before the provincial legislatures concerned.

The accord recognizes that it is constitutionally acceptable for Parliament to establish new national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Money will only be provided to non-participating provinces if they carry out a program or initiative that meets the national objectives. As Professor Donald Smiley testified before the Ontario Select Committee on February 4:

The Accord is a much less radical break with the Canadian past than most of its opponents claim.

He added:

It does not strip Ottawa of the power to act decisively in respect to a very wide range of matters important to Canadians as members of a national political community.

[Translation]

As far as appointments to national institutions are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that Canada is somewhat of an anomaly among federations. It is exceptional that the federal government should be under no legal obligation to consult the governments of the member states or any other authority when the time comes to appoint Supreme Court judges or senators.

The accord reinforces the federal character of the Supreme Court and the Senate by acknowledging the legitimate role played by the provinces in the choice of candidates who must nevertheless have the approval of the federal government which continues to make the appointments.

Twice already, in the 1971 Victoria Charter and in 1978 Bill C-60, the federal government gave its support not only to the principle of the provinces' participation, but also to the notion of a college responsible for choosing Supreme Court judges, if the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of a province could not agree. This mechanism would have entrusted the decision making authority to a non-elected third party.

I suggest that this provision of the accord will lead elected governments to agree on mutually acceptable candidates.

As for the Senate, the Trudeau government subscribed in 1969 to the principle that the provinces could appoint a number of senators, and not only suggest a list of candidates as is the case in the Meech Lake Accord. In 1978, Mr. Trudeau suggested that half of the members of the new Chamber of Federation be appointed by the provinces and that their mandate should coincide with that of the provincial legislative assemblies. I say that the Trudeau formula of 1978 would have certainly made of these senators mere delegates of their respective provincial governments.

Finally, I should like to repeat that the temporary provision dealing with Senate appointments should not replace an overall reform of the Senate. The accord guarantees that this issue will be addressed as a priority at future yearly constitutional conferences.

You have heard witnesses state that it will be difficult to set up new jointly-financed national programs and that if some are developed, the opting-out power which the provinces will have will sound the knell of the national nature of these programs and replace them with a collection of ill-assorted measures.

The purpose of the accord provisions dealing with the spending power is to civilize the use of the spending power and clarify the fact that it cannot be used to force the provinces to act against their will in the areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

The accord recognizes, however, that it is constitutionally acceptable for Parliament to set up new jointly-financed programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, a point which some might actually dispute. Mr. Pickersgill emphasized this point when he testified before our Committee of the Whole. As professors Peter Leslie and Richard Simeon pointed out to the joint committee, the spending power provision makes it possible to set up, between the two levels of government, a healthy negotiation process which should lead up to a wide consensus and reduce the possibility for the provinces to decide not to participate in new jointly-financed national programs.

Moreover, the Canadian Council on Social Development indicated that:

in its opinion, the notion of national objectives would enhance national and social programs.

This provision on the spending power is much less rigid than what the Trudeau government had offered in 1969 and 1979. In both cases, the creation of new jointly-financed programs would have been subjected to the agreement of the majority of the provinces. There is no similar provision in the Meech Lake Accord.

The Meech Lake provision also protects the national interest better than the previous offers to which Mr. Trudeau referred yesterday afternoon, and which provided for the granting of compensation to the residents of non-participating provinces, and these provinces were not required to implement a similar program or initiative compatible with the national objectives.

[English]

The spending power provisions of Meech Lake do not require the consent of the provinces for the federal government to establish new shared-cost programs. There is no majority consent mechanism, as Mr. Trudeau proposed when he was Prime Minister. Meech Lake does require, as Mr. Trudeau's proposal did not, that compensation will be paid only if a province brings in a program or initiative compatible with the national objectives.

● (1150)

Mr. Chairman, this committee and the Task Force on the North heard a good deal about northerners' views on the accord, particularly the "new provinces" rule and the Senate and Supreme Court appointments provisions. Under the accord, certain items, such as the creation of new provinces and Senate reform, are added to the list of those now requiring unanimity. The general amending formula of at least seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population will, of course, continue to apply to most other major matters. I stress this because the point is often overlooked. The general amending formula, Parliament plus seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population, remains.

Underlying the proposed change to the amending formula is a conviction that these matters—the Senate, the Supreme Court appointments process, and the creation of new provinces—are so central to the federation that all provinces should have an equal voice in them.

Mr. Trudeau objects, as he objected yesterday afternoon, to the unanimity rule for this limited but very important list of subjects. He objects to giving the veto over this limited but very important list of subjects to every province. But he was willing, as he repeated several times yesterday and as he indicated at Victoria in 1971, to give the veto to Quebec. What is that, if it is not special status?

As for the creation of provinces, some, including the majority of this chamber's own Task Force on the North, had suggested that the accord be amended to provide that a new province would be created by a bilateral agreement between the territory and only the Government, not even the Parliament, of Canada. I believe it is unrealistic to suggest that consensus could be achieved among First Ministers on an amendment that would give the provinces no role at all in the creation of new provinces—a role they sought and obtained in 1982 when the so-called 7-and-50 rule was established.

I remind the committee also that expert commentators have termed the "new provinces" rule an appropriate response to the fact that the creation of a new province will have an impact on both the operation of the general amending formula and basic financial arrangements of the federation such as equalization.

Under the amending formula, Professor Hogg has said that "since any direct amendment of the amending formula now requires unanimity it is arguable that other amendments having the same effect ought to be subject to the same requirements."

As for the impact on equalization, Professor Tom Courchesne of York University has said:

Introducing a northern province may strain the federal government's ability to finance the increased demands on the equalization formula.

As he put it:

Three traditional "have" provinces of the federation, Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, ought not to have a veto on new provinces if the three "have-not" Maritime provinces do not have a veto, particularly if the level of equalization payments is at stake.

The special joint committee confirmed that territorial residents continue to be constitutionally eligible for appointment to the Senate and to the Supreme Court.

Finally, as the Prime Minister indicated in his speech on the constitutional resolution last October 21, First Ministers might wish to examine certain territorial concerns at future constitutional conferences—a conclusion that premiers had reached at their August 1987 conference after a discussion with territorial leaders.

Mr. Chairman, before I leave this matter of the amending formula I want to refer briefly but, I hope, thoroughly to Mr. Trudeau's intervention yesterday at this point because he indicated that I had somehow misread, perhaps misinterpreted, the letter that he had sent to Premier Lougheed and to all the premiers on March 31, 1976. Mr. Trudeau said yesterday that in the letter he had suggested three methods of getting patriation with an amending formula. An examination of the correspondence—and I will table this letter also in a moment and send copies to honourable senators—shows pretty clearly that Mr. Trudeau had not suggested three methods of getting patriation with an amending formula. What he had outlined were three possible amending procedures that could become part of the Canadian Constitution once patriated. And his first proposal was as follows:

One could provide in the address to the Queen that amendment of those parts of the Constitution not now amendable in Canada could be made on unanimous consent of Parliament and the legislatures until a permanent formula is found and established. In theory, this approach would introduce a rigidity that does not now exist.

Mr. Trudeau concluded this ten-page letter—and honourable senators can read it for themselves—by saying that the federal government, in seeking patriation preferred “to act in unison with all the provinces” but if that were not possible “the federal government will have to decide whether it will recommend to Parliament that a joint address be passed seeking patriation of the BNA Act.” In short, Mr. Trudeau was prepared to proceed unilaterally to Westminster, but he was prepared to accept unanimity as the amending formula until something better came along or if something better did not come along, unanimity indefinitely.

I think that fact becomes pretty clear from the letter of Prime Minister Trudeau of March 31, 1976 which was released on April 9, 1976. That is the letter from Prime Minister Trudeau to Premier Lougheed as chairman of the Conference of the Premiers.

Mr. Chairman, I would table that letter and I have copies ready for distribution to honourable senators.

Document tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, aboriginal leaders have requested that aboriginal issues be placed on the agenda of future constitutional conferences provided for the Meech Lake Accord, although some people have claimed that it is impossible. The Native Council of Canada has proposed a draft complementary resolution in this respect.

The government shares and recognizes the disappointment of aboriginal people of Canada who feel that the constitutional consultations on aboriginal issues have failed since they were terminated in March 1987 without any agreement on self-government having been reached.

However, I am not sure that it is wise or necessary to institute a new consultation mechanism of the same type with fixed deadlines, as suggested by the Native Council of Canada.

In fact, it could even prove harmful if we compel ourselves to negotiate without a reasonable chance to come up with an agreement. Indeed, it is not at all obvious that the respective positions of governments and aboriginal leaders have evolved to the point of ensuring minimal chances of success.

● (1200)

[English]

Aboriginal constitutional matters are not being displaced or ignored in the second round of constitutional reform. The Prime Minister has said that he stands ready to convene another First Ministers' Conference on a self-government amendment when a proposal emerges that offers reasonable prospects for agreement. Nothing in the accord prevents him from doing so, or rules out preparatory discussions between governments and aboriginal representatives.

In this regard I believe that we would not be well served by constitutional deadlines. Rather, we remain committed to developing the necessary ground work for achieving such an agreement.

The aboriginal leaders have submitted a joint proposal which sets out a set of principles and a process with a view to renewing aboriginal constitutional discussions. The Minister of Justice will be responding to that proposal.

The Nova Scotia Leader of the Opposition, Mr. McLean, suggested to you that including roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries on the agenda for the second round will inevitably lead to a transfer of jurisdiction to Newfoundland but would harm the interests of Nova Scotia. This claim fails to take into account that the term “roles and responsibilities” is much broader than jurisdiction.

The special joint committee noted in its report that including this item on the agenda “could result in federal-provincial agreements or other cooperative arrangements benefiting all fishermen without disadvantaging any of them.”

It has been alleged that Newfoundland could well be able to encourage other provinces with little interest in the outcome to agree to a change of jurisdiction to benefit Newfoundland. This assumes that provinces “with little or no interest” in the outcome would willingly gang up with other provinces to deprive one or two particular provinces of access to key resources. To put it mildly, this is highly unlikely—not least because provinces are aware that the tables could turn during future constitutional discussions on other issues.

Furthermore, it is completely unreasonable to presume that the federal government would agree to a proposal favoured by seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population but fiercely opposed by one or two provinces that would be directly affected and would suffer hardship.

We have had enough of isolating provinces in constitutional processes. We have had enough of running roughshod over concerns that are vital to a province's interests. While the inclusion of this item on the agenda of the second-round conference does not guarantee an amendment, the government believes that there can and should be a full discussion of the issues, as there has been with regard to fisheries at most constitutional conferences over the past decade.

Mr. Chairman, taken together, the criticisms and amendment proposals I have addressed, though put forward sincerely, clearly would require virtually every major provision of the accord to be reopened for renegotiation. Mr. Trudeau is at least candid about where all this leads. He would have the Meech Lake Accord consigned to the dust bin. Still others would like to see action now on issues that were not on the agenda for this round and which do not figure in the Meech Lake Accord.

For example, Mr. I. H. Asper and Dr. A. W. Johnson, when they appeared before this committee, proposed that Triple-E Senate reform be achieved before the Meech Lake Accord proceeds. Apart from the breadth and complexity of the issue, they seem to forget that Senate reform is specifically identified as a second-round item, and that since the Premiers' Conference of 1986 governments have been agreed that discussions on it should be deferred until Quebec once again is a full participant in the constitutional process. Once the accord is ratified, I can assure honourable senators that the reform of this chamber will be a priority issue for governments.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, you have also been told that the accord should have contained a better constitutional acknowledgement of multiculturalism. I must recall that the purpose of this round of constitutional discussions was to bring Quebec back into the constitutional fold, not to eliminate the other alleged flaws of the 1981 accord.

As I said earlier, the section 2 acknowledgement of the distinct character of the Quebec society is in addition to the other constitutional acknowledgements in the Constitution Act, 1982, particularly that of section 27 pertaining to our multicultural heritage.

One of the reasons why this round was successful is that there was a limited number of issues on the agenda. That made it altogether different from prior constitutional exercises when 12 or 14 issues were raised at the same time.

[English]

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I could not help but reflect yesterday—listening to Mr. Trudeau reciting this endless litany of provincial demands, with which he was confronted during the late 1960s, the 1970s and the early 1980s—what a very good deal we did at Meech Lake on the basis of a limited agenda of the five conditions posed by Quebec and agreed to from August 1986 by all of the partners in Confederation. The premiers had agreed, at their conference in 1986, that the first round of constitutional reform would be limited to the five conditions put forward by Quebec; and attempts to go beyond that were firmly resisted up until the time that the First Ministers met at Meech Lake and at Langevin.

Senator McElman: Did you say that you were listening to Mr. Trudeau?

Senator Murray: Yes. The honourable senator will be aware that I followed very carefully everything that Mr. Trudeau said yesterday, and I watched the marathon that took place—and I congratulate Mr. Trudeau and honourable senators on their endurance. I do not believe that we heard from the Honourable Senator McElman during the question period yesterday, but perhaps we will hear from him today.

Senator MacEachen: We would have welcomed you into the chamber yesterday and you could have made your points directly to Mr. Trudeau.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for that. He will be aware that the purpose of the Committee of the Whole is to enable honourable senators to hear all these points of view. I have not attended any of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Murray: You heard, as you have a right to do, from, I think, 27 witnesses before Mr. Trudeau appeared yesterday, and you heard from them in my absence. I am the responsible minister and I knew that I would be the final witness before this committee, and I have every opportunity to put forward the point of view of the government, and to vote—as I hope all honourable senators will have the occasion to vote—on the Meech Lake Accord before the end of April.

[Translation]

The second round of discussions provides all sorts of opportunities to examine other issues and improve our constitutional arrangements. In the meantime, it is useless to ask that the governments reopen the accord in an attempt to settle major issues which were not on the agenda of the discussions which led to the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Chairman, I shall repeat here what I have said many times before. The federal government firmly believes that the accord must not be reopened to negotiation. No egregious error has been found, and this was the only condition under which the premiers had agreed that the accord should be reopened for negotiation.

Moreover, several of the amendments proposed have already been discussed and rejected by the governments, including those on the relationship between the accord and the Charter, the promotion of the linguistic duality of Canada and several provisions concerning the Territories and appointments to the Supreme Court.

[English]

Furthermore, as the joint committee underlined in its report, reopening the accord to renegotiate one proposal would inevitably lead to pressures to renegotiate other provisions. Some commentators have implied that the one or two changes they favour could be made with no difficulty. A telephone call would suffice, they say. This, honourable senators, is a delusion. If First Ministers were to revisit one or two provisions of the accord, advocates of other changes would object that their proposals had been ignored and would demand that they be placed on the table. It is impossible to know where this would end, and whether the necessary political consensus could be reconstructed.

Finally, it should be noted that reopening the accord to consider such amendments would require the unanimous agreement of the signatories. In contrast, many of the proposals for changes would in future require the approval of only seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the population.

● (1210)

Mr. Chairman, yesterday you were told that Quebec was not badly treated in 1981. Other witnesses have suggested that Quebec was legally bound by the 1982 Constitution Act and that it should not have been necessary to deal with the range of issues covered by the Meech Lake Accord. In the May 27 article in La Presse, Mr. Trudeau went so far as to suggest that the 1982 Constitution Act would last a thousand years, even with Quebec's isolation.

[Translation]

In my mind, the settlement forced upon Quebec in 1981 could not be the proper base on which to build the Canada of tomorrow. That is why I voted against the constitutional resolution tabled in this House on December 8, 1981.

Quebec was of course duly bound by the Constitution Act of 1982. But as Mr. Trudeau pointed out yesterday, that province in fact disputed the political and moral legitimacy of that Act as well as of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Parti Québécois government systematically resorted to the notwithstanding clause in an effort to make the Charter practically inoperative in Quebec and it made that a condition of Quebec's support for the Constitution.

Quebec later announced its intention not to take part in the constitutional process as long as no solution could be found to its specific concerns.

Such a situation could only be harmful for Canada. On the one hand, the fact that Quebec was isolated only made it harder to have changes adopted through the general amending formula and impossible to adopt changes requiring unanimous consent.

On the other hand, and more importantly, there was a danger that the situation might deteriorate and that a future generation would be left to solve a difficult problem in possibly more troubled circumstances.

[English]

With Quebec's willing assent to the 1982 Constitution Act, we now have a Charter of Rights which fully expresses pan-Canadian values and is accepted as legitimate throughout all parts of the country.

The Meech Lake Accord will help transform our Constitution, a document which, with limited change, has served us for 120 years. It will help transform it into a more authentically federalist document. In so doing, the accord will not revolutionize our constitutional arrangements. Rather, it reaffirms the view of the federation held by a broad spectrum of Canadians. This view is not based on mistrust, a pugilistic vision of competition between the partners of the federation. Rather, it assumes the interdependence of the federal and provincial governments and provides a better reflection of what Canadians want Canada to be—a generous, tolerant and united society which respects diversity and which believes that governments should work cooperatively within their respective spheres of jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, for the moment however, our objective is fundamental and it is clear. We are called upon to ratify an agreement which is aimed at putting an end to Quebec's isolation and at making constitutional change possible in Canada.

This ratification will allow us to move forward with the knowledge that we are entering a new era in the history of our country. In those coming years, we shall have the opportunity to further refine our constitutional process.

[English]

I thank the committee for its attention. I invite honourable senators to put their questions to me. I will do my best to reply to them. I will refer questions which properly can be referred to my officials, the Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations and the Deputy Minister of Justice.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Murray. The first senator I have on my list is Senator MacEachen.

[English]

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, first, I would like to ask the minister whether or not he can table for us the full text from which these expressions relating to the character of Quebec were drawn. In his statement the minister argued that Mr. Trudeau was prepared to agree to two versions of a preamble, with the inclusion of Quebec's distinct society. I wish to have the full text in which these expressions would have appeared, because they would not simply be words living in isolation.

Senator Murray: I thought I had done that, Mr. Chairman. If the documents that I have tabled are not sufficient, there are more. What I had tabled were the texts that came from the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution. There, in square brackets, were the two options that the Government of Canada was prepared to accept, and, further, the exchange between Prime Minister Trudeau and Premier Lévesque, in which Prime Minister Trudeau suggests some changes in Premier Lévesque's draft which would have recognized the distinctiveness of Quebec society, though not of the "peuple quebécois", the phrase to which he took objection.

If my friend finds that these are incomplete, I can table the entire transcript—the verbatim report exists both on paper and on videotape—and, of course, the full report, which I have, of the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution.

Senator MacEachen: I will examine these documents. I see that the full text is available. I do not think that the document I have does contain the full text in which these expressions are situated.

Senator Murray: Has my friend looked at page 2? There is a document here entitled "CCMC, Best Efforts Draft, Preamble and Statement of Purpose of the Constitution". There are then various items suggested by the federal government and various provinces. Then, proceeding to page 2, the first line reads: "The fundamental purpose of the Federation", and so on.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I have that. I take it that that section on page 2 is the complete statement?

Senator Murray: That is the full best efforts draft put forward by the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution. If you look at lines 17 and 18, you will see the two clauses that are in square brackets. The first reads:

Recognizing the distinct French-speaking society centred in though not confined to Quebec;

and the second reads:

Recognizing the distinctive character of Québec society with its French-speaking majority;

That formulation was from the Continuing Committee of Ministers and was supported by the Government of Canada.

Later, as I suggested, just to reinforce the points, Mr. Trudeau made it clear in his exchange with Premier Lévesque that he was prepared, by changing a word or two in Mr. Lévesque's draft, to go along with the recognition of distinctiveness of Quebec's society in the Constitution.

Senator MacEachen: I will not press this point until I have an opportunity to look at the transcript of Mr. Trudeau's comments of yesterday, but it was my recollection that Mr. Trudeau had also quoted from a document that had been prepared by a Continuing Committee of Ministers, that it had been presented in square brackets to the First Ministers, and that Mr. Trudeau subsequently said that he was not prepared to accept one version but might have accepted the other in a preamble. However, we can check that when we look at the text.

I have one other point to raise with the minister and that is the assertion he has made that the Meech Lake Accord is not subject to any amendments. I take it that the minister still has that idealistic view of the Meech Lake Accord, that it is a seamless garment, the perfection of which is so evident to him that it cannot be improved at this stage.

Senator Murray: It is not so much an idealistic view, Mr. Chairman, as it is a most practical view. There is no doubt, as I have indicated, that to open it for one supposed improvement would open it for all kinds of other suggestions. As I have said, most of the suggestions for improvement have either been rejected by the First Ministers after careful consideration in the process leading up to Meech Lake and Langevin or they are such that they will be no more difficult—in fact, easier—to effect after ratification of the accord.

Senator MacEachen: It is a practical question then, not a claim of perfection; that is at least understandable. I will not ask the minister to speculate on when he thinks the Meech Lake Accord will become the law of the land, but I wonder how he is going to deal with the situation that prevails in the province of New Brunswick. It is true that the former premier did put his signature to the accord, but he subsequently called an election and was totally defeated by the electorate of New Brunswick, not winning a single seat.

The new Premier is now expressing preoccupations about the Meech Lake Accord. He is not a signatory to that accord and has asked that his preoccupations be addressed. Surely it would be fair to consider them and to accommodate the new Premier of New Brunswick, who has stated that he is not prepared to accept the accord unless his preoccupations are accepted.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, Premier McKenna has, as the Leader of the Opposition points out, expressed his reservations about the Meech Lake Accord. So far as I am aware, he has not stated that he will not accept the accord unless certain changes are made in it. I am not aware that he has made such a statement. In any case, his government indicated in the Speech from the Throne a couple of weeks ago that it would be appointing a legislative committee to hear the views of the people of New Brunswick on the matter. There the matter rests for the moment. The Government of New Brunswick will hear from the people of that province and from other witnesses, and presumably a recommendation will be brought to the government.

The Leader of the Opposition asks me how the federal government is going to deal with the province of New Brunswick. I would remind him, and I would remind the Government of New Brunswick, that this is not a bilateral matter between us and them. Ten provinces, together with the federal government, signed the Meech Lake Accord. The House of Commons has already ratified it, as have the provinces of Quebec, Saskatchewan and Alberta. British Columbia is on the way to doing so, as was announced in the Speech from the Throne a few weeks ago. Ontario has a legislative committee which, if it has not already wound up its work, is in the process of doing so. Nova Scotia has a resolution now being debated in the House of Assembly. Prince Edward Island has announced it in the Speech from the Throne; Newfoundland has announced it in the Speech from the Throne. The ratification process, therefore, is moving ahead. With the exceptions of New Brunswick and of Manitoba, where an election has intervened, the ratification process is moving ahead very much on schedule.

In due course, if Premier McKenna or the Government of New Brunswick have views to express or have reservations or requests to make, they are not to be made in some bilateral negotiation with the federal government. The members of the Government of New Brunswick will have to address themselves to all of the other partners in Confederation who support this accord.

Senator MacEachen: May I take it from the minister's answer that there have been no discussions between the Government of New Brunswick and the Government of Canada with respect to the attitude of the New Brunswick government to the accord?

Senator Murray: I think it would be permissible for me to tell the Senate that in the course of private discussions that I have had with Premier McKenna on various matters Meech Lake has come up at least once. On that occasion I conveyed to him the views that I have just conveyed to the Senate, namely, that this is not a bilateral matter between us and them.

Senator MacEachen: It is not bilateral, but we take it that the federal government is an important player and that the views of the federal government will be part of the solution.

Is the federal government prepared, if the other provinces are prepared, to sit down and discuss with Premier McKenna his preoccupations to see whether an accommodation can be reached?

Senator Murray: To complete the record, Mr. Chairman, I should have indicated—and I have been reminded by the officials—that federal officials and officials from New Brunswick have, indeed, discussed the concerns that were expressed by Mr. McKenna and the New Brunswick Liberal Party during the election, now the government of that province.

The question that the Leader of the Opposition puts is frankly rather academic. One can discuss preoccupations, but it has been made clear, I think publicly both by this government and by the Government of Quebec and by various other governments, that we are not prepared to take the monumental risk to the unity of the country that would be involved in reopening the accord for the purpose of discussing matters which, as I said, could more easily be addressed after ratification in the second round of constitutional discussions.

As I have pointed out, the Government of New Brunswick has already been rebuffed—I hope that is not too strong a word—by several provinces on this matter. My honourable friend is well aware that without unanimous consent, which is not forthcoming, we cannot reopen the accord.

Senator MacEachen: But can you conclude the accord without unanimous consent? Can you make it the law of the land in the absence of New Brunswick?

Senator Murray: I think my friend knows the answer to that question as well as I do.

Senator MacEachen: What is it?

Senator Murray: A number of matters in the accord require unanimous consent, and that being the case, it would take unanimous consent to reopen—

Senator MacEachen: So it would require the consent of the Province of New Brunswick to make the accord the law of the land?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: And the minister is saying to me, if I understand him correctly, that the Government of Canada will not consider changing the accord to meet the preoccupations of New Brunswick.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I must give the same reply that I gave earlier, and that I gave to the Premier of New Brunswick, which was that this is not a bilateral matter between us and them. His concerns, if they are to be discussed, would have to be discussed multilaterally.

Just imagine the signal that I would send to the other partners of Confederation if I sat down and began to renegotiate Meech Lake with the Premier of New Brunswick.

Senator MacEachen: That is not the question; the question is whether the Government of Canada has made up its mind that it will not make changes that would meet the preoccupations of New Brunswick.

I am not asking about the other provinces; I am asking what is the attitude of the Government of Canada about possible changes to accommodate the preoccupations of New Brunswick? Is the attitude negative or positive?

Senator Murray: I am sure my honourable friend knows the answer to that question.

Senator MacEachen: Please give it to me. I do not know the answer, to tell you the truth.

Senator Murray: I will give it to my honourable friend again. The Government of Canada, together with ten other governments of this country, made a commitment at Meech Lake and at the Langevin meeting. We made a commitment. We respect and stand by that commitment. We are opposed to reopening the accord.

Senator MacEachen: Even though in the interim the population of New Brunswick has changed the government in a very drastic way? The Government of Canada is not prepared to take that into account?

Senator Murray: I trust the Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting that the issue in that election was the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator MacEachen: No.

Senator McElman: It was one.

Senator MacEachen: I am not suggesting that, but the fact remains that there is a new government. We have heard a great deal about the equality of the provinces. I remember the minister waxing eloquent in this chamber one day about the equality of the provinces.

Senator Murray: Which my friend says does not exist.

Senator MacEachen: I am applying the minister's standards to his own conduct; namely, what has happened to the equality of the provinces? How does New Brunswick attain equality now with the other provinces unless it has a voice in the consummation of Meech Lake? It is to be ignored, according to the minister.

Senator Murray: Not at all; nor does New Brunswick believe it is being ignored. The Government of New Brunswick has brought the resolution forward, at least for the purpose of referring it to a committee of that legislature.

The honourable senator is getting quite a bit ahead of himself and ahead of the legislature of New Brunswick in anticipating the result of that study and the eventual final position of the Government of New Brunswick.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think I am getting ahead of myself at all, or ahead of the events, because the premier was on television last evening and stated quite clearly that unless his preoccupations were addressed he would take the responsibility to the people of New Brunswick for seeing the Meech Lake Accord not proceed. That is what I understood him to say on television last evening.

So I am not really ahead of myself. It seems to me my question is totally in accordance with the view expressed by the Premier of New Brunswick. I think that is a reality.

I can understand the minister's coyness in refusing to deal with this directly, because it is quite clear that unless New Brunswick comes aboard Meech Lake is a dead duck.

If the spirit of reconciliation is a guiding principle, it would seem to me that that spirit ought to be applied now by the government and the other premiers in trying to conciliate and reconcile themselves to a new premier.

Senator Murray: That remains a guiding principle, and, unlike the honourable senator, I am confident that it will triumph in the end.

Senator MacEachen: That is an answer that is so apocalyptic that it is probably a proper introduction to Good Friday.

Senator Murray: It is not apocalyptic.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, following the example of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, I would take advantage of the presence in Committee of the Whole of the Deputy Minister of Justice and ask him whether he can, in some way, inform us of any advice or opinion he has given the government as to the constitutionality of any or all of the clauses of the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure what the honourable senator intends by that question, but he will know, as a former cabinet minister and as an experienced parliamentarian, that as a matter of practice it is not the custom to table legal advice that one receives in confidence from the law officers of the Crown.

I do not know whether the deputy minister would like to elaborate on that; I do not know what he could properly say in reply to the question Senator Haidasz has put. Let me simply say that what this process is about is amending the Constitution. Senator Haidasz seems to be suggesting that there is something unconstitutional about what is being done. Perhaps he should elaborate on that and then I will invite the deputy minister to comment, if he properly can.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, we have heard statements in this chamber from other witnesses that lawyers from the two territories are being discriminated against because they will never be eligible for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada since those two territories will not be able to become provinces, and, therefore, will not be able to submit a list of candidates for the Supreme Court of Canada. That is against the equality rights in the Charter of Rights.

• (1240)

Senator Murray: If I am not mistaken, and the deputy minister can perhaps elaborate, I believe that very point is now the subject of some litigation in the courts. In any case, I simply remind the honourable senator that lawyers in the territories, who are also members of provincial bars—as the overwhelming majority of them are and as all of them can become quickly—remain eligible for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Meech Lake process.

Mr. Frank Iacobucci, Q.C., Deputy Minister of Justice: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I would like to add a general comment. Obviously, as advisers to the government, my department thoroughly reviewed the constitutional proposals that are reflected in the 1987 amendment. As a general matter, we advised the government that these provisions did comply in all material ways with the provisions of the Constitution of Canada.

Senator Murray: It occurred to me, when the Leader of the Opposition was talking about the commitments that were made by First Ministers, that because there are questions of detail here I might ask Dr. Spector, who was both present in the room and is familiar with the documents, whether he has anything to add about the commitments to table those resolutions in the legislatures.

Dr. Norman Spector, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, with respect to the question of the position of the Government of Canada concerning reopening the accord, it is important to consider that the accord signed on June 2 and 3 commits the signatories to lay or cause to be laid before their respective legislative assemblies as soon as possible the resolution that is appended to the accord.

There was—and this is public knowledge—a discussion in the early morning of June 3 at the Langevin Building on the topic of public hearings. The question arose as to the conditions under which the signatories to the accord would be released from their commitment with respect to presenting the resolution that is appended. The words, if I recall them correctly, were: "If there is an egregious error, and only if there is an egregious error, would we be prepared, as First Ministers, to reopen the accord."

It is our view that, if a signatory to the accord were to reopen it under other conditions and not lay or cause to be laid the resolution before his legislative assembly, the commitments contained in that accord would have been violated. Having said that, the situation we are in, given the unanimity requirement as a practical matter for the resolution, is that without the unanimous consent of the signatories to the accord to reconsider the commitments they made the morning of June 3 we would be no further along or no further behind where we are at present with the difficult issue that has been raised here with respect to New Brunswick. That is, we now have the prospect of a non-signatory with concerns about the accord. But unless there were unanimous agreement—even if there were only one premier who said that he was not interested in revisiting the commitments made on June 3, we would be no further along than we are at present with respect to the exception of New Brunswick.

I can tell you—and this is public knowledge as well—that overtures have been made to a number of provinces that have been rejected. Moreover, as an indication of the kind of process this sets in place with respect to the content of the resolution, for example, the accord, one premier has suggested that if the accord were reopened he would want to see Triple-E Senate reform effected in the current round of discussions.

Senator MacEachen: That would be excellent!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Yes; and the question that arises is whether you want to hold up Quebec's re-entry into the constitutional family until those other objectives are achieved. That is the question that is before this chamber and before the country and on which, I trust, honourable senators will have an opportunity to vote before the end of April.

Senator MacEachen: I wonder whether Dr. Spector can tell us whether there were any other conditions apart from—

The Chairman: One moment. Senator Haidasz, had you finished your questioning?

Senator Haidasz: I do not think I will get very far in my questioning, so I will desist.

The Chairman: Thank you. I then have Senator MacEachen, followed by Senator Doyle.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I will desist also.

Senator Doyle: I have a couple of questions that relate to proceedings in this chamber yesterday, and I will try to be as precise about them as I can.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would respond to a statement made in the course of the questioning of Mr. Trudeau. This was a statement made by Senator Frith. He said:

... if this week or next week—that is before the expiration of 180 days—we pass a resolution authorizing a proclamation—that is what the section says—we will have paralyzed section 47, knocked it out, and we will have an absolute veto.

The “we” of whom he was speaking, of course, was the Senate. I wonder if you would agree with Senator Frith on that interpretation.

● (1250)

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I think this position put forward by Senator Frith yesterday, and into which he tried to lead Mr. Trudeau, is absolutely ludicrous. Is there any doubt in anyone's mind as to what was intended in 1981-82? Is there any doubt in anyone's mind that what was intended was that the Senate should have a suspensive veto of 180 days on constitutional change, period? Does anyone doubt that? Does anyone who voted on that matter doubt what the intention was? I do not, and I would be surprised to find that anyone seriously does. I am quite surprised at Senator Frith's intervention on that matter.

However, let me go to section 47 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and read it to you, including a phrase which I am reasonably sure neither Senator Frith nor Mr. Trudeau quoted:

47. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under sections 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation—

Honourable senators, “the proclamation”—just one.

—if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution—

Then I would draw the attention of honourable senators to the rest of this section:

—and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

Honourable senators, I do not know what could be clearer than that; it is clear that what was intended by this section in 1982 was that the Senate should have a suspensive veto of 180 days only—a suspensive veto only—on constitutional change.

Senator Frith also tried to make something of the French version. I believe the French version, which I took occasion to read this morning, is at least as clear and at least as strong as is the English version. Because I am speaking advisedly on this matter, and although I speak in less diplomatic and less professional language than would the Deputy Minister of Justice, I invite him to comment.

Senator MacEachen: Are you speaking as Justice Murray or Minister Murray?

Senator Murray: I am speaking as the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations—as I say, advisedly—on this preposterous legal point.

Senator MacEachen: What does that mean to us?

Senator Murray: When I say “advisedly,” I mean having taken advice on what appeared to me then—and which I have confirmed to my own satisfaction, at any rate—a preposterous point interjected into the discussion yesterday by Senator Frith—

Senator MacEachen: It seems to have frightened you a little—

Senator Murray: —and into which he tried, quite unfairly, to lead the former Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: He is starting a panic out there; panic in the streets.

Senator Murray: Let me tell my honourable friend that if it gets out that the honourable senators are trying now to claim that we did not lose the absolute veto in 1982, and that there is some little word in there, some form of words, that gives us back the absolute veto, they are welcome to take that case to the people of Canada, because we will be the laughing stock not only of the country but, I suggest, of the courts.

In any case, I ask the Deputy Minister of Justice to deal with this matter in more professional language.

The Chairman: Mr. Iacobucci?

Mr. Iacobucci: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I cannot improve on the explanation of the intention that was given by Senator

Murray. As far as the wording is concerned, I note that, to begin with, the marginal note on section 47 states: "Amendments without Senate resolution." So it is pretty clear that there are amendments that can be contemplated that do not have a resolution passed by the Senate.

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made by a proclamation, and the proclamation has to relate to a resolution. Also, the wording of the section states pretty clearly that there is one proclamation and that there is one resolution.

Therefore, when we look at what resolution is passed by the House of Commons, it is that resolution that, in fact, has to be the resolution that is either adopted by the Senate or is not adopted by the Senate, and those are the choices from a legal standpoint. If the Senate, in its wisdom, chooses to modify a resolution, obviously, from a political standpoint, that is something that I would not want to comment on, but it would be up to the judgment of the Senate to do so if it wished to modify a resolution. However, if the Senate did that, then it would not have adopted such a resolution within the meaning of section 47, and, consequently, it would lose its suspensive veto, and, accordingly, after the expiration of the 180 days the House of Commons could again adopt that resolution.

The Chairman: Senator Doyle?

● (1300)

Senator Doyle: Mr. Chairman, that was very useful, because it leads me right into the second part of this question. We are talking about what the Senate might do, or attempt to do, to the resolution, and Mr. Trudeau dealt with that yesterday, I thought, in quite a striking way. However, in going back over the record of just what was said I find that it is perhaps not as precise as I had thought it was.

He did clearly recommend that this chamber make changes and make amendments and otherwise work towards setting the stage for a reference to the courts. At least, that is what emerged in my mind. He certainly was in favour of a reference to the courts and, while he thought there might be some limitation on how effective this chamber would be in moving that along, he wanted us to do what we could to encourage it.

Therefore, I wonder about the prospect of a reference to the Supreme Court, with all of the delay that would probably follow.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I must say that having heard Mr. Trudeau it is clear that his suggestion for a reference to the Supreme Court is nothing more than a subterfuge, because he also made it very clear, not once but several times in his presentation yesterday, that what he really wants is to have this accord consigned to the dust-bin of history. Then, of course, the Constitution Act of 1982 could last for a thousand years, as he told us in May, even with Quebec outside the constitutional family.

Mr. Chairman, constitutions are written in language that is intended to allow them to evolve with time and in response to changing conditions and to keep pace with changing conditions. As I had occasion to remark before, when people objected to some of the general concepts that were written into the proposed constitutional resolution, this is not a tax statute or a ways and means resolution that we are writing, in which we try to cover off every conceivable eventuality. Constitutions written like that frequently do not last very long or, at any rate, are not very successful. A long time ago I was taught that that had been the experience of a number of other countries. The idea of putting general concepts into the language of the Constitution is to ensure that that Constitution will evolve and keep pace with the changing needs and conditions in the country.

In 1867 the Fathers of Confederation set down "peace, order and good government," without much further elaboration. They left it to succeeding generations of Canadians and to the courts to interpret what that meant. The same applies to "property and civil rights."

One does not need to go back to 1867 to find these general concepts written into the Constitution. In the 1982 exercise we have the recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage as an interpretative clause for the Charter of Rights. Nobody has said or tried to define what that means. I think it would be rather interesting, albeit probably a futile exercise, for a bunch of us to get together to try to do that. It was not further defined, because it was not necessary to define it.

Even more to the point, section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

The first clause in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is the one that provides for limits on the most fundamental rights of Canadians; freedom of conscience and religion; freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression; freedom of the press and other mediums, including communication; freedom of peaceful assembly; and freedom of peaceful association. That clause provides for the limits on those most fundamental freedoms of Canadians. What does it say? It says, "... such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." Do we try to define in some detail what is meant by "a free and democratic society"? No, we do not. We leave that to the courts. We leave that to successive generations of Canadians to decide.

In the 1981-82 exercise there were some questions that could be put to the courts, and were put by various provincial governments and by the federal government in a reference to the court. The questions were: Does Parliament have the power to do X, Y or Z? If not, then some more questions were put. If so, then some other questions were put. Those were concrete questions that could be put to the court. What questions would you refer to the court under the Meech Lake Accord? When he was asked about this, Mr. Trudeau said, "Well, the 'distinct society' clause." What is the question? Surely, there has to be a set of facts to put before the court.

No, Mr. Chairman, for all the reasons that I have indicated, a reference to the Supreme Court is not on.

Having stated the policy on this matter, there may be, from a legal point of view, some matters regarding references to the court that the Deputy Minister of Justice could put on the record at this stage.

Mr. Iacobucci: Mr. Chairman, when governments have decided to refer a matter, it has been in situations where there was concern about the legal aspects of the issues involved. In the context of the accord and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the context in which the question was raised about a reference, it is my understanding that the government does not believe that the weight of legal opinion today suggests that there is anything in the accord that takes away, supersedes or overrides any of the rights of the Charter or otherwise puts them at risk.

The other point I raise is that the reference on the question of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would have to involve a request to the Supreme Court to provide an interpretation of the accord in the abstract, and it would be very difficult, from a factual standpoint, to give the court a factual basis and context that would be necessary for the court to assess, in any meaningful way, the accord's contents.

Indeed, I point out that it was the lack of a similar factual basis and context that caused the Supreme Court of Canada to decline to answer certain questions in the 1979 reference on Senate reform.

A Supreme Court reference in the present context would be difficult to conceive in terms of adding a specific set of answers to a specific set of questions that would enlighten the issues under consideration.

Senator McElman: The statement just made by the witness is very interesting. The Department of Justice, of course, is the department that advises the government and supports that advice, which I respect.

The debate on Meech Lake-Langevin has not been very widespread, I think largely because the process used has had a blanketing effect upon proper public debate of the issue. However, there has been sufficient debate and sufficient testimony before this committee to show that there are some very deep reservations about some aspects of Meech Lake. I guess one could say that the deepest concerns have been with respect to the term "distinct society" and what its effect might be, for example, on elements of the Charter.

The government has taken the position that its effect will not be serious in diminishing those matters now in the Charter. Other highly respected witnesses have taken the contrary view. The government has said that, no, it does not wish to make a reference to the Supreme Court. One or more of the premiers have said that they have not the foggiest notion what "distinct society" means, although the Government of Canada says it believes it does know. We have, currently, a great difference of view. The government says that eventually it will be decided by the Supreme Court. Because of the concerns of some very credible witnesses that there are innate dangers involved here, why does the government not now make a reference—I do not accept that it is impossible to make a reference—that would perhaps allay some of the fears? I agree with what Senator Murray had to say earlier as to what was meant by "Parliament" and the 180 days. There are many things meant by "Parliament." The Supreme Court of Canada has said, "That may be what they meant, but it isn't what they have said in law." That could apply to this accord, despite the good advice to the government from its bureaucrats.

So why not consider the request that has been made by many viable witnesses, many learned people in constitutional law, to make a reference before the event rather than after the event?

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, first, I hope that we will have an opportunity at some point for Senator McElman to elaborate on his comments about the amending formula and the suspensive veto of the Senate, because I take it from what he said that he agrees with the legal opinion put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—

Senator McElman: Well, I had better stop you right there, because I made no such suggestion as to whether I support it or do not support it—and that is not in question at the moment; so don't lay that on me. Just deal with the question I gave you.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, for reasons that my honourable friend will appreciate, I cannot resist the temptation to point out to him that when his party, at its 1986 convention, passed a resolution in favour of recognizing the distinctiveness of Quebec society, it must have known what it meant.

Senator McElman: We would particularly have known what it meant had it been in the preamble rather than where it is now.

Senator Murray: Before we leave today we must have a discussion between our legal advisers about the preamble as distinct from a clause in the Constitution. But since my honourable friend has brought that up, let me make this point—

Senator McElman: Could you first answer my question?

Senator Murray: I will get to your question. The preamble was under discussion in the 1981-82 exercise, as the record shows. But the moment passed for a preamble, and the other interpretative clauses that were put there in 1982 respecting aboriginal rights and our multicultural heritage—that the Charter had to be interpreted in a way consistent with our multicultural heritage—were not put in a preamble but as interpretative clauses in the body of the text.

So, when 1987 came along, and the question was where to put the interpretative clauses relating to the distinct society and to Canada's linguistic duality, we could do no less. The moment for the preamble had passed. The First Ministers, in 1982, had judged it appropriate not to have a preamble but to put those interpretative clauses into the body of the text.

We are not making a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for the reasons that have been explained. You do not send to the Supreme Court of Canada for a legal opinion or a legal interpretation. You send the set of facts and ask the Supreme Court to pronounce on those facts.

I want to ask the Deputy Minister of Justice to say a word, if he wishes to add anything and thinks it appropriate to do so, about this matter of preambles as distinct from the body of the text.

Senator McElman: Before you do so, may I ask a supplementary following upon your answer to my basic question? If the federal government feels that it is not in a position to be able to word such a reference, what would be the feeling if a province found it quite possible to word such a reference and have it go to its own Supreme Court?

Senator Murray: I am sorry, would you repeat the question?

Senator McElman: My question is: What would be the government's reaction to a province which felt itself capable of wording a reference and of putting it to its own Supreme Court? Would the Government of Canada then be intervening in some fashion?

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, the honourable senator asks what would our attitude be if the government of a province decided to make a reference to its own Supreme Court. What difference does it make what our attitude would be? If they put a reference to the Supreme Court, whether or not we intervened would depend on what the question was and how far it went, and whether the Supreme Court agreed to hear it or deal with it.

On this business of a "distinct society", I am sorry that Senator Frith is not here, because he was a member of the B & B Commission—

Senator McElman: We are sorry that you weren't here yesterday.

● (1320)

Senator Murray: —and, in addition to the resolution that was passed in 1986 by the Liberal Party—who would not, I am sure, pass a resolution dealing with a distinct society if they did not know what it meant—there is the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. I will take just a second of your time to read what they say under the heading of "Two Societies":

We have already said the two dominant cultures in Canada are embodied in distinct societies and that the word "society" designates the types of organization and the institutions that a rather large population, inspired by a common culture, has created for itself or has received, and which it freely manages over quite a vast territory where it lives as a homogenous group according to common standards and rules of conduct. We recognized the main elements of a distinct French-speaking society in Quebec. The same may be said of the other culture in the English-speaking provinces, and, to a certain degree in Quebec, where the disadvantages of minority status are balanced for the English-speaking society and by a very advantageous socio-economic position.

[Senator Murray.]

That was the position of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, of which our friend and colleague, Senator Frith, was a member.

If I may, I will read a couple of lines from the Task Force on Canadian Unity—the so-called Pepin-Robarts commission appointed by the Trudeau government and which reported in 1979, as follows:

One can readily identify several factors which have led to the emergence of a distinct society in modern Quebec. We have identified six—history, language, law, common origins, feelings and politics—which together with others have led to the development of a distinct society in modern Quebec.

Senator McElman: And aside from civil law, the same description would apply to New Brunswick, would it not?

Senator Murray: Indeed, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism would have said so. In fact, I will read what the commissioner said about the distinct society in Quebec:

Elements of an autonomous society are taking shape elsewhere. In some cases they are tenuous and of marginal importance, but in others they are advancing vigorously.

He went on to state:

Especially in New Brunswick.

But, in any case, I do not think anyone would pretend that that reality—that is, that Quebec is a distinct society—is at all comparable to the unique situation that we have in New Brunswick.

I do want to finish my thoughts on the matter of the preamble versus the interpretative clause by asking the Deputy Minister of Justice if there is anything he can add.

Mr. Iacobucci: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, on the question of a legal distinction between the preamble and an interpretative clause, I will be as brief as possible. The interpretation clause in a statute or in a Constitution puts an obligation on not only the court but on others reading the Constitution, or the particular document in question, to take that interpretation clause into account in the interpretation of the provisions of the statute or Constitution in question. A preamble gives more of a discretion to the court to take into account the wording of the preamble.

There have been cases where the courts have referred to a preamble in arriving at an interpretation, but, as I said, it is not obligatory or mandatory for the courts to take the wording of the preamble into account. So a stronger form of impact is through an interpretation clause, and, as Senator Murray has pointed out, since it was decided to put multicultural preservation in the Charter in section 27, and aboriginal rights in section 25, the First Ministers agreed with the interpretation clause approach for the distinct society.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator McElman.

● (1330)

Honourable senators, it is now a little past 1.30. We should make a decision as to how we wish to proceed. I have only one name on the list at the moment. If there are no other names to be added, then I suggest that we proceed and then rise, but if there are going to be further questioners we have to consider whether we should break for lunch.

Perhaps we should proceed with the next name on the list.

I now call upon Senator Perrault.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I spent a long, hot summer as a member of the Joint Committee on the Constitution here in Ottawa last summer. I have maintained silence since that time. I have listened to the remarks of the minister today. I know that there are sincere people on both sides of this question of whether Meech Lake is a good agreement or an incomplete agreement.

I can say that the method pursued in order to bring this Meech Lake or Langevin accord into being is hardly the classic method. It is not elegant, it is not historical, in any sense. It almost seems to have been rushed through with furtive zeal.

At one time I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, and that is the way we shoved through a minor labour dispute—keep them up all night, make an urn of coffee, and get them to sign on the dotted line. That is done in labour disputes all over North America.

But so many concerns have been raised since that event by so many qualified and well-intentioned people, I find it difficult to accept from the minister the suggestion that somehow this is a seamless web, some sort of gossamer fabric which would be rent by any suggestion that it is deficient in any way.

I find it even more difficult as a result of the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages which was made public last week. I know the Commissioner of Official Languages has been condemned by many members of the Conservative Party who walked in lock step to demand that he resign. I hope that the minister is not on that kind of weary and dismal bandwagon.

At page 7 of the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages it states:

With all its imperfections, some form of official bilingualism is the only answer that does not point toward a progressive dismemberment of Canada.

When we hear remarks like that we ask what the reasoning behind them is. The report goes on to state:

The language sections of the Meech Lake accord are an honest attempt to address that issue.

Fair comment. The report goes on to state:

But, much as we must welcome Quebec's whole-hearted adherence to the Constitution of Canada, the relevant paragraphs of the accord do not, as now formulated, present a completely satisfactory balance between the general commitment to preserve duality and the specific affirmation of Quebec's role to preserve and promote its distinctiveness.

Precisely what the former Prime Minister said yesterday and what many well-thinking Canadians are saying across the country. Perhaps we had better listen to some of these concerns.

The report goes on to state:

What may look like a difference of a couple of syllables could affect the general language equilibrium in this country. As we urged in our brief to the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord, the word "promote" or its equivalent should have been placed in both parts of the formula and apply to both official language minorities throughout Canada. The distinctiveness of Quebec society also seems to us inseparable, both in historical and contemporary terms, from the contribution of the English-speaking community in that province and should be recognized as such.

The Commissioner of Official Languages is concerned about this designation of a distinct society. You can reply to that and say, "Well, his fears are groundless," but there are so many Canadians in so many provinces now saying, "Look, we do not want to destroy Canada, we love this country. There is a special relationship being established for one province the others do not enjoy. Maybe we had better have another look at the Meech Lake Accord."

You almost suggest that it is an act of disloyalty to suggest that the Meech Lake Accord can be improved.

As I said, there are good people on both sides of this argument who are very distressed by what they believe to be the implications of the accord.

When the Commissioner of Official Languages spoke out, many Canadians said, "Off with his head! Get rid of him!" Is the minister prepared to denounce the Commissioner of Official Languages and the position that he has taken on behalf of many other Canadians?

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I should note that quite some time ago, following the Meech Lake Accord and the Langevin accord, the Commissioner of Official Languages stated quite definitely—and I think I referred to this in my remarks earlier this morning—that the accord represented a net gain for linguistic minorities.

Further to that, while Senator Perrault has placed on the record some of the things Mr. D'Iberville Fortier said in his annual report, I think it is only fair that I should complete the record by quoting the conclusion that he comes to. I have the French language text.

[Translation]

In spite of its flaws, this Accord is a great step forward—

[English]

And a bit later, and this is the position to which I would ask Senator Perrault to pay particular attention:

[Translation]

We have some reservations (about the Accord) . . . but they do not lead to criticism of the Agreement's principle or appropriateness [ . . . ]. I must say that we disagree with Alliance Quebec and with Francophones outside Quebec whose position [ . . . ] which we do not share, is to amend or not to ratify the Accord. Our position is that the Accord is basically good without being perfect and that, if the opportunity to improve it was to arise later, we would prefer a more specific protection for minorities and that the word "promotion" be used instead of "protection".

[English]

I explained earlier that the Prime Minister tried to get all to agree to promote linguistic duality. That agreement was not forthcoming. What was achieved, and it was a first in Canadian history, was a commitment on the part of 11 governments towards bilingualism, towards the linguistic duality of this country as one of its fundamental characteristics. I would say, then, in contrast to what Senator Perrault has just said, that the views of Mr. Fortier and Mr. Trudeau on this matter are not the same.

Senator Perrault: I wish the minister had been here yesterday—perhaps he was monitoring the proceedings somewhere—to hear to the fullest extent what the former Prime Minister had to say. According to Mr. Fortier, in essence, the document says that while Quebecers are encouraged to promote French, Canadians in the other provinces are only required to tolerate it. Senator Murray has said, "We did our best to get them to move away from the position that they only tolerate it." The question then is: Could this pave the way for Quebec to create a kind of French ghetto within its boundaries and thus lead to a dissolution of this country?

Finally, with these concerns being expressed by very qualified observers in the provinces, in view of the historical importance of this agreement, is the government unwilling to consider amendments and changes to remove the concerns of many of the people in this country with regard to the ultimate impact of the agreement? It would be so easy, for example, to say to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon that they will have a say in their future. The present situation creates at least the suspicion that three or four provinces have not established what they think their northern boundaries are going to be, so they do not want any additional powers given to the northern people. The government could so easily remove many of these concerns, and we could all join together to bring into being an agreement which has general consensus and support.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, many of the things that are suggested will be no more difficult—in fact, will be easier—in a second round.

Senator Perrault: Is that true when 100 per cent agreement is required?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator stated at the beginning that the accord was incomplete. The accord was complete in that it achieved in the first round the objective that the federal government and all the provinces had set for themselves, that objective being the re-integration of Quebec into the constitutional family. That is why the First Ministers, the premiers, agreed in August of 1986 that getting Quebec back to the table was a first priority, that this would be negotiated on the basis of Quebec's five conditions, and that other constitutional reforms would await a second round. What we have done with respect to the "distinct society" and "linguistic duality" clause is to recognize in a balanced way two extremely important realities of this country that were not recognized in that way in the 1981-82 exercise.

My friend says that we proceeded in a way that was not the classic method, as he put it. Perhaps that is why we succeeded. Senators heard Mr. Trudeau here yesterday, as I said, giving the litany of demands and counterdemands that were on the table during the constitutional conferences of the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s, when they went ahead with an almost unlimited agenda. We were dealing with quite a limited, fixed agenda that all agreed they would respect and, indeed, did respect. There was nothing new about these issues. Many of them—the distinct character of Quebec, the linguistic duality, the amending formula, the spending power—have been discussed and debated for generations in this country.

As to the specifics that we were negotiating in the run-up to the Meech Lake Accord and in the discussions at Meech Lake and Langevin, the five conditions were outlined by the Liberal Party of Quebec in the general election of 1985 in their election program "Maîtrisez l'avenir," following which Mr. Rémiillard elaborated on them at a rather famous conference held at Mont-Gabriel. There was the meeting of provincial premiers in August of 1986 at Edmonton, to which I referred, where they agreed that the negotiations would be conducted on the basis of the five conditions put forward by Quebec. There were no surprises in all of this. The issues were not new and there were no surprises. The only surprise, perhaps, to the media and to a lot of people was that we succeeded.

The Chairman: Senator Perrault, does that conclude your questioning?

Senator Perrault: Although I would like to ask more questions, Mr. Chairman, I will desist at this time.

The Chairman: There being no further questioners on my list, then, I will entertain a motion that the committee rise and report progress.

Senator Petten: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, that the chairman report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe it is the wish of the chamber that a recess be taken at this time. I am in the hands of honourable senators as to how long this recess should be.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is rather late. The dining room closes at 2 o'clock.

Senator Doody: I am sure the cafeteria is open, although I do not want to sound too plebeian. Shall we adjourn until the sound of the bell at approximately 2.45 p.m.?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the Senate adjourn during pleasure until 2.45 p.m.

Some Hon. Senators: No! No!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on a point of order, what business will we be dealing with when we return at 2.45 p.m.?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, we have Question Period, although we on this side are willing to forgo that if it is the wish of the chamber. There are three government orders on the table with which I would like to deal, third reading of Bill C-76, second reading of Bill C-52, and second reading of Bill C-67. Standing in the name of Senator Adams is debate on second reading of Bill C-102.

Hon. William J. Petten: That will stand.

Senator Doody: Standing in the name of Senator Thériault is debate on second reading of Bill S-15.

Senator Petten: That will stand.

Senator Doody: We have Order No. 6, to do with Bill C-60, which I know will stand. Debate on second reading of Bill C-83, in the name of Senator Stewart, I suspect will also stand.

The three orders that I have mentioned are government orders that should be addressed. We would like to do it today, if at all possible.

Senator MacEachen: Let us do it now.

Senator Doody: I have no objection to that. If the Senate wishes to continue to sit now, that is fine.

Senator Petten: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: I was curious as to what it was we were coming back for.

Senator Doody: I thought I had made it clear that there were some government orders on the order paper, and that is why I asked that we canvass the Committee of the Whole at 1 p.m. and see what their intentions or wishes were. If the committee had wanted to break for an hour, we could have come back to deal with these other matters.

I do not know if Senator Murray has to converse or meet with anyone prior to Question Period, or if there is any information that has to be prepared, or if any of the people who want to speak on these bills on second reading need any time to get information or materials. However, as far as I am concerned, we can proceed now.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, if there is to be a Question Period, I would like time to get the information that was asked for in several questions that were put to the Deputy Leader of the Government yesterday.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I think I can speak for this side of the house—and, if I cannot, someone will correct me—that we can forego Question Period today and proceed directly to the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Kelly, moved the third reading of Bill C-76, to provide for emergency preparedness and to make a related amendment to the National Defence Act.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I would like to speak on this bill. Consequently, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-52, respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature.

He said: Honourable senators, let me begin by saying that this bill, in large part, continues the policy contained in current legislation. Its major new feature is to reserve the coasting trade to Canadian ships to the 200-mile limit.

The second principal benefit of the bill is that it clarifies that all commercial marine activities are reserved for Canadian ships.

The Canadian coasting trade, at the present time, is governed by Part XV of the Canada Shipping Act. These provisions became law in 1934 and have as their basis the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement of 1931. This agreement required that all signatories grant equal treatment to ships from Commonwealth countries. In 1979 this agreement was terminated by common consent of the signatories. In 1966 Part XV of the Canada Shipping Act was amended, reserving to Canadian ships the coasting trade west of Anticosti Island, in the St. Lawrence and in the Great Lakes.

The Coasting Trade Act is designed to encourage growth in the Canadian coasting trade and create new opportunities for this industry in offshore exploration and development.

This bill completely removes the coasting trade provisions from the Canada Shipping Act and makes amendments to those provisions, thereby creating the new Coasting Trade and Commercial Marine Activities Act.

We are certain—or, at least, we are certainly confident—that this new act will give impetus to the marine, tourism and shipbuilding industries. It will create more jobs for seamen working in areas to be reserved for Canadians. These areas include commercial activities related to the exploration, development or production of mineral resources right out to the continental shelf.

The purpose of this bill is to reserve all commercial marine activities taking place in Canadian waters to Canadian ships and to allow foreign ships to provide services to Canadian shippers when a Canadian ship is not available. The bill also provides for certain categories of ships to be exempted from its provisions.

In dealing with the principle of reserving the trade to Canadian ships the bill distinguishes between the activities taking place within the 12-mile territorial sea and those taking place above the Canadian continental shelf. Subject to the exemptions listed in subsection 3(3), all commercial marine activities of a commercial nature taking place within the territorial sea are reserved to Canadian ships.

In the waters above the continental shelf—that is, 200 miles—only those activities of a commercial nature relating to the exploration, development, production or transportation of non-living natural resources are reserved to Canadian ships. I assume that “non-living natural resources” refers to oil and gas and, presumably in the future, to minerals. This difference reflects Canada’s international obligations in the 12-mile to 200-mile economic zone. The extension of the reservation to the continental shelf will encourage construction in Canada of platforms for the exploration and exploitation of Canada’s offshore oil and gas. The transportation of materials required by this industry is also reserved to Canadian ships, thus creating more jobs for Canadian seamen and shipyard employees.

This bill continues the practice of the Minister of National Revenue of granting a temporary licence to a foreign ship when no suitable Canadian ship is available to carry goods or undertake marine activity. This waiver system has worked well in the past to protect the Canadian shipping industry and to ensure that the shippers’ needs are met. Under the present system approximately 99 per cent of the Canadian coasting trade is carried in Canadian ships.

Foreign cargo ships wishing to do business in Canada must obtain a temporary coasting trade licence and give 14 days’ notice of the proposed activity. This will allow Canadian shipping companies to adjust their schedules to allow as many Canadian vessels as possible to be employed.

A provision has been inserted in the bill permitting the Governor in Council to place a cap on the number of licences that may be issued. This provision is available to the government in situations where it is in the public interest to do so.

The bill provides protection for cruise ships having a capacity of less than 250 overnight accommodations. It specifically exempts vessels with a greater number of overnight accommodations. Possibly someone might explain this to me, because I did not have an opportunity to go into this.

The purpose of this provision is to protect what could be called the “domestic cruise” industry. Apparently this is the industry that operates in the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes and along the east and west coasts of Canada during the summer months only. This industry is growing, but it needs protection to ensure that Canadians benefit from this development to the maximum extent possible. This industry uses vessels with less than 250 overnight accommodations, and many of them have no such accommodations.

The “international cruise” industry operates in Canada during the summer months and in other areas of the world during the rest of the year. This industry uses vessels of 250 or more overnight accommodations, and usually employs vessels with a capacity of 300 or 400 overnight accommodations. This is also a growing industry that attracts a large number of tourists to Canada’s coasts. As these vessels must operate in other parts of the world during the Canadian winters, it is not feasible to provide protection to this class of vessel.

Finally, the bill provides for adequate enforcement procedures. These are contained in clauses 13 to 22. They have been drafted on the basis of the enforcement procedures contained in sections of the Canada Shipping Act.

Exemptions to the legislation include fishing vessels, ships engaged in ocean research, including those operated or sponsored by foreign governments, and ships assisting others in distress. These foreign vessels are controlled by other Canadian legislation or by international agreements.

Overall, the bill enables the Canadian supply boat fleet to extend their range beyond the territorial sea to the outer edge of the continental shelf or 200 miles, whichever is the greater. The area will be reserved for Canadian ships.

In conclusion, this bill, in large part, continues the existing policy contained in current legislation. Its main feature, as I have mentioned, is to reserve the coasting trade to the 200-mile limit to Canadian ships. The second principal benefit of the bill is that it clarifies that all commercial marine activities are reserved for Canadian ships.

Honourable senators, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

ANIMAL PEDIGREE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Martha P. Bielish moved the second reading of Bill C-67, respecting animal pedigree associations.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce for second reading a bill that will replace the Livestock Pedigree Act with the Animal Pedigree Act.

Since the bill was tabled in the House of Commons last June there have been extensive consultations with industry, and the government listened carefully to their suggestions.

The draft amendments introduced in November addressed many of their concerns. Further consultations were held when the bill and the draft amendments were sent to the committee by the House of Commons.

We want to ensure that the best possible legislation is enacted to serve the purebred industry. Consultations with all sectors of the Canadian purebred animal industry have, in fact, been going on since 1982. So I am confident that this legislation will serve the industry well, and, in turn, it will be of real service to Canadian agriculture.

The animal pedigree bill will update and replace the old act, which has been in force since 1900 and was last amended in 1952. The new legislation will allow us to better address today's realities in the livestock industry.

The main purpose of the bill is to promote breed improvement and to protect those raising or buying registered animals. It will retain the provision of the old act regarding the animal pedigree associations authorized to keep pedigrees and to register animals of specific breeds.

The new bill will also allow the establishment of associations to keep records and to identify animals of evolving breeds. This is an important addition, designed to encourage the best possible records and pedigrees of evolving breeds.

Honourable senators, I will briefly summarize the major provisions contained in the bill before us.

The new Animal Pedigree Acts will more closely define the basic purpose, powers and duties of animal pedigree associations.

The new bill provides for the formation of the Canadian Livestock Records Corporation to replace the Canadian National Livestock Records, the legal powers of which are unclear. The new corporation would keep pedigrees for animals of a breed and for animals in the process of evolving into a new breed.

The act defines a purebred animal as having at least 87.5 per cent—that is, seven-eighths—of its inheritance from one breed. However, individual associations could make this more restrictive if they so desired.

The bill allows for the registration of animals other than purebred or "percentage" animals.

The bill makes provisions for embryo transfer and artificial insemination.

The bill provides for the amalgamation and dissolution of breed associations.

The bill also includes an expanded offences clause. It specifies time limits for transferring certificates of registration or identification after a change in ownership, and it sets penalties for exceeding those limits.

In addition, the level of fines is now to be determined by the value of the animal to which the offence relates. The maximum level of fines under the new provisions will be raised to $50,000 from the old $500 maximum set back in 1952.

The new bill also brings provisions under the old act in line with current federal corporate law legislation.

In sum, the Animal Pedigree Bill will provide greater protection for the buyers of livestock, more realistic penalties for violations of the act, and more flexible rules for breed organizations.

I will now outline some of the major amendments that have been made to the original bill. As I mentioned, these amendments are the result of extensive consultations with industry representatives.

During consultations with the industry some associations feared that they would not be entitled to register certain animals of their breeds when they are less than 50 per cent pure.

In response, the 50 per cent requirement has been removed. As long as the lineage can be traced back to the breed's original foundation stock, associations that register animals such as the Quarter Horse, Appaloosa, Sport Horse and Anglo-Arab can operate under this act.

● (1410)

Following discussions with beef breeds associations, the wording in subclause 64(g) was changed. The intent is to prevent the selling of an animal under false pretences. Under the current bill the seller of an animal that is not registered or eligible to be registered will not be allowed to sell the animal "in a manner that is likely to create an erroneous impression that the animal is registered or eligible to be registered."

Several associations requested that the new legislation clarify the clause which states that no association may fine a person. So the wording has been altered to clarify the fact that association fees are not fines. The bill before us reaffirms that associations have the right to charge different fees for late registration or to suspend someone from membership and force them to pay higher non-members' fees.

The bill also provides for the withdrawal of a breed from an association in order to form a new association or join an existing one. It will permit, for example, the formation of a Canadian Braunvieh, or Beef Brown Swiss Association, if it is shown that Braunvieh and Dairy Brown Swiss are two distinct breeds.

Another clause concerns liability. The bill will ensure that no one can be held personally liable for any act done in good faith on behalf of the Canadian Livestock Records Corporation.

In addition, a clause was added to provide for the establishment of a general stud and herd book to be kept by the corporation. This book will keep pedigree records for animals of breeds or evolving breeds for which there is no association.

After consultations with Holstein Canada, the bill was amended to require associations which are involved in artificial insemination and embryo transfer to make bylaws for the recording and identification of semen and embryos, as well as for issuing semen and embryo certificates.

After careful deliberation and further consultations with industry, clause 59 was introduced prior to passage of the bill in the House of Commons. This clause allows for the promotion of an environment of free enterprise and competition in the area of maintaining records.

The bill that is now before us allows the expertise, staff and equipment of one breed association to be made available to other associations for registration and record-keeping purposes. It will allow a choice of record-keeping and registration services other than the new Canadian Livestock Records Corporation.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I am convinced this bill will provide better protection for both buyers and sellers of registered or identified animals and promote breed improvement.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS BILL

THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the third reading of the Bill C-76, An Act to provide for emergency preparedness and to make a related amendment to the National Defence Act.—(Honourable Senator Stewart).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon I indicated that I wished to say something on the motion for third reading of Bill C-76. Since then I have made some investigations and enquiries to discover the relationship between this bill, Bill C-76, and another bill which is to come to us, namely, Bill C-77. I discovered that there is almost no relationship, and, consequently, I do not wish to speak on Bill C-76. The result is that, if it is the will of the house, I certainly would not raise any objection to proceeding to third reading of the bill at this time.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Stewart. In that event, I move third reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, April 18, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, April 18, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION (SHARE ISSUANCE AND SALE AUTHORIZATION) BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-125, to enable the Northern Canada Power Commission to issue shares, to authorize the sale of those shares to the Government of the Northwest Territories, to repeal the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and to provide for related matters.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, April 21, 1988.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at five o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Tuesday, 19th April, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—1988-89 CROP YEAR—INITIAL PRICE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not the initial price for wheat and other grains has been adjusted by the Canadian Wheat Board for the 1988-89 crop year. Last week I heard an announcement to the effect that the Canadian Wheat Board has increased the initial price for the current crop year by, I believe, $10 per tonne in the case of regular flour or bread wheat and $15 per tonne for durum wheat, but the announcement did not go on to say whether or not the increase applies to the new initial price for the ensuing crop year. I would appreciate it if the minister would clear this point up for me. If a communiqué has been sent to my office containing the information I have requested, I have not seen it as yet.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I regret to say that I do not have the information the honourable senator is seeking, as I have been out of town myself the past few days. I shall endeavour to obtain that information and bring it to him at once.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would appreciate that very much. I wonder if the honourable minister would also seek the information respecting other grains, such as barley, oats and so on, so that farmers will have an indication of prospects for the ensuing crop year for these cereal grains as well as wheat.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall do that.

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the second reading of the Bill C-52, An Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Petten took the adjournment of this debate for Senator Langlois. So the order should stand in his name.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Langlois.

ANIMAL PEDIGREE BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bielish, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill C-67, An Act respecting animal pedigree associations.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Petten also took the adjournment on this matter, but for Senator Marchand. I wonder if we might have it stand in that honourable senator's name.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Marchand.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I suggest that we stand all remaining orders and proceed to the main motion before the Senate this afternoon?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: On reading Hansard of March 31, I was under the impression that it was the intention that the order dealing with the Meech Lake Accord would be the first item to be called every day this week before we proceed to any other business. Will we have to do this every day?

Senator Frith: Do what every day?

Senator Flynn: I am talking about giving priority to the resolution concerning the Meech Lake Accord. Is there no order of the house that this be called as the first item of business every day?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not believe that there is such an order, but there is certainly an understanding that we are going to give priority to the Meech Lake resolution this week.

Senator Flynn: I thought there would have been an order of the Senate.

Senator Frith: We are also discussing the possibility of an order as to disposition, so we could include it in that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your wish, honourable senators, that all inquiries stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—
MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

THAT,

WHEREAS the Constitution Act, 1982 came into force on April 17, 1982, following an agreement between Canada and all the provinces except Quebec;

AND WHEREAS the Government of Quebec has established a set of five proposals for constitutional change and has stated that amendments to give effect to those proposals would enable Quebec to resume a full role in the constitutional councils of Canada;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto sets out the basis on which Quebec's five constitutional proposals may be met;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

AND WHEREAS section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987
Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens"

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B.(1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C.(1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

"General"

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:

"Courts Established by the Parliament of Canada"

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 101 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Supreme Court of Canada"

101A.(1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.

101B.(1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E.(1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—CONFERENCES ON THE ECONOMY AND OTHER MATTERS

Constitution Act, 1982

9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

11. Subsection 46(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"46.(1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province."

12. Subsection 47(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

13. Part VI of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"PART VI CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

50.(1) A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year, commencing in 1988.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, in speaking to this motion, I intend, first, to enumerate, very briefly, the achievements of the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

Senator Frith: That won't take long.

Senator Murray: Second, I intend to discuss the historical and political imperative posed by Quebec's constitutional isolation since 1982. Finally, I wish to place the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord in the context of our constitutional history and evolution and show how it builds upon Canadian realities and Canadian values.

Meech Lake represents a balanced resolution of issues which have stymied constitutional talks for years—a federal resolution in the true sense, because it recognizes the legitimate interests of the provinces while safeguarding federal authority, the national interest and the rights and freedoms of all Canadians. To be specific, the accord achieves the following:

First, it gains Quebec's political and moral acceptance of the Constitution Act, 1982, thus completing and turning the page on the historic but flawed patriation achievement of 1982;

Second, it strengthens the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms through Quebec's willing acceptance of the Charter without amendments or deletions.

[Translation]

Third, it recognizes the legitimacy of the Supreme Court of Canada—where Quebec is now guaranteed three justices—as the ultimate arbiter of questions relating to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the distribution of powers.

Fourth, by recognizing the linguistic duality of Canada and the distinct identity of Quebec, it gives us a Constitution that accurately reflects the fundamental characteristics of Canadian society.

Fifth, by bringing Quebec back into the Constitutional family, it unblocks the process of constitutional reform.

Sixth, by requiring annual First Ministers' Conferences on the Constitution, the accord provides a forum for discussing other important constitutional matters, such as Senate reform.

Seventh, it represents the first constitutional affirmation of the federal government's spending power in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction and provides a process for establishing objectives through Parliament and for prior consultation with the provinces. This means that in future we will be able to have national shared-cost programs that are more effective and better adapted to regional needs.

[English]

Eighth, the accord strengthens the federal character of important national institutions such as the Supreme Court and the Senate.

Ninth, the accord respects the fundamental equality of the provinces by guaranteeing a provincial role in nominations and in changes to the amending formula which reflect the stake that each province has in important national institutions such as the Senate.

Finally, the accord guarantees a forum for economic policy coordination and planning in annual First Ministers' conferences on the economy.

Honourable senators, I want now to dwell for a moment on the circumstances that gave rise to the accord and which argue so strongly for its adoption.

The seminal issue of Canadian history since 1867 has been national unity. It is an issue that has presented itself in many forms at different times in our history; but what is transcendent about the issue is the relationship between English- and French-speaking Canadians, the relationship between Quebec—the one majority francophone province—and the rest of the country.

[Senator Murray.]

Some serious threat to our unity has arisen with almost every generation. That our unity has survived is due to the strong will that exists among Canadians to maintain this country; and due also, I believe, to some wisdom over the years on the part of the political leadership in this country.

The isolation of Quebec in 1982 presented dangers and disadvantages to the people of Quebec—to which I will make reference later in my remarks; but for Canada and for Canadian unity this wound could only grow more debilitating with time.

Quebec's refusal to take part in future constitutional amendments, so long as the issues surrounding her isolation had not been resolved, effectively blocked constitutional reform in this country. It was impossible to achieve constitutional amendments that required unanimous consent, and it was extremely difficult to achieve constitutional amendments that required the assent of seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population—as we saw during the conferences on aboriginal constitutional rights earlier this year and in previous years. Indeed, the Right Honourable John Turner made this point, very forcefully, I thought, in his address to the Liberal meeting in Quebec on the weekend.

Surely all of us can see, as the leaders of our country saw in 1985 and 1986, the danger of trying to settle this issue—the isolation of Quebec—at some future date, perhaps at a time of national crisis, perhaps in haste and at a price that would be dictated by urgency.

This is a point which some very longheaded and experienced Canadians have made time and again in supporting this accord and in commending this accord to parliamentarians. I think in particular of the statements made by the Honourable J. W. Pickersgill and Mr. Gordon Robertson on this very matter.

Nor, I think, should we ever underestimate the psychological and political effect of Quebec's isolation in Quebec and on Quebec's thinking. It was surely dangerous to have Quebec, as one retired politician put it to me, "half in and half out of the Constitution." So the question that faced the political leadership of this country a while back was what should be the appropriate response to this situation. Is it to insist that a constitution which does not have Quebec's assent is as legitimate as one that does? Surely not. Is the appropriate response to ignore them? For how long? For a thousand years? Or is the appropriate response to try to negotiate their return to the constitutional fold? It is that latter response that the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the other nine provinces gave once Quebec had outlined the five conditions for its assent to the 1982 Constitution. Surely no one will deny that the continued isolation of Quebec from our Constitution posed a real threat to the political stability of this country.

This accord brings Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family, and that was the purpose, that was the objective, of the Quebec round. To reject this accord now because it is not perfect, to reject it because it does not resolve other constitutional issues that were not even on the agenda during the Quebec round, to keep Quebec out for those reasons, would be irrational and, in the context of the history that we all know about, it would be irresponsible.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, a constitution does more than apportion jurisdiction and set out rules and regulations; a constitution represents the commitment of the people to a set of shared values and is a reflection of what they are and a vision of how they wish to pursue their destinies together.

Canada's Constitution, as we all know, was forged in colonial times and took the form of a British statute. While independence lay far in the future, some enduring Canadian values and realities emerged in the Constitution of 1867. Look at the old BNA Act and you will find those realities reflected, you will find those values given constitutional expression by the Fathers of Confederation—federalism, parliamentary democracy, bilingualism, our inherited obligations towards the aboriginal peoples, regionalism, pluralism, the distinctiveness of Quebec, the principle of sharing, above all, the splendid principles of equality and partnership between English and French-speaking Canadians. All of those realities are there in the old BNA Act. I argue and shall argue that the accord of 1987 builds on those realities and values.

The preamble to the BNA Act made clear that Canada was to be a federation with a parliamentary form of government.

[Translation]

The attempt to abolish the use of French through the Act of Union in 1840 was also officially rejected and provisions concerning the use of French and English in Parliament and the courts of Canada were enshrined in the Constitution.

Parliament was entrusted with the Indians and the lands reserved for them, as well as the commitments the Empire made in the Royal Proclamation of 1763.

Regionalism was expressed in the equal representation of the Maritimes, Quebec and Ontario in the Senate of Canada.

Pluralism was protected through guarantees regarding the rights of confessional schools.

By virtue of its distinct civil law system, Quebec was not affected by Parliament's power to ensure the uniformity of laws governing property and civil rights in the common-law provinces. Thus the guarantee provided in the Quebec Act of 1774 remained in effect.

The 1867 Act even provided in Section 118 for an early form of equalization payments to the provinces.

[English]

What is remarkable is that 120 years later all of these realities and values endure as hallmarks of the Canadian way. Not only do they endure but they have been strengthened—strengthened over the years and strengthened, notably, in the 1987 accord. As Premier Peterson told the Ontario legislature during the November 25 debate on the constitutional resolution:

The Accord does represent a solution in the best Canadian tradition. It is a viable accommodation. In both symbolic and practical terms, it is the kind of agreement that has characterized the building of this country.

The 1987 accord will strengthen federalism in Canada by providing new mechanisms for intergovernmental consultation, collaboration and cooperation. It also reinforces our parliamentary system of government. For example, no immigration agreement negotiated by the executive of the government under this resolution will be given force of law unless it is authorized by the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assembly of the province concerned.

French and English were recognized as official languages of Canada and New Brunswick in the Constitution Act, 1982. In 1987 the role of Parliament and all legislatures to preserve Canada's linguistic duality will be constitutionally recognized. As the Prime Minister has said, the Government of Canada intends to address the issue of constitutional protection for minority language rights at the first constitutional conference to follow ratification of the Meech Lake Accord. To suggest, as some have, that the constitutional recognition of our linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada will divide the country, as opposed to bilingualism, which unites us, is to set up a false dichotomy. Past and future policies and programs of bilingualism in Canada were premised on the incontrovertible fact of our linguistic duality. To afford constitutional recognition of this fact to Canada as it is, in the words of the special joint committee, and to affirm the role of Parliament and all legislatures to preserve this fact can only serve to strengthen and to further the interests of bilingualism.

Another false dichotomy, honourable senators, is the contention by some people that there is some inherent contradiction, or at least inconsistency, in the concept of a bilingual federal Canada, on the one hand, and the recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness within Canada, on the other. Today's leaders, and, in my opinion, most Canadians, accept that both linguistic duality and Quebec's distinctiveness are essential and cherished elements of our national identity.

[Translation]

The rights of Canada's native peoples recognized in the Constitution Act of 1982 were maintained in the Constitutional Amendment of 1987.

The pluralism affirmed in the 1867 education provisions was reinforced by the recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage in the Constitution Act of 1982. This recognition will be maintained in the 1987 Accord.

The protection of Quebec's distinct civil law system, first granted in the Quebec Act of 1774 and then in the British North America Act, will be increased in the 1987 Accord by the constitutional provisions on the composition of the Supreme Court, which will ensure in the Constitution that Quebec has at least three seats on the Supreme Court. This guarantee is presently found only in the Supreme Court Act. The Accord also strengthens the protection of Quebec's civil law through provisions relating to appointments to the Court and also the provision relating to the interpretation of the "distinct society."

[English]

Over the years we have done more than preserve or expand the values and realities that shaped Canada's Constitution of 1867.

In 1960 Prime Minister Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights set us on a course of articulating and defining the rights and freedoms Canadians share. The proclamation of the Charter in 1982 completed that process. Nothing in the 1987 amendment will override or supersede that important achievement.

In 1982 First Ministers agreed it was reasonable that the substantive provisions of the Charter should be interpreted in light of our multicultural heritage and of aboriginal rights. In the 1987 Constitutional Accord First Ministers have complemented and extended those recognitions by agreeing that it is equally reasonable that the Charter should be interpreted in light of Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinctiveness.

This is a view which was clearly held by the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. Countering the criticism of those who charged that the accord will thus lead to two Canadas, on September 29, 1987, Mr. Turner said, in the other place:

We do not believe this—meaning the distinct society,

—is a revolutionary concept. We believe we are merely confirming in this Chamber the reality. Quebec does have a distinctive character. Quebec is the only province where French is the language of the majority. There is a different system of law, a unique psychology and a unique history. I do not believe that recognizing that fact in the Constitution is dangerous. I do not believe that it will lead to special status or sovereignty association or in le concept des deux Nations. I believe it is a historical and cultural fact that should be recognized.

In fact, honourable senators, what we have done is to make explicit what has been implicit for 120 years. Underlying the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 respecting Quebec's system of education, its system of civil law, its unique provisions for representation in the Senate, and the use of French and English in the legislatures and courts of Quebec was an implicit assumption that Quebec was and would remain a distinct society within Canada.

Did not Sir John A. Macdonald, in explaining why legislative union had been rejected, say in the Confederation Debates of 1865:

In the first place, it would not meet the assent of the people of Lower Canada because they felt that in their peculiar position—being in a minority, with a different language, nationality and religion from the majority—in case of a junction with the other provinces, their institutions and their laws might be assailed and their ancestral associations, on which they prided themselves attacked and prejudiced; it was found that any proposition which involved the absorption of the individuality of Lower Canada—if I may use the expression—would not be received with favour by her people.

Hon. John B. Stewart: What did he say at that time about the "lower provinces," the Maritime provinces?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend is free to consult the Debates of 1865 on that matter.

Senator Stewart: He said something along the same line. He said that the Maritime provinces, too, had distinct interests and local laws.

Senator Murray: I have no doubt—and I have said myself on many occasions—that my native province, which had its own interest, its own government, its own politics, its own culture, and its own political identity for all these many years, would not have accepted a legislative union.

Senator Stewart: Unless it were recognized as a "distinct society," is that what you are saying?

Senator Murray: I am saying that it would not have accepted a legislative union, for the reasons I have outlined.

I ask my honourable friend to pay heed to the statements of Sir John A. Macdonald, because if they do not define fully what is the distinctiveness of Quebec I think they incorporate some of the essential elements.

Senator Stewart: I know what he said with regard to Quebec; I also know what he said with regard to the Maritime provinces. On the basis of the honourable gentleman's own argument, he is saying that Macdonald regarded both those areas as "distinct societies."

Senator Murray: Well, my honourable friend can make that case if he likes for the interests of debate, but what I said was:

[Translation]

Sir John A. Macdonald's statement may not be a complete definition of what constitutes Quebec's distinct society, but it certainly contains the principal elements. Sir John knew perfectly well that Quebec would not support Confederation if it were to lose its individuality—its distinct identity—in a union with provinces with an English-speaking majority, where the Common Law system prevailed.

By bringing Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family, we are completing the nation-building process that started with the federal union of 1867. Creating this nation was not a simple matter, witness the debate on Confederation, and the fact that Nova Scotia elected separatists to Parliament right after it became a Canadian province.

Subsequent attempts at nation-building were not an easy matter either. Prime Minister Trudeau mentioned these problems in his speech before the other place on March 23, 1981, during the debate on patriation of the Constitution.

He reminded members of the objections raised when Prime Minister St. Laurent decided, without prior discussion in a constitutional forum with the provinces, to abolish appeals to the Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council and to establish the Supreme Court of Canada as the country's court of last resort.

[English]

He reminded the House that Mr. St. Laurent's decision to secure the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation was opposed by some because the provinces had not been consulted; and, indeed, one province, Quebec, was strongly opposed to the terms of union.

He also reminded members that the partial patriation of the Constitution in 1949 was also opposed because the provinces had not been consulted.

Finally, he reminded the House of the acrimony surrounding the flag debate in 1964.

Mr. Trudeau's examples of division that arose during past acts of nation building demonstrates how difficult it is in Canada to secure a broad consensus on the nature, the character and even the symbols of Confederation. That is why the Honourable J.W. Pickersgill and the Honourable Robert Stanfield spoke in identical words of what they saw as the "miracle of Meech Lake." For the first time in Canadian history a major act of nation-building has been achieved not with rancour, bitterness and division but with the unanimous and firm agreement of all First Ministers, supported by the leaders of both opposition parties in the other place. For, as the Honourable Jean-Luc Pépin pointed out during his testimony before the Ontario Select Committee, which is studying the accord:

● (1440)

[Translation]

And I quote:

Seldom have we in Canada had the intelligence to do something about constitutional matters before a crisis arose.

[English]

That is the better way which Prime Minister Mulroney set out as the policy for a Conservative government at Sept-Îles on August 6, 1984, when he said:

We are on the threshold of a true national renewal. Let us replace the bias of confrontation with the bias of agreement, let us open avenues to solutions instead of putting up obstacles, let us listen in order to understand, rather than condemn without hearing.

[Translation]

That was our policy during the past three years. It led to the memorandum of agreement in Regina in February, 1985, on an annual First Ministers' conference on the economy and other matters. It has provided for consultation and created a climate of co-operation and mutual respect between the federal government and the provinces. In fact, Canada has become so peaceful it is hard to remember that only five years ago, another federal government provoked feelings of regional alienation and bitterness such as Canada had never known before.

[English]

Those who believe that federalism is a war dance of the dialectic, a constant struggle between countervailing forces, will have difficulty supporting the accord, because it is not predicated upon strife and a test of strength.

Those who believe that federalism works best when it allows people to achieve common goals together through a national government, while respecting their diversity and regional concerns, will find their philosophy reflected in the accord. As the Honourable Eric Kierans pointed out to the Special Joint Committee:

Meech Lake is not new. It is simply the closest that we have come to following the original intent and meaning of the British North America Act since Confederation. It reflects more accurately the view of what the regional Fathers of Confederation thought they were agreeing to at Confederation.

Honourable senators, this government's approach to federalism is not based on a naive belief that everything will work out in time. It is based on the conviction that people of goodwill must work long and hard to create the proper circumstances for success. Again, at Sept-Îles on August 6, 1984, the Prime Minister said:

... knowing the importance and the complexity of federal-provincial issues, I will not undertake a constitutional path with ambiguity and improvisation. To proceed otherwise would risk making things much worse rather than better. Before putting gestures which risk engaging us, one more time, in an impasse, it is necessary to have precise terms and ground rules and to meet the minimal conditions of success.

[Translation]

Perhaps honourable senators will recall what was at stake in the Quebec Round.

After Quebec was isolated on November 5, 1981, the Quebec National Assembly adopted a resolution rejecting the plan to patriate the Constitution and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Quebec subsequently recognized the legality of the Constitution Act, 1982, but continued to deny its political legitimacy. In fact, until quite recently it had systematically denied that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms applied to the statutes of Quebec, to emphasize the fact that the Constitution Act, 1982, had been imposed on the province without the consent of the Quebec National Assembly.

Some say that Quebec is required by law to respect the Charter and that its signature is not important. I doubt anyone here would say that it makes no difference whether or not one quarter of the population accepts the legitimacy of the fundamental values set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That is certainly not the kind of constitution that could last a thousand years, contrary to what one of our illustrious witnesses said in this chamber.

I may add that Quebec's rejection of the Charter did not in any way reflect a philosophical objection to fundamental rights and freedoms. In fact, the Quebec Charter of Rights is the most comprehensive one in Canada. As William R. Lederman, Professor Emeritus, Faculty of Law, Queen's University, said in his speech before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons:

Our fellow citizens in Quebec are not second to anyone in their belief in, and support of, human rights and fundamental freedoms.

[English]

Under Premier Lévesque, the Parti Québécois government published a proposal in May 1985 for ending Quebec's constitutional isolation from the rest of Canada, but it would have involved the non-application of almost all of the Canadian Charter to Quebec: the rights of Quebecers would derive from a provincial statute, symbolizing a perpetual isolation of Quebecers from the broader Canadian community.

The National Assembly of Quebec, by adopting the constitution amendment of 1987, has embraced the Canadian Charter voluntarily, underlining the values that Quebecers share with all other Canadians. Premier Bourassa and the National Assembly have not asked that the Charter be amended in any respect or that Quebec be exempted from the application of any of its provisions. They have asked only that the Charter be interpreted in the light of the reality of Canada's linguistic duality and of Quebec's distinctiveness, as it is now interpreted in light of Canada's multicultural heritage because of section 27, and in light of aboriginal rights because of section 25. Does this not better reflect Canada "as it is"?

[Translation]

As I said at the beginning of my speech, the accord reinforces the Charter and turns the page on the historic and imperfect agreement of 1982 that patriated the Constitution. As the Honourable Ian Scott, Attorney General of Ontario, said before the provincial legislature on November 25 last year:

The Meech Lake Accord does not compromise the Charter but reflects its solemn and symbolic acceptance by the Government of Quebec.

Consequently, as far as substance is concerned, it is clear the Accord is profoundly inspired by our history and previous constitutional achievements, and that it reflects, without ambiguity, the fundamental principles of federalism.

[English]

In terms of process, honourable senators, First Ministers are proceeding according to the amending formula adopted in the Constitution Act, 1982.

This is why I find so misleading the views of present proponents of amendments to the accord to refer to the 1981-82 exercise as a precedent for last-minute, over-the-telephone amendments. Let us not forget that we are now operating under far different ground rules than we were in 1981-82, when a single phone call between governments would suffice to achieve amendments, since no formal amending formula was in place and only the Joint Address of the Senate and the House of Commons was ultimately required to secure amendments to the Constitution.

Provincial legislative assemblies were not then required to give their constitutional approval to such amendments, but since 1982, under the amending formula then adopted, 11 legislative assemblies now play a very special role. Since the House of Commons, by an overwhelming majority and with the support of all three party leaders, and the Legislative Assemblies of Quebec, Saskatchewan and Alberta have already adopted the accord, any amendment at this stage would require not only the unanimous consent of First Ministers but also new resolutions by the legislative bodies that have already adopted the measure. But weeks of hearings by the Special Joint Committee of the House and Senate, and by the Senate Committee of the Whole, and the testimony and submissions of hundreds of witnesses have revealed no fundamental flaw in the accord which requires amendment. It is, to quote the special joint committee, "a reasonable and workable package of constitutional reforms."

It is also one which has the support of the federalist voices in Quebec, about which our colleague, Senator Grafstein, was inquiring on March 30 in this chamber. Among those voices are the voices of Laurent Picard, Eric Kierans, Yves Fortier, Jean-Luc Pépin, Robert Décary, Gérald Beaudoin, Solange Chaput-Rolland, Raymond Garneau and virtually all Quebec members of Parliament, including André Ouellet and, I trust, in the event, all honourable senators from Quebec and from other provinces as well. As Madame Solange Chaput-Rolland commented to the special joint committee:

Prime Minister Mulroney promised a reconciliation between the provinces and his government, between Quebec and Ottawa, between separatism and federalism. He has kept his word; it has not been said enough: he has kept his word—

Twice in the past eight years—in the referendum of 1980 and at Meech Lake in 1987—Quebec has said "Yes" to Canada. It is now for the rest of Canada to say "Yes" to Quebec. It is now for the Senate to join with the other chamber of our federal Parliament in saying "Yes" to Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will recall May 5, 1987, almost one year ago, when the conclusion of the Meech Lake Accord was announced in the Senate. Senator Flynn, understandably, expressed his "profound joy" at this development and ventured the opinion that, outside of "extreme centralizers and separatists," there would be general acceptance. On that occasion I expressed the view that the atmosphere of euphoria which affected us all on that occasion would likely be more restrained as a deeper understanding was reached on the contents of the Meech Lake Accord. Almost one year later the Parliament of Canada has yet to complete its consideration of the accord, and a number of provinces have either not yet begun or have not yet completed their consideration of the accord. It certainly would take an optimist to predict that the accord will be the law of the land before the next election. So we are discussing this evolution in our constitutional history at a very strategic moment.

The decision on the accord which we are about to take has been preceded by a joint committee of both houses, by hearings of the Committee of the Whole of the Senate, a special task force to Northern Canada, and a special submissions group which heard evidence to assist the Committee of the Whole. We certainly can say that the Senate took this question very seriously and did its homework in an exhaustive way. All along, we on this side have fully supported the objective of achieving Quebec's assent to the Constitution. Quebec is now willing to accept it and anxious again to take its full part in the constitutional process. We welcome this move, because it is of great significance to our future.

Prime constitutional and political objectives have been attained, and this achievement should not be obscured in our consideration of what made it possible. However, this having been said, we share the opinion of the joint committee of the Senate and of the other place when they stated in their report, "we do not accept the idea that any agreement that brings Quebec 'into the constitutional family' must a fortiori be a good agreement." We do not accept either that the end justifies the means. The Constitutional Accord of 1987 has to be valued on its own merits, and this evaluation calls for an understanding of Quebec's proposals, of their formulation in the relevant provisions of the accord and of Quebec's interpretation of these provisions.

It is interesting to recall that the first questions asked in the Senate following the announcement had to do with the concept of the "distinct society." That is understandable in the light of subsequent history and in the light of subsequent concerns and analyses of the implications of the introduction of this concept as a rule of interpretation into the Canadian Constitution. One thing I think we can say is that since that initial announcement our understanding of both the legal and political implications of the application of this new rule of interpretation has certainly been deepened, broadened and enhanced, if you wish. Everything that I have heard since that time has convinced me that it is a major innovation with major consequences for the future.

If that is a fact of life, the Canadian government should stop being ambivalent about it. It has been made abundantly clear by the drafters of the agreement that the expression "distinct society" carries a meaning in ordinary language to anyone familiar with the Quebec scene, but they deliberately avoided defining the phrase in the accord. Mr. Bourassa said:

We did not want to define [distinct society] precisely in order to avoid reducing the National Assembly's role in promoting this specificity.

Senator Murray made somewhat the same point before the joint committee. He said:

We decided not to define Quebec's distinct society more clearly . . . It would be easy to draw up a list . . . but that list might unduly limit the concept itself. The Constitution is a living and evolving instrument.

Senator Murray also said:

there is nothing new in a constitution containing general concepts expressed in broad terms.

The argument is clear: the reality of Quebec will continue to evolve, as it has done over the past 50 years and earlier. The "distinct society" clause reflects a Quebec reality now. It may reflect a different reality in the future. The Canadian Constitution will be interpreted by the courts through a process of double interpretation. The courts will first have to define the "distinct society" and what the "distinct society" means in the light of the particular circumstances prevailing at the time in Quebec. The courts will then have to interpret the Constitution in the light of their own construction of the meaning of "distinct society."

● (1500)

If the drafters of the accord have refrained from a definition of "distinct society," they have, however, given assurance that they can easily describe what constitutes the specificity of Quebec. According to Senator Murray:

. . . we all know that we can quickly draw up a list of those characteristics that describe Quebec . . . it would be easy to draw up a list.

The Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs has provided a more precise sketch of Quebec's specificity. He said:

. . . it is evident that we know why (Quebec) is recognized to be distinct, by its language, by its culture, but also by its way of being and its way of life.

Of course, Mr. Rémillard also referred to the social, cultural, economic and historical dimensions of the concept of the "distinct society."

It is hoped that the courts, which will have to define what is the "distinct society" in the light of circumstances at some future time, will find it equally "easy" and "evident," but for us who have to pass judgment now "distinct society" is clearly an evolving and undefined concept, because such is the way in which it was deliberately written into the accord.

If grasping the scope of an open-ended concept raises a challenge for us, it will also be a challenge for the National Assembly and the Government of Quebec, because they have the responsibility under the accord to promote this open-ended concept. Quebec's National Assembly and government will promote Quebec's specificity. As they move from concept to reality, their perception of "la spécificité québécoise" is clearly that of a dynamic notion reflecting a dynamic society. The constitutionality of their actions, if challenged, will later be tested in the courts in the light of the very specificity which, paradoxically, these actions will be in the process of creating.

We know, honourable senators, that nothing is distinct in itself and by itself but only in relation to other things. The distinctive character of Quebec will be defined through Quebec's difference from the rest of Canada. The promotion of this difference, whatever it may turn out to be in the future, will be written into the Canadian Constitution as a beacon for its interpretation.

The Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs has, here again, stated unambiguously what he perceived to be the effect of the accord. I quote from the proceedings of the National Assembly of June 19, 1987, when he said:

The recognition in the constitution that this country, Canada, is based on two founding peoples, two national communities, French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians, two equal peoples which form what we call the principle of Canadian duality. That is a notion we have acknowledged for a long time in Quebec . . . that is a reality now.

Honourable senators, it is absolutely clear that Quebec alone is being recognized as a "distinct society," a point made with much emphasis by the Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. He said:

There are not two, three, four or five provinces which have been recognized to be distinct societies. There is only one, Quebec.

The Premier of Quebec made an even more telling statement when he said:

Questions have been raised about what would happen to the right of self-determination of Quebec. I answered . . . that the Liberal Party had recognized that right and still recognized that right. Indeed there is in Quebec's free and willing move to adhere to the 1982 Constitutional Act a particular expression of the Quebec people's right of self-determination.

Honourable senators, these statements are now part of the legislative history of the 1987 Constitutional Accord and shed light on Quebec's position and objectives.

The "principle of duality," intentionally mentioned by the Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, has a long history. The report of the joint committee appropriately noted that the Supreme Court of Canada had taken cognizance of such arguments in the Quebec Veto case. I refer to the joint committee report at page 36. The right of self-determination of nations has an even longer history, and the assertion of that right has, for many, paved the way to autonomy and independence. It is not surprising, therefore, that the joint committee noted, at page 43 of its report, the concern of some witnesses who argued that:

. . . the recognition of Quebec as a "distinct society" means that Canada is being redefined as a country composed with individuals, not even of 10 provinces plus the northern territories, but of two nations.

I should say, honourable senators, that the concerns of such witnesses should not be dismissed lightly. Maybe these witnesses have a better insight into Quebec's view of the Constitutional Accord than the Government of Canada. Their concerns will not be allayed by the somewhat changing statements made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and other spokesmen for the government.

There is no need to repeat that the "distinct society" clause is an interpretative clause and that the division of powers under our Constitution is not changed by the accord. This is well understood, and this is not the issue; but if the powers are unchanged, the exercise of these powers is a matter for judgment and for interpretation. The insertion of guidance for interpretation into the Constitution is, by itself, a recognition that there is room for interpretation and change.

Senator Murray, in a sense, detonated the first bombshell in this chamber by posing and then answering the following questions:

Will that give Quebec greater room to manoeuvre, more authority in order to protect, promote and preserve the distinctiveness of its society? Of course it will. Will it be used as an argument before the courts with regard to language legislation? Of course it will.

As a constitutional expert, Professor Beaudoin attested to its significance by insisting that, as a new rule of interpretation—and only as a rule of interpretation—it was "important . . . fundamental . . ." and ". . . it can in certain cases in particular under Section 1 of the Charter and in grey areas concerning the distribution of powers give more weight to certain arguments."

The joint committee itself was quite explicit in asserting that, as a rule of interpretation by the courts, it could and would likely have the effect of allocating and classifying subject matters to heads of jurisdiction—federal and provincial.

● (1510)

I draw to your attention the fact that Mr. Rémillard, in the debates of the National Assembly of June 19, 1987, analyzed how the use of the "distinct society" provision would assist Quebec in acquiring more clout, jurisdiction over broadcasting and credit unions, and added, as an additional example, the matter of international relations; and the latter point, namely, international relations, attracted my interest, because one of the first thoughts that occurred to me, sitting on this side of the house, as I heard about the Meech Lake Accord, was that if Quebec were authentically to express its distinctiveness, no one could do it better than Quebec itself abroad—and Mr. Rémillard, as if he had wanted to answer my question, made the following comment in the National Assembly:

We must be able to express our specificity on the international plane and here we have the possibility of grounding our competence—relating to international matters on a clear rule of interpretation.

The Quebec minister has underlined what ought to be evident to all, namely, that the "distinct society" gives new and additional potential through the judicial system for increasing the authority of Quebec.

That is the fact, and one might ask this question, just building upon that analysis of Mr. Rémillard's, with respect, for example, to the caisses populaires or the credit unions which he analyzed: Suppose that the Supreme Court of Canada accepts the projected argument of the Government of Quebec that the credit unions, with respect to the banking function, might, ought or could be brought under the provincial jurisdiction because of the "distinct society" clause, what would we do with the resulting situation: credit unions in Quebec with respect to banking functions because of the "distinct society" provision under provincial jurisdiction, and the banking function of credit unions in all other provinces under federal jurisdiction?

Those are some of the issues which have been raised by the government which formulated the provisions, which accepted those provisions, which had asserted those provisions as constituting a win for Quebec—and, honourable senators, I do not think that we should go into the situation armed only with soft assurances of the Leader of the Government.

Those are some of the potential legal implications that have been asserted by the Leader of the Government, by the joint committee, by constitutional experts, and analyzed in a political context by the Quebec minister. There are, of course, political implications also. I do not think it is necessary to tell experienced politicians that when they wish to argue aggressively a particular point they will use the weapons at hand—and what better weapon than the "distinct society" clause that ministers in Quebec understandably will use in the future to expand their reach in a variety of ways? I believe that would happen to a minister in any province. It is no reflection. But in this case Quebec has it and no other province will have it.

I think that it is so self-evident to politicians that it may be unnecessary to quote one or two witnesses; but perhaps I will quote from Professor Breton's testimony when, in Committee of the Whole, he said that the "distinct society" clause would become part of the political jargon of Quebec. He said:

... it can be used virtually in every domain in terms of the promotion of what will be defined by any government in Quebec at any time as being within its purview.

Later he said:

That clause will be used on all issues, whether they are closely related or only very remotely related to the distinctness of Quebec, precisely because nobody knows what makes the distinct character of a society.

The importance of this matter also derives from the recognition of the role the Legislature and the Government of Quebec must play in promoting the "distinct society." There is not only scope for change; there is a role to achieve change. Both have to be read together, and the most reliable interpretation of this scope and role must surely come from the Quebec government which designed and put forward the proposal. It is the Quebec government that had to be satisfied with its import in order to make it a condition for its acceptance of the Canadian Constitution.

It is the Quebec government which will shape the measures to promote the "distinct society," and the Quebec Premier, it seems to me, struck the right note when he said:

There is no doubt that Quebec comes out a winner from this constitutional operation... Quebec will at least have its place in the Constitution and this place will be one of honour.

One does not complain that any province, including Quebec, has a place of honour and is a winner. No one complains about that. May I read the next paragraph:

One must underline that the whole constitution including the Charter will be interpreted and applied in the light of this article on the distinct society. The exercise of legislative authority is included and we will thus be able to consolidate existing positions and make new gains.

When one has read the statements of the Quebec Premier and his minister, with the authority they have on the subject, one is not greatly helped by reading the testimony of the Deputy Minister of Justice and the Deputy Attorney General of Canada when he appeared before the joint committee and stated:

Under section 1 of the Charter, it is open to the Courts to take a provincial piece of legislation and to interpret it according to the particular circumstances that relate to that province and to that piece of legislation.

That seems fairly obvious. I will read the second paragraph:

To the extent the distinctive society clause reflects a reality of Canada, a court will be doing no differently from what it presently could do under the charter in section 1 and under the jurisprudence that has developed.

That certainly strikes a different note from that struck by the Premier of Quebec. While the remarks of the Deputy Minister of Justice were being made in the context of the Charter, they are equally applicable to those parts of the Constitution not withdrawn by article 16 of the accord from the "distinct society" interpretative clause. Are we to understand from the words of the Deputy Minister of Justice that the division of powers under the Constitution will not be affected and that the courts will behave no differently than they do now? If that is the case, why would the Premier of Quebec proclaim Quebec a winner? Nothing has been achieved except, in the words of the Deputy Attorney General, "the confirmation of the pre-existing status quo."

In the circumstances, and when we hear these contradictory analyses from those who were closest to the operation, we can understand why some people have suggested a reference of the phrase "distinct society" to the Supreme Court for interpretation at the earliest possible date. An important reference was made to the Supreme Court during the patriation process. The "distinct society" clause is already giving rise to divergent interpretations. It would be helpful to have the authoritative advice of the Supreme Court for the benefit of those legislatures which still have to pass judgment on the accord.

But I suggest, honourable senators, that no legal sophistry should hide the fact that with the accord we are bringing under one constitutional roof two divergent visions of Canada. On the one hand, there is the principle of duality, which Mr. Rémillard called "a reality now," and described as embodying "two founding peoples, two national communities, two equal peoples." That is the vision that Mr. Rémillard sees in the accord. On the other hand, there is the vision of a multicultural and bilingual society.

The Leader of the Government has taken the view that these visions are "compatible and complementary." I do not think he understands, if I may say so, because he could not have made such an egregious error in that comment.

Senator Frith: What sort of an error was that?

Senator MacEachen: An egregious error, and that is a special error. The Leader of the Government has taken the view that these visions are "compatible and complementary," and that "the conflict exists only in Mr. Trudeau's mind." As I said, I think the leader has failed to grasp the meaning of Mr. Rémillard's statement, or he is ignoring a great deal of Canadian history.

So it would appear to me that we are attempting to house within the accord two visions of Canada, and, of course, there is no return from the steps we are being asked to take. If we expect these steps that we are taking, or are being asked to take, will lead to harmony, then we must see to it that these visions do not clash or diverge or take such extreme forms as to divide the country. We must not, for the sake of bringing the country together now, sow the seeds of future division. It will call for a very strong framework to support both visions and still keep the nation together.

It may be, honourable senators, that the drafters of the accord at one moment sensed a potential difficulty and that, indeed, they might have been on a slippery slope and attempted to save themselves and save the nation by adding the provision of "the linguistic duality of Canada."

The drafters of the accord must have made that very judgment when they designed the provision concerning the linguistic characteristic of Canada. That was not one of Quebec's proposals. The language provision in the accord is clearly meant to be read in conjunction with the "distinct society" clause. Both are made principles of interpretation, applicable to the whole of the Constitution. The courts will have to bear in mind the existence of linguistic minorities in Quebec and in the rest of Canada when they use the "distinct society" clause as a principle of interpretation. That means that a limitation has been placed on the "distinct society" clause. It cannot have the effect of creating a unilingual society in any province in Canada. However, it has been of interest to me to observe that Article 2.1 of the accord is certainly not symmetrical, and there must be a purpose to this asymmetry. First, the existence of linguistic majorities and minorities in certain parts of our territory is recognized as constituting a fundamental characteristic of Canada. But the fact that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society is not regarded as a fundamental characteristic. It will be a matter for the courts to interpret this discrepancy, which, so far, has not received any satisfactory explanation.

More significantly, the role of the Legislature and Government of Quebec to promote the distinct society is recognized, but the role of the Parliament of Canada and of provincial legislatures, as recognized in the accord, is only to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada. That is more than a discrepancy; it amounts to a statement of intent and of policy. The bottom line, as Senator Murray has stated, was that the provinces were not prepared to accept more, and that this was part of the saw-off which produced the package.

Honourable senators, I think we ought to acknowledge that we live in a country which recognizes the immense contribution to our identity and our quality of life by all minorities, wherever they may be. It is, therefore, deplorable that some provinces do not recognize the role for their legislatures in promoting improvement for our linguistic minorities. What I find particularly disquieting is the abdication by the Government of Canada of its responsibilities for promoting bilingualism in this country.

Section 2(2) of the accord spells out in constitutional language the role of the Parliament of Canada with respect to bilingualism. The Government of Canada is asking the Senate, part of the Parliament of Canada, to confirm a role vis-à-vis what is described as a "fundamental characteristic of Canada," which is less than what is expected of the Legislature and Government of Quebec vis-à-vis the distinct society. The proposition that the Canadian Parliament should preserve but not promote one of the most important instruments of binding this country together—that is, our ability to communicate across linguistic lines—is a proposition that is unacceptable and shameful. It flies against principles of policies which have been pursued by successive Parliaments, and it does so at a time when the acknowledgment of Quebec as a distinct society calls for a vision in which Quebec should be made to feel increasingly at ease within our federation, and our federation should be made increasingly at ease with a distinct Quebec.

Honourable senators, we have also discovered that the euphoria of May 1987 has been somewhat affected by two additional factors, the first being the refusal of the new Government of New Brunswick to adhere to the Meech Lake Accord; the second, the recent action of the Government of Saskatchewan in restricting the language rights of its French-speaking minority.

In his testimony before the Committee of the Whole Senator Murray had no solution to offer for the New Brunswick situation. He said it is not a bilateral matter between Ottawa and New Brunswick, it was sort of a Lenten Pontius Pilate act, appropriately on Holy Thursday. He admitted no responsibility at the suggestion that the Government of Canada should take the lead in attempting to reconcile the diverging views of the Government of New Brunswick and the governments of the other provinces.

● (1530)

On May 5, a year ago, when Senator Murray announced the Meech Lake Accord, he said:

In short, the Accord is an eloquent demonstration of the government's commitment to make national reconciliation a basic principle of our political and constitutional existence.

Well, as a basic principle, national reconciliation has obviously been abandoned insofar as New Brunswick is concerned. In the case of New Brunswick, pressure is substituted for reconciliation.

On that same day in May of 1987, in commenting on the Meech Lake Accord and in explaining his vote against the Constitution Act, 1982, Senator Macquarrie stated:

At that time I took the view that we could not have a nine-province Constitution for a ten-province country.

Today in Canada nine provinces have adhered to the Meech Lake Accord and one province has refused its adherence, yet the Government of Canada is not prepared to resolve this impasse in a constructive way. It confines itself to issuing warnings of foreboding to the Premier of New Brunswick. Today we heard again an enunciation of the principle of equality of the provinces. Well, does that equality apply to the province of New Brunswick? Should its views not be heard and reconciled so that it can become part of the ten-province Constitution?

A second development that certainly sent political shock waves through Canada was the new law affecting the rights of the French-speaking minority in the province of Saskatchewan. The citizens of that province, even though the province has passed the Meech Lake Accord, have not found any solace in its implementation. In fact, the provisions of the accord have been ineffectual. Substituted for it now are persuasion and negotiation to try to correct the situation rather than to rely on the authoritative statement of the Meech Lake Accord that the provincial legislatures were obligated to preserve the rights of linguistic minorities.

Honourable senators, I have a few more comments to make on a number of the remaining provisions of the accord. I should say at this point that my colleague, Senator Frith, will deal later in the debate with a number of aspects of the accord, including aboriginal rights, multiculturalism, the economic union, the Senate, the Supreme Court of Canada, the amending formula, and the annual conferences. I, however, would like to deal with two more aspects of the accord before I conclude. One has to do with the spending power, the other has to do with the Charter of Rights.

When Senator Flynn mentioned that those who would oppose the accord would be confined to a couple of categories, I think he failed to anticipate the concern that has been expressed by a number of voluntary organizations and independent persons in this country about the potential of the new provisions on the spending power to weaken the federation. That concern certainly had to do with the expression "national objectives," among other things. Perhaps I should read the section so that honourable senators can follow the context. The words of section 7 read, in part:

The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

As I said, the use of the expression "national objectives" has caused considerable concern. Senator Murray attempted to deal with this concern before the joint committee when he said:

What do we mean by national objectives? We mean the underlying purposes for which Parliament puts the program in place. . . . What are the national objectives of medicare? Universality, accessibility, portability. Now, that is the kind of thing I mean about national objectives.

He then continued:

So when you talk about standards, I talk about objectives; when somebody else talks about criteria, I talk about objectives—and I do not want us to fall into any semantic traps.

Of course, Senator Murray's effort to equate objectives to underlying purposes, criteria and standards failed not only to satisfy those who had concerns but failed to take into account dictionary definitions and the history of shared-cost programs in Canada in which certain terms took on a special meaning and context.

Among the witnesses on this point was the Ad Hoc Committee of Manitoba Women's Equality-Seeking Groups on the Meech Lake Accord, which made the following observation:

Clause 3, dealing with immigration, uses the term "national standards and objectives". Clause 7—that is, the spending power clause,

—omits the word "standards". Such omissions may well be interpreted as significant and deliberate.

Honourable senators, if the courts were to interpret "objectives" as meaning "standards," as Senator Murray would have us believe, then we must ask what they would do with clause 3, the immigration clause, which contains both words "standards" and "objectives." It is clear that though it may be acceptable for a casual comment in early mid-summer to treat "objectives" as meaning "standards," it would hardly be satisfactory to ask the courts to do so.

Subsequently, when the members of the joint committee—including the colleagues of Senator Murray in the chamber—adjudicated upon this point, they certainly parted company with his interpretation. The joint committee agreed that the phrase "the national objectives" does not equate with the phrase "national standards." It goes on to say: "Given the language of proposed section 95B.(2) (which is the immigration section of the Accord) it would be impossible to equate objectives with standards." That is the point to which I referred as emanating from the Women's Equality-Seeking Groups of Manitoba. The members of the committee then went on to say:

Nor can it be said that the "national objectives" can be equated with conditions or criteria, as exemplified by the Canada Health Act.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the testimony given in this chamber by Al Johnson, whom I regard as an extremely well qualified witness because of his background. His testimony added to our concern by his claim that:

... you can be as clear as you want about national objectives without establishing criteria.

Well, an "objective" is not a "criterion." Further on he stated that:

The word "objective" does not mean the same thing as "principle". . .

as is used in the Canada Health Act.

● (1540)

Numerous witnesses attacked the vagueness of the term "objectives" which, when combined with the preceding expression—namely, an initiative or program compatible with national objectives—makes a very weak situation indeed. We know what the word "objective" means. It is not a standard; it is not a criterion. These are the expressions that have been formally used in shared-cost programs.

The term "compatible" in French can mean capable of existing alongside; it could also mean consistent. I think one can really conclude this portion of the comment on the spending power by quoting a few paragraphs from the testimony of Professor Albert Johnson, followed by Dr. Forsey. Dr. Forsey had the merit of analyzing the meaning of the words and the meaning of the context rather than the general observations we have heard from quite a number of witnesses before the joint committee. There is quite a difference between opinion and analysis. We got analysis from Professor Johnson, and we got analysis from Dr. Forsey.

In Debates of the Senate of March 16, 1988, Professor Johnson said the following:

Now Meech Lake says "compatible with national objectives." One is forced to wonder why there is the choice of the word "objectives" and the apparent discarding of the vocabulary of shared-cost programs and spending power, which are governed by the same principles. I think the change weakens it. An objective is the object of an action.

One also has to ask about the word "compatible."

He then goes on to define the word "compatible" along the same lines that I have. He concludes with this very succinct summary:

So a province may opt out of a new shared-cost program provided it has something which is capable of living alongside the end object of the program. I say that weakens it.

[Senator MacEachen.]

In reply to Senator Murray, if there is fundamental flaw in this document of Meech Lake, it is the spending power. That is where the fundamental flaw lies, because it will be impossible for the national government ever to launch a program such as Medicare. We can forget about it. I can tell you that from my own experience.

Recently I heard quite an accidental comment from a former colleague of Senator Murray, Senator Paul Martin. Quite out of the blue, he said, "With Meech Lake, national health insurance would have been impossible," and I believe that is the case. So loose have the words become and so easy have the conditions become that the social programs, if ever launched in the country, will be differentiated among the various provinces.

Perhaps that is what is desired. Perhaps that is the ultimate goal of the government, which wants to have variations which would inevitably have occurred if this provision had been in effect when Medicare was introduced. We would not have had the Medicare we have today under that kind of loose wording.

I would like to refer to what Dr. Forsey said when he analysed the spending power. He related "objectives" to programs or initiatives. In Debates of the Senate dated October 21, 1987, Dr. Forsey said the following:

Other people have pointed out that it might apply to pollution. For instance, with regard to pollution, there might be a national objective to get rid of pollution. Everybody will say, "Oh, yes, that is fine." The government here might say, "We are prepared to make certain grants to the provinces if they adopt certain pollution measures."

So the government would attempt to lay down a standard, so to speak, to achieve its objective. Dr. Forsey goes on to say:

But the provinces might do a "Reagan", and say, "We have an initiative, a program of our own involving research and incentives."

That is a program compatible with the objective of ending the pollution in the country, but it is certainly not a remedial program or an abatement program. This same point has been made by many others in the course of our hearings. It is not as if the objection to the spending power has been confined to persons such as Dr. Forsey and Professor Johnson.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women told us:

We are concerned that after the Accord is in force, the exercising of federal spending power could lead to the balkanization of social services. Balkanization is a generous word to use because the assumption is that it would exist everywhere. What it would mean is that some provinces would have certain services and others would not, resulting in inequality.

There is also evidence from the National Union of Provincial Government Employees, submitted by Larry Brown, who said:

It is not at all clear that we will ever be able to have new programs in new areas, such as day care. It is not clear that we would have been able to enforce the ban against extra billing that the federal government was able to enforce previously.

The Executive Director of the Canadian Association of Social Workers told us:

We are really fearful that that clause will not allow for strong national programs to develop in the future.

We will be proposing an amendment to section 7, which we trust will remove this fundamental flaw and establish a system in Canada that will permit the federal government, in conjunction with the provinces, to establish social programs that have common standards and common application in every region of Canada. That is part of the sharing that the minister pointed out was first mentioned in 1867, but which has been neglected in this particular formulation.

Our amendment would recognize and affirm that Canadians in all parts of the country are deserving of some measure of equality with respect to programs funded by their federal government, and that the national Parliament and the national government will not lose the role that it had in the past.

Honourable senators, I think it would be important to point out now that for many people one of the most difficult aspects of the accord is its relationship to our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Senator Murray assured us, during his presentation before the Committee of the Whole, that:

As an interpretation clause, the "linguistic duality-distinct society" clause will not override, take away or supersede the substantive rights set out in the Charter . . .

That assurance deserves analysis both by reference to his key words—override, take away or supersede—and by reference to paragraph 16 of the accord.

Let us take paragraph 16 first. Paragraph 16 states that nothing in the "distinct society/linguistic duality" section of the accord affects the aboriginal or multicultural rights contained in the Charter. Many witnesses commented that by specifically mentioning these exemptions, rules of statutory interpretation would lead to the conclusion that the other provisions of the Charter are not exempt and can be affected by this new interpretative clause of the accord.

The Canadian Teachers' Federation made the point quite clearly before the Submissions Group, as follows:

. . . in explicitly excluding these provisions of the Charter, the text of the Accord creates the assumption that all other rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter would be subject to the provisions of the Accord . . . there is reason to wonder whether the courts will find that all of the rights and freedoms guaranteed under the Charter enjoy the same status as they did prior to the signing of the Accord—

• (1550)

It should be remembered that Senator Murray, I think carefully, used such words as "override, take away or supersede." He has been careful to avoid saying that nothing in that clause affects the Charter. Paragraph 16 of the accord does not use any of Senator Murray's words; it says "affects," which is a much broader term that implies immunity in the context it is used.

Of course, most concerned about the Charter implications of the accord are women's groups. When they appeared before our Submissions Group, the National Association of Women and the Law and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women both expressed fear that there was being created "a hierarchy of rights." Louise Dulude of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women went so far as to say that:

In this hierarchy of rights women will be below multicultural and native rights, and the lowest of all will be the doubly-disadvantaged groups, such as disabled women, visible minority immigrant women and native women.

We are deeply concerned about the implication of this particular provision. We hope to respond to the concerns that have been expressed by the citizens of Canada before the Senate. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as has been pointed out so frequently, is for the benefit of individual Canadians, wherever they may be found. It is of such fundamental importance that any attempt to dilute it must be opposed by those who believe that individuals do possess certain inherent rights. It is for this reason that among the amendments which we propose we will be calling for the exemption of the entire Charter from the clauses of the accord.

Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate for me to say that we will, in fact, be proposing a number of amendments to the resolution now before the Senate. We will be proposing amendments to remove the fundamental flaw relating to the spending power; to exempt the Charter from the application of the accord; and a certain number of other amendments to which I will refer before I conclude.

We have not been able to accept as ironclad guarantees the assurances that have been made from time to time by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Not that we charge that these assurances have been ill-intentioned, but because the statements which they make, in a matter of this importance, have absolutely no standing whatsoever in law. We would like, while we have the opportunity to do so, some of these assurances converted into clear language in the Meech Lake resolution.

We do not intend to strike down the accord. We are not proposing to vote against it. We are suggesting ways of improving it in order to benefit all Canadians. We believe that Canadians deserve a constitution that strikes a balance between certainty and flexibility. The changes that we are proposing are intended to achieve this balance.

I will now summarize the amendments, which I will propose later and circulate. In making this summary I can do no better than repeat the words of our leader, the Right Honourable John Turner, when he spoke on these identical amendments in the House of Commons on September 29, 1987. He said:

First, we want to include as fundamental characteristics of Canada . . . the recognition of our aboriginal peoples, the recognition of the multicultural mosaic of Canada and the recognition of the regional identities and the advantage of lower trade barriers between the provinces . . .

Second, we want to offer more protection to official language minorities by ensuring that Parliament is responsible for promoting as well as preserving official minority language rights.

We want to offer every province the opportunity to commit its legislature to promoting as well as preserving our linguistic duality.

Third, we also propose that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms take precedence, in order that the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians are not diminished by possible conflict with other clauses in the Accord. Especially the rights to equality for women . . .

Fourth, we believe in an elected Senate . . .

Our proposal would accelerate the move from an appointed Senate to an elected Senate by electing senators now when vacancies occur rather than appointing them based on provincial lists . . . Also, given our amendment, it would recognize the right of the citizens of the Yukon and Northwest Territories to senatorial election . . .

Five, we believe . . . that the Accord clauses dealing with the appointment of Supreme Court justices from provincial lists could lead to an impasse between the federal and provincial Governments. We have therefore suggested a solution that would ensure that at all times the Supreme Court has a complement of justices, and that would protect the basic rights of Northern Canadians, by granting their Governments the same rights as provinces have to nominate candidates to the Court.

Sixth, we propose that the clause concerning compensation for provinces opting out of national shared cost programs be clarified to ensure greater national consistency in programs available to all Canadians, and to ensure that minimum standards are met by provinces in order to claim compensation for opting out of such programs . . .

Seventh, we propose to eliminate the rigid unanimity provision for Senate reform and return to the seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population formula . . .

We also suggest that the eventual provincehood of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and extension of existing provincial boundaries into those territories, should that ever happen, be resolved solely by the federal Government and the territory in question.

Senator Murray: Pre-1982!

Senator MacEachen: In reference to a final point he stated:

Eighth, with regard to future constitutional conferences, we propose to make aboriginal rights a priority.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, it is our view that these amendments clarify and improve the accord and, when and if accepted, would lead to our full support in the subsequent vote on an amended and improved Meech Lake resolution. These amendments reflect the testimony we received in the Committee of the Whole in this chamber, in the Submissions Group and in the North of Canada. They reflect the views of Canadians who were concerned enough and interested enough to come forward and share with us their thoughts. Also, as I have said, they reflect fully the views of the Leader of the Liberal Party, the Right Honourable John Turner, as contained in the identical amendments which he moved in the House of Commons. I hope that the government will appreciate that by accepting and actually promoting these amendments it would win the support of many concerned Canadians, and that the Meech Lake Accord would be truly strengthened.

Honourable senators, I have made available to members of this chamber copies of my motion in amendment in both English and French. During my comments this afternoon I have summarized the amendments, and if honourable senators would spare me the burden of reading them again, I would be grateful.

Senator Flynn: May I ask if there is only one motion?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, it is one single amending motion.

Senator Flynn: You are asking the Senate to vote on all of these amendments at the same time?

Senator MacEachen: Yes.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: There is a motion in amendment of Senator Murray's original motion. It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the motion be amended as follows:

(a) in paragraph 1 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 2.(1) and substituting the following therefor:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

(c) the recognition that aboriginal peoples constitute a distinctive and fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(d) the recognition of the multicultural nature of Canadian society, and in particular respect for the many origins, creeds and cultures as well as the differing regional identities that helped shape Canadian society; and

(e) the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union."

(b) in paragraph 1 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 2.(2) and substituting the following therefor:

"2(a) The role of the Parliament of Canada to preserve and promote, and the role of the provincial legislatures to preserve and, subject to subparagraph (2)(b) to promote, the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph 1(a) is affirmed.

(b) The role of a province in relation to promotion applies from the time it is adopted by a resolution of the legislative assembly of that province."

(c) in paragraph 2 of the Schedule by deleting section 25 and substituting the following therefor:

"25. Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, and until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the government of Canada shall, within six months after the vacancy occurs, call an election in the province or territory to which the vacancy relates for the purpose of filling that vacancy, and, notwithstanding the provision of section 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867, for a term of nine years."

(d) in paragraph 6 of the Schedule by deleting subsections 101C.(1) and (2) and substituting the following therefor:

"101C.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province and the elected government of each territory may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province or territory and are qualified under section 101B. for appointment to that court."

(2) Subject to subsection (5), where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

(e) in paragraph 6 of the Schedule by adding immediately after subsection 101C.(4) the following:

"(5) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) and, if within a period of three months, no name which has been submitted under subsection (1) is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the Chief Justice may make an interim one-year appointment from among justices of the Federal Court of Canada or provincial Superior Courts."

(f) in paragraph 7 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 106A.(1) and substituting the following therefor:

"106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Parliament of Canada after the coming into force of this section, in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a compatible program which meets minimum national standards."

(g) by deleting paragraphs 9, 10, 11 and 12 of the Schedule and substituting the following therefor:

"9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers legislative powers from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province was entitled to be represented on April 17, 1982;

(c) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(d) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(e) the Supreme Court of Canada; and

(f) an amendment to this Part.

42.(1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

(a) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators; and

(b) the number of members by which a province or territory is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators.

(2) Subsections 38(2) to (4) do not apply in respect of amendments in relation to matters referred to in subsection (1)."

"42A. Notwithstanding subsection 42(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the establishment of new provinces and the extension of existing provinces into territories shall be a matter exclusively for the Governor General in Council and the elected government of the territory affected."

(h) in paragraph 13 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 50.(2) and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

(a) the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including self-government;

(b) Senate reform, including the role and functions of the Senate, its powers, the method of selecting Senators and representation in the Senate;

(c) roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries at the first meeting only; and

(d) such other matters as agreed upon."

(i) by deleting paragraph 16 of the Schedule and substituting the following therefor:

"16. Nothing in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 derogates from any of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or affects Part II of the Constitution Act, 1982."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I should like to raise a procedural point of order. I do not know whether I am speaking to the amendment or to the main motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Or both.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I might have a few comments to make.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, Mr. Speaker, both motions are now before the Senate. Remarks may relate to both at the same time. As to repetition or the right to speak twice on a question before the Senate, I believe we can agree on the possibility of speaking on both subjects at the same time without making a distinction between the two.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, this creates a problem because in this case Senator Simard's wish to speak now is legitimate. The principle is that he would speak to the amendments now before the Senate.

If Senator Frith is suggesting that it matters little whether he speaks to the amendments or to the main motion, this suggestion has a certain significance because of the fact that once the amendment has been disposed of Senator Simard may again speak to the main motion should he want to. Of course Senator Simard may opt for exercising his right to speak now to the amendments and the main motion, but his right to rise again on the main motion once the amendments have been disposed of cannot be excluded. That issue has not been resolved.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think if we want we can grant the right to speak to both motions at the same time. Then if a senator wants to rise on the main motion we can also extend the same right at that time. I want to avoid a senator rising to say: I am now speaking to the amendments. In this case we have the resolution before us, the resolution in amendment. Should the situation described by Senator Corbin arise, we could decide right then whether we are prepared to give the right to speak a second time on the main resolution. We can solve the problem that way if it turns out to be real.

Senator Corbin: I understand the spirit in which Senator Frith is making this suggestion. The decision is not ours, rules and precedents are there and we must respect them. We cannot deny Senator Simard the right to rise a second time on the main motion if he wants to. We have to acknowledge that possibility now. If Senator Simard speaks now we cannot say that he will not be able to rise again on the main motion once the Senate has disposed of the amendments. That is the only point I am making.

Senator Simard: If I may . . .

Senator Frith: It would not be accurate to say that we are totally ruled by the regulations. It is clear that, in the Senate at least, we can decide unanimously to let our decision prevail. That is clear. And that is what I suggested. If we agree to that procedure which I suggested is perfectly acceptable in the Senate.

Senator Corbin: I think that proposal could be passed if everyone agrees. But I do not support that procedure which is contrary to Parliamentary tradition.

Senator Simard: So, to help you solve this dilemma and given Senator Corbin's speech, let me say that I will be away from Ottawa until the vote and I do not intend to speak again on the main motion when it will come back up for discussion.

Dear colleagues, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

On August 26, 1987, I said in Saint-Louis-de-Kent:

"It is fortunate that in Acadia we hold forums where our organizations and other parties can express their views.

I stand before you today as a nationalist, if I can make that claim, and as a Progressive Conservative Senator representing New Brunswick and especially the French-speaking community of our province. The two roles are compatible. In 15 years of active political life in New Brunswick, I believe I have realized and proved that it was logical and desirable.

It was an honor for me to serve the province and the Acadian community, as I can do it today in the Canadian Senate."

That is part of what I said at a seminar organized by school board teachers in that area of New Brunswick.

Dear colleagues, although I sit as an independant Progressive Conservative Senator, my position today has not changed much since last August and for good reason.

● (1610)

[English]

Of course, I have listened carefully to witnesses in this house or I have read their statements and followed with great interest the stands of many Canadians in New Brunswick and elsewhere in Canada, but, for reasons that I shall state, my initial support for the accord has not diminished.

[Translation]

Criticizing is easy, as Senator MacEachen showed us today, and with him a number of witnesses who have appeared before this chamber in the past two or three months to present their views. I agree that we also had a number of prominent experts, including Senator Forsey and others, who as the senator mentioned previously, went beyond general comments to analyse the terms of the accord. That is why I think the second round may be more fruitful than the Quebec Round.

However, I think many witnesses made the very legitimate point that it is difficult for parliaments and first ministers to respond to all the wishes of interest groups, whether we are talking about women, minorities, fishermen, and the rest. I think this reflects the complexity of the problem and urgency of finishing the Quebec Round as soon as possible, even though, as I will say later on, the accord may not be perfect.

Senator MacEachen gave us his vision of Canada. It is a vision we have known for some time, that of a centralized Canada, uniform from coast to coast. The senator gave us his dire predictions including, for instance, that it would be difficult to set up national social or economic programs. I think the present government is proving it is possible to be accommodating and to meet the objectives of national programs while allowing for certain nuances and for some accommodation with provinces whose characteristics set them apart from their neighbours.

Senator MacEachen talked about spending powers. He was concerned. I have followed the career of Senator MacEachen and others, and as far as I am concerned, I have espoused and continue to espouse the traditional position taken by the province of New Brunswick and successive provincial governments, and I can say I have not changed my views. I am for a strong Canada and a strong federal government that has the resources to help the provinces, including New Brunswick, meet their economic and social objectives. I do not believe that the accord we are considering today threatens spending powers and heavily mortgages the federal government's ability to raise funds and distribute them among the provinces, while leaving the provinces free to adopt national programs as they so desire, as long as the objectives are met. Eight interest groups have told us their views, and we must respect those views. The centralists have given us their views. However, I don't think it is necessary to dramatize just because my vision and the present government's vision differ from the centralists.

Honourable senators, the accord, the subject of our reflection and our discussions today, is a major step. It is a necessary step, and I think it will be a successful one, but it is also an urgently needed stage in the long process of Canada's constitutional reform. We call it the Quebec Round. We know that other rounds will follow, and that they will be effective and promising because Quebec will be part of those rounds. We know that Quebec was missed at some federal-provincial meetings and that as a result of its absence some progress that could have been made was not in fact made.

I think it is important for Canadians to maintain the support that they have already shown for this agreement reached in the Quebec round. The accord is imperfect, I repeat, but it does recognize the existence of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians in all regions of the country as a fundamental characteristic of Canada that Parliament and all provincial legislatures have to protect; this must be considered undeniable progress in the struggle we have always been waging. Furthermore, the recognition of the distinct character of Quebec society must also be perceived as a historic response to the demands of the Quebec people.

Of course, in 1982, as in 1987, I was one of those who hoped for more and I still do.

So the 1987 accord is not perfect, I repeat. It is therefore possible to identify some deficiencies. I have no doubt that over time we will find other flaws.

Nevertheless, for my part, and it no doubt has to do with my rather optimistic nature, I prefer for the time being to stress the beneficial effects of this accord for French Canadians. So I share the opinion of Le Devoir's editorialist Benoit Lauzière, who wrote the day after the agreement was signed:

The Accord is a victory for intelligence, compromise and a sense of opportunity, virtues that are so important for the federation's evolution (and so foreign to ideological fixations).

That is the first point I wish to make. The result of these negotiations is first and foremost one of compromise and conciliation. I quote Richard Hatfield:

Experience and realism were our guides.

He said that at a press conference on June 3, 1987.

● (1620)

That takes nothing away from the value of the agreement. Even though it is a compromise or the result of experience and realism, the accord, by recognizing Quebec's distinct character, will indeed correct a historical mistake, to use Michel Roy's words. Indeed, it is too often forgotten that on leaving political life, Mr. Trudeau left us with an unfinished Constitution and an isolated Quebec.

Furthermore, the Meech Lake agreement will, for the first time in our country's history, bring the federal government and all provincial governments to recognize Canada's linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of our country and to agree to protect this characteristic.

The Federation of Francophones Outside Quebec and other organizations have, in general, reacted positively to the agreement, while regretting that the provinces were not required to promote this linguistic duality. Like them, dear colleagues, I believe that the concept is somewhat restrictive. But the federal government is behind many other initiatives that cannot help but promote this duality.

In this regard, I think of the tabling for first reading on June 25, 1987, of the Official Languages Bill that was favorably received by francophones outside Quebec and by many other groups and individuals. Not only did the Federation of Francophones Outside Quebec see most of its demands taken into consideration there, but it also admitted that the new legislation would support the development of francophone communities and encourage progress toward the equal status and use of French and English.

By the way, let me add that the recent problems in Saskatchewan in no way change my support for the spirit and letter of the Meech Lake Accord. In other debates, not in this one, we can come back to support what I have just said.

Here, I should like to quote Mr. Robert Décary, a constitutionalist and member of the Pépin-Robarts Commission on Canadian Unity:

I am aware that the Agreement does not meet the expectations of the aborigines, the Francophones who live outside Quebec, the women, and ethnic groups in some regions, even in some provinces. I say to these individuals, these groups and these regions to understand what is at stake. This is only the beginning of the process. We will go nowhere as long as Quebec is not a full-fledged member of the Canadian family. We must first and foremost make sure that this country is Canadian and federal again.

I should like to quote also Mr. Richard Siméon, a director of the Queen's University Public Administration School, who stated:

The committee and the groups concerned should recognize that by itself a series of changes will not deal with all the interests which want to be recognized in the Constitution, nor reiterate all the commitments we have made before. This document will result in Quebec joining the Constitution and the creation of a better balance between the federal and provincial powers. I suggest it achieves this goal very well.

So, dear friends, I suggest that the implementation of specific projects will have a certain impact on the future of the French language within our communities. The national program of community radio initiated and developed by the Federation of Young French Canadians and with which I have been personally associated is an example of promotion by the federal government with the provincial governments willing to do their share as its partners.

I also know that the federal government, and here I should like to call the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the fact that the federal government is now considering a project put forward by the National Commission of Francophone Parents, a group of over 435 francophone parent committees outside Quebec. Senator Murray, I sincerely hope that this program will be approved very shortly, so that these groups of francophone parents will be able to condemn, I repeat, honourable senators, to condemn and subsequently remedy a shocking situation, namely the tendency of most provincial governments with an English-speaking majority to treat their minorities unfairly with respect to education matters.

In fact, I intend to speak to this subject again in a few weeks' time following a notice of inquiry I tabled recently.

Honourable senators, I think I mentioned a number of initiatives that are a very clear reflection of the determination of the Mulroney government to protect and promote the French language and official language communities in this country. Isolated incidents, like the Piquette case in Alberta and the rather narrow-minded display by residents of Salisbury, New Brunswick, last year on the appointment of their new postmaster, occasionally cast a shadow on the efforts of the federal and provincial governments.

I know that these violations do not enjoy the support of the vast majority of Canadians, and I still believe that the Constitutional Accord of 1987 will become a source of inspiration and action. In fact, surveys published by the Commissioner of Official Languages confirm that the vast majority of Canadians share this openness of spirit and that they are far more favourable to the development of bilingualism across this country than was the case a few years ago.

Some bigots remain here and there, and we have our share in New Brunswick. I don't think we can escape that. However, I believe these people represent a small minority that is making itself heard and would take us back to the Stone Age. I think most Canadians, as I said before, support our attempts at openness and equality and the provision of equal services for both communities, which includes access to the Public Service, and so forth.

As our colleague Senator Murray said before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the 1987 Constitutional Accord, on August 4 last year, I believe that a commitment by the federal government and the provincial legislatures to protect our Canadian linguistic duality is a minimum, not a maximum requirement.

Honourable senators, I believe that if the federal government is able to use this constitutional foundation to build a system that will provide for much closer and far more effective collaboration, we will, in future negotiations, be able to persuade the provinces to make a constitutional commitment to promote Canadian duality. If this close cooperation materializes, I am convinced that the difference between protection and promotion will become purely a semantic debate.

Bearing this in mind, I hope that the McKenna government will ask to have the provincial act recognizing the quality of both official language communities in New Brunswick enshrined in the Constitution, as requested by the Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick and the vast majority of Acadians.

Honourable senators, since this bill that I had the honour to sponsor in a previous career was passed, we in New Brunswick talk less and less about a dominant majority and a submissive minority at the whim of the provincial government.

Indeed, in my province, there are two equal groups that are entitled to their distinct institutions and their fair share of the tax base. That is why I want the provincial government to stop playing games and put an end to this indecision which it is trying to pass on to others. So I repeat, I hope that the McKenna government will stop playing for time and while recognizing the imperfections of the present accord, as I and others do, it will want to ratify what Richard Hatfield as Premier of New Brunswick accepted on behalf of his province, namely an agreement that moves the constitutional revision process one step forward.

This will usher in a new era in federal-provincial relations and make Quebec a full constitutional partner. In this way, in the second and third stages, the provincial governments will deal with such issues as fishing, native peoples' rights, Senate reform and subjects that others have mentioned and concern not only myself but also many Canadians, of course.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I support the 1987 Constitutional Accord unequivocally and with great satisfaction. I call on the people of New Brunswick and their government to do the same.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, would Senator Simard accept a question?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Do I understand correctly that Senator Simard's remarks about francophones outside Quebec are to the effect that they supported the accord?

Senator Simard: Honorable senators, I said that their initial reaction was one of generous but partial support. I know that in recent months they have had an opportunity—given certain events in certain provinces—to insist that improvements be made at this first round of constitutional negotiations, particularly owing to the problems of which we are aware.

Unsatisfied though they may be, I should think they are realistic enough to know that their concerns will be considered during the second round of constitutional negotiations and that amendments might be made.

I would not want to put words in the mouths of other individuals nor make a judgment on what the president or several spokesmen for francophones outside Quebec may have said. Indeed that can vary from one spokesman or newspaper to another, depending on what people are reported to have said, but I think that francophones outside Quebec are reasonable people and prepared to wait, knowing there will be further amendments.

Senator Molgat: Further to my question, I believe that indeed francophones outside Quebec are reasonable. Still I want to draw the attention of Senator Simard to statements made by the president of Alberta francophones to the Submissions Group on the Constitutional Accord. Should he care to look into what the Franco-Albertan society and their president said he will find out that it is not the same thing as what he is telling us here. These people quite honestly expressed their views and they voiced their opposition to this accord. Did Senator Simard read what President Georges Arès of the Alberta group said?

Senator Simard: I wish I were told which documents we are talking about. I read several from Mr. Arès. I have worked with him and I continue to work with him on other programs. As a matter of fact, I mentioned one a few moments earlier. It is under these programs that the federal government will promote the French language. It will do that and take action concerning the promotion of the French language even though the Province of Saskatchewan and others have made no commitments in that respect.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Georges Arès said so before the Senate Submissions Group and you can read his remarks in the report presented here. He said he was flatly opposed to the accord. No one should claim here that these people support the accord.

Senator Simard: There is no problem about that.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, so much can be said about Meech Lake, and so much has been said. Will Rogers once said that he had never met a man that he couldn't like. I have tried very hard to like Meech Lake, but I must say that I have not been able to find anything in it that I like. Its objective to have all provinces and all participants agree to constitutional amendments is supported, I believe, by everyone, but I find the provisions here exact too high a price for that objective. I said here, within two days of the announcement of the Meech Lake Accord, that the objective was desirable, but the price was too high. Nothing that has happened since the adjustments made at Langevin or the evidence that we have heard has changed my mind. Rather has my opinion been reinforced that this accord cries out for improvement.

The objective has often been stated to be Quebec's isolation—

Senator Murray: The end of Quebec's isolation.

Senator Frith: Yes. The reason was Quebec's isolation, and the target was to end Quebec's isolation. I must say that the evidence I have heard since that objective was first stated has not persuaded or convinced me of the existence of that isolation. Certainly, constitutionally I believe it is generally understood and accepted that Quebec was not isolated; that because the then Government of Quebec did not agree to the 1982 amendments, Quebec at that point was not cut loose and left floating like some Sargasso Sea, constitutionally by itself and not as part of the Canadian Constitution. As a matter of fact, Senator Murray, as I understood it, has never said that. Today he did not say that. He said that it was to end Quebec's political and moral isolation.

I have not been persuaded that Quebec has been politically isolated. It has participated since 1982 in Canadian federal and provincial politics, and its political isolation, as someone has said, appears largely to be the creature of professors at Queen's and Toronto, while politically and economically Quebec has been succeeding magnificently. In fact, the most successful section of Canadian economic activity now is undertaken by the entrepreneurs in Quebec who, while Queen's University and the University of Toronto are worried about Quebec's isolation, are out conquering the economic world.

As to their moral isolation, I cannot understand the sense in which that term is used. All that happened was that the then Government of Quebec failed to agree to the amendments that were made at that time.

I had asked Senator MacEachen's assistant to find for me an extract from the evidence of Dr. Bliss who appeared before us on this question.

An Hon. Senator: Your pal.

Senator Murray: He was speaking of Toronto.

Senator Frith: I agree, and that gives greater force to his argument that his colleagues in Toronto, as he said, seemed to be more concerned about Quebec's isolation than was Quebec itself. At page 2337, Dr. Bliss, when speaking before the Committee of the Whole, said:

I could say much more if time permitted. As historians, we worry about getting our facts right. Many of us have been outraged by the use of dishonest tactics to suggest that Quebec was somehow outside of the Canadian Constitution before the Meech Lake Accord, or even to suggest that separatist sentiments have been given great impetus by the Quebec government's failure to sign the 1982 Constitution. The empirical evidence, of course, is that they had not. There is no evidence that two Canadas were created as a result of 1982, but it may well be that we are creating two Canadas with the Meech Lake Accord. Certainly we are no longer going to have one Canada.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that the process could be compared metaphorically to the doctor who wants to engage in excessive treatment or surgery and, in order to do so, exaggerates the symptoms—the exaggerated or excessive treatment here being the willingness to make any deal, to give up any Canadian position, to fail to speak for Canada, in order to get an agreement from one of the provinces.

It seems to be generally agreed that this document is not perfect. If that is so, then why is it not also generally agreed that we should improve it? We are dealing with a constitution. I have never heard any proponent of this Constitutional Accord describe it as being perfect. If that is so, again I say, why not improve it—and that, honourable senators, is what the Leader of the Opposition is proposing by his proposed amendments, which I have seconded. I will therefore confine my comments to the items that he mentioned in his intervention—those that are the subject of amendments, but which were not touched upon by him.

● (1640)

The first are the fundamental characteristics. That phrase should sound familiar, “fundamental characteristics,” because the interpretative clause, section 2(1), sets out as a fundamental characteristic of Canada:

—the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated—

Notice the difference between “centred” and “concentrated”:

—outside Quebec but also present in Quebec—

That has been vigorously argued in Committee of the Whole to be too narrow a description of Canada's fundamental characteristics. Remember, the reference is to the “fundamental characteristic of Canada.” No one, it seems to me, argued that Quebec, as a distinct society, is not “a fundamental characteristic of Canada”. But what were some of the other fundamental characteristics referred to in the testimony given before the Committee of the Whole?

I want to point out that Senator MacEachen did take into account the evidence given to the Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, the submissions made to the Submissions Group, and the evidence given in Committee of the Whole, and that our amendments are based on what we heard here as well as on the debate that took place in the House of Commons.

I say that because I do not intend to resist again saying that I feel the exercise of the joint committee was constitutionally incorrect and turned out to be a waste of time, as we expected it would be. In the first place, we were not dealing with a joint resolution, so there was no reason to have a joint committee, and, second, the House of Commons had a majority on that committee, and, of course, the government had a majority of that majority. The members of the committee were told at the outset that the accord was a seamless web, that it would not be changed, that it could not be changed, but “please feel free to go ahead and hear all of the witnesses.”

The only good thing about it was that it did engage a process against what has been called “executive federalism;” that is, at least it gave the people an opportunity to participate in the amending process. But we were told at the outset that, in effect, no attention was going to be paid to what the people or the members of that committee had to say if they proposed changes.

The Senate, fortunately, proceeded with its own committee, in spite of the fact that it was allowed to participate in the joint committee, and the references that I intend to make are from the evidence that the Senate heard.

So what are some of the additional fundamental characteristics that the people of Canada told us about during our hearings? First, the existence of the aboriginal peoples. Mr. Georges Erasmus, National Chief, Assembly of First Nations, in the Committee of the Whole, stated:

We took tremendous exception to the concept that Canada has just two founding nations and one major “distinct society”—

That quotation is found in Senate Debates of November 18, 1987, at page 2200.

Mr. Louis "Smokey" Bruyère, President of the Native Council of Canada, echoed:

The accord completely ignores aboriginal peoples and our place in the existing constitutional order. It misstates Canada as it is and as it had a greater chance of becoming... Canada is premised on the relations between three—not two—founding societies. The first, and the most distinctive, are the aboriginal peoples.

That quotation is found in Senate Debates of December 2, 1987 at page 2258.

Mr. James Allan of the Yukon, in his appearance before the Task Force in Whitehorse, reminded us that:

—before the white man came 400 or 500 years ago the natives had a distinct society. We had our own unique culture, our own language, our own history, our own heritage, our own spiritual values, our own communities, and most important, we had our own self-government. I do not know how more distinct you can get before you are recognized as a First Nations people who were the original inhabitants of this country.

That quotation is found in the proceedings of the Task Force of October 25, 1987.

We accept the strength of these arguments and will attempt to amend the resolution to correct this omission. That amendment is found in the proposals put forward by Senator MacEachen.

We propose also an amendment to give expression to the multicultural characteristic of Canada. In the 1986 census 11 per cent of the population reported a language other than English or French as their mother tongue. Upwards of a third of Canadians trace their lineage elsewhere than to Britain or France. In Canada we took pride in welcoming people from every corner of the globe to join in the formation of our political, economic and cultural union. It is appropriate to acknowledge that reality in the accord.

Professor Binavince of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, in his appearance before the Committee of the Whole, stated:

The multicultural character of the country is not inconsistent with the recognition of the English and French culture in Canada. For that reason there is no reason to fear that an amendment to section 2, stating that one of the fundamental characters of Canada is multiculturalism, would be a dangerous proposition.

Not only would such an amendment not be dangerous as a proposition, it would, in fact, be welcomed and appreciated by millions of Canadians.

When one asks visitors from other nations what, in their opinion, makes Canada unique, the inevitable response is the country's breathtaking size. When this feature of geography is combined with a sparse population, the result is diverse regions, each possessing unique characteristics.

I will not argue that each region constitutes a distinct society in the sense used in these proposals, but the reality is that the challenge of uniting these widely differing regions into a single federation constitutes one of the most fundamental characteristics of our country. That should be recognized in our Constitution.

Finally, Canada is also more than a mere cultural and political union; it is a strong and vibrant economic union. Confederation, the subsequent westward expansion, and the addition of Newfoundland in 1949, was predicated on the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union. This is a most fundamental characteristic of Canada that should be clearly recognized, particularly now when we are considering entering into a far-ranging economic agreement with the United States. The dismantling of trade barriers between nations is of great importance, but of equal or even greater importance is the elimination of impediments to the free flow of goods and services between the provinces themselves.

The characteristics I have described are, to quote the buzz word again, "fundamental" to our nation; they have all been crucial to our development and will all play an instrumental role in our future. Their existence cannot be ignored in a document that deals with the subject matter of the fundamental characteristics of Canada, certainly not in a document that deals with those fundamental characteristics on the basis of how the Constitution is to be interpreted. When the decision was made to delineate any fundamental characteristics of Canada in the Constitution, it was an error to confine the list to matters of language.

As we are aware, the accord has something to say about the Senate. Under the accord, persons appointed to the Senate will have to be approved by the provinces, and any changes to the membership of this chamber will require the unanimous consent of all the provinces. I have long favoured a reformed and elected Senate. I first made a speech on the subject here in this chamber many years ago. I have my doubts that any reform will be possible under the terms of the accord.

Again, to refer to the evidence of the Honourable John Roberts, he was unequivocal before our Submissions Group when he stated that the accord "means the death of the initiative for the equal, effective and elected representative base for the Senate."

It is true that the subject of Senate reform will be on the agenda of all future yearly constitutional conferences. That, as I understand it, was one item of quid pro quo given to Premier Getty by the Prime Minister in order to persuade him to join in the accord. This, however, is very thin gruel for those Canadians who look to a reformed Senate as a strong defender and advocate of their regions' interests. So, when Senator Murray stated on CTV's "Question Period" on May 1, 1987, that:

the good news is we're going to talk about Senate reform and we are going to talk about it every year. . .

he might also have said:

...and the bad news is that under the new amending formula, we will undoubtedly be talking about Senate reform every year for many, many years to come.

Senator Murray: Just watch us!

Senator Frith: Yes, we will—and for years and years and years to come.

Since there is a very wide consensus that reform of any substance would entail an elected Senate, we suggest that until such time as real change does take place senators be called to the Senate by the people of the provinces through direct elections and not by agreement between premier and Prime Minister. This would constitute a genuine and meaningful step towards the reform of this chamber. It would mean that we would have during the transition period some elected senators and some appointed senators. Many have suggested that that is an impossible situation, but Senator Flynn and I found otherwise when we were in Australia. One of the states—I believe it was New South Wales—had in place a system of appointed senators. This was gradually changed to a system under which senators were elected. We asked them how that worked, with elected senators sitting next to appointed senators, and they said that it worked fine. They said that it was a gradual process, but that within a year or two the entire state Senate would be fully elected.

Senator Tremblay: That is not the Canadian way.

Senator Frith: What is not the Canadian way?

Senator Tremblay: I will explain my point later.

Senator Frith: Oh, good; we look forward to that—another cliff-hanger.

Senator Phillips: What is the first?

Senator MacEachen: Senate reform!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, another institution in which changes are being made in the appointment procedure is the Supreme Court of Canada. As with the Senate, new appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada will only be made with the prior approval of the provinces, with new justices being chosen from lists of names submitted by the premiers. In addition, the long-standing tradition of appointing from Quebec three of the nine justices will be entrenched in the Constitution.

Unlike the Senate, where change is seen as pressing, so far as I have been able to observe, there has been no clamour from the populace for the reform of the Supreme Court of Canada. The court is a highly respected body which is generally viewed as ruling without bias, whose members are acknowledged to be of the highest calibre.

What evidence have we on this subject? When Mr. Robert Baragar appeared before our Submissions Group on March 3, 1988, he wondered:

why the provinces are so anxious to nominate their own justices to the Supreme Court. After all, the system works well, so why change it? Surely the answer has to be that the provinces are interested in gaining greater influence in court decisions...

Mr. Baragar was not alone in his scepticism. Senator Macquarrie, someone widely quoted on this side today—

Senator MacEachen: He is our only hope!

Senator Frith: —expressed concern about the wisdom of this provision when he said:

The Meech Lake formula for appointments to the Supreme Court does not strike me as being as satisfactory as the one that now exists.

He made that statement at a meeting of the Submissions Group on March 3 of this year.

Senator MacEachen: The whip was away that day!

Senator Frith: One would also be forgiven for asking why the Territories have been shut out of the appointment process. I am sure that Senator Murray forgives us and others who ask that question. There is no legitimate reason not to allow the Territories to submit names to the federal government in the same fashion as the provinces do. Furthermore, there is no legitimate reason to exclude from consideration for appointment those members of a territorial bar who do not also belong to the bar of one of the other provinces.

Senator Flynn: They all do.

Senator Frith: Well, good—all the more reason, as you are saying.

In its final report, the Senate Task Force on Meech Lake said:

Time after time we heard people of the North tell us that the only practical way to have qualified Northerners considered for appointment to the Supreme Court is to have their names submitted for consideration by the territorial governments. They believe that failure to do so constitutes unfairness and inequality visited on Northerners simply because of their place of residence.

We agree with this assessment and propose that the recommendations of the task force respecting the Supreme Court of Canada be accepted.

Still on the topic of the Supreme Court, we are very concerned by the lack of any dispute-resolution mechanism. Should the Government of Quebec refuse, for whatever reason, to submit a list of candidates to the federal government, or should the names submitted by the provinces be patently unacceptable to the federal government, how will the court maintain its full complement of nine justices? Would the court be asked to rule on cases emanating from Quebec, cases calling for the interpretation of the "distinct society" clause of the accord, at a time when there were no members of the Quebec bar on the court because of a long-standing dispute between the two levels of government? How effective would our highest court be if it were forced to operate for any length of time with only six or seven justices?

We are proposing that when such an impasse arises the Chief Justice be empowered to make an interim one-year appointment from among the justices of the Federal Court or provincial superior courts.

When he appeared before the Special Joint Committee on August 4, 1987, Senator Murray commented:

My hunch is that deadlock-breaking mechanisms create deadlock.

It is unusual for Senator Murray to try to justify something on a hunch. Knowing how careful he is, it suggests to me that he cannot think of any other justification for the absence of a deadlock-breaking mechanism. What he said before the special joint committee is akin to saying that laws create lawlessness, and it is not sufficient reason to leave the Supreme Court of Canada exposed to a deadlock that could rob it of its effectiveness and of the high standing and respect that it enjoys among Canadians.

On the amending formula, another aspect of this accord that causes us concern is the unanimity requirement for future changes to the Senate and for the creation of new provinces. Though we understand the principle of the equality of provinces and appreciate the interest of provinces in federal institutions, we believe that the principle of unanimity could be a serious, and even insurmountable, impediment to Senate reform and to the evolution of the Territories into provinces. The principle of unanimity is already haunting us, as Senator MacEachen has pointed out. This accord could be put into law without unanimous consent; that is, it could legally be put into effect without unanimous consent, because it only requires the 1982 formula in order to be a legal amendment, although we have been told that policy would not permit that.

In any event, to indicate the difficulties with the unanimity principle, I suppose that would mean that if it ever did come into law, we would then go into the New Brunswick round, which would be the round to end the isolation of New Brunswick and to bring New Brunswick back into the Constitution and into the constitutional family, and to end its political and moral isolation.

We propose that changes to the Senate require not the unanimous consent of the provinces but, rather, the consent of seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population, as provided for in section 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Furthermore, we propose that the establishment of new provinces be a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government and the territory in question. This would be in keeping with tradition, and is, in fact, the procedure that was followed in 1949 when Newfoundland-Labrador joined Confederation.

As the accord now stands, the Territories have no say whatsoever in the creation of new provinces or in the extension of existing provinces into their territory. In 1949 the people of Newfoundland gave their consent to Confederation through a referendum. In 1987 the ten premiers and the Prime Minister decided that they alone would decide the fate of the Territories, that neither the people of the Territories nor their elected representatives had any legitimate say in the matter.

Senator Murray has said that every province has a legitimate interest in the creation of new provinces, because it affects their rights in terms of equalization and financial arrangements. But this does not explain why the people of the Territories themselves do not have a legitimate interest in their own future. There is a suspicion by northerners that the consent of all the provinces will not be easy to obtain.

When the Honourable Donald Johnston appeared before our Committee of the Whole, he brought to our attention the following statement made by Premier Bourassa before the Committee of the Quebec National Assembly, after the Meech Lake Accord, but prior to the Langevin Block meeting:

As far as new provinces are concerned, I do not have to elaborate on the threat which the addition of new provinces would represent for Quebec's collective wealth especially in the regions where natural resources could become fully developed.

It is perhaps with good reason that the people of the Territories fear for their future under the accord.

The last item consigned to me by Senator MacEachen concerns future conferences.

Senator Flynn: How does Senator MacEachen say you're doing?

Senator Frith: Wait until the tenth round. If you remember, Dempsey always said that. It is how you look in the tenth round that counts, not how you look in the fifth round.

The accord also provides for yearly constitutional conferences, which will have included on their agenda the Senate and the fisheries. We propose that discussion on the fisheries be limited to the first meeting, unless otherwise subsequently agreed upon, and that the aboriginal peoples be on the agenda for future meetings.

The necessity of placing aboriginal matters on the agenda is self-evident. With respect to the fisheries, we agree that this is certainly an important matter, but we do not agree that it should be kept on the agenda for time immemorial. It has been observed that three of the four Atlantic provinces are concerned about the consequences of any transfer of jurisdiction. Furthermore, there is the real fear that discussions of fisheries jurisdiction every year would lead to instability in the industry and uncertainty in its administration.

If there are problems in Canada's fisheries that need to be addressed by the First Ministers, let them be addressed and resolved at the next conference.

Honourable senators, there is a common expression these days, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it!" In this case, this accord is broke, so let's fix it!

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a delegation from Mexico, led by the Honourable Senator Humberto Hernandez-Haddad, chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee.

This delegation is visiting Ottawa on the occasion of the VIII Interparliamentary Mexico-Canada Meeting.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN NAME OF SUBCOMMITTEE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, April 26, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to a change in the name of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens, approved by the parent Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on Tuesday, December 1, 1987, and in order to make the mandate of the subcommittee compatible with the new responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs as Minister of State for Senior Citizens.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

THE CONSTITUTION—MOTION FOR PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987 AND ANY MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT MADE FIRST ITEM OF BUSINESS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., respecting the Constitution Amendment, 1987, be the first item on the Orders of the Day until the motion is disposed of;

That any recorded division demanded on any amendment proposed to the said motion be deferred until the conclusion of the debate on the said motion; and

That no later than three o'clock p.m. on Thursday next, 21st April, 1988, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the main motion and any amendments thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no objection whatsoever to the motion. I simply make the point that there is nothing incompatible with having the votes on the amendments and on the main motion at the same time.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: But you are not suggesting, are you, that there should be only one vote?

Senator MacEachen: No, I take it for granted that there will be a vote on the amendments and, if they carry, a vote on the main motion, as amended, so that there would be two votes. I did not want it left hanging, however, and the inference might have been drawn by someone less alert than Senator Flynn that it would be necessary to have the vote on the amendments several hours before the vote on the main motion. That may happen, but it could also happen that the two votes would come more or less one after the other so that we would have the two divisions within the same time period.

Motion agreed to.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 21, 1988, I will move:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be; and

That, within 120 days after the adoption of this resolution, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should consider the advisability of tabling in the Senate the response of the government to this recommendation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: Before we proceed to Question Period, honourable senators, I wonder if I might elaborate on that motion to advise the Senate that tomorrow, at 7 o'clock in the evening, in Room 250 of the East Block, the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs will be hearing from Mr. Percy Mercer, the Secretary of the U.K. Veterans Association. He has come to Ottawa from London, England, at his own expense, to explain to Canadian parliamentarians the plight of many of the Canadian veterans who remained overseas after the war and are now living under destitute conditions. I ask any senator who is not busy at that time to attend that committee meeting.

QUESTION PERIOD

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE—SETTLEMENT
NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR APPEARANCE OF FORMER AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE AND MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS BEFORE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has anything to report on the state of relations between Canada and France subsequent to the arrest and jailing of the crew members of the French vessel, the recall of the French ambassador from Canada, and the very strong statements made by both the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister of France with respect to the actions taken by Canada. Are there any discussions in place to lower the temperature? Indeed, more importantly, will some way be found to begin negotiations both on the fisheries and on the boundaries? From my point of view, what happened in Saint Pierre and Miquelon and Newfoundland over the weekend did not project a very desirable image. From what one could observe, I do not think that Canada was exactly the clear winner. However, putting that aside, what positive steps are now contemplated to move this process of negotiation ahead?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think it is a little too early to answer that question definitively. Those who were on the French vessel came here, declaring their intention to break Canadian law. They refused to cooperate with Canadian authorities. That being the case, Canada took the only action that was appropriate in the circumstances.

I can add nothing to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday in the other place to the effect that this isolated incident should not be allowed to damage our long-term and very good relations with the Republic of France.

Senator MacEachen: That may be a desirable and pious wish, but the fact is that the language used by the President and Prime Minister of France in their description of Canadian policy has not been heard from French leaders for probably two or three decades. It may be a pious hope to say, "Let's believe that this has not affected our relations." Certainly, if verbal expressions are any indication of how the President and the Prime Minister of France feel, they feel great hostility towards Canada.

What steps are being taken to get these negotiations under way in order to lower the temperature and to get relations between the two countries back to a normal basis? If the minister is telling me that no steps are being taken or contemplated, then I will accept that reply.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first, the Leader of the Opposition should have—and I think does have—quite a long memory. That being the case, he should agree that our relations with France have survived worse challenges than the one with which we are now confronted.

Second, I am inclined to think that while time will not heal all things, a little bit of time should be allowed to elapse before we undertake any very formal initiative along the lines suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. As we speak, the former ambassador to France—the present Secretary of State, Mr. Lucien Bouchard—is in Paris and is making his adieu to the President and the Government of the Republic. We will no doubt have a report from him when he returns. We look forward to continuing, without interruption, the excellent relations we have with that country in the economic, political and cultural spheres.

Senator Frith: Mr. Bouchard is carrying out his constitutional duties even though he is not elected!

Senator MacEachen: In a sense, I am pleased that Senator Murray has referred to the visit of the former ambassador to Paris to say his farewells. It reminds me that on the order paper we have an order providing for the Committee of the Whole to deal with the fisheries and boundaries question. It had been in my mind that when we finish Meech Lake it would be appropriate to complete our study on the fisheries and boundaries question.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: We had requested the testimony of Mr. Bouchard—now Minister Bouchard—in the Committee of the Whole, but he was unavailable.

Would the minister consider—as he is reporting, in any event, to the government—paying his long-awaited visit to the Committee of the Whole in the Senate and bring us up to date on what is happening in Paris and on how he analyzes the situation? I think it is a timely visit, and it would be even more timely to have him in the Committee of the Whole, where we could not offer him a seat but could welcome him to the ministry.

Senator Frith: Yes, exactly!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is a fact that Mr. Bouchard is probably more interested in finding a way into the other chamber of this Parliament, which I trust and am confident will take place soon!

Senator Frith: But in the meantime?

Senator Murray: But in the meantime I shall certainly convey the renewed interest of honourable senators in hearing Mr. Bouchard on this question in the Committee of the Whole.

Senator MacEachen: While we are on the subject, it might be appropriate to add the further point that we had had a useful visit from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his officials in the Committee of the Whole. The intention was that at an appropriate time he would return to the Committee of the Whole. That has not been possible, but such an appearance is still quite relevant. Maybe the minister would also alert the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that we may wish to have him present when we conclude our hearings and the taking of testimony in the Committee of the Whole and make a report to the Senate.

Personally, I believe at this stage it might be useful to have a constructive report from the Senate supporting Canadian objectives in this particular dispute, because I think, as the evidence unfolded in the Committee of the Whole, it would have been possible to reach a conclusion here that would have been supportive of the objectives of the Government of Canada in the fisheries and boundaries dispute and to make a statement here in the Senate in support of Canadian interests.

Senator Murray: Well, if that is the objective of honourable senators, I will certainly encourage it in any way possible, including producing my colleague, Mr. Bouchard, at the earliest possible date.

Senator Argue: There may be a certain amount of risk in that!

REFERRAL OF DISPUTE TO INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the same subject.

When I last addressed myself to this fishing subject of Saint Pierre and Miquelon and the disputed waters, it is my best recollection that it was the position of the Canadian government that we would readily and happily refer this to the International Court of Justice for a binding settlement, and that France refused to do so.

First, is that still the position of the government? If it is still the position of the government, will the government take steps to make this clear to the Canadian public, and to the public and world opinion at large, that we are prepared to submit our case to the court, because it is so strong, but the French are not willing to do so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there are various issues involved in the dispute between Canada and France on this matter. I rather think that the position of the Government of Canada is a bit more nuanced than suggested by my honourable friend.

In any case, I think it would be prudent of me to obtain a prepared statement from my colleague on that matter.

REQUEST FOR APPEARANCE OF MINISTER FOR INTERNATIONAL TRADE BEFORE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will provide for an extra chair when Mr. Siddon, the Minister of Fisheries, appears. I have noticed that in the House of Commons questions on east coast fishery matters, particularly questions in relation to Canada-France, tend to be dealt with by the former Minister of Transport, who is now the Minister for International Trade. It might be useful if the two gentlemen were present in the Senate on this occasion.

● (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, perhaps we should have a third chair. I read an editorial in La Presse the other day suggesting that we could do no better than call upon the Honourable Senator LeBlanc for his advice on these matters. Perhaps he would like to provide us with his advice on these matters when the minister is here.

Surely Senator LeBlanc does not object if Mr. Crosbie, who has an obvious interest as the federal minister from Newfoundland, takes questions on these matters that are so close to the interests of his constituents and of all Newfoundlanders.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I certainly do not object to Mr. Crosbie's doing that. My normal modesty prevents me from conveying advice, except perhaps in one area. It is obvious that the Department of External Affairs and the Prime Minister's Office, by way of an intervention, which really was a diktat to the negotiator, forced him to sign an agreement without consulting the Government of Newfoundland. This created a situation where Mr. Crosbie was forced to intervene. I can understand his reasoning, because Newfoundlanders felt very exposed and very unprotected by the actions of the PMO and of External Affairs, which broke what had been a very long tradition within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans that provincial governments and the industry be fully involved in negotiations until the very last minute. In the case I am referring to, obviously they were not. So perhaps my suggestion is not mischievous but is merely an effort to correct the impression that was left with Newfoundland fishermen by this action. Also, I suspect that the Newfoundland government very much wants to have a seat at those negotiations for the same reasons.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the record does not justify the extreme interpretation just put on it by my honourable friend.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator LeBlanc: I am sorry, I did not hear that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He said that the record does not justify your extreme interpretation. That is almost word for word.

ENERGY

GEORGES BANK DRILLING MORATORIUM—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question on another matter, namely, the announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in Halifax yesterday that there would be a moratorium on drilling on Georges Bank for a 10- or 12-year period. I certainly support that decision as an interim step in resolving the difficulty and the conflict between the fishermen of that area of Nova Scotia and the oil companies.

My question to the minister is whether or not there have been any consultations between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia with respect to this decision. In other words, was the Government of Nova Scotia consulted or informed prior to the announcement, and does it support the action taken by the Government of Canada?

Senator MacEachen: It is important to get the details, because I understand that Premier Buchanan has asserted that he just heard shortly before the press conference that this announcement was to be made in Halifax. I find it surprising, in view of the moving comments made yesterday about reconciliation in the Canadian federation, that a major announcement should be made at such short notice and without consultation. However, that is an allegation that arises from press reports, and I will not press it until I hear further from the minister.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can assure the honourable senator that Mr. Masse has had consultations with ministers in the Nova Scotia government on this matter. I have heard him relate something of these conversations in the past. Furthermore, I think we are all aware of the position of the Government of Nova Scotia on the matter, because Premier Buchanan is on public record, and has been for some time.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers to questions. I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AIDS—AVAILABILITY AND COST OF DRUG AZT IN CANADA—HEALTH PROTECTION BRANCH—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS AND STATEMENT ON ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 10, 1988, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding Health and Welfare—Aids—Availability and Cost of Drug AZT in Canada—Health Protection Branch—Request for Tabling of Reports and Statement on Action Taken by Government.

The cost of AZT has to this time been $250.00 Canadian per bottle of 100 tablets. The company has announced that the cost has been reduced by $50.00 to $200.00 Canadian per bottle. Burroughs Wellcome (UK) the parent company has made this price reduction worldwide and it is being directly passed on to the consumer. The question on availability was answered previously; the information has not changed.

The Cabinet established the Working Group to study the drug submission review process and to propose corrective action.

Members of government, the pharmaceutical industry and the Canadian Public Health Association were represented.

Their recommendations were submitted to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and to the Minister responsible for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs on October 1, 1987 (the Stein Report).

The actions proposed by the Department of National Health and Welfare to resolve the current backlog experience in the review of drug submissions are under review by ministers.

The report of the Working Group on Drug Submission Review (Stein Report) is considered to be a Cabinet confidence.

MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

ELIMINATION OF MINORITY EQUITY INTERESTS—IMPACT OF ENHANCED CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 15, 1988 by the Honourable Ian Sinclair, regarding Multinational Corporations—Elimination of Minority Equity Interests—Impact of Enhanced Canada-United States Trade.

With respect to minority equity interests by Canadians in foreign multinational corporations, the Sectoral Advisory Groups on International Trade (SAGITs) did not focus on such a specific issue. The International Trade Advisory Committee (ITAC) which includes representatives from a broad range of senior business people, plus academics, labour leaders and consumer advocates, did give the Government advice on investment matters, but not on this specific issue.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

DELIVERY SYSTEM FOR PROGRAM

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I also have delayed answers in response to requests for answers in the Senate on March 29 and 30, 1988, by the Honourable H.A. Olson. The first is regarding Western Economic Diversification—Delivery System for Program.

The first answer Senator Olson requested was to a question he posed on March 2 concerning Western Economic Diversification. On March 30, in the Senate, Senator Olson said, "we have not yet been provided with an answer." An answer to this question was provided on March 16 in the Senate by the deputy leader (reference: page 2847).

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR 1988 CROP YEAR

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer in response to requests for an answer in the Senate on March 29 and 30, 1988, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Agriculture—Grain—Initial Payment for 1988 Crop Year.

The second answer requested by Senator Olson was to a question asked on March 22 about the initial payment for the 1988 crop year. In his original question and his follow-up of March 30 Senator Olson referred to a "long-standing practice of announcing these prices in early March". Below is a list of the dates of the initial payment announcement for the last eight years:

1987	April 20
1986	April 8
1985	March 28
1984	April 13
1983	April 5
1982	March 22
1980	July 25

Senator Olson will also note that in these years the announcement was only twice made in March—once by this administration and once by the previous administration. Senator Olson will have noticed that the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds announced an adjustment to the initial price for this year on April 14, 1988. A copy of the press release is available for his information. The announcement of the initial price for the coming year is expected in the next few weeks.

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT MCMURRAY, ALBERTA—STATUS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer in response to a request for an answer in the Senate on March 29 and 30, 1988, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Energy—Tar Sands Processing Plant, Fort McMurray, Alberta—Status.

The third response requested by Senator Olson dealt with the tar sands processing plant in Fort McMurray, Alberta. Senator Olson raised the question first on March 15. Senator Olson raised the question again on March 16, and the question was addressed in full by Senator Murray on that date. No new information is available.

LABOUR

ALLEGED UNFAIR APPLICATION OF RAILWAY BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable Hazen Argue, regarding Canadian Pacific Rail's use of Bill C-85 to threaten rail workers refusing to cross picket lines.

Bill C-85, the maintenance of Railway Operations Act, 1987, was passed by Parliament in August of last year for the express purpose of restoring normal operations in the national railway system. Not only did the Act require striking Associated Railway Union (ARU) members to return to work, but it extended their collective agreement until December 31, 1988.

Both the Canada Labour Code Part V and the Maintenance of Railway Operations Act, 1987, prohibit strikes and lockouts during the term of a collective agreement. A strike includes a cessation of work, or a refusal to work or continue to work by employees, in combination or in concert or in accordance with a common understanding.

In a case involving the Canadian Wire Service Guild and the CBC, the Canada Labour Relations Board has held that in the absence of a provision in the collective agreement entitling employees to refuse to cross a picket line, "a group refusal to cross a picket line, even if only because of respect of the convention of honouring picket lines, will be concerted action in accordance with a common understanding and constitute a strike."

Members of the Shopcraft unions are exercising their legal right to withhold their services. However, because ARU members are subject to the collective agreement imposed by Parliament, they are not in a legal strike position. Both railway management and the ARU members are required to carry out the will of Parliament by keeping the railway operating. ARU members who refuse to report for work may thus be placing themselves at risk of allegations that they have violated both the Canada Labour Code and the Maintenance of Railway Operations Act, 1987.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCHOLARSHIPS—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Post-Secondary Education—Federal Government Scholarships—Allocation of Funds.

The scholarship money will be sent directly to the selected students.

The scholarship program will be treated differently from the Canada Student Loans because it is not a loan, and because it is to be restricted to science and engineering students.

ABORTION

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding Abortion—Rights of Unborn—Introduction of Legislation.

While the Minister of Justice discussed with his provincial and territorial counterparts a variety of options relating to abortion in Canada in Saskatoon, no consensus was reached. The federal government continues to consider the matter and will act as appropriate when its policy is formulated.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—REACTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable Jacques Hébert, regarding Official Languages—Report of Commissioner—Reactions.

The Government is committed to supporting the development and enhancing the vitality of both English and French linguistic minority communities throughout Canada.

It is this unequivocal commitment which underlies both the Meech Lake Accord and the Official Languages Bill, Bill C-72.

It is the Government's policy to contribute to the development of linguistic minority communities, including the English-speaking community of Quebec, through cooperation and dialogue with the provinces.

The Commissioner and the Government have a common objective—the development of linguistic minority communities throughout Canada. The Government recognizes the Commissioner's efforts in seeking to achieve this objective.

BILL C-60—REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN COUNCIL OF MINISTERS OF EDUCATION OF CANADA AND FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS MINISTER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable Ian Sinclair, regarding Copyright—Bill C-60—Request for Correspondence Between Council of Ministers of Education of Canada and Federal-Provincial Relations Minister.

I am prepared to table the documents, as requested, by Senator Sinclair.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—SAFETY OF OPPOSITION CANDIDATE—ATTENDANCE OF OBSERVERS—REVIEW OF CONVENTION ON CONSULAR RIGHTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 30, 1988, by the Honourable Jerahmiel Grafstein and the Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, regarding Foreign Affairs—Senegal—Presidential Election—Safety of Opposition Candidate—Attendance of Observers—Review of Convention on Consular Rights.

The Canadian government is not aware of any demarche made by European Parliamentarians through their respective representatives to the Government of Senegal.

On March 17, the Canadian Ambassador in Dakar drew the attention of the Senegalese Minister for Foreign Affairs to the preoccupations and concerns expressed in the Senate and in the House of Commons, concerning the detention of Maître Wade and his colleagues in the opposition.

On April 11, the Canadian Ambassador sent to the Foreign Affairs Minister a transcript, in French, of all statements made in the Senate and in the House of Commons on this question.

The Senegalese government is therefore fully aware of the concerns expressed by members of the Canadian Parliament.

Following the tragic fire at the Cuban consulate in Montreal the question was raised whether the Canadian government will consider a review of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations so that Canadian authorities could enter diplomatic or consular premises without the permission of the sending State in cases of emergency such as fire.

Article 31.2 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations provides that:

The authorities of the receiving State shall not enter that part of the consular premises which is used exclusively for the purpose of the work of the consular post except with the consent of the head of the consular post . . . The consent of the head of the consular post may however, be assumed in case of fire or other disaster requiring prompt action . . .

The Cuban Consul General was present when the fire occurred at the consulate in Montreal and refused Canadian firemen entry to the building. Hence, the consent of the head of the consular post could not be assumed.

The Canadian government does not consider it useful to ask for a review of the VCCR for the purpose of limiting the inviolability of consular premises. The same international convention which prevented Canadian authorities from entering the premises occupied by the Cuban consulate in Montreal also serves to maintain the inviolability of Canadian missions abroad and prevents the authorities of foreign governments from entering them without permission. The Canadian government along with all other countries who are signatories to the Convention, considers the inviolability of diplomatic or consular missions to be absolutely essential.

All Canadian posts abroad have instructions on how to respond to fire and other emergencies.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

AND WHEREAS the Government of Quebec has established a set of five proposals for constitutional change and has stated that amendments to give effect to those proposals would enable Quebec to resume a full role in the constitutional councils of Canada;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto sets out the basis on which Quebec's five constitutional proposals may be met;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

AND WHEREAS section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987 Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens"

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B.(1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C.(1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

"General"

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:

"Courts Established by the Parliament of Canada"

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 101 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Supreme Court of Canada"

101A.(1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B.(1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

(3) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) of any of the three judges necessary to meet the requirement set out in subsection 101B(2), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the Government of Quebec.

(4) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) otherwise than as required under subsection (3), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the government of a province other than Quebec.

101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E.(1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

16. Nothing in section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867 affects section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended as follows:

(a) in paragraph 1 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 2.(1) and substituting the following therefor:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

(c) the recognition that aboriginal peoples constitute a distinctive and fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(d) the recognition of the multicultural nature of Canadian society, and in particular respect for the many origins, creeds and cultures as well as the differing regional identities that helped shape Canadian society; and

(e) the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union."

(b) in paragraph 1 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 2.(2) and substituting the following therefor:

"2(a) The role of the Parliament of Canada to preserve and promote, and the role of the provincial legislatures to preserve and, subject to subparagraph (2)(b) to promote, the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph 1(a) is affirmed.

(b) The role of a province in relation to promotion applies from the time it is adopted by a resolution of the legislative assembly of that province."

(c) in paragraph 2 of the Schedule by deleting section 25 and substituting the following therefor:

(d) in paragraph 6 of the Schedule by deleting subsections 101C.(1) and (2) and substituting the following therefor:

"101C.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province and the elected government of each territory may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province or territory and are qualified under section 101B. for appointment to that court."

(2) Subject to subsection (5), where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

(e) in paragraph 6 of the Schedule by adding immediately after subsection 101C.(4) the following:

"(5) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) and, if within a period of three months, no name which has been submitted under subsection (1) is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the Chief Justice may make an interim one-year appointment from among justices of the Federal Court of Canada or provincial Superior Courts."

(f) in paragraph 7 of the Schedule by deleting subsection 106A.(1) and substituting the following therefor:

"106A.(1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Parliament of Canada after the coming into force of this section, in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a compatible program which meets minimum national standards."

(g) by deleting paragraphs 9, 10, 11 and 12 of the Schedule and substituting the following therefor:

"9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers legislative powers from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province was entitled to be represented on April 17, 1982;

(c) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(d) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(c) roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries at the first meeting only; and

(d) such other matters as agreed upon."

(i) by deleting paragraph 16 of the Schedule and substituting the following therefor:

"16. Nothing in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 derogates from any of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or affects Part II of the Constitution Act, 1982."—
(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Doyle.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I think that all of us in this chamber should be grateful to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate for his timely reminder that "distinct" is a comparative word, that it means "difference, one from the other", and that implies that we should not take it to mean "special" or "favoured" or "exclusive" or "exceptional." Oxford tells us that it means "possessing differentiating characteristics." Meech Lake defines Quebec as having different characteristics than the rest of Canada. Now, had the First Ministers in their meeting last year chosen to say that all the provinces but one in this country constituted a distinct society, they would have been acknowledging an admitted fact. But, I dare say that in the circumstances we would, this very day, be attacking the Prime Minister and the premiers for isolating a minority.

There the word sits, in the accord as it was when it was signed and as it was when the accord was supported by all the parties in the House of Commons. We have been told that the premiers and members were wrong to leave it there, that it could become "a tremendous force in the politics of separation," and that "it would be the end of the peaceful kingdom."

Yes, those were the words of Pierre Trudeau when he came as a witness before the Committee of the Whole. Those words were part of a very gloomy scenario indeed. May I remind honourable senators that he said, "... if the people of Canada want this accord ... I for one will be convinced that the Canada we know and love will be gone forever." Then he exhorted us by saying, "... if it is going to go, let it go with a bang rather than a whimper." Hansard tells us that some honourable senators answered, "Hear, hear!", although I heard some other words.

● (1430)

It is right that the Senate should respond when a former Prime Minister speaks. We know that this one does not enter casually into such a debate. At the nub of his argument was his assertion that the House of Commons has decided to "pass a resolution with its known imperfections, its known contradictions or known vaguenesses which have still to be interpreted and make no effort to correct them."

Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, dealt eloquently, I thought, with many of the right honourable gentleman's contentions, but perhaps you will give me some time today to deal with what Mr. Trudeau said about process—for process is very much at the heart of achieving change, change which both sides of this chamber desire and advocate—whether to go now to a new plateau in constitutional evolution or to reopen the accord and go for a bundle of new possibilities, as suggested in the MacEachen amendments.

Mr. Trudeau took us by the hand through his own constitutional venturing, telling how he had coped with his difficulties along the way to "a solution which respected the idea of a national will binding all."

Honourable senators, I witnessed that process from a distance and from another perch, but, if memory serves, this is how it seemed to me.

It is a green and pleasant time in the spring of 1980. René Lévesque has released his white paper on an independent Quebec to be related to Canada by sovereignty association. Claude Ryan, leader of the Liberals in Quebec, has presented what will be known as the "beige paper," which calls for a fundamental reworking of the framework of our institutions within a single Canadian Constitution. Tom Wells, Ontario's Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, calls it "a reasonable, positive and constructive contribution to revitalizing Canadian federalism."

As Mr. Lévesque's famous referendum is about to go to the people of Quebec, Prime Minister Trudeau and his Justice Minister, Jean Chrétien, join Mr. Ryan to fight sovereignty association. On the eve of the vote Canadians outside of Quebec are reminded that "when we urge the people of Quebec to vote no, we are committing ourselves to the negotiation of change, real and possibly wrenching change. No, in this context, will not be a signal that we can go back to sleep."

Three cheers and a tiger! Quebec defeats the separatist option!

Allan Blakeney, the Premier of Saskatchewan, asks for a First Ministers' conference within three weeks. Mr. Trudeau dispatches Mr. Chrétien to see each of the premiers to talk about constitutional change. He warns the Commons that "Quebec will not be happy with crumbs, they will want a whole new constitution."

Summer in Canada is a time of many storms. One breaks as the ministers meet. A squall produces a leak and the Ottawa Citizen headlines it. The government already has a contingency plan to patriate the Constitution unilaterally.

Well, the September song is hardly sweet. The First Ministers argue about constitutional initiatives. Mr. Trudeau is stern and unyielding. "The provinces," he says, "have enormous power, more power under our Constitution than any of the component parts of any government in the world." Mr. Blakeney responds:

If there was substantial change unilaterally imposed, then a large number of Canadians would view this as meaning that the Canada we have known is gone, and that if Canada is leaving us . . . it is perhaps time we gave some thought to leaving Canada.

In the Ottawa Press Gallery, Michael Valpy and Robert Sheppard take full notes of everything for the book they will eventually write, in which they describe how the Liberal caucus decided to go for the Cadillac—its own and nobody else's drive for patriation and entrenchment of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights.

The only arbiters of this exercise will be the Liberal majority. The guillotine of closure is used to send the resolution to committee, and the newspapers describe how they brought the Tories down.

Canada, we are told, is almost certain to have by July 1, 1981, a Constitution that has been unilaterally amended, unilaterally imposed, and unilaterally altered to allow the federal authority to ride over the will of the provincial legislatures.

Well, not all of the legislatures. Ontario's premier, pleased with the federal policy on energy, supports Mr. Trudeau and urges Ontario members of the federal House to do the same. The odd man out from New Brunswick says, "Me, too."

The leader of the NDP, in return for concessions on resource control and indirect taxation, jumps on the Trudeau bandwagon; but the Premier of Saskatchewan, pursued by the Grits to the beaches of Hawaii, declines. He joins what is now called "The Gang of Eight" in provincial opposition.

With Christmas coming, the Prime Minister receives an unwelcome gift. Dr. Gallup wraps up a poll that says that 58 per cent of respondents disapprove of what the government is doing and only 27 per cent approve. The heaviest weight of disapproval comes from the Prairies, 72 per cent; the lightest, but still a majority, from Ontario, 52 per cent.

With the New Year the scene shifts to Great Britain, where supporters and opponents of the Trudeau plan are lobbying Westminster—which is, by agreement, the trustee of both Ottawa and the provinces in matters relating to the Constitution.

The Prime Minister, acknowledging the U.K. reluctance to deal quickly with his resolution, suggests that the British hold their noses and sign it.

In Quebec Claude Ryan's Liberals join with the Parti Québécois in a resolution condemning the federal initiative.

In the spring of 1981 the Trudeau timetable is in disarray and the matter is before the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1440)

Dr. Gallup is back. His news: 88 per cent of all Canadians want Ottawa to meet the provinces to seek constitutional agreement; 90 per cent want all changes except those affecting the amending formula to be made in Canada by Canadians. So much for Mr. Trudeau's 200 complex sections and subsections of reform.

[Senator Doyle.]

The Supreme Court divides, but the majority finds that what the government proposed is legal. The same court says:

As a matter of constitutional convention, consent of the provinces would be needed for changes affecting the rights of the provinces. No amendment changing provincial legislative powers has been made since Confederation when agreement of a province . . . was withheld.

And the Prime Minister's resolution would "abridge provincial legislative authority on a scale exceeding the effect of any previous constitutional amendment."

Senator Frith: Could you read that statement again, please?

Senator Doyle: Yes. It states:

No amendment changing provincial legislative powers has been made since Confederation when agreement of a province . . . was withheld.

Senator Frith: But many times they were not even consulted, so how could they have withheld approval? That is a nice way of putting it.

Senator Doyle: I had taken that from a much larger context, and I have no doubt, considering some of the governments in power in the past, that there were many things done in the midnight sun.

At any rate, we have the decision of the Supreme Court and, in time for Thanksgiving, Mr. Trudeau issued the first of his invitations to provincial consultation.

We all recall what happened, how the Prime Minister rediscovered provincial concerns and passions, and how the premiers juggled options and sat up all night to find a deal. But, somewhere along the way, Quebec was left out. Mr. Lévesque was not even invited to witness the last of the wheeling and dealing and, oh well, what could a man committed to separatism be expected to contribute to Canadian unity anyway? We all rang bells when the Queen brought the Constitution home.

The achievement of 1981 was shadowed by the travail that plagued it. But it had no hope of enduring as long as it was only a law to be enforced in one of our ten provinces and not an expression of the unity of purpose of them all.

Jack Pickersgill, the long-time Liberal cabinet minister, would put it this way:

I wanted to see the Constitution repatriated, and when it was accomplished, I was, on balance, pleased. But I did not like the sleazy way it was done or the unnecessary humiliation of the Premier of Quebec.

Robert Sheppard and Michael Valpy—remember them up in the gallery—finished their book. They wrote:

There was, of sorts, a Trudeau victory. The Supreme Court of Canada handed him a stinging rebuke on propriety, but by then the Prime Minister had succeeded in narrowing the final agenda to his preferred items, and was able to winkle out a compromise he could live with. But phase two—what one might call the renewed federalism that underlay the shopping lists of most of the Premiers—seems as dead as Laurier's reciprocity.

November 1981 came at such high political cost that it is unlikely that any government will have the will to take up the rough issues again for years to come.

That was their last word on that.

Senator MacEachen: Who said that?

Senator Doyle: Michael Valpy and Robert Sheppard in a book entitled The National Deal. That was written in 1982.

Senator Frith: For whom do they work?

Senator Doyle: Oh, they work for the Globe and Mail.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doyle: I wondered if this little question might come up.

Senator Frith: Excellent auspices!

Senator Doyle: I said I viewed this development from a different perch, and I do not apologize for the perch. May I say that one thing, perhaps the only thing, I share with the former Prime Minister is that I, too, am a former journalist. I might also say that the former Prime Minister, like myself, occasionally still puts pen in hand and writes for the press. In fact, on these very matters—

Senator Frith: Same perch, but different birds.

Senator Doyle: Yes, different birds with different calls—I just happen to have with me a little bit of what Mr. Trudeau recently wrote for the Toronto Star about the present accord.

Senator MacEachen: They are still your former employees!

Senator Doyle: He talked about the people who put it together and he called them “snivellers and losers, people who staged tantrums and were guilty of betraying their country.” He called the Prime Minister a “weakling,” who, with the complicity of ten premiers “would render the Canadian state impotent.”

If his journalism can return to that, please allow me this afternoon a reference simply to a book written by other journalists.

Senator Frith: Consider it allowed.

Senator Roblin: Thanks a lot!

Senator Doyle: At Sept Îles in the 1984 election campaign Brian Mackasey told Canadians—

An Hon. Senator: Brian who?

Senator Doyle: Pardon me, Brian Mulroney. I am going to get myself into trouble before I am finished. I apologize if mentioning the name “Mackasey” puts honourable senators opposite into such a stir.

Senator Buckwold: It was giving him the name “Brian” that bothered us.

Senator Doyle: I think perhaps most honourable senators could quote most of Mr. Mulroney’s speech at Sept Îles without my reminding them, but he did say:

Our first task is to breathe a new spirit into federalism.

Senator Murray reminded us of that Monday. Two years later the Prime Minister told the Commons:

We all knew that the Constitution could never be truly Canadian until Quebec had agreed to it.

In Quebec Mr. Bourassa embraced the goal. At Meech Lake the premiers of every province made it their cause. At the Langevin Building in Ottawa it all came together, and the leaders of the Liberal and New Democratic Parties pledged their support of the necessary legislation. We have heard nothing of threats made along the way.

There have been public hearings in Ottawa; the Senate has conducted hearings of its own. The Charter has already been approved by the National Assembly in Quebec and by the legislatures of two other provinces.

Never say that the Meech Lake Accord will give us a perfect Constitution. Who would be so foolish as to anticipate perfection? But the foundation is there for building. We must come to aboriginal rights—and we have already recognized that in four national parleys with the native peoples.

When the architects of Confederation celebrated July 1, 1867, they looked westward and eastward and lamented the absence of provinces that would surely be. We must look northward to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

● (1450)

Is the Charter of Rights secure against any adventuring? We are reassured, but vigilance is prudent, while the courts continue their interpretation of the Charter’s intent.

Are there risks in formalized annual meetings of First Ministers? Like Churchill, we opt for jaw-jaw. Who knows, we may even find the secret passage to free trade within Canada.

Does the accord tip the balance of power to the provinces? Hardly. What it does do is move a step towards the reality of diversity and the opportunity of federation. That, surely, is the message of Meech Lake and its process—a process far removed from that vain effort at unilateral change. Once again, a word from Mr. Pickersgill:

I wouldn’t have bet the chances were even one in ten that the Meech Lake day would have succeeded—

he said,

—but I care a lot about these things and I was ecstatic. Particularly when I read it, and saw that it diminished the power of Parliament not at all.

The proposals in the alphabet of retreaded amendments before this chamber represent a reworking of thrusts in the accord that might be instructive as constitutional evolution continues, as surely it will, to meet the needs of a vital society. Mr. Trudeau notwithstanding—if I may dare to use that word—nothing “binds us for all time.” Is there any one of these variations on the theme worth the loss of the fine and fragile moment we have reached?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the months since June 1987, when we first began hearing witnesses on the topic of the 1987 constitutional amendments, have been intensely interesting ones. The Senate has heard from a wide variety of citizens' groups and experts on Canadian society and on the Canadian Constitution. These witnesses have brought great depth to our review of the implications of the proposed amendments to our Constitution. They have provided a thought-provoking analysis of the measures to which the premiers and the Prime Minister agreed in the Langevin Building in the early hours of the morning of June 3, 1987. The work of those who appeared here and before the submissions group is very much appreciated and their views have been closely attended to.

It is now ten months since that agreement was reached and for all of that period Canadians interested in this project have been working out the ramifications of those proposed changes. Constitutional revisions are difficult in any society in any part of the world. We can look, for example, at the process of change in the United States of America, the Equal Rights Amendment, and the difficult process through which that has gone in various periods. We can look at the Philippines and elsewhere where constitutions are being renewed, changed or amended. In any society committed to democratic ideals and to hearing the views of its members there is bound to be a long and fiercely argued process. It has been such a process in Canada historically, and should continue to be such a one.

None of the witnesses here underestimated the importance of the signature of all provinces to our national Constitution. While many of our witnesses have said that they do not know, and claim that no one knows, what the new "distinct society" clause means, and while many have expressed their anxieties, all have agreed that the culture, the language and the history of the province of Quebec are highly significant in our national life and that this distinctiveness is worthy of protection. The problem lies in the implications of the amendments for the process of constitutional growth in Canada and for the protection of those rights of Canadians which are threatened by the wording, the arrangement of the sections and the lack of clarity in the accord.

Honourable senators, there are many issues on which I would like to comment. The rights of native people are particularly important and significant in this stage of constitutional amendment. We have heard testimony from a number of groups that have put eloquently their concerns on this debate. The concern over federal spending powers is a significant one for those of us who believe that Canadians from every part of the country, whatever their economic situation and whatever their circumstances, should have the right to some universal programs and universal standards in social and economic policy. Those of us concerned with health care, child care, the care of Canadians in retirement and other groups are very worried about the meaning of the federal spending power amendments. But the Canadian Nurses Association, Professor Al Johnson, the Canadian Social Workers Association and others have put that case clearly.

One would like to talk about the deadlock which was created by the unanimity section of the amending formula on many matters on the constitutional agenda. But Mr. Vincent

[Senator Marsden.]

MacLean has eloquently expressed that concern as he related it to the fisheries issue in testimony before this committee. One would like to talk about the threat to the Territories, not only in their long-term ambition of provincehood but also in their representation in this chamber and in the Supreme Court. But that case has been made earlier in our report, based on the Senate committee's hearings in the North, and Senator Lucier will speak on that question. One would like to speak on the rights of language minorities. The sad sight of the Premier of Saskatchewan failing to make the distinction and appreciate the difference between fundamental rights and the pragmatic provisions of services makes one fear for the protection of language minority rights across this country, whether the language be French or English. But the Alliance Quebec, the Protestant school boards of Quebec, the francophones outside Quebec and, now, many other leaders are speaking out on this issue.

Therefore, honourable senators, I will not speak on these or on many of the other topics which are so important and which have been so well expressed in this chamber by our witnesses and other senators. I propose to confine myself to two issues which I think are very important and which require changes not only to the accord, itself, but to the process of future constitutional debate.

The first issue on which I would like to speak is the threat to gender equality rights represented by these amendments to the Constitution. The matter has been widely misunderstood. I go further. I suggest to you that the matter has been deliberately distorted by some so as to prevent those Canadians concerned about gender equality from recognizing the dangers implicit in the Meech Lake Accord as amended on the 2nd and 3rd of June in the Langevin Block. Many of our witnesses have made this case. The deliberate aspects of distortion have come from a series of half truths, dubious tactics and a smothering of debate which might have taken place in Canada on this issue. One has only to look to the comments of Senator Lowell Murray in this chamber on March 31 to see transparent evidence of this problem.

Let me make this case in some detail, because it represents one example of a problem faced by those concerned with sexual equality rights since the Meech Lake Accord first appeared. When Mr. Trudeau was our witness on March 30, I asked him the following question, and I quote from Debates of the Senate:

In current times we are being told three things.

The first thing we are being told by witnesses appearing before this committee—constitutional lawyers and others—is that there is a hierarchy of rights being created by provisions of section 16 that indirectly weakens the access to the Charter in the courts and, therefore, threatens the Charter of Rights with respect to women's equality rights.

Mr. Trudeau responded as follows:

Well, I would agree with your words "hierarchy of rights." It is quite clear that if "distinct society" means something—and I have argued that in the intention of its most important framers, those who are asking for it, it does mean something—then the protection women have under the Charter will be somewhat lessened.

Honourable senators, I urge you to note Mr. Trudeau's words, "I agree with your words 'hierarchy of rights'." Mr. Trudeau then went on to talk about the strength of section 28. He pointed out that the reasonable limits, or the "notwithstanding" clause, may not be able to override section 28. However, he clearly and distinctly agreed with the problem of a hierarchy of rights. Yet, the very next day we heard Senator Murray say the following:

As an interpretation clause, the "linguistic duality-distinct society" clause will not override, take away or supersede the substantive rights set out in the Charter, including those in section 15. Indeed, if I followed correctly the testimony of the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau yesterday . . . when, in reply to a question from our colleague Senator Marsden, he underlined the strength of the sexual equality rights in the Charter, indeed their virtual invincibility—my words, not his—their virtual invincibility because of section 28.

Let me make three points clear. First, Mr. Trudeau did not say that the equality rights were invincible because of section 28. I am afraid Senator Murray has failed that test of credibility. Second, Senator Murray has not followed correctly the testimony of the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau. Mr. Trudeau did not agree that the interpretative clause—the linguistic duality/distinct society clause—would not override, take away or supersede the substantive rights set out in the Charter. Senator Murray has used the evidence to serve his own argument, evidence which is published and is in front of us. Third, Mr. Trudeau agreed, quite clearly stated on page 3002 of Debates of the Senate of March 30, 1988, that a hierarchy of rights may be created by the Meech Lake Accord.

Honourable senators, it is important to point out this example of disinformation which is being put forward to bury the threat to women's equality under the Charter. Senator Murray's sin is not original. Many others are doing the same.

The claims made by groups concerned with sexual equality rights—principally women's groups—are not exaggerated or distorted. The claims of the sponsors of this amendment, unfortunately, are. I suggest to all Canadians who are concerned with the rights which were won by women under the Charter that they pay attention not only to the content of the Meech Lake Accord insofar as it affects the rights of women but also to the process by which the voices of citizens, expert and otherwise, are being stifled and smothered in this debate.

This is only one instance of the smothering of the debate, and I quote it because it occurred here in front of us very recently. However, there are other examples. Nor is this strategy unknown throughout Canadian history. There is a series of notorious measures which have been practised against people who raised issues which were inconvenient to governments, who, in the past, were in sole control of the constitutional agenda. This history is laid out in an important brief given on February 4, 1988, by Mary Eberts, a well-known constitutional lawyer, to the Ontario Select Committee on Constitutional Reform. One of the tactics which Eberts notes is that women have consistently throughout our history been manoeuvred into a position which pits women against the provinces.

This happened in 1978, for example, when Prime Minister Trudeau, at the end of a constitutional conference, suddenly conceded to the provinces jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. It took an enormous effort to stall this initiative, which would have made custody and support orders even more difficult to enforce in the federal system and threatened the existence of an effective uniform law on divorce. Only the efforts of women and the indifference of the provinces to this proposal overcame what would have been a significant setback to orderly family life for women, children and other Canadian citizens.

Time and again we see that equality rights for women and the gains which women have made in Canadian history are sacrificed in the interests of provincial powers. Perhaps the best known example of this came in 1981-82 when governments played off one another on the question of women's rights and the rights of native people. Women were then forced to form a massive popular lobby to persuade Premier Blakney and his allies to change their minds and support the entrenchment of women's rights in the Constitution. The choice was put between gaining women's rights and gaining the rights of native people, a ploy for which women did not fall and do not support, and are not about to fall for in this case either. Such have been the tactics of constitutional decision-making in this country.

In the Meech Lake Accord, the technique of pitting women against the provinces has been used with a degree of cynicism unseen before in this country, as the women of Quebec were forced into the position of declaring themselves either in favour of Quebec or in favour of women's rights. This is a false dichotomy. These issues are not mutually exclusive. The women of Quebec can be supportive of the distinctiveness of Quebec society and fight for that while, at the same time, supporting the rights of sexual equality in the federal Constitution and for women from coast to coast. Women outside Quebec can speak for Quebec's distinctiveness and still assert the need to clarify the supremacy of the Charter. But the political manipulation by provincial premiers and the federal government has forced many women across Canada into a silence or an agonized dilemma on this issue. I would like to quote from Mary Ebert's brief before the Ontario Select Committee. On page 9 she says:

High on the list of deterrents to real debate is the threat that any change to the Accord will make it unravel or fall apart. Women who seek such change are thus portrayed as the potential wreckers of Confederation. The portrayal is not a subtle one: Prime Minister Mulroney publicly endorsed Lise Bissonette's charge that Anglo-Canadian women were a "Trojan Horse" for the foes of Quebec's enhanced participation in Confederation.

Strongly linked with this portrayal of women critical of Meech Lake is the assertion by the federal government and the Special Joint Committee that Quebec women are the only women whose voices count on the issue of whether the distinct society provisions of the Accord will have a negative impact on women. The message sent by Ottawa is: Quebec women must speak, all others hold your tongues, because the Accord is not your business . . .

. . . And the reason they face that choice is because the federal government and its closest allies among the provinces have said that no woman can be both—they have, by their manipulation of the issue, told all Canadian women, wherever they live, that they must be either for Quebec or for women. If they are for Quebec, they will drop their complaints about Meech Lake; if they are for women, they will persist with the complaints and run the risk of wrecking Confederation. To tell women across Canada, who have worked together for years to improve the status of women, that they must make these choices is insulting and totally unrealistic. Any idea that a sensible middle position can be reached is never allowed on the agenda.

In effect, women, who comprise 52 per cent of the Canadian population, are told to speak with one voice or not be taken seriously or be listened to. Others have told women that because of their regional, political or other characteristics they have no right to be heard in the debate.

Of course, men are not told that they must speak with one voice, nor are they told that because they come from Ontario or Quebec, from B.C. or the Northwest Territories their views are not valid. That would be nonsensical, and it is nonsensical in the charge to women.

The entrenchment of the "distinct society" idea in an interpretative clause is the source of the mischief here, and it is possible to clarify this problem. The failure of each of the premiers, the Prime Minister and, indeed, Senator Murray to agree to that change to ensure clearly the sexual equality rights as paramount leads many Canadian watchers to the conclusion that this must be a deliberate attempt to diminish sexual equality rights.

The premiers will tell us once again that it is not their intention and that they would never do anything to diminish sexual equality rights. But this conveniently forgets the fact that once the matter is in the court system it is beyond the powers of the premiers or the Prime Minister to make the decision as to whether sexual equality rights will take precedence over other rights.

In this regard, I would like to refer senators to a paper entitled, "The Effect of the 'Distinct Society' Clause on Charter Equality Rights for Women in Canada", delivered by Professor Lynn Smith of the Faculty of Law, University of British Columbia, on October 29, 1987. She concludes as follows:

[Senator Marsden.]

I think that there is confirmation in the Joint Committee Report that Charter equality rights will be affected, in the sense that a new interpretative rule will be added to the process of balancing interests under a section 1 (or under section 15, if the balancing takes place there) . . .

. . . Further, I think that there is a possibility (although small) that section 2 will be seen as conferring legislative powers, and if that is the case it seems quite likely that section 2 would be given primacy over gender equality values (in light of the wording of section 16, and in light of the Bill 30 Reference).

Finally, I think that the ignominy of being overlooked or deliberately ignored will reflect on women's position in a general way . . .

• (1510)

She goes on to say:

Thus, there is reasonable cause for concern that the proposed new section 2 will directly or indirectly tend to restrict the scope of Charter equality rights, both inside and outside of Quebec. Those equality rights were the culmination of a long and hard struggle, and naturally the potential impairment of them is viewed with alarm. Given the continued reiteration by the Prime Minister that the accord will not affect the rights of women, native people, and minorities, and given the well-known difficulties of predicting in advance how constitutions will be interpreted, the question 'Why not amend to clarify this matter?' is a powerful one. The answer that it is not desirable to 'open up' and therefore imperil the accord only increases the concern of the critics, who begin to suspect even more strongly that the impairment of Charter equality rights is intended and is seen as necessary and desirable—otherwise, there could be no difficulty in making the desired change.

In fact, I think the best explanation for the current situation is that the supporters of the Meech Lake Accord have wisely chosen the dry-land strategy. Once a discussion of the possible effects of section 2 on equality rights opened up, inevitably the situations in which the supporters think those rights ought to be affected would be revealed. There would then follow a discussion about the comparative importance of rights in which the true political issue would emerge from the muddy waters.

Both of these excerpts raise the question of whether or not the Meech Lake Accord has to do only with Quebec with respect to gender equality rights, or elsewhere, and, on this matter, I would like to quote again briefly from the Eberts brief to the Ontario Select Committee at page 27. She says:

This highlights an important issue that is almost always ignored in the discussion of Meech Lake. The Supreme Court of Canada is the final Court of Appeal for all of Canada, including Quebec. Cases from Quebec dealing with conflicts between sexual equality and the distinct society will, once decided by our highest court, be in our jurisprudence for citation in other sexual equality cases arising in other parts of Canada. It is thus not at all true to say that the relation between sexual equality and the distinct society is a domestic matter for Quebec only. As long as the Supreme Court is the highest court in Canada, its jurisprudence affects us all. We have seen in the court's recent pronouncements that its judgments make philosophical and valued statements. They do not simply reach conclusions. It will not help the women of Canada to have a clearly articulated statement that the interests of women must be subordinate to those of their national or linguistic group because, in a pluralistic society with many national and linguistic groupings and strong constitutional and accord protection for multicultural values, such a statement will not be confined to Quebec.

For these reasons, all those concerned with sexual equality rights are calling for an amendment of the Meech Lake Accord on this issue. However, because so many of the groups making this argument appeared before the Submissions Group and not before the Committee of the Whole, and because their testimony has not been published, I will refrain from reading all of their testimony into the record. However, I would like to list for honourable senators who may not have read their testimony the list of groups who made these and similar arguments protesting this issue before the Submissions Group: The National Association of Women and the Law; the National Action Committee on the Status of Women; the Women's Network Incorporated from Prince Edward Island; West Coast Legal Education Action Fund Association; the Disabled Women's Network of British Columbia; the Ad Hoc Committee of Women on the Constitution; the Ad Hoc Committee of Manitoba Women's Equality-Seeking Groups Concerned About the Meech Lake Accord; the Ad Hoc Committee on the Meech Lake Accord (Nova Scotia); the Prince Edward Island Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the National Council of Women of Canada—the oldest women's association in this country; the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women—which, I might draw to senators' attention, recently sent to every senator a summary of their brief protesting the Meech Lake Accord; the British Columbia Women's Liberal Commission; the Vancouver Association of Women and the Law; the Prince Edward Island Caucus of the National Association of Women and the Law; the Manitoba Action Committee on the Status of Women; the Okanagan Women's Coalition; the Port Coquitlam Area Women's Centre; the Penticton University Women's Club and the National Federation of Nurses' Unions.

Not only have all of these groups raised their doubts and called for amendments but the Senate is calling for amendments and clarification; the Liberal Party in the House of Commons has called for such clarification; the New Democratic Party at its B.C. convention the weekend before last passed a resolution protesting the abandonment of women's equality rights, or the threats to them; some Conservatives are endorsing this amendment. The country is calling for this clarification, but the First Ministers are ignoring this request in such a blatant way that they are opening a well of doubt that can only be resolved by a Supreme Court clarification or, preferably, by an amendment to the Meech Lake Accord.

It is, of course, entirely possible for the premiers and the Prime Minister to get together and clarify the accord in the way which is being recommended. As former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau reminded us, this is what happened in 1981. The Constitutional Amendment had been signed and was then re-opened to accommodate the concerns of women.

Senator Murray: That is still there.

Senator Marsden: It is important to stress here that at the Meech Lake meeting and at the Langevin meeting which produced the Meech Lake Accord none of the premiers nor the Prime Minister had made any effort to represent the concerns of 52 per cent of the population. There was no effort made to have at these meetings experts with particular expertise or perspective on women's concerns with respect to the Constitution. The reason that it could have been anticipated that they would do so in this round as opposed to previous rounds was precisely because of the difficulties that should have been so fresh in the memories of all of the First Ministers of the 1981-82 agreement. Indeed, several of the leading studies of the 1981-82 constitutional amendments have referred explicitly to the concerns of women and sections 15 and 28.

However, the tactics of distorting the record and pitting women's rights against the interests of the provinces does not stop at this. In addition to putting up these tactics, there is another tactic employed, and that is to dismiss or silence those who complain about this accord—mostly women—as not being expert or knowledgeable on matters concerning the Constitution. This tactic is both wrong, in the sense of not being founded on the facts, and insulting, since it resorts to the traditional patriarchal tactic of dismissing women's brains. For example, it is alleged—and Senator Murray may wish to comment on this—that at a meeting between Senator Murray and the Ad Hoc Committee on the Constitution last summer, and after hearing from a variety of women's groups led by constitutional lawyers and experts on this process, Senator Murray said, "We have heard from the women, now let's hear from the experts." Honourable senators, I was not at that meeting. I heard this secondhand. Senator Murray may deny or confirm this statement, and witnesses may be called who will say that they heard it. However, whether or not this comment was correctly interpreted in the secondhand accounts that I have received, the fact remains that that is the odour which prevails in this debate.

Many premiers and officials have dismissed experts, both male and female, who have argued that the hierarchy of rights does represent a problem which is deserving of debate. On the matter of expert knowledge, I refer honourable senators to, among other documents, the brief presented in this chamber on March 16, 1988, by Lucie Lamarche and Beth Atcheson of the Women's Legal Education Action Fund. That fund is an organization of litigators who litigate test cases on the Charter. As was reported in that brief, and as interested honourable senators will know from the newspapers and from briefs in the legal community, the Women's Legal Education Action Fund has appeared in the superior, trial and appeal courts of every province and territory, with the exception of two. They have had intervenor status in five major equality cases before the Supreme Court of Canada. As they testified, they use a wide consultation process, because equality cases raise complex issues, as do the requirements of the courts in Charter cases. They require "a very sure definition about the meaning of equality, because when you go before the court you have to make a very precise argument."

LEAF lawyers are experts not only on the application of the Charter, and women's equality rights in particular, but on the history of women's equality rights in Canada. They and their colleagues in the law who are interested in these issues have an analysis, superseded by no others available, of the development of women's equality rights, including the Persons Case, which eventually brought women to this chamber—no thanks to the Supreme Court of Canada; the Canadian Bill of Rights in which Jeanette Lavalle and Stella Bliss were both denied their rights; and they are the framers and veterans of the 1981-82 constitutional battle to strengthen the provisions governing gender equality in our current Charter. As the witnesses testified, they recognize the importance of both political and judicial remedies in gender equality issues. They recognize as well that governments often act unconstitutionally, and have done so throughout our history. They recognize that the Supreme Court has not yet interpreted fully and directly sections 15 and 28 of the Charter. They went on in their testimony, which you will find on page 2867 and thereafter in Debates of the Senate, to show how the creation of a hierarchy of rights may occur in our courts and threaten gender equality rights in the Constitution if these constitutional amendments are proceeded with. I urge senators and all Canadians who are interested in this issue to read their testimony, which is technical and complex, to see how their argument is developed.

Those politically committed to the Meech Lake Accord as it currently stands may reject the argument they are making on political grounds, but they are not in a position to reject the argument on legal grounds. Even the constitutional advisors to the First Ministers, who are now reappearing in front of provincial committees such as the Ontario Select Committee, are basing their cases more on their political desires than their legal interpretation. This becomes more and more apparent as they cautiously and carefully backtrack on their original position. While women do not reject or diminish the importance of political commitment and political action in gaining gender equality, it is impossible to emphasize sufficiently the strategic importance of maintaining the supremacy of gender equality rights in the Constitution so that it may be argued as a defense in cases before the courts. I urge our premiers and Prime Minister to take the opportunity to listen carefully to the arguments of the experts on Charter cases, not only to the arguments of academics who argue from the base of theory and the wishful thinking of their officials.

The political tactics named above are not the only ones which have been used to attack and deflect examination of the threat to women's equality rights. The Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee, which held public hearings during the summer of 1987 and published its report, "The 1987 Constitutional Accord", on September 9, 1987, engaged in a particularly offensive type of tactic to ignore the concerns of women. Honourable senators have all heard the analysis of that document by Dr. Eugene Forsey in front of the Committee of the Whole. The expert testimony in front of the joint committee was as clear as it has been to us. The "gender equality" experts were heard. They testified, but their testimony in the report is distorted and their analyses dismissed. I refer honourable senators to page 14 of Senator Forsey's paper, "Analysis of the Report of the Joint Committee on the Constitutional Accord, 1987", where he notes that the joint committee report:

—rightly devotes considerable space to the contention of various women's organizations that the 'abundance of caution' ought to have meant the inclusion in Section 16 of the equality rights of women. However, the committee thought this was not necessary for six reasons.

None of those six reasons, which Senator Forsey then goes on to dissect, is compelling in his opinion. Indeed, the reasons offered in the joint committee report only exacerbate one's fears.

The distortion of the conclusions of the joint committee have not gone unremarked. It can only be seen as part of the general campaign to prevent a serious consideration of this issue, which places governments in difficult political positions vis-à-vis their own agenda concerning power between the provinces and the federal government. It leaves the gender equality rights issue mainly affecting the women of Canada relatively unexplored in the media and public debate.

Honourable senators, democracy has its foundation in free information and free debate. In the discussion of gender equality rights in relation to the Meech Lake Accord, we have not had as yet a democratic hearing. The signatories to the Meech Lake Accord have ignored these concerns. They have refused to entertain serious opinions different from their own. The record has been distorted—whether by design or not, I cannot tell you—and this is not acceptable. I call upon those premiers who have not yet committed their provinces to this accord to think seriously about the implications of a constitutional, political and human rights nature which flow from their decisions.

Honourable senators, the process of the Meech Lake Accord has not been in the spirit of Canada's new Constitution. Professor Alan Cairns in testimony before our committee and elsewhere has made the argument that before 1981-82 constitutional matters were largely government issues, but that the entrenchment of the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution has turned it from the government's Constitution to the people's Constitution. The people of Canada—women and men, native people, multicultural groups, anyone affected by federal spending powers, and therefore nearly every citizen—feel some stake in the process of constitutional change. This process must be a more open and democratic one than we have experienced this time.

Professor Al Johnson in testimony here suggested that the premiers should announce an area in which they were considering constitutional reforms, hear from the people through legislative and parliamentary public hearings; and then, having heard the views of the people, come together to make their decision on our behalf in the spirit of responsible government. This would allow the people of Canada a hearing. This would allow the legislators of every province, territory and the two chambers of Parliament to play the role for which they were elected or appointed—that is, to represent their constituencies or their provinces and reflect the views of the people. It would allow the First Ministers to exercise their prerogative and power of decision-making in an informed way.

We are now entering a round of changes with respect to the Senate and fisheries. We have been reading about Premier Bourassa's discussions with Premier Getty on these matters. They are important matters. On the question of Senate reform, I am in full agreement with those who would like to see a reformed second chamber and a new method of selecting senators. Electing senators is not a solution alone, because the division of powers between the House of Commons and the Senate then becomes of crucial moment. The Australian situation has demonstrated this. But it is not beyond the imagination of Canadian constitutional experts and the people of Canada together to resolve the problem. Those public hearings proposed by Professor Johnson as a first phase of constitutional growth are essential.

Honourable senators, I seek many amendments to the Meech Lake Accord. In particular, I seek a clarification on the question of gender equality rights and the primacy of the Charter. Equally, I seek the democratization of the process of constitutional amendments. I support, generally speaking, the proposal put forward by Professor Johnson and other critics of the process, such as Professor Albert Breton. Above all, I regret the lofty dismissal of the brains of constitutional experts on the grounds of their sex and urge that this climate of creating first- and second-class experts in Canada be expunged from constitutional decision-making. Women, members of linguistic and cultural minorities, people with disabilities, native people, and all groups who are not represented in constitutional hearings must be heard, and heard with open hearts and minds, if our country is to live up to the ideal established in the preamble to our current Constitution.

● (1530)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as a matter of, I suppose, personal privilege, I would like to take this occasion, for the record, to inform the honourable senator and the house that the secondhand report which she placed on the record a few moments ago alleging that I made a certain remark at a meeting attended by, among others, representatives of women's groups is totally untrue.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, the Constitutional Accord of 1987 springs from the urgent need to restore Quebec to Canada's constitutional family. It is an historic achievement, and, in the view of the Special Joint Committee on which this chamber was represented, a reasonable and workable package of constitutional reforms which, I submit, should be adopted by this chamber.

Patriation of the Constitution with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 was incomplete, because Quebec was isolated. The accord repairs the damage done then to national unity. Together with all Canadians, I welcome this.

But I would support the accord even if it had not been designed to resolve Quebec's isolation. My reason is that it lays the foundations for a renewal in federal-provincial cooperation based on mutual respect between the two orders of government, not on rivalry and confrontation. The accord upholds the national interest and recognizes the equality of all provinces while it also meets Quebec's concerns.

Let me illustrate with the immigration provisions. As honourable senators know, immigration has been a shared jurisdiction from the first day of Confederation. Although many people think of this as a federal matter, section 95 of the Constitution Act, 1867 permits a province to make laws in relation to immigration to the extent that they do not conflict with paramount federal laws. As the committee notes, over the past 16 years the federal government has concluded administrative arrangements respecting immigration with seven provinces, taking into account their special concerns.

Among them is Quebec. Under the so-called Cullen-Couture Agreement of 1978, Quebec exercises considerable powers, according to its own criteria, in the selection of immigrants to settle in Quebec. One of Quebec's concerns, of course, is to preserve a strong French-speaking community, because this is one of the keys to its distinct identity within Canada.

Some provinces have a special interest in attracting immigrants with job skills that match their economic requirements. These agreements have worked well, as the Special Joint Committee concluded. There has been concern, however, that these agreements were unprotected from unilateral federal action at any time. It is no secret that Quebec, in particular, wanted the agreements to have a more solid, constitutional foundation. This is provided in the accord. However, I want to stress that it is provided in a way that respects the equality of the provinces. There is no special status here. Under the accord, the federal government will negotiate an agreement with every province that asks. Each will be tailored to the particular needs and circumstances of the province. I also want to stress the built-in protection for the national interest and the role that Parliament will play. Again, this is a feature on which the committee has commented with approval.

Parliament will continue to set national standards and objectives relating to immigration and aliens, including provisions that establish general classes of immigrants or relate to annual levels of immigration. This will allow Parliament to ensure that family reunification, for example, remains a high priority in our immigration policy for all of Canada.

Parliament will also review the precise terms of each federal-provincial agreement. An agreement will have the force of law only after approval by resolution of the House and the Senate as well as of the legislative assembly of the province concerned.

Quebec will no doubt continue to place emphasis on an ability to speak French or on a disposition to learn it. This is understandable and proper. It is directly related to Quebec's distinct identity.

But there can be no discrimination by any province, or by the federal government for that matter, on the grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour or religion, as well as on sex and other grounds. Section 15 of the Charter sees to that, and the Charter has been made explicitly to apply these agreements. This was done because the agreements will be developed by a new method, a method which was not in place when the Charter was first adopted in 1982. The accord ensures that the ambit of the Charter is broad enough to encompass these agreements. The Charter also ensures that immigrants will be free to relocate anywhere they wish in Canada.

I could give other examples of the accord's recognition of the fundamental equality of the provinces and its protection of the national interest. Equality is expressed in the requirement for unanimous consent to certain constitutional amendments of fundamental importance, and this has been done in a way that the Special Joint Committee concludes carries forward principles established in 1982 and is "consistent with both the 'equality of the provinces' and a recognition of the stake that each and every province has in the basic elements of the Canadian federation." Equality is also expressed in the right of all provinces to put forward names for appointment to the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada as key federal institutions.

I make a similar point with respect to the national interest. The national objectives, against which provincial initiatives or programs will be tested for reasonable compensation, will be set at the federal level. Thus, all Canadians will benefit from federal spending. Final authority for appointments to the Senate and the Supreme Court will lie with the federal government.

Let me remind honourable senators that the Trudeau government was prepared to dilute federal authority in these fields. It twice supported proposals for a mechanism that would have prevented Parliament from using its spending power to establish new shared-cost programs unless a majority of the provinces with at least half the population gave their consent. There is no such limitation in this accord. The provinces cannot prevent Parliament from establishing new shared-cost programs.

The Trudeau government was also twice prepared to offer unconditional compensation to individual provinces that did not participate in such programs. Under this accord, compensation will be offered to non-participating provinces only if they carry out programs or initiatives compatible with national objectives. Provinces can, of course, choose to remain outside shared-cost programs. They have always had that right. But they will not be entitled to federal funds unless they take steps on their own to meet the national objectives.

As the Special Joint Committee notes, the major effect of the proposed amendments in this area will be "to place a renewed emphasis on negotiation."

In 1969 the Trudeau government also endorsed giving provinces the final say on the appointment of some senators. Bill C-60 included a similar proposal which would have led to the provinces appointing half the members of the reformed Senate. This accord does not go nearly so far.

Then, in the Victoria Charter of 1971 and in Bill C-60 of 1978 the Trudeau government was prepared to hand over appointment of Supreme Court justices to a nominating council when the federal and provincial governments could not agree on a choice. This accord keeps the decision where it belongs—in the hands of people who are responsible to the electorate.

In addition, all previous rounds of constitutional negotiations involved changes to the distribution of powers in the direction of the provinces. In the words of the Special Joint Committee, "... nothing has been said to lead us to believe that the basic principles of the Canadian federation would be compromised..." by the accord.

In immigration, in the creation of new shared-cost programs, in appointments to federal institutions, and in the distribution of powers, the accord clearly upholds the authority of the federal government and of Parliament as the voice of all Canadians. Yet, it does so in a climate of federal respect for provincial authorities as the voices of varying regional needs.

Under the accord, no province is singled out for special status. The accord ensures full consensus on fundamental changes affecting the federation, including Senate reform—an item now guaranteed to be on the agenda for future constitutional talks.

In conclusion, one reason I support this accord is because it ends Quebec's isolation and brings it back as a full and enthusiastic partner in future constitutional growth for our country. But I would support it even if it did not accomplish that, because this accord reflects the reality of Canada as a federal nation. It fosters a federation with a strong federal government at its centre and ten strong, responsible provincial governments. This is the Canada that the Fathers of Confederation sought to build. It is the Canada that the Canadian people expect us to preserve. It is the Canada I will support with my vote for this accord.

● (1540)

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I wish—this should come as no surprise—to address the subject of the treatment of Canada's North in connection with the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

As my opening remarks, I offer not my own words but those of two others. Mr. Tony Penikett, the government leader of the Yukon, stated to us in Whitehorse last fall, "To have had no vote was bad enough, to have been granted no voice was outrageous."

The other comment, also made in Whitehorse, came from a colleague, whose absence I lament. I refer to the Honourable Jean Le Moynes, who accompanied us on our northern hearings. Unfortunately, he retired before the report of the Senate Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and Northwest Territories was tabled. Senator Le Moynes, with his customary eloquence, summarized the issue in three words: "It is invidious." I only regret that he cannot be here to contribute further to our deliberations.

On June 30, 1987, during meetings of the Committee of the Whole, I rose on a point of order, which at that time was probably a questionable one. Senator Molgat, as chairman of the Committee of the Whole, to his credit, allowed me to make a presentation to the Senate dealing with the Meech Lake Accord. At that time I praised the role of the Senate committees concerning the northern territories. I mentioned the fact that the Fisheries Committee, chaired by Senator Marshall; the Energy Committee, chaired by Senator Hastings; and the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Senate Reform, among others, had visited the Yukon and had made the people of the Yukon feel that their views were important. As I stated at that time, "The Senate has done an excellent job of representing the interests of the territories since I arrived here in 1975."

During my presentation to the Committee of the Whole, I made statements concerning the Meech Lake Accord. I would now like to read part of those statements for you. They are taken from Debates of the Senate of June 30, 1987, at pages 1548 and 1549. I said:

Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on behalf of the people of both territories, who have been directly and adversely affected by the Meech Lake Accord, with no participation, no input, at any of the meetings. They feel that they have been betrayed by the one person who supposedly represented them at those meetings—namely, the Prime Minister of Canada.

I would like to make it clear that the people of the north are not upset with the premiers. They were there getting what they could for their provinces. That was their job. I also want to make it very clear at this time that the people of northern Canada would like to see Quebec become part of the Constitution. I fully agree with the objectives of the Meech Lake Accord.

However, I would like to make it clear that we feel that we had a representative at those meetings who was not elected by the people of the north. The Prime Minister of Canada was supposedly speaking for the north, and we feel that he sold us down the river.

I find it very difficult to accept that, whereas the people of northern Canada have always been quietly cast as second class citizens, we have now been openly declared to be second class citizens. There are four areas of the Meech Lake Accord on which the people of the north want to be heard. They are aboriginal rights, provincial status, naming of judges and senators, and holding of constitutional conferences.

By giving an absolute veto on constitutional changes to every province, the Canadian Prime Minister has, in one sentence, doomed the aboriginal people to their present status, has precluded the Yukon and the Northwest Territories from becoming provinces in the future, has made no provision for naming senators or judges from the territories, and has made no provision to enable us to attend future constitutional conferences.

Honourable senators, I believe the above statement, which reflected not only my views but those of all northerners, is as valid today as it was in June 1987.

As a result of my presentation to the Committee of the Whole on June 30, a task force of the committee was formed and travelled to Whitehorse, Yukon and Iqaluit to hold hearings on the Meech Lake Accord. That task force heard witnesses representing all political parties and all aboriginal groups in both territories. Following those hearings, the task force returned to Ottawa to put together its report, referred to as the Report of the Senate Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and Northwest Territories. That report, honourable senators, has done the Senate proud.

Northerners unanimously endorsed the report as categorically representing their views. Once again, the Senate has proved that it can be an adequate representative of the regions of Canada. The Yukon government leader, Tony Penikett, is happy with the report and was quoted in the Yukon paper as saying, "For a New Democrat, I must say I am feeling uncommonly kind to the Senate today."

Mr. Ted Richard, a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories, in a letter dated March 3, 1988, to Senator Molgat, said:

You and your colleagues initially showed your genuine concern for northerners by taking the time to travel to the Yukon and N.W.T. to listen directly to Northern Canadians. From my quick review of the report, it appears that you also listened carefully when you were in the north, for you have grasped the issues correctly.

Those of us who made representations to your Task Force could not have asked for anything more from you. You have shown a clear understanding of our concerns, and your recommendations are concise and unequivocal.

Concerning the task force, honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to single out three of the honourable senators who served on the report for the job that they did. Senator Bielish and Senator Macquarrie, who travelled with the committee, had a very difficult time of it. We heard from 68 witnesses during our trip to the North and we had 47 written submissions. As you can well imagine, about 104 per cent of them were opposed to the accord, and it was very difficult for Senator Bielish and Senator Macquarrie to sit and take that day after day—but they did it and they did an excellent job. They participated fully in the hearings, and I believe that the people of the North probably appreciated their attendance as much or more than they did anyone else's because of the difficulty of the situation in which they were placed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: The other honourable senator whom I would like to single out at this time is Senator Molgat, who chaired that committee and also the Committee of the Whole. Senator Molgat has spent virtually the last year on the subject of Meech Lake and, as with everything else that he does, he has done an excellent job on our behalf.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: He deserves our praise. Whether or not honourable senators agree with the Meech Lake Accord, the job that he has done in chairing those two committees has been a credit to the Senate.

Honourable senators are aware of the contents of the task force report, which was tabled by the chairman, Senator Molgat, in February. You are also familiar, I am sure, with the task force's recommendations; so I shall not belabour you with the details of them. Suffice it to say that the task force recommended amendments to the Constitutional Accord which would eliminate discriminatory provisions against the North, ensure northern representation at future First Ministers' conferences on the Constitution or the economy, return the question of future status of the Territories to a matter of negotiation with the federal government, not subject to provincial veto; add aboriginal and treaty rights and the issue of self-government to the agenda of future constitutional conferences, and recognize the aboriginal peoples of Canada as well as Quebec as distinct societies.

The people of Canada and the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories were shocked that 11 men locked themselves into a room and refused to surface until they had agreed on a document that treats northerners so unfairly, and that it would be done without their knowledge or participation. During this presentation I will deal with some of the more offensive parts of the accord.

Honourable senators, let me first dispel the notion that the shabby treatment we received from the First Ministers was an oversight, was something that they included as an afterthought or, more importantly, something they plan to correct during the so-called next round, which the government continues to refer to when trying to cover its tracks. To prove my point, let me quote from remarks made by someone who should know, no less an authority on Meech Lake than Senator Lowell Murray. I have here a document from the Office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations entitled, "Notes for a Presentation by the Honourable Lowell Murray at the Conclusion of the Hearings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the 1987 Constitutional Accord". This is dated September 1, 1987.

[Senator Lucier.]

On page 3 of the document, Senator Murray says, and I quote:

I want to assure the Committee that the Accord as drafted, faithfully translates the intent of First Ministers.

Further down on the same page, Senator Murray states:

Let me be clear. The Meech Lake Constitutional Accord was not drafted over the course of a day and a night. The issues had been debated over a twenty-year period. There were prolonged discussions over the course of the past year among officials, ministers and First Ministers not only on policy directions, but also on the best means to translate policy decisions into legal texts. Expert legal advice was sought and obtained. First Ministers are unanimously agreed on the policies reflected in the Accord and continue to be satisfied that the legal text expresses those policies.

Honourable senators, the idea of this having been done inadvertently, or this having been done as an afterthought, or that this will be corrected later can be forgotten. As I said earlier, honourable senators, what Meech Lake does to northern Canada was done deliberately with no intention whatever of being changed at a later date. Why should the premiers come back for a second round? They got everything they wanted in the first round.

Honourable senators, the first thought that comes to mind when the words "Yukon" and "Meech Lake" are heard is "provincial status." Because of the unanimity clause, the universal veto, any hope the territories ever had of some day becoming provinces has been taken away. Anyone who does not agree with that statement is not being very honest.

Let me say to Senator Murray, to the Prime Minister and to others who continue to hide behind the next-round theory, and also the theory that at some future date the ten premiers and the Prime Minister will agree to allow the territories to become provinces, that they may think northerners are naive and not too bright, but we are smart enough to know when we are being conned. We just do not buy that ridiculous position on that particular issue. If the premiers have no intention of using their veto, why is it there? If they have no intention of some day extending their boundaries into the territories, why did they ask that that be put into the accord?

Honourable senators, if by some miracle at some future date they all agree that the Yukon Territory could become a province, what possible justification could there be for the premiers making that decision instead of the people of the Yukon and the people of Canada? As premiers, it is none of their damn business! It is the business of the people of the Yukon Territory and the business of the people of Canada.

Senator Murray: How did you vote in 1982?

Senator Lucier: I voted and spoke very strongly against provincial involvement in the territories becoming provinces.

Senator Murray: Did you vote against patriation?

Senator Lucier: No, I did not vote against patriation, but I was very strong in my opposition to the premiers having any involvement in the territories becoming provinces.

Senator Flynn: You did not vote accordingly.

Senator Lucier: As I said, honourable senators, the responsibility for the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories becoming provinces is an issue to be dealt with by the people of the territories and the people of Canada, represented by the Prime Minister.

Senator Murray: Pre-1982!

Senator Lucier: That should not involve the premiers, but the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada. That was good enough for the rest of the provinces, and that is what we want, exactly the same as the rest of the provinces were given.

Senator Murray: With the consent of seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population. You had an option to vote against that.

Senator Lucier: I was opposed to this then, and I am opposed to this now.

Senator Murray: But you did not vote against it.

Senator Frith: British Columbia came in without any of the existing provinces being involved.

Senator Lucier: In 1905 Alberta and Saskatchewan came in, and every other province came in in exactly the same way. There has never been a provincial premier involved in another province becoming a part of Canada. Why should we be treated differently?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, the premiers can rest easy for a while. We have no plans to become a province for quite some time. What we as Canadians object to most strenuously, and what we find repulsive, is that this Prime Minister and this Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations have abdicated their responsibilities concerning the north to the premiers. If they do not have the intestinal fortitude to stand up for their responsibilities, perhaps they should turn their jobs over to someone else, someone who does not negotiate while on their knees, as this Prime Minister seems to do.

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking of Trudeau in 1981?

Senator Lucier: On December 9, 1987, the Human Rights Institute of Canada appeared before the Committee of the Whole and listed a number of basic problems and injustices that the Meech Lake Accord will create.

The institute pointed out the fact that the procedure for appointments to the Senate violates important international conventions that Canada has ratified, guaranteeing women appointment to public office on an equal basis with men as well as raising questions about possible breach of the equality provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The institute has also raised publicly the question whether the exclusion of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories is a violation of other international conventions that Canada has accepted as binding.

As the senator representing the Yukon Territory, I support amendments to the Meech Lake Accord that will bring it into line with justice and with Canada's international commitments. Appointments to the Senate are particularly open to challenge because of the precise nature of the qualifications. These changes would recognize the real interest of the Yukon and Northwest Territories as well as the legal claims of women of Canada. It would bring Senate appointments into line with Canada's international agreements and the Charter, and would make the Senate more clearly representative of the people of Canada who would otherwise be excluded from any legal right to appointment on an equal basis to the Senate.

There is, of course, the problem that the Prime Minister is proceeding with appointments to the Senate in accordance with the Meech Lake provisions without waiting for the Meech Lake Accord to become law. Even if the accord never becomes law, it seems as if the territories will be effectively excluded and the women of Canada will continue to be denied appointment to the Senate on an equal basis with men, as required under the Convention on the Political Rights of Women.

The Human Rights Institute of Canada drew our attention to the fact that the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, and the Prime Minister himself have refused repeated requests by the Human Rights Institute for a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether appointments to the Senate violate international conventions and the Charter. The institute has been told that women should wait for their rights to evolve. We all know how long that can take.

I have now seen a legal opinion that the institute has received from the law firm of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, confirming that they are prepared to bring legal proceedings in the Federal Court of Canada attacking the appointment procedure. The legal opinion states clearly that:

We consider the issues raised... to be fundamentally important. They are not frivolous or without foundation in law. We look forward to addressing these issues, not only in our opinion, but also in preparing the pleadings and commencing proceedings on behalf of the Institute.

The legal challenge to the appointment procedure will have important implications for the Meech Lake Accord. The Human Rights Institute is now seeking funding for the case. It could force the government to reconsider other parts of the Meech Lake Accord and to re-open the discussions with the premiers about the accord itself.

Honourable senators, I now want to speak about the effects of the Meech Lake Accord on our aboriginal people—a subject which I am sure will be touched upon by others, as well. Can you, in your wildest dreams, imagine a government so misdirected that it decides Canada's original people are not worthy of being an agenda item at First Ministers' conferences? Instead, the agenda will include Senate reform and fish. If it were not so dangerous, it would be funny. I do not think anyone would seriously argue that Meech Lake does not institute a third level of government through annual First Ministers' conferences. I think that is a foregone conclusion. It might be bad or it might be good—only time will tell—but it is really a joke to say that annual First Ministers' conferences will have a fixed agenda in perpetuity that consists of Senate reform and fish. First, any hope of meaningful Senate reform will be lost because of the unanimity clause—the fact that the premiers have a veto on everything—and the fisheries, as we all know, are a federal responsibility. As someone once said, "Fish swim a lot and they tend to ignore provincial boundaries."

Honourable senators, why have discussions on aboriginal peoples' rights been removed from the agenda? Because, according to our Prime Minister and our Minister of Justice, the last conference failed to reach a satisfactory conclusion. Big deal! Canada's aboriginal peoples have been fighting for their rights since the first Europeans arrived here and started removing those rights. And they will continue to fight. They are tough, resilient, very patient and very smart. They are also driven by the knowledge that they are fighting for their very survival. Failing is nothing new to them, but quitting is, and that seems to be what the federal government has done in this case.

Does this government not understand that if ever there should be one permanent agenda item it should be aboriginal rights? They are not going to go away, nor are the problems that must be resolved. It is ridiculous for any government to suggest that there will be no future talks on aboriginal rights until it feels that a solution to all of the problems will result.

How does a premier or a prime minister who does not want aboriginal problems resolved deal with them? He simply states that there appears to be no solution available, so it will not be put on the agenda. Case closed. That's a nice way to deal with it—that's pretty neat. For those who might suggest that no premier would do such a thing, I suggest that they go back to review the tapes of the past First Ministers' conferences when that subject was dealt with. They may have their eyes opened.

Honourable senators, I think that the Meech Lake Accord as it presently stands is not acceptable to the people of northern Canada. Why should the rules concerning the appointment of senators and the Supreme Court justices be different for the territories and the provinces? Is a Yukon judge inferior to a judge from Alberta? Is Senator Ottenheimer, recently appointed from Newfoundland—and I welcome him to the chamber; I think his is a great appointment—superior to a senator from the north? I do not think he is, and I do not think he sees himself that way. Why should a premier have a right to suggest that any senator be here when a leader of the government of the territories does not have a right to do the same thing?

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister has that right.

Senator Lucier: Is there any justification for entrenching annual First Ministers' conferences, at which major decisions will be made concerning the economy, social policy and political evolution of our country, while in the same breath saying, "By the way, Yukon and Northwest Territories, you are not only denied a voice at these meetings, you will not even be permitted to attend"? It is not surprising that a government callous enough to treat its citizens in such a despicable manner would want the resolution passed with the absolute minimum of debate and exposure. I don't blame them for being ashamed of themselves.

Honourable senators, some strange things have been happening lately. First, we have seen a brave young man from New Brunswick challenge one of the premiers who signed the Meech Lake Accord. He ran on a platform of opposition to the accord and won 58 of 58 seats in his province.

Second, we have seen a rather brave young lady by the name of Sharon Carstairs from the province of Manitoba run a campaign against the Meech Lake Accord. It is the one issue on which she is questioned at every meeting that she attends. The polls say that she has gone up from 13 to 35 per cent in the standings.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: It appears to me, honourable senators, that the more people become aware of the ramifications of the Meech Lake Accord, the more they appear to question its content. Would it not be funny to watch the people of Alberta when they realize that their premier, who went to the Meech Lake conference with the specific goal of obtaining Senate reform—a Triple-E Senate—agreed to a unanimity clause which forever dooms any possible chance of meaningful Senate reform? One of these days they are going to realize that he went to get Senate reform and, instead, signed a piece of paper that forever prevents it from happening. And what did he obtain in exchange for this unanimity clause? He won the right to have Senate reform placed on the agenda of First Ministers' conferences for discussion in perpetuity. That was a great deal. Maybe somebody should have explained to him that we have been discussing Senate reform since 1867, and that he could have had that for free—he did not have to fight for it. That Mulroney must have been a great snake-oil salesman!

Of course, one of the other small things Premier Getty and his friends agreed to at Meech Lake was that Quebec could become a "distinct society." If you ask them what that term means, they shrug their shoulders and change the subject.

Honourable senators, going through this Meech Lake Accord has been a strange exercise. We have spent a year at it now. I do not think we know a lot more about it than we did at the very beginning. I do not think we have gained an awful lot. Is Quebec any closer to becoming a distinct society than it was at the beginning of this exercise? Honourable senators, we cannot discuss the "distinct society" clause without talking about the aboriginal peoples. During the hearings of the Task Force on the Meech Lake Accord and in Committee of the Whole we heard it said on several occasions, "if there is such a thing as a distinct society in Canada, surely what could be more distinct than the aboriginal peoples, who were here 30,000 years ago?" Senator Adams, Senator Watt and Senator Marchand surely qualify over someone from another country, for example, who came to Canada five years ago, took out Canadian citizenship, and resided in Quebec. An interesting observation, honourable senators, is that if Senator Adams, for instance, who lives in Rankin Inlet, moved to Ottawa or Vancouver, he would still be a member of a "distinct society." Nothing would change for him. But if Senator Flynn or Premier Bourassa moved from Quebec to Halifax, neither would any longer be distinct. They would just be ordinary Canadians at that point. They would not carry the distinctiveness with them.

Senator Flynn: Don't be so simple! Listen, you are pushing it. Try to reason a little.

Senator Lucier: If Senator Flynn does not believe that, perhaps he would like to talk to some Quebecers who have moved to Saskatchewan recently. If he does not believe that, he should move to Saskatchewan and Premier Grant Devine will show him how distinct he is. Senator Flynn is distinct when he is in Quebec; when he moves out of Quebec he will be a Canadian like the rest of us—that is what is suggested in this accord. The "distinct society" clause does not apply to the people—it applies to the Government of Quebec.

Senator Steuart: There you go, John!

Senator Lucier: I am not sure whether that is true or not—perhaps somebody should try to explain it to Senator Flynn. I am sure some people on that side of the chamber will know what "distinct society" means. No one has bothered to explain it yet, but perhaps someone would like to try it some time. I think it is interesting that if a person from Quebec moves to Saskatchewan he is no longer a member of a "distinct society."

Senator Flynn: That is nonsense!

Senator Lucier: But Premier Devine has the blessing of the Prime Minister and Premier Bourassa when he shoots them down. I think that is a very interesting concept. As a Quebecer you are distinct as long as you are in Quebec; when you move away you are just like the rest of us.

Senator Flynn: It is foolish to advance that.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I have spent almost 40 years in the Yukon, 20 of those years in active politics. I can honestly say that I have never been more proud to call myself a Yukoner than I was after the task force hearings in Canada's North. The people who made presentations had worked hard on their briefs and delivered them with such emotion and true feelings of betrayal that anyone who attended had to be impressed. We are not country bumpkins looking for a handout. We are not whiners looking for something that is not available to every other Canadian. We, the people of northern Canada, are demanding that we be given an opportunity to develop this great country along with the rest of you. The North is a very important part of Canada. Senators Watt, Adams and I represent a very proud group of Canadians who have chosen to live in a tough part of Canada. Quite frankly, I think we need you, but, as well, you need us.

Honourable senators, the Meech Lake Accord is not good enough. We Canadians can do better, and if we have the will and the imagination to do what is right for the country and its future we will do better. I think this is an insult to the people of Canada. It is particularly an insult to the people of northern Canada. There is no reason why we should be treated as second-class citizens. I think we should get on with the amendments and get this thing changed so it will be liveable for the rest of us.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, on April 30, 1987, the first ministers of the provinces and Canada assembled at Meech Lake and agreed on a series of constitutional amendments in order to bring Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family. The agreement in principle was subsequently finalized as the Langevin Agreement and signed on June 3 by all provincial first ministers and the Prime Minister of Canada.

As a Canadian and a Quebecer, I was delighted with this "miracle" of national reconciliation, which finally made it possible for Quebec to become a full-fledged partner of our Canadian Federation.

The Liberal majority in the Senate is now proposing a series of amendments which, if they are adopted, will oblige the other place to adopt the text of the accord a second time. As a representative for Quebec in the Senate, I strenuously object to this proposal which fans the fires of old feuds, divides Canadians instead of uniting them and gives rise to further useless confrontation.

By recognizing that Quebec is a distinct society within the Canadian nation, the Meech-Langevin Accord is merely putting words to a reality that was already implicit in the Constitution adopted by the Fathers of Confederation. From my earliest years to this very day, all governments in Quebec have favoured policies that were characteristic of that province. In this respect, the continuity of philosophy and political action is, with all its diversity, a remarkable phenomenon, from Maurice Duplessis to Jean Lesage, Daniel Johnson, Jean-Jacques Bertrand, Robert Bourassa, René Lévesque, Pierre-Marc Johnson and again Robert Bourassa. Quebec has always been a distinct society and if you wonder why, Senator Lucier, I will tell you because of its traditions, its rationalism, its language, religion and culture, its laws and institutions. The preservation and promotion of this distinct society has always been an overriding concern of the various political parties in Quebec and their leaders. Why not acknowledge this reality? And since acceptance of this principle was part of the conditions set by Quebec for becoming a partner in our Constitution, why run the risk of a new wave of "indépendantisme"? Have we already forgotten the troubled years of the "souverainiste" movement, and the referendum that was won thanks to the Canadian loyalties of a majority of the people of Quebec? The wounds are still too fresh to raise new obstacles to Quebec's acceptance of the Canadian constitutional proposal. Maintaining two solitudes is the surest way to cause further confrontation, while the Meech-Langevin Accord is a generous, realistic and positive gesture of long-awaited reconciliation that has finally been achieved. The consequences of denying the existence of a distinct society would seem to be far more dangerous than the implications of recognizing and approving this principle.

Another controversial issue is the role of the federal government in relation to that of the ten provincial governments.

Honourable senators, we are being offered two visions of Canada.

One thrives on confrontation, the other on co-operation; one is based on the struggle for power between the federal government and the provinces, the other on mutual respect; one projects an image of rivalry, while the other sees the parties as partners working together to serve Canadians.

The 1987 Constitutional Accord clearly leans towards co-operation, mutual respect, association and union.

I support the option of a more united and thus stronger Canada.

To me, the 1987 Constitutional Accord is inspired by the very essence of federalism, mainly the principle that the federal government and the provinces can work together for the greater benefit of Canada and Canadians.

The patriation of the Constitution, the formula whereby Canada is able to adopt its own constitutional amendments, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms are historic landmarks, and we recognize that fact.

However, there was a very serious flaw in the process, since these decisions were made without the consent of Quebec, without the consent of the government elected by this distinct society.

In 1982, while most Canadians were celebrating, Quebecers were left out.

In 1980, however, Quebecers had said "no" to sovereignty-association and yes to the renewed federalism they were solemnly promised during the referendum campaign.

Some witnesses appearing before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons pointed out the serious consequences this kind of situation would have in the long run for the unity of this country. Mr. Pickersgill mentioned the ensuing grief and bitterness. I remember this period and from personal experience, I agree.

Robert Stanfield's verdict was that in 1982, we created two Canadas.

Gordon Robertson also gave us a clear warning:

... it is an extremely dangerous situation for the future, if we leave it one in which there is that sense of grievance, frustration, and even perhaps of betrayal.

The recent accord now gives us a chance to heal the wounds and reunite Canada.

As Solange Chaput-Rolland said before the committee:

It was not until the day after Meech Lake that, for the first time, I felt we had won the referendum.

The accord allows Quebec to take its place within our constitutional family, which I think is extremely important for the country as a whole. It also provides a framework for increased co-operation between the two levels of government.

Honourable senators, I will not elaborate on the provisions the accord contains in this respect. We are all familiar with them. However, I would like to look at some of the repercussions.

I will start with our federal institutions. By giving the provinces the option of proposing candidates for appointments to institutions as important as the Supreme Court and the Senate, the accord reinforces the very nature of our federation.

As far as the Senate is concerned, the accord paves the way for new reforms that may materialize in the second round of constitutional talks. That reform, in fact, provided under the accord.

The desired objective is increased participation by the provinces in the national decision-making process. An initial step has already been taken in this direction, and the tentative provisions set forth in the accord clearly reflect this objective.

In fact, the proposal also reflects what the Fathers of Confederation had in mind in 1867, when they provided that the Senate would be a forum for expressing the concerns of the regions on national issues.

With respect to First Ministers' conferences, about the economy or other issues, the accord has put an end to a problem that has always undermined the harmony of federal-provincial relations.

Until 1985, the federal government alone determined the subject, formula and dates of these conferences. Every time this led to discussions about suitable dates for bringing the First Ministers together.

In the Meech-Langevin Accord, the Prime Minister of Canada and his provincial counterparts have unanimously agreed to meet once a year. The accord thus adds an element of stability and harmony to the relations between our two levels of government.

Constitutional reform can be pursued in an orderly manner, free of past constraints, since the accord provides for an annual constitutional conference.

Exchanges on the immigration question will also take place in a more relaxed atmosphere, since federal-provincial agreements of the kind we have had in the past seventeen years and which have already proved satisfactory will be better protected from now on.

In concluding, I would like to say a few words about the federal government's spending powers.

The accord recognizes the integrity of provincial jurisdiction in shared-cost programs and guarantees reasonable compensation for provinces whose programs, in addition to being adapted to the specific needs of their population, are compatible with national objectives.

Finally, honourable senators, the Constitutional Accord paves the way for a stronger Canada, and it does so in three ways:

First, it enables Quebec to participate without reservations in the future of our country.

Second, it creates a framework for cooperation instead of confrontation between the federal government and the provinces.

Third, the sense of unity between federal and provincial governments will help us to deal better with the challenges the future holds in store.

Honourable senators, for all these reasons I intend to vote in favour of the resolution, in the hope that this personal "yes" will be shared by all members of this chamber, although I do not cherish many illusions about that.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I listened carefully just now, as I am sure all honourable senators did, to the words of Senator David.

I doubt that there is anyone in this house who questions—certainly I do not—the assertion that Quebec has many distinct features. I applaud the efforts of francophones to maintain their language and culture in North America. There is no disagreement among us on that.

The question is not the end but the means. That is what we are talking about; that is what we are debating. The real question is whether the specific measures in the Meech Lake Accord are the correct ones to support the francophones in Quebec in their efforts.

I suppose that as a layman I might say to Dr. David, "We agree that the aim is to maintain the patient." But I suggest to Senator David—I do not expect him to believe me—that the remedies and procedures recommended to him by the experts, the specialists, in this case may very well endanger the life of the patient. I hope he understands my point, because I mean it in the best of goodwill. There is no notion in my mind that francophones in Quebec are to be suppressed. The truth of the matter is that they are to be encouraged in every productive way. We are to applaud them just as loudly as we can. I speak as a Scot, with not a drop of English blood in my veins. They are to be applauded for doing what we failed to do.

What I am afraid of is that if the Meech Lake Accord prevails we will end up with effectively two Constitutions in Canada. I think the rule with regard to the interpretation of the Constitution, the "distinct society" rule, is defective. It is defective because of its practical implications for Canadian unity.

I have heard the importance of the "distinct society" rule of interpretation dismissed—not in this chamber but outside. It has been argued, "Well, it has only to do with language." But let us look at the section.

The proposed new section 2 of the Constitution of Canada sets forth two new rules of interpretation. The first has to do with linguistic duality. The second says that the Constitution is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a "distinct society." That second rule of interpretation is substantial. It stands on its own. It could stand even if the language duality rule were not there at all.

Clearly, language is a part of Quebec's distinctiveness. But the distinctiveness to be promoted under this rule goes far beyond language. That this analysis is correct is shown by the inclusion of subsection 4 to the proposed new section 2. We are told there that:

Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language.

The conclusion, then, is that rule 2, the "distinct society" rule, is of general application. Its scope is complete; the rule applies throughout the whole of the Constitution, subject only to the modifications set forth in section 16. However, it may be said that although its scope is wide, its influence does not go deep. That is what we are being told here in Ottawa.

Therefore, we must go back to subsection (4), the non-derogation clause. If we were to read that clause as saying that the division of powers is to be found by the courts to be exactly the same in the future as it has been found to be in the past, then rule 2, the "distinct society" rule, would be a nullity. The courts will not accept that view. The alternative is that when constitutional questions come to be decided in the future, the courts will give the new rule of interpretation its full force in cases involving Quebec. Indeed, the very first question that a judge will have to answer when a case comes before him is this: Does this statute, this regulation, this order, this policy have any effect on Quebec as a distinct society? If it does, the decision of the court may then have to be different where Quebec is involved than it would be if Ontario, New Brunswick or one of the other provinces were involved.

As I understand what has been said, the division of power between Parliament and the National Assembly—and here I am talking about Quebec—remains exactly as it is now in all settled cases. There is no attempt to roll back what has already been settled. However, from the date the Meech Lake Accord becomes law the court will have to take this new rule into account. In other words, in the future in particular cases the decision of the court may be different from what it would have been in the absence of the "distinct society" rule.

Senator Murray was very clear on this last year. On May 7 he was asked:

When the courts come to consider specific cases involving that distribution of powers . . .

And here I interject, the distribution of powers in section 91 and 92—

. . . will they or will they not be bound by the new provision that the Constitution of Canada is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society?

Senator Murray replied:

Honourable senators, the proposal is that the Constitution will provide in that interpretative clause that the Constitution is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with 'distinct society,' and also what I have summarized in my language as being 'linguistic duality.' The Constitution shall be interpreted. It is not intended to exempt any particular section of the Constitution from that interpretative clause.

He then continued:

We do not purport to change the distribution of powers, and the courts do not change the distribution of powers. There is a process for changing the distribution of powers.

In political science or in public law a distinction is made between two ways in which constitutions are changed. We talk about the formal process of amendment; we refer also to the informal method of constitutional amendment. What Senator Murray is saying—and now I inflict my words upon him—is that there is no formal amendment with regard to the distribution of powers, but that from the moment this new rule of interpretation becomes part of the constitutional law of Canada a powerful new factor will influence the process by which informal amendment of the distribution of powers takes place.

What is likely to be the result? I have listened carefully to the evidence that we have had from the government to see whether they would put before us a specific example of where they thought this new rule would have an important impact. Honourable senators, we have had not a single example. However, let me propose one. When the validity of the War Measures Act was tested in the Fort Frances case, the judges decided that the "peace, order and good government" clause gives Parliament the right to enact such a statute to deal with an emergency, even though the act authorizes measures relative to matters such as property and civil rights in the province—matters which normally are within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislature. Now, however, when the new emergency powers statute has been enacted, the court will have to decide whether that statute—which will eventuate from Bill C-77 the new emergency powers legislation which is now before Parliament—is valid generally. That will be the first question, and it will be, I think, pretty easy to answer. The second question that will have to be answered is whether it is valid in the distinct society which is Quebec. In other words, there will be two questions to be asked as to its validity.

In answering the second question the court will have to decide whether the measures taken under Bill C-77 affect detrimentally the distinct identity of Quebec society. At that point the court will have to begin the difficult and prolonged task of establishing the specific characteristics of Quebec.

Honourable senators, what the "distinct society" rule does is this: It opens up the prospect that in some circumstances measures that will be intra vires the Parliament of Canada in nine provinces will be ultra vires in the province of Quebec.

[Senator Stewart.]

The fact that the rule of interpretation runs both broad and deep is shown by what was said by the Premier of Quebec, Robert Bourassa—who I assure you understands this document extremely well. He said in the National Assembly, and I quote:

... first we must conclude that the distinct society clause is a major victory which is more than sheer symbolism, because henceforth the Constitution of the country will have to be interpreted in light of this acknowledgement. The French language is a basic aspect of this specificity, but there are others such as culture as well as political, economic and judicial institutions. As we have said on a number of occasions we did not want to be more precise so as to avoid reducing the role of the National Assembly in promoting this specificity ...

However, honourable senators, we really did not have to rely upon the Premier of Quebec for that information, because the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in its report talks about the distribution of powers. At page 45 of its report the committee deals with this very point in a very revealing manner. I quote from page 45 of that report:

... the Joint Committee was advised that the definition of the scope of a legislative power is an ongoing process of allocating subject matters to heads of jurisdictions. Take, for example, the regulation of markets for financial securities. Would such a law be classified as an aspect of the federal 'trade and commerce' power, as some say, or of 'property and civil rights' within exclusive provincial jurisdiction, as others contend? And what about a new law purporting to regulate the content of radio or television broadcasting? As new laws are made and challenged before the courts this process of classification of laws into federal or provincial jurisdiction continues.

A sentence or two later, they say:

The ongoing process of the constitutional "classification" of laws by the courts is one of the important areas where the interpretative provisions of the "linguistic duality" and "distinct society" clauses will come into play. Indeed, if this were not so, then the "linguistic duality" and "distinct society" interpretative provision would be meaningless, a result that can hardly have been intended by its framers.

● (1640)

They then go on to talk about the peace, order and good government clause, what is often referred to as the "residual power." There they quote no less an authority than Senator Murray. He is quoted as having said the following:

... the powers that accrue to the federal Parliament by virtue of the peace, order, and good government clause are every bit as explicit and as safe as any of the other heads of powers that are enumerated in the old Constitution Act of 1867.

I will ask the Deputy Minister of Justice whether he would like to add something in a more complete and professional way to this statement.

Then Mr. Iacobucci is quoted as having said:

There is nothing I could usefully add. I believe it is the analysis we have advised the government on.

Then our joint committee formed its conclusion as follows:

The net result of the advice received by the Joint Committee is that federal powers are "safe" but that they continue to be subject to judicial interpretation and evaluation. The possibility, therefore, exists that the affirmation in section 2(3) of the role of the government and legislature of Quebec "to protect and promote" Quebec's distinct society could be used by the courts to interpret the distribution of powers in a way not precisely the same as these powers would have been interpreted if the "distinct society" clause were not part of the constitutional mix.

I smile at the sly use of the expression "... not precisely the same ...," because whether the interpretation will be precisely the same or very far different will depend on the meaning of the expression "distinct society," and that has not yet been revealed.

Senator Murray has told us that he has no definite meaning in his mind when he uses this expression. Indeed, he has sought to turn the ambiguities of the rule, the fact that it provides "no precise terms and ground rules"—an expression he used yesterday in recommending precise terms and ground rules—into a great strength and virtue. So now we have a new maxim for constitution writers: Be vague; be ambiguous; fly from precision; avoid establishing a rule of law, for a rule of law will foster predictability. Do not tie the judges' hands with law; rather, rest the future of the country on the unfettered discretionary power of the judges. What Senator Murray has given us as a new rule for constitution-makers, we might call, I suppose, "Murray's rule." Alternatively, we might call it "the rule of constructive ambiguity."

Senator Flynn: That is very humorous.

Senator Stewart: Unlike Senator Frith, Senator Murray is a modest man.

Senator Frith: Senator Frith? You are right, but I do not think that you meant me.

Senator Flynn: That could not be applicable to you.

Senator Frith: It certainly could, but I do not think he intended it to apply this time.

Senator Stewart: In any case, Senator Murray is a modest man. The Fathers of Confederation—I mean the 1867 version—were very wise men. Senator Murray told us that yesterday. They applied "Murray's rule of constructive ambiguity," Murray says, but not as a maxim for, as a maxim, it was unknown to them; rather, they applied it from a kind of subconscious political instinct.

On March 31, 1988, Senator Murray said that long ago he was taught that the experience of a number of countries where constitutions were precise was that such constitutions did not last very long or, at any rate, were not very successful. He went on to say:

In 1867 the Fathers of Confederation set down "peace, order and good government," without much further elaboration. They left it to succeeding generations of Canadians and to the courts to interpret what that meant. The same applies to "property and civil rights."

Well, Senator Murray is wrong.

Senator Murray: I used some other examples as well.

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray is saying that he is wrong on the examples I have quoted. The truth of the matter is, wisely or not, the Fathers of Confederation did seek precision. The expression "peace, order and good government" was an old expression in the law in 1867. In fact, that expression was first used, as far as I can ascertain, on October 26, 1689. I quote from the Report Pursuant to Resolution of the Senate, 1939, which states:

The Royal Proclamations, the commissions of all colonial governors, the constitutional statutes of colonies, in so far as any of these related to the making of laws, all ran in the same terms. Up to 1867 the sole source of jurisdiction to enact any kind of statute of the provinces which entered Confederation was a Royal Proclamation or Commission or an Imperial statute authorizing the making of laws for the peace, order and good government or for the peace, welfare and good government of the colony concerned.

There was nothing ambiguous in Lord Thring's mind and in the Fathers' minds when those words were used in section 91 of the British North America Act.

Senator Flynn: Not in relation to the division of powers. It is not the same thing at all.

Senator Frith: You have not listened to what was said about it.

Senator Stewart: Similarly, the property and civil rights provision in the division of powers was not new in 1867. It was not a vague and ambiguous term. It was used in section 8 of the Quebec Act where it was provided that "... in all matters of controversy, relative to property and civil rights, resort shall be had to the laws of Canada as the rule of decision of the same ...". These were not instances in which "Murray's rule" was applied.

But Murray was wrong in a second way; and he was wrong in a far more important way.

Senator Flynn: You have not been right up to now.

Senator Frith: No, Murray has not.

Senator Stewart: The truth is that the new "distinct society" rule has not been abandoned as a shapeless block of marble. The sculptors already have been appointed. Under subsection (3) of the proposed section 2, the legislature and the Government of Quebec are to be assigned the duty of preserving and promoting a distinct society. Part of their obligation as they perform their constitutional function will be to define the meaning of that term. Every judge will be most reluctant to overrule, to second guess those who functionally have the important constitutional responsibility of promoting the distinct society. Does anybody believe that the Supreme Court of Canada will set itself up as the master, the custodian, the second-guesser over the National Assembly of Quebec in performing its constitutional role under subsection (3) of section 2? Nobody really believes that.

The egregious error of this part of the Meech Lake Accord is, first, that it imposes too heavy a burden on the legislature and Government of Quebec, a burden falling little short of self-determination. The second egregious error is that it imposes an insuperable burden on the Supreme Court of Canada, the burden of acting as the Almighty reigning in and superintending the promotion of the distinct society in Quebec. I submit that the Supreme Court of Canada will not undertake to perform that function in any way comparable to the way it passes on ordinary statutes.

Honourable senators, I come now to my second topic. I shall not take up as much time on it, and I hope that I will not agitate honourable senators opposite as much as I did earlier. I have Senator Flynn particularly in mind. I want to say a word or two about the proposed new section on shared-cost programs.

Senator Flynn: I wasn't too sure where you were going.

Senator Stewart: I am sure you had no idea where I was going.

Senator Frith: I agree. He didn't follow you at all.

Senator Flynn: May I ask a question?

Senator Stewart: Certainly.

Senator Flynn: Were you saying what you were saying about the distinct society because you oppose the insertion of these words in the motion?

Senator Stewart: I thought I had made my position very clear—

Senator Flynn: You're against it.

Senator Stewart: —at the beginning. You weren't listening.

Senator Flynn: You didn't say that you were opposing it.

Senator Stewart: I propose to support the amendments that have been moved.

Senator Flynn: But then you will be supporting the "distinct society" concept. I do not know how you can read it otherwise.

Senator Stewart: Senator Flynn, it should be—

Senator Flynn: Read it! It is there!

Senator Stewart: You can read it yourself! Certainly I have read it! To have only two rules of interpretation is one thing, but to put those rules in the context of a set of several rules changes the interpretative significance greatly. An isolated mountain peak is far different from a peak in a range of mountains. The senator is a distinguished lawyer, and he knows very well what he is trying to do!

Senator Flynn: But I don't know what you are trying to do!

Senator Stewart: I know what he is trying to do. He is trying to obfuscate.

Senator Flynn: "Obfuscate," what's that?

Senator Frith: O-b-f-u-s-c-a-t-e, that is the word. You can look it up, too!

Senator Stewart: I don't think it is an unparliamentary term.

Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the house, so let me go on. I am sure that Senator Flynn does not want me to delay the house either, but perhaps I will put in a footnote. Senator Flynn is really trying to delay us. He has been providing a kind of shrill obligato all afternoon. He has not done this for many months; now he is back to normal.

Senator Flynn: I have to have good health to listen to you!

Senator Stewart: He has done the same thing with every speaker on this side. I suppose that simply tells us where he sits.

I want to say something about shared-cost programs, because they are important to the part of the country from which I come. The shared-cost programs have been of great value. I refer to shared-cost programs such as the early old age pensions, the TransCanada Highway, hospitalization, Medicare, and even federal assistance for post-secondary education during one phase of its evolution.

Let us remind ourselves of what happens under the present Constitution. Ottawa proposes the establishment of a shared-cost program for a particular purpose. It offers to pay the government of every participating province a part of the cost. Unless a special opting-out provision is included, any provincial government that decides not to establish a program conforming to the federal standards and principles is ineligible for a payment in relation to that program. But the effect of the proposed new section 106(A) will be to restrict the spending power. The federal Parliament is to lose its right to set national principles and standards.

What will happen? I think two things can be anticipated. First, eligibility for compensation will depend on having a program or an initiative compatible with the national objectives. In other words, eligibility is to depend upon compatibility of ends. The means may be entirely different in each of the ten provinces, but if the ends are the same the provincial government gets the money. The terms "balkanization" and "cantonization" have sometimes been used to describe the result. Second, there will be no assurance that the provincial government will support its program or initiative with much money from its own revenues. We know what has happened in the case of post-secondary education.

The response to these criticisms has been that if the federal government does not like what the provincial governments are prepared to do, they can abandon the proposal to establish the program. As Senator MacEachen said yesterday, that is what we fear. We are afraid that when the federal government brings in proposals for new shared-cost programs or proposals to update, for example, hospitalization and Medicare—as the Canadian Nurses Association told our committee, they will have to be updated—they will become discouraged by the unwillingness of the provincial governments to agree to common standards and principles.

Senator Murray: But those examples are not potential shared-cost programs.

Senator Stewart: That is a point that can be debated. I understand what the honourable senator is saying. He is saying that any changes to these programs will simply be revisions; however, I think we can anticipate that if the revision is a considerable one, some provincial governments will say, "Look, let's be candid. This is really a new beginning." I think in candour the senator will admit that that is an argument that will be made. Certainly the Canadian Nurses Association and Doctor Al Johnson indicated that it is a line of argument they anticipate provincial governments will adopt.

As a representative from Nova Scotia, a province which has benefited greatly from shared-cost programs, it would be unthinkable if I did not register my protest against what I regard, perhaps incorrectly, as a rich-province attempt to cut down, to pare away the effective spending power of the Parliament of Canada.

Now, I would like to really go to the east coast and to say a word about the inclusion of roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries on the permanent agenda for the constitutional conferences. Senator Murray has told us that the term "roles and responsibilities" is broader than jurisdiction. We ought not to assume, he implies, that what is contemplated is an amendment relating to fisheries jurisdiction. What is he suggesting? Is he suggesting that constitutional amendments relating to the construction and repair of wharfs, dredging, the provision of ice for cooling fish are the matters to be discussed? If he thinks that these are the topics that will be put forward for potential constitutional amendments, may I suggest he call Brian Peckford right away. Permanently on the table in every negotiation relative to constitutional amendments—whether unanimity is required or whether the amendment is one that could be made under the seven provinces rule—will be the question of fisheries jurisdiction. The Meech Lake Accord deals the Premier of Newfoundland perhaps not the ace of spades but a very high card. Nova Scotia fishermen say that the early gull gets the fish. In this instance, the Premier of Nova Scotia was not an early gull; he seems to have been gulled.

The proposal in the amendments deals appropriately with this error. It does not erase the reference to roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries—that would be too much to ask of Premier Peckford—but they will take the fisheries question off the table after one year.

Senator Frith: That it does not necessarily have to be on the agenda.

Senator Stewart: They will not automatically be on the table. That's the point.

Senator Murray: What if they want to discuss it?

Senator Stewart: They may want to discuss many things. Senator Murray is an experienced politician. One of the problems of putting this permanently on the agenda is that any Premier of Newfoundland coming to a negotiation for constitutional amendment will have to go back home with something to show on this line, whether or not he really thinks it is a price which he ought to exact for agreeing to other amendments. That is the political problem that this amendment will raise for any Premier of Newfoundland in the future. And, of course, the Premier of Nova Scotia will be in the position of having to refuse any amendment along those lines—and we understand the kind of stalemate—

Senator Murray: They have discussed it at virtually every constitutional conference in the last decade.

Senator Stewart: I thought that you were now launching a new and productive chapter. You lead us to expect that in the future these discussions will produce amendments.

I come now to what I think will be the general effect of the Meech Lake Accord. The Honourable Eric Kierans told the joint committee that this accord:

...is the closest that we have come to following the original intent and meaning of the British North America Act.

Well, if the Meech Lake Accord embodies the original intent and meaning of the British North America Act, the Fathers of Confederation certainly failed to make evident their intent and meaning. They gave the Parliament of Canada the plenitude of power and then subtracted the specific matters listed in section 92. They gave the Parliament of Canada an unlimited power to tax. They gave the Parliament of Canada an unlimited power to spend. They gave the Parliament of Canada the declaratory power. They gave the Governor in Council the right to appoint the governors of the provinces. They gave the Governor in Council the right to appoint the judges of all provincial courts at or above the County Court level. They gave the lieutenant governor the power to reserve provincial bills. They gave the Governor in Council the power to disallow provincial statutes.

Here Mr. Kierans is wrong and Senator Murray is right. According to Senator Murray, the general purpose of the Meech Lake Accord is to take a giant step toward putting the intentions of 1867 far behind us. There is to be a transformation. Instead of being, as the Constitution Act, 1867 states in section 3, one nation, Canada—the language in the statute is "One Dominion", an outmoded term—with certain legislative powers assigned to Parliament, and certain other legislative powers assigned to provincial legislatures, Canada is to be a union of provinces. We are to be provinces united.

Senator Murray made the aims of the government clear on March 31. At that time he was talking about the way in which, under this accord, we would select our senators and members of the court. He said, at page 3051:

It is exceptional that the federal government should be under no legal obligation to consult the governments of the member States or any other authority when the time comes to appoint Supreme Court judges or senators.

That is a very carefully contrived sentence, but the implication is clear, and the rest of the Meech Lake Accord is entirely consistent with that implication.

Then, on the same day, he summed up. At page 3055, he said:

The Meech Lake Accord will help transform our Constitution, a document which, with limited change, has served us for 120 years. It will help transform it into a more authentically federalist document.

Take that, Kierans! He goes on to say that he believes that the new Constitution will be more in accord with current Canadian conceptions.

The total effect of the Meech Lake Accord will be to reduce the ability of the power of the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada to act on behalf of all Canadians. That may be an attractive prospect for politicians from the rich provinces—all those provinces that were enriched by gifts of territories endowed with natural resources made to them unilaterally by the Parliament of Canada. That may be acceptable to such politicians. It may be acceptable to rich provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan, who would never think of asking for federal funds for farmers, as Senator Argue and Senator Olson are constantly telling us.

It is a dismal prospect, however, for the people of Nova Scotia, who joined Canada in 1867, very reluctantly, on the assumption that Canada would have a Parliament and government competent to advance the national interests of all Canadians, including Nova Scotians.

In 1867 Nova Scotia was shanghaied into Confederation by a Tory majority in the Nova Scotia Legislative Assembly, without a mandate to do so. That inaugurated some 70 years of complaints, grievances and protests. Since 1945 those complaints, grievances and protests have died away. They have died away because, since about that date, the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada have been prepared to use their powers—those left with them by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—in ways beneficial to the people of Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces.

It now appears that another Tory majority, without a mandate on this important matter, is determined to weaken the powers of the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada. They seem determined to move Canada toward the very model of federalism that Sir John A. Macdonald warned us to avoid. They want to move us toward the model of federalism, weighed and found wanting and rejected emphatically by our American neighbours. How ironic it would be, honourable senators, if the theory of federalism embraced by the Southern Confederacy some 125 years ago were to triumph in Canada in 1988!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it is not an easy task to follow Senator Stewart with his learned statements about various legal aspects. Although he wanted to prove, with some very polished legal arguments, that a distinct society cannot exist under our present legal system and conventions, the fact remains that no one since the beginning of Confederation has denied the existence of a Quebec, different from the other provinces. I would say to my friend Senator Stewart that the facts are always ahead of the law.

In this case, the Canadian government and the provinces wanted to give this particular fact a legal framework through the Meech Lake Accord.

The term distinct society does not give Quebec more rights or privileges. It merely restates a Canadian fact of life. The term distinct society, as Senator David said earlier, defines and reaffirms the existence of a community consisting of a majority of French-speaking Canadians.

This community has its own history, institutions and culture, its own way of life, its own outlook and its own values. The members of this community have developed a strong sense of identity.

For many years, in fact for generations, this sense of identity in Quebec led to a subsequent withdrawal from the outside world of a community exhausted by the constant struggle to safeguard and stand up for its rights. Then one day came the Quiet Revolution and the need to meet the challenge of modern technology and economics. Suddenly Quebecers felt this immense urge to take their place in a world that would challenge the traditional structures and institutions of Quebec society, and more than ever before, the place of Quebec society within Confederation.

My friends, Quebecers were delighted in 1980 when they were told about constitutional reform, the changes that would take place, and the promise that if they voted no in the referendum, very substantial constitutional changes would be made.

The mood quickly changed when the Canadian Constitution was patriated without Quebec's participation. I will not get into the historic debate that took place in this chamber on the patriation of the Constitution.

Suddenly, Quebec was isolated, and throughout this period we felt almost like outlaws, living on the fringes of our country's Constitution.

We had to wait for Brian Mulroney to regain the trust of Quebecers with the Meech Lake Accord. And now, despite the long way we have come, there are still people who refuse to acknowledge the Quebec situation because they are afraid that under the accord Quebec will be able to obtain more rights within the Canadian federation. This is really beyond me.

When the Meech Lake Accord was signed, the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Robert Bourassa, stated that he was proud to be a Canadian, to be a citizen of a country whose national unity had just been reinforced.

The Prime Minister of Canada said that it was a very long time since we heard that kind of statement from a Quebec Premier.

Other Quebecers also proclaimed their Canadian patriotism to borrow a phrase from Mr. Trudeau, after the Meech Lake Accord was signed. Solange Chaput-Roland stated before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, and I quote:

The Meech Lake agreements have not gone unnoticed in the province of Quebec. Those 60 per cent of Quebecers who voted no to independence and yes to Canada felt it in their hearts and in their souls . . . Since the signing of the Meech Lake Accord, I feel I am becoming more and more Canadian.

In 1982, Canada was split in two, as Robert Stanfield said before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. Today, thanks to the 1987 Accord, we have one Canada and one Canadian nation.

The Meech Lake Accord ends the constitutional isolation of Quebec, a situation that Gordon Robertson qualified as "extremely dangerous", and the feelings "of injustice, frustration and even betrayal" which according to Mr. Robertson were caused by the 1982 Accord.

Thanks to the Meech Lake Accord, Quebecers have now become full-fledged members of the Canadian federation.

There are those who claim that acknowledging the distinct identity of Quebec has brought us closer to the two nation concept and will one day lead to sovereignty association.

Honourable senators, these people do not know the historical, social and political reality of Quebec.

The Meech Lake Accord recognizes and reflects the Quebec reality.

It also puts it in context. Not only does the accord recognize Quebec's distinctness but it also places it in the broader context of Canada's linguistic duality. The Special Joint Committee rightly pointed out:

What is described as "a fundamental characteristic of Canada," the existence of linguistic minorities, that is French-speaking Canadians concentrated in Quebec but also present in the rest of the country and English-speaking Canadians concentrated in the rest of the country but also present in Quebec . . .

Quebec's specificity must therefore be understood within the context of this linguistic duality of Canada, this recognition that French-speaking Canadians are present everywhere in the country and that English-speaking Canadians are also present in Quebec. That is the Canadian reality!

This linguistic duality is Canadian and Parliament and all provincial legislatures, including Quebec's, are to protect it.

The Special Joint Committee stressed the importance of the role that from now on falls to every government in the country. In its report, we read:

Equally significant is the situation in which the other provincial premiers found themselves. They went to Meech Lake to deal with the issue of Quebec as a distinct society . . .

That was the main reason for the provincial premiers to go to Meech Lake.

. . . they returned home with the commitment to enshrine in the Constitution the obligation to protect French-language minorities in their provinces. They agreed to recognize exclusively the presence of these minorities as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Obviously, the Saskatchewan government's reaction to the Supreme Court decision dashed some of our hopes.

As President of the International Association of French-language Parliamentarians, I took it upon myself to send a letter to the Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Grant Devine, in which I said:

As President of the International Association of French-language Parliamentarians, I must draw to your attention the serious consequences that the bill concerning the use of French could have for Saskatchewan's francophones and French Canadians in general and the survival of the French language.

May I request that you speak on my behalf to your government for it to reconsider this initiative.

This is an important problem for the survival of French culture in the English provinces. I think that everything necessary should be done to solve it as quickly as possible.

So one of the effects of the accord is to integrate the distinct society of Quebec in this fundamental characteristic, Canada's linguistic duality, at the same time making it a vital element of the distinct character of Canada.

The accord also maintains legal equality among the provinces without prejudice to the Charter of Rights and without in any way reducing the legislative powers of the federal government.

According to Queen's University Public Administration School Director Richard Simeon, and I quote:

Of all the means we could have chosen to represent the distinct character of Quebec in our federal institutions, those which have been used in the Accord seem to represent the smallest challenge to the other important values of Canadian federalism.

Other people have also rejected the suggestion that the Meech Lake Accord puts us on the slippery slope towards two nations. Honourable senators, simply read what Mr. Robert Stanfield had to say before the special joint committee. Here are some of his remarks:

I do not see anything in the Accord which puts us on that slippery slope towards two nations . . .

He said.

. . . On the other hand I believe we were led to a dangerous slope after 1982 . . . If the negotiated accord is rejected we will again find ourselves on that slope. As I see it, that is the slippery slope about which we ought to be concerned.

Let us not forget either that when Quebec was excluded from the constitutional family of 1982 the National Assembly of Quebec refused to accept the legitimacy of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms which was imposed without its consent and which reduced its powers.

While some Canadians were bound to the Charter, others were excluded. That is why at the beginning my remarks, I said that we looked like outlaws before the Canadian Constitution. In that context, the Charter could not help promote a system of common values and therefore reinforce our national unity.

Honourable senators, thanks to the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec accepts fully and willingly, without any deletion or modification, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as well as the whole Canada-oriented set of values described therein.

In short, the Meech Lake Accord recognizes the Quebec reality, sets up a Canada-wide definition of our linguistic duality which makes room for Quebec as a distinct society, gains Quebec's acceptance of the Canada's constitutional and social set of values, and secures Quebec's full participation in the Constitutional renewal process.

In my opinion, therefore, the Meech Lake Accord can only contribute to our national reconciliation and strengthen our unity.

● (1720)

[English]

Honourable senators, I believe that the accord represents an historic achievement for Canada and Canadians. It repairs the damage done to national unity when Quebec was left out of the agreement which led to patriation of the Constitution and it makes us a stronger country.

I agree with the joint committee that to provide in the Constitution that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society is to recognize a fact, not a right or a power. Moreover, the wording makes it clear that Quebec's distinct society is part of a larger entity—Canada. The federal government alone will continue to exercise the international personality of Canada and to represent the interests of Quebec, as it does those of the rest of the country.

That said, as a result of international arrangements negotiated by Canada, Quebec already enjoys the status of participatory government within the Agency for Technical and Cultural Co-Operation and within the Summit of Francophone Nations. Quebec has every reason to see in the Constitutional Accord a confirmation of this acquired status, which it exercised very effectively at the recent meeting of francophone countries in Quebec City and which can only serve to enrich Canada.

In the National Assembly, on June 19, Gil Rémillard said that Quebec:

...has been acquiring a greater role in international relations while respecting the federal government's jurisdiction over external affairs.

Mr. Rémillard added:

It is Canada, as a sovereign country, which sets the framework for action by its policy in external affairs.

[Senator Asselin.]

[Translation]

Honourable senators, our friend the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate mentioned the danger that Quebec, while exercising its rights at the international level, might encroach on the rights and powers of the federal government to exercise its exclusive jurisdiction over international matters. I wish to remind my honourable friend, Senator MacEachen, that the agreement which makes it possible for Quebec from time to time to play a role on the international scene was there thanks to the umbrella provided in 1964 by the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. Honourable senators will remember, I think, that Honourable Senator MacEachen was then a minister in Mr. Pearson's Cabinet.

This agreement made it possible for Quebec to intervene in areas of its own jurisdiction on the international scene, while respecting Canada's sovereignty and exclusive jurisdiction in foreign policies.

That is what happened at the time and this is what happens again whenever Quebec participates in a Francophone Summit. It operates within the federal delegation and takes initiative only in matters of provincial jurisdiction.

I insisted somewhat on this argument because people might think that the Meech Lake Accord provided Quebec with new powers at the international level, while reducing the federal government's sovereignty and exclusive jurisdiction in foreign matters.

Honourable senators, this is the way I understand the Meech Lake Accord which will give Quebecers a new feeling of belonging to the Canadian federation.

Whatever their political affiliations, Quebecers in this Parliament cannot remain indifferent or insensitive to this constitutional development. Thank you very much.

[English]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in my remarks on the Meech Lake resolution I would like to deal with three separate topics.

I would, first, like to show that the government is wrong when it claims that the Meech Lake Accord is a natural outgrowth of the constitutional amendments agreed to by the federal government and nine provinces in 1981. In fact, I will show that the Meech Lake Accord reflects a vision of Canada which runs entirely counter to the vision reflected in the 1981 constitutional amendments. The real truth, as I will establish in a moment, is that the Meech Lake Accord reflects the Conservative Party's vision of Canada while the 1981 amendments reflect the Liberal Party's vision of Canada.

Second, I would like to comment on three specific elements of the Meech Lake Accord which I find particularly offensive. While it would be easy to criticize virtually all elements of the accord—and, indeed, speakers in this house have already done so yesterday and today—I will limit my remarks to three items on which I have had considerable personal experience and which I believe are illustrative of the badly flawed premises on which the accord is based.

Third, I will comment briefly on the amendments to the Meech Lake resolution which have been introduced by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and point out why they make the resolution more acceptable to those of us who passionately believe in the vision of Canada, which has long been the basis of Liberal Party policy and which has long been supported by most Canadians.

First, then, let me turn to the issue of what I have called two competing visions of Canada. During the federal-provincial constitutional debate of 1980-81 two sharply conflicting visions of Canada were evident. One vision was supported by the federal government and the Conservative governments of Ontario and New Brunswick while the other vision was supported by eight other provincial governments.

To understand these two sharply differing and conflicting visions one need look no further than the two different preambles to the Constitution which were proposed during those negotiations. The federal preamble was based on the premise that the basic unit of Canadian society is the individual. Indeed, it began with the words: "Parliament and provincial legislatures, and various governments and their agencies, shall have no other purpose than to strive for the happiness and fulfillment of each and all of us."

The view of the group of eight provinces who opposed the federal government and the Governments of Ontario and New Brunswick was that it was the provinces, or more precisely provincial governments, which were the ultimate source of Confederation. Thus, during those negotiations in 1980 and 1981 they proposed a preamble that included the words: "The provinces of Canada choose to remain freely united." In this vision of Canada it is the provincial governments, not the people, which are seen to make up the country, and it is the provincial governments which are seen to be the basic unit of Confederation.

The Meech Lake Accord reinforces this provincial compact theory of Confederation, this provincial compact view of Canada, in the following ways. Let me give you an example. By including the so-called "distinct society" clause and refusing to ensure that this clause will not impinge on any rights which are now guaranteed in the Constitution under the Charter of Rights, the Conservative federal government is saying, in effect, that the rights or powers of provincial governments are more important than the rights of individual citizens.

The Meech Lake Accord reflects, therefore, a vision of Canada which is precisely the opposite of the vision which underlies the 1981 constitutional amendments.

It is hardly surprising, however, that a Conservative government should support this view of the role of the Province of Quebec in Confederation or, indeed, this vision of the nature of the Canadian federation. For example, it has been a long-standing view of previous Conservative leaders.

Consider the fact that Robert Stanfield, when he was leader of the Conservative Party in the federal House of Commons, supported what was in those days called the "two-nation" theory of Confederation. His successor, Joe Clark, both when he was Leader of the Opposition and then as Prime Minister, argued that Canada was—and these are his words, not mine—a community of communities. Thus, both of Prime Minister Mulroney's predecessors as leaders of the federal Conservative Party have argued for a form of special status for Quebec and a form of the provincial compact theory of Confederation.

Moreover, this view of the nature of Confederation—this vision of Canada—has also been articulated on many occasions by Conservative premiers across the country. Let me give you two examples. Former Premier Lougheed, speaking on behalf of his fellow premiers at one of the constitutional conferences in 1980, said:

We view Confederation as a compact.

Premier Peckford has said that the federal government was "the agent of the provinces . . . and not the other way around."

• What these statements by both former federal Conservative Party leaders and Conservative premiers show is that the Meech Lake Accord is a clear reflection of the long-standing Conservative Party vision of the nature of Canada and the nature of Confederation.

It is precisely this vision which was rejected overwhelmingly by the federal government of Prime Minister Trudeau and by the Conservative premiers of Ontario and New Brunswick in 1981. It is therefore completely misleading to suggest, as Conservative spokesmen, including the Leader of the Government in the Senate, have on occasion suggested, that the Meech Lake Accord is a natural sequel to the 1981 constitutional agreement. In fact, it reflects exactly the opposite vision of Canada.

Let me give you one other illustration of this difference between the competing visions of Canada. One need only look at the statements the government has made respecting the immigration clauses of this agreement to realize how completely the federal government has accepted the provincial compact theory of Confederation.

The federal government has said that in the future the Government of Quebec and, indeed, the government of any other province, if it so chooses, will have the power to provide all services which new immigrants to Canada receive. These services will no longer be supplied by the national government. Thus, new immigrants settling in Quebec will be taught that they are citizens of Quebec rather than citizens of Canada living in Quebec. This will inevitably lead to immigrants thinking that they are provincial rather than Canadian citizens.

This vision of Canada and of the nature of the Canadian federation, as I have said, runs exactly counter to the vision that was put forward, and which many of us in this Chamber fought so hard for, in 1980 and 1981.

A second major difference in the vision of Canada reflected by Meech Lake and the 1981 constitutional agreement can be seen in the way both agreements deal with the issue of the degree of protection to be offered to members of minority language groups in a province. The federal government's position in 1981 was that the basic bilingualism of Canada must be affirmed in the Constitution and that minority language rights arising from that bilingualism must be protected everywhere in Canada.

The parliamentary supremacy argument of the premiers in 1980 and 1981 led them to the conclusion that their legislature and, hence, the language majority group of the province had the right to determine language policy in that province. Thus, the premiers of that day concentrated their attention on protecting the power of the language majority, whereas the federal government, helped by the Governments of Ontario and New Brunswick, made the language minority group the focus of their constitutional position.

This issue of the language rights of the majority versus those of the minority has been dealt with in the Meech Lake Accord. What we find in the accord is a position which requires that the Government of Quebec "preserve and promote" the French language in that province, but in the other nine provinces the only requirement of provincial governments is that they "preserve" the rights of francophones, the minority language group.

Recent action by the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan show how little they are committed to even preserving the language rights of francophones in their provinces. Indeed, Bill 2, which was recently introduced in the Saskatchewan legislature, does not preserve rights which the Supreme Court has said francophones in that province have had ever since Saskatchewan became a province. It is very clear that Bill 2 in the Saskatchewan legislature runs counter to both the letter and the spirit of the Meech Lake Accord.

If this is an example of what Prime Minister Mulroney has repeatedly called the spirit of Meech Lake, then the future rights of minority language groups in Canada are in trouble. Clearly the Meech Lake Accord has accepted the underlying premise of the group of eight premiers who opposed the federal government's constitutional position in 1980 and 1981, namely, that the role of government is to protect the power of the language majority rather than protecting the language minority group from the tyranny of the majority. As a result, the Meech Lake Accord supports the duality vision of Canada rather than the bilingual vision of Canada, which was a fundamental premise of the Liberal Party's position in 1980 and 1981.

Meech Lake is based on a vision of Canada which is almost certain, over time, to lead to a unilingual French Quebec and nine other unilingual English provinces. Meech Lake, as one would expect from a Conservative government, is based on a two-nation duality vision of Canada which is exactly counter to the thrust of the entire debate and all the amendments of 1981. Thus, with respect to the way it treats minority language rights, the Meech Lake Accord, far from being a natural sequel to the 1981 amendments, as the government has suggested, tries to at least partially undo what was accomplished in 1981.

[Senator Kirby.]

Again, it should be noted that the vision of Canada which is reflected in the Meech Lake Accord has long been a vision supported by members of the Conservative Party. To see this we only need to note some of the comments which government members in the other place are making with respect to language legislation which is now before that chamber. What, in fact, has happened is that Meech Lake has once again catered to the narrow views of a considerable number of members of the Conservative Party.

● (1740)

A third element of the federal government's vision of Canada during the 1981 negotiations involved the balance which should exist between the degree of local diversity and the degree of national community in Canada. The federal government's belief was that Canada is a national community which respects diversity, indeed, extols pluralism, protects the rights of the individual and the collective rights of its citizens. But the Liberal vision also was that Canada is more than the sum of its parts; that it is far more than merely a community of communities.

The Liberal view also was that there were national values and characteristics which were more important and should override a blind commitment to provincial diversity and, in particular, a blind commitment to provincial legislative autonomy. This is why the federal Liberal government fought so hard for an entrenched Charter of Rights and why it opposed—and why the Liberal Party still opposes—the notwithstanding clause in the current Canadian Constitution.

The perspective of the eight provinces which initially opposed the repatriation of the Constitution in 1980—a perspective which I have said reappears again and again in the Meech Lake Accord—was the overriding importance of local diversity in contrast to national values.

Indeed, in 1981 the eight provinces that opposed the Charter of Rights did so mainly because they felt it would constrain their ability to be different from other provinces, and also because this ability to be different was more important to them than the national values which the Charter would put into effect from coast to coast in Canada.

The view that Canada is more than the sum of its parts, that there is a national interest which is distinct from and, indeed, greater than the aggregation of regional interests, is fundamental to the Liberal vision of Canada, and was fundamental to the position which the federal government took in 1980 and 1981. That is why the Liberal government of that day fought for an entrenched Charter of Rights which defines common values for all Canadians. That is why the Liberal government of that day insisted upon a constitutional commitment to equalization. That is why the Liberal government of the day promoted mobility rights and why it argued that as a member of the national community every Canadian has the right to pursue a living, take up residence, and receive a comparable quality of basic public services anywhere in Canada.

Indeed, this belief that certain kinds of public services—such as the issue of Medicare and medical services which has been raised here today—should be available under similar terms and conditions anywhere in Canada was precisely the reason why, in 1981, the amendments made it clear that the provinces that chose to opt out of constitutional amendments in the future were not to be given fiscal compensation for that decision.

The Liberal government in that day, and the Liberal Party today, firmly believes that giving fiscal compensation to the provinces will simply encourage them to opt out of future national cost-shared programs and thus weaken the pan-Canadian nature of future services which should be provided to all Canadians on a truly national basis and, equally importantly, at a national standard of quality. The Liberal government in 1981 believed that uniformly administered cost-shared programs were a major part of the social contract that binds Canadians together.

The current Conservative government, however, in its rush to give the provinces everything they wanted in the Meech Lake Accord, and in its rush to embrace the provincial compact theory of Confederation, has ensured that there will never again be established in Canada a truly national cost-shared program. The Meech Lake Accord establishes, once and for all, that local variation and, above all, provincial paramountcy and power are more important than national services provided with a national standard of quality, particularly in the social policy area.

Liberals have long believed that a comparable quality of service, particularly essential services such as, for example, daycare, should become in the years ahead an integral part of being a Canadian citizen. Services of comparable quality should—indeed, must—be available to every Canadian. The level or quality of service should not depend on the province an individual Canadian happens to live in. For this reason the Liberal Party has strenuously argued for, and, indeed, will continue to fight for in the future, national programs which are comparable not only in their objectives but also in the quality with which they are delivered to the individual citizens of this country.

By offering fiscal compensation to any province that chooses not to participate in a national cost-shared program the federal government has absolutely ensured, through the Meech Lake Accord, that this aspect of Canadian citizenship will be lost in future cost-shared programs. The end result will be a country in which national programs are not truly national and a country whose citizens will be forced to find out what kinds of public services are available in any given province before they move there.

Thus, in its proposed constitutional amendment relating to cost-shared programs the Meech Lake Accord is putting into effect a vision of Canada which is exactly contrary to the vision which was put forward by the federal government and the Provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick in 1980-81. Thus, in this area, too, we see that the claim by the government that Meech Lake is a natural sequel to the constitutional amendments of 1981 is completely false. It is, however, as I have said, a natural sequel to the vision of Canada which leaders of the Conservative Party, both federal and provincial, have supported for a long time.

In summing up this part of my remarks on the Meech Lake resolution, I wish to stress the fact that the reason that a great many Canadians are strongly opposed to the Meech Lake Accord is that it represents a retreat from their long-held and passionately-supported vision of a bilingual, multicultural Canada to a vision of Canada as two nations, one English and one French-speaking, each with geographically defined limits.

The Meech Lake Accord also represents a retreat from the vision of Canada as a national community whose strength comes from shared values, claims, obligations and opportunities to a vision of Canada in which provincial, rather than national, values are paramount.

The Meech Lake Accord also represents a retreat from a vision of Canada as a country where the focus of public policy is on the rights of the individual to a vision of Canada in which the rights of provincial governments are more important than the rights of the people they are elected to govern.

It is for these reasons, honourable senators, that I reject the basic premises of the Meech Lake Accord, and why I resent the blatant and false attempts by the government on various occasions to suggest that the Meech Lake Accord is, in any way, an extension of the grand vision of Canada which the federal government had in 1980 and 1981.

Let me turn now to a few comments on the specific elements of the Meech Lake Accord. I have already indicated my strong opposition to the principles of the accord and the vision of Canada reflected by these principles. As a result, it would be easy to take virtually every part of the accord and point out the reasons why I disagree with it. Rather than do so, however, I will limit my comments to three specific amendments about which I feel strongly on the basis of my experience as a senator, as a Nova Scotian and as a former Secretary of the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations.

First, let me comment on the issue of Senate reform. For the last 20 years, and, indeed, for decades before that, many different proposals have been advanced for Senate reform. While these proposals have often differed in detail, virtually every single one of them has been based on two principles: One is the principle that senators should be elected and the other is the principle of greater Senate representation for the four Atlantic provinces, the four western provinces and the northern Territories.

The Meech Lake Accord will make the achievement of Senate reform, embodying either of these two principles, impossible. Let me explain why. Let us first consider the issue of the likelihood of all provincial governments agreeing to an elected Senate, and I say “all” because changes to the Senate can now be made only under the unanimity provisions of the amending formula. The Meech Lake Accord clearly establishes a permanent role for provincial premiers on the national scene in areas of federal jurisdiction. Given this role which the premiers have now won on the national political stage, it is extremely unlikely that they will agree—that all of them will agree—to increase the number of elected representatives from their province in Ottawa, since this would create a new set of elected politicians whose claim to speak legitimately for the people of their province would equal that of provincial premiers. The last thing most provincial premiers want is additional voices in Ottawa with a legitimately powerful claim to speak for the interests of their province. The premiers do not want this added competition on the national stage. Moreover, having acquired the power to at least prepare a list from which the person selected to fill a Senate vacancy must be chosen, it is highly unlikely that the premiers—and again let me remind you that it takes all of the premiers—will agree to give up this power to influence events in the federal Parliament. Neither are they likely to want to give up their power to convert the Senate into a chamber which reflects the view of their provincial government. Therefore, in my view, the creation of an elected Senate is virtually impossible under the Meech Lake Accord.

But perhaps more importantly, since senators are part of the federal Parliament, it seems to me that we must ask why provincial governments should have any say in the method by which senators are appointed. It is true, as I am sure some senators will recall, that almost a decade ago the Supreme Court of Canada, commenting on Bill C-60, said that provinces do, in fact, have a say in the distribution of Senate seats.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry to interrupt you, senator, but it is now 6 o'clock and according to the rules I must adjourn the debate until 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

• (2000)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The sitting is resumed.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, before we adjourned for dinner, I was explaining why in my view under the Meech Lake Accord the creation of an elected Senate will be virtually impossible. I concluded my remarks before the dinner break with the observation that, since senators are part of the Federal Parliament, one has to ask why provincial governments should have any say in the method by which they are appointed.

While it is true that the Supreme Court ruled with regard to Bill C-60 a decade ago that provinces have a legitimate voice in the distribution of Senate seats among provinces, the court also said that the method of appointment of senators was up to the federal government. Therefore, there would appear to be no justification for Prime Minister Mulroney's voluntarily giving up this power to the provinces.

Indeed, if the Prime Minister really believes in an elected Senate, as many of us in this chamber, including myself, have argued for publicly for many years, he should have moved to create an elected Senate without giving any premier a veto over such a change. By giving this veto, the Prime Minister has made an elected Senate impossible.

The other key premise underlying most proposals for Senate reform that the Meech Lake Accord will make impossible to achieve is the movement toward a greater number of Senate seats for the four Atlantic provinces, the four western provinces and the northern territories. Indeed, if those regions are to be given more Senate seats, we should ask ourselves where they would come from.

Anyone familiar with the political problems faced by any Quebec premier, of any party, will realize that it would be politically impossible for a Quebec premier to agree to reduce the percentage of seats in the Senate from the Province of Quebec. If a Quebec premier agreed to reduce the percentage of Quebec senators in this chamber, it would amount to his agreeing to weaken Quebec's influence in Ottawa, something no Quebec premier could do without suffering political consequences at home.

Consequently, I suggest that the percentage of Quebec seats in this chamber will never be lower than on the day Meech Lake goes into effect. Therefore, the only way in which the Atlantic provinces, the western provinces and the northern territories can increase their percentage of seats in the Senate is for the seats they gain to be taken entirely from the Province of Ontario.

While Ontario has indicated in the past its willingness to consider slightly reducing the percentage of seats it holds in this chamber, it would clearly be politically foolhardy for an Ontario premier to agree to a drastic reduction in Ontario's representation in the Senate in order to increase the representation from Atlantic and western Canada and the territories, if the other large province in Canada—namely, Quebec—refuses to accept any reduction in its percentage of seats. Therefore, the relative balance of the number of senators among the regions of Canada is going to be impossible to change under the Accord because of the unanimity provisions of the amending formula.

It seems to me, therefore, that Senate reform, which many of us in this chamber believe in passionately and believe is essential and long overdue, will be impossible to achieve because of Meech Lake.

I should add also that what the clauses on the reform of the Senate in the Meech Lake Accord clearly prove is the degree of constitutional rigidity which has been introduced by the new unanimity provisions of the amending formula. These provisions ensure that it will now be virtually impossible for any meaningful constitutional amendment to be written into the Constitution, unless, like some parts of the Meech Lake Accord, the amendment involves a transfer of jurisdiction, a transfer of power from the federal government to the provinces.

Let me turn now to a few comments on the fisheries issue, which Senator Stewart spoke on earlier today. The Meech Lake Accord requires that constitutional conferences be held every year.

Hon Charles McElman: Would the honourable senator accept a question at this point?

Senator Kirby: Yes.

Senator McElman: The honourable senator has obviously given a good deal of thought to reform of the Senate, and he has spoken of numbers. What about powers for the reformed Senate? Have you given any thought to that matter?

Senator Kirby: Yes, I have. I favour a power solution somewhat like that in the British House of Lords, in which the Senate would have a suspensive veto. But the fundamental purpose of a reformed Senate should be to deal with, and settle, interregional issues in Canada. At present interregional conflicts are not dealt with effectively in the federal Parliament but are now handled provisionally through First Ministers' conferences.

In my view, the real mistake of institutionalizing First Ministers' conferences has been the transfer of the inevitable interregional bargaining, which takes place in any federal state, from the federal Parliament to an extraparliamentary forum, which we call First Ministers' conferences. My concern has always been that, to the extent we do this, we not only weaken the role of the federal government, but we give a degree of legitimacy to provincial premiers in areas that go beyond their jurisdiction, because First Ministers' conferences, almost inevitably, have on their agenda only items of federal jurisdiction.

I strongly believe that one of the major thrusts of Senate reform should be to weaken the role played by the First Ministers' conference as a decision-making body, which is essentially what it has become, and to transfer the interregional bargaining that must occur in a federal state back to this chamber.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Senator Kirby: I should like to turn now to a couple of comments on the fisheries issue as touched upon in the Meech Lake Accord. The accord requires that constitutional conferences be held every year. One of the items on the agenda of such a conference is the issue of fisheries.

In other words, fisheries jurisdiction, which, since the country was started in 1867, has always been an exclusively federal responsibility, will be up for grabs in the transfer of power from the federal government to the provinces every year at the constitutional conference—forever.

Premier Peckford has repeatedly stated—indeed, he restated his position extremely clearly a few days ago in a speech in the Newfoundland Legislature—that his goal is to have the Constitution amended to give Newfoundland control over the catching and processing of fish located off Newfoundland. Premier Peckford continues to argue, as he did during the constitutional negotiations of 1980 and 1981, that fish living in what he regards as Newfoundland waters—which in his terms are coastal waters out to the edge of the 200-mile limit—are a provincial resource and should be treated as such under the Constitution.

The Meech Lake Accord is the key to Premier Peckford's achieving his stated aim of control over all fish off Newfoundland, since the accord guarantees that every year there will be a chance to push for provincial control over fish allocations at a constitutional conference. If seven provinces and the federal government agree with Newfoundland's position, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, even if they combine forces, cannot block a constitutional amendment which would give Newfoundland jurisdiction over fisheries.

When that happens the people in my own province of Nova Scotia will lose their existing right—a right they have exercised since long before Confederation—to have access to fish stocks off Newfoundland.

Even if Newfoundland fails to win fisheries jurisdiction on its first try, or its second or third try, the threat to Nova Scotia will not disappear. The Meech Lake Accord ensures that the issue will keep coming back year after year after year.

Like an open-ended game of Russian roulette, sooner or later political conditions will favour Newfoundland's case and some Prime Minister, trying desperately to curry favour with the Premier of Newfoundland, supported by other provinces who, as a matter of principle, will accept any transfer of power from the federal government to the provinces, will give to Newfoundland the jurisdiction it so desperately seeks.

In 1986, 140 million pounds of fish were caught by Nova Scotia fishermen in the waters Newfoundland wishes to control. If jurisdiction over fisheries is transferred to the provinces, that 140 million pounds of fish will be reserved for Newfoundlanders and the result will be the loss of thousands of jobs in Nova Scotia fishing communities such as Lunenburg, Canso, Liverpool, Louisbourg and many others.

The clause in the Meech Lake Accord that places the issue of fisheries jurisdiction on the agenda of an annual First Ministers' conference forever, ought frankly to have been opposed by the Premier of Nova Scotia during the Meech Lake negotiations; but he did not do so. In his attempt to do whatever the Prime Minister wanted, Premier Buchanan placed the future of Nova Scotia's most important industry in jeopardy. The threat to the livelihood of thousands of Nova Scotians is far too serious for Nova Scotia to take any chances. The fisheries clause in the Meech Lake Accord should be amended to give every east coast province the right to veto any change in the division of fisheries powers between Ottawa and the provinces. That would allow Nova Scotia, or indeed any other coastal province, to block constitutional changes that favour fishing industries and fishermen of some provinces at the expense of others.

At the very least, the Meech Lake Accord should be amended so that fisheries jurisdiction is on the agenda of only one First Ministers' conference—only the next constitutional conference—and it should be amended to ensure that it is not automatically on the agenda of every constitutional conference thereafter, forever. Yet, when both these amendments are proposed, we are told by the federal government that they will not support or allow any amendments to the Meech Lake Accord. I think we have to ask why they would not accept even this one minor amendment. Surely it is impossible for them to argue—although they try to do so—that such an amendment in any way impacts on what we are constantly told is the purpose of the Meech Lake Accord, namely, getting Quebec to sign the Constitution. Clearly, an amendment of the fisheries clause does not affect the fundamental government purposes for the Meech Lake Accord.

I suspect that the real reason why the federal government will not agree to this amendment is that the Prime Minister is too weak-willed to be able to stand up to any provincial premier, even one whose political future is on as shaky ground as Premier Peckford's is at the present moment.

I note with pleasure, however, honourable senators, that the Leader of the Opposition in the Nova Scotia legislature, Vince MacLean, has waged such a powerful campaign against the fisheries clause of the Meech Lake agreement that, at least temporarily, Premier Buchanan has backed off trying to ram the resolution supporting the accord through his provincial legislature. I remain hopeful, therefore, that even though Nova Scotia can expect no help from the federal government—federal spokesmen, including those from Nova Scotia have made that very clear—it may in the end be saved by the Liberal opposition in the Nova Scotia legislature from the consequences of the Meech Lake resolution as they apply to the fishing industry.

Finally, honourable senators, let me comment on the issue of the creation of new provinces. Prior to the Meech Lake Accord, new provinces could be created without the approval of provincial legislatures provided that, in creating those provinces, the boundaries of existing provinces were not affected. Thus, for example, Newfoundland joined Canada in 1949 after a vote of the Parliament of Canada and the people of Newfoundland, but without requiring the formal approval of the legislatures of the nine provinces which existed at that time.

I see no reason for changing this practice. I believe that there is no justification for the clause in the Meech Lake Accord that requires the unanimous approval of all provinces before new provinces can be created. Indeed, in light of the fact that no representatives of either the Yukon or the Northwest Territories participated in the Meech Lake discussions, this agreement affecting their future is an extreme example of legislation without representation.

We must, therefore, ask why this particular clause is included in the Meech Lake Accord. To answer this question we need look no further than at the statements some premiers have made about this specific clause. For example, Premier Bourassa has indicated that he regards the creation of new provinces as a threat to the wealth of Quebec, particularly if the provinces are created in regions where natural resources are rich in abundance. This is a not very subtle way of saying that he is opposed to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories becoming provinces because Quebec would lose a share of the natural resource wealth from the territories that now goes to the federal government, if these territories became provinces.

As Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations from 1980 to 1983, I had many discussions with both legislators and the general public in the north about their aspirations for constitutional development in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and about their deeply held desire to eventually become provinces. I said then, and I continue to believe now, that these are very legitimate aspirations and that progress in this direction should be made in an orderly, step-by-step way until full provincial status is achieved in the not-too-distant future.

To have this potential achievement put in jeopardy by the Meech Lake resolution borders on the unconscionable. What it does is set up a situation in which, before a new province can be created, before the people living in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories can fulfill their aspirations for their region of the country to become a province, the federal government will have to give something to the provincial premiers in return for their support.

The long history of federal-provincial constitutional negotiations in this country establishes beyond a shadow of a doubt that provincial support for a proposed federal constitutional amendment is given by the provinces only if the provinces see themselves as getting something in return.

Thus, the Meech Lake Accord says to the people living north of 60 that their legitimate political aspirations can be fulfilled only as a consequence of a power-trading bargain between the federal government and provincial governments. It is clearly wrong to constrain the rights of northerners in this way. There is no justification for it other than the desire of the premiers to acquire more power for themselves and the unwillingness of the Prime Minister to stand up for the rights of northern Canadians.

I now turn, honourable senators, to a few brief remarks on the proposed amendments to the Meech Lake resolution that the Leader of the Opposition introduced in the Senate yesterday.

The proposed Liberal amendments introduced in the Senate by Senator MacEachen, the Leader of the Opposition, address many of the concerns I have outlined in my remarks thus far. For example, the proposed amendments to subsections 2(1) and 2(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 would help to correct the problems in the Meech Lake Accord caused by the failure of that accord to offer adequate protection to official language minorities throughout Canada. These amendments also stress the fundamental characteristics of Canada including its aboriginal peoples, its multicultural nature and its regional diversity.

The concern that section 16 of the Constitution Amendment, 1987 would give the legislature of Quebec the right to constrain some of the individual rights and freedoms which are now guaranteed under the Charter of Rights would be eliminated by the proposed Liberal amendment to section 16.

The concern I expressed in my earlier remarks about provincial governments not agreeing to an elected Senate would be alleviated by the proposed Liberal amendment relating to the method by which senators are appointed. I must point out, however, that this amendment does not deal with the more fundamental need to reduce the percentage of senators who now come from central Canada—from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario—in order to increase regional representation in this chamber from the Atlantic provinces, the western provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

The proposed Liberal amendment to section 7 of the Constitution Amendment, 1987, which would have the federal government provide reasonable compensation to a province that chooses not to participate in a national cost-shared program provided that the provincial program meets minimum national standards, is certainly a move in the right direction. In my view, however, the fundamental problem associated with cost-shared programs, namely, the truly national programs as we have grown to know them in this country and as they have been enforced in recent years through legislation, such as the Canada Health Act, will remain. I would have hoped for a stronger amendment in this area.

I strongly support the proposed Liberal amendments to section 9 of the Constitution Amendment, 1987, which deals with the amending formula. Canada continues to be the only federal country in the world that has a unanimity provision in its Constitution, and the extension of the unanimity rule, as proposed under the Meech Lake agreement, will only make future constitutional change in this country virtually impossible. Indeed, it is the unanimity rule that, as I have already said, guarantees, in my view, that we will never get meaningful Senate reform.

Finally, honourable senators, I also support the proposed amendments to section 13 of the Constitution Amendment, 1987, which restore aboriginal rights to the constitutional agenda and put fisheries only on the agenda of the First Ministers' meeting on the Constitution.

As I have already indicated, the proposed Liberal amendments modify the Meech Lake Accord in ways I regard as highly desirable. I therefore support them fully.

But let there be no doubt. I continue to oppose passionately the vision of Canada that is reflected in the Meech Lake Accord. No amount of tinkering, or touching up with minor amendments, can change the fact that the Meech Lake Accord reflects a vision of Canada that I have opposed during the more than 20 years I have been involved in politics and government at both the federal and the provincial level in this country. For that reason I have enormous regret that the Senate lacks the constitutional power to block the entrenchment of the Meech Lake Accord.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Bazin: Honourable senators, the Meech Lake Accord is a new step in the constitutional evolution of our country. Other steps were made in 1982 when Canada patriated its Constitution and added to it a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Unfortunately, Quebec's refusal to join in cast a shadow on these achievements.

Thus in building our country, we were faced with a major obstruction since 1982 because Quebec was not part of our constitutional family.

Today the 1987 accord affords us the means to put an end to Quebec's isolation and allows Quebec to take back the place it rightly deserves at the constitutional table.

By ratifying the 1987 Constitutional Accord, we shall hold out our hand to Quebec and we shall restore Canadian unity.

We shall also lay the foundations for future achievements to which all elected governments will contribute.

On the other hand, if we reject the accord, we would maintain the split that occurred in 1982 when the Constitution was patriated under circumstances that both the elected Government of Quebec and the Quebec National Assembly rejected.

Some of the provisions of the accord, such as the interpretation clauses of linguistic duality and the distinct society, the provisions relating to spending powers and the amending formula, have attracted much attention.

Other less prominent provisions did not attract as much attention, but it does not mean they are less important or have a more limited scope. On the contrary, they play an equally central role in our constitutional evolution.

Such is the case of the Supreme Court of Canada. This institution is the keystone of our judicial system. It provides both individuals and governments with final interpretations of the Canadian Constitution, including the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments, the rights and freedoms guaranteed under the Charter and the interpretation of ordinary federal and provincial statutes.

However, this essential institution is not explicitly recognized in our Constitution. It was simply created by an ordinary act of Parliament. The federal government has the exclusive authority to select and appoint the nine members of the Court and an ordinary act sets their salary and defines their mandate.

In spite of this lack of a constitutional base, the Supreme Court has always shown a very high degree of integrity, impartiality and quality in discharging its responsibilities. This because its members adhere strictly to the principle of the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law.

Nevertheless, as was pointed out by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, there has been increasing pressure in the last fifteen years to include in the Constitution a number of the essential characteristics of our highest court. This included recognizing the institution as such in the Constitution and giving it the status to which it is entitled. It meant providing for balanced participation by the federal government and the provinces in selecting and appointing its members and in future changes in the membership and infrastructure of the court.

The resolution before this Chamber today proposes a number of constitutional amendments.

The court will be defined in the Constitution as the general court of appeal for Canada. The Constitution also provides that it will consist of nine judges, three of whom will be appointed among lawyers or magistrates who have passed the examinations of the Civil Bar of Quebec. Qualifications, terms of appointment and remuneration of the members of the court will also be included in the Constitution.

Even more important, a new joint federal-provincial mechanism for selecting judges of the Supreme Court will be provided in the Constitution. This mechanism will, of course, recognize a characteristic that is so essential to a federation like ours, namely that both levels of government have an interest in the organization and membership of this important institution.

Thanks to the joint mechanism, when a vacancy occurs in the court, provincial governments will have the right to submit to the federal government names of qualified candidates who have been admitted to the Bar of the respective provinces or have been judges of their courts, and the federal government will fill the vacancy by selecting a name among the suitable candidates appearing on these lists. Where a vacancy occurs in one of the three positions set aside for Quebec, the vacancy will be filled by a candidate whose name was submitted by the government of that province. In the case of other vacancies, a suitable candidate will be selected from names submitted by the nine "common law" provinces.

There has been some criticism of certain aspects of the new appointment mechanism. I would like to comment briefly and try to respond to some of these criticisms.

A number of people who appeared before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons claimed that the candidates submitted by provincial governments would become judges with a provincial bias. Such fears are unfounded. It is as much in the interest of the provincial governments as the federal government to ensure that our highest court consists of individuals with outstanding qualifications as legal scholars. Furthermore, the Supreme Court maintains a profound sense of the independence of the judiciary which would certainly not be affected by the new procedure. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons defended this view in the following terms, and I quote:

We believe that a provincial bias among newly appointed judges is no more likely than a federal bias among the present judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Legal scholars who have examined the issue whether the court has displayed a federal bias in its constitutional decisions have been unable to substantiate any such bias. Indeed, recent constitutional jurisprudence would, if anything, suggest a provincial bias.

Other witnesses criticized the absence of a mechanism for resolving a stalemate, in cases where it is impossible to agree on a suitable candidate. Some people would prefer to amend the resolution before this chamber to provide for such a mechanism. That is also the position taken by the Opposition in its proposed amendments.

According to its proposal, if both governments failed to agree on the choice of a suitable candidate within a period of three months following a vacancy, the chief justice would have the power to make an interim one-year appointment from among justices of the Federal Court of Canada or provincial superior courts.

Honourable senators, this proposal is not a mechanism for resolving a stalemate. It simply encourages both governments, in case of a conflict, to drag their feet, and fails to provide a solution if no agreement has been reached within one year. Furthermore, it totally ignores a fundamental conclusion drawn by the Joint Committee regarding the role of non-elected intervenors in political stalemates, and I quote:

This flies in the face of the principle that all members of the judiciary, and particularly the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, should be appointed by persons responsible to the electorate.

But let us also ask ourselves the following question, "What government really has an interest in blocking the appointment of a judge to the highest court in the land if there is a vacancy?" To ask the question is to answer it. In this case, it seems to me that we must believe in the governments' good faith.

Finally, the territorial governments' inability to name competent candidates from their bar and bench under the accord was also criticized.

The report of the joint committee presented the situation realistically, while recognizing that competent residents of the territories continue to be eligible for the position of Supreme Court judge under Section 101(G)(1) of the Constitution.

The report concludes that in practice, it is very unlikely for the provincial governments to nominate such individuals.

Although I am not at all convinced that this will really be the case, since all provincial governments will want to present the best possible candidates, I subscribe to the joint committee's proposal that the matter be reviewed by the first ministers at their first constitutional conference. The purpose of this review would be to see whether in practice the territorial governments should have the same status as the provincial governments regarding these appointments. Personally, I believe that they should and I hope that this will be achieved at a later stage.

More generally, I share the opinion of the joint committee and of most members of the other house that the present constitutional amendments are really workable. Moreover, they are needed to bring Quebec into the Constitution and they fit in with the objectives of national reconciliation and true federalism.

The special joint committee that studied the accord last summer and on which this house was represented states that without Quebec's participation:

The Constitution will continue to evolve one way or another without the participation of an essential partner in Confederation.

Or, as Mr. Pickersgill said:

We could leave unattended a wound of which the enemies of Canadian unity might take advantage.

As long as Quebec will not feel at home around the constitutional table, it will be hard to find the support required to push through the reforms which are still necessary to meet the country's needs.

In fact, it will not be possible to proceed with certain reforms which at the present time require the unanimous consent of all the provinces and of Parliament.

Since we cannot afford to relegate Quebec to the role of an unwilling partner in the federation, it goes without saying that we must now vote in favour of the accord.

In my mind, it also goes without saying that no change must be made to the accord at this stage. Unfortunately, all do not share the same opinion in this respect.

During the course of their examination of the accord, the joint committee and our Committee of the Whole have heard a great number of eloquent as well as interesting arguments which were made to clarify certain points and add certain elements.

No one was left unimpressed in particular with the testimony of those who represented the native peoples. I believe however that members of the joint committee are right to suggest that:

The solution to their problems does not lie in the rejection of the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

Hopefully we will soon be in a position to foresee opportunities for success in a new meeting of provincial premiers in order to work with them in finding a fair and honourable solution to native problems. Our constitutional arrangements are clearly flawed in that respect.

However, any amendment to the accord might jeopardize the progress that is already noticeable.

Mr. Laurent Picard from McGill University had this assessment of the situation:

Any new important change or even unimportant change can and will create among some signatories the feeling of being released from the commitment... To reopen the content will probably end up destroying the commitment of some of the signatories and as a consequence, to an early rejection of the accord.

The Prime Minister and his provincial counterparts are agreed not to reopen the accord except for correcting egregious errors that might have crept in. No such error has been noted.

During their annual conference in August, the premiers once more rallied to the position firmly defended by the Canadian government, namely that the accord should not be put back on the table.

For someone with experience in labour relations, it is easy to understand that once a collective agreement has been negotiated it must be signed before initiating a new round of negotiations. To re-negotiate before signing only jeopardizes what had been agreed.

Certainly, further reforms will have to be considered during the second round of constitutional negotiations as provided for in the accord.

If we reopen the accord now, even for one change, we will make it twice as hard to refuse a second one, and three times as arduous to refuse a third one.

At that rate, it is a completely new constitutional reform we will be faced with, everyone will try to pull his own way, and any agreement will be impossible. That will be the impact of the proposed amendments on the accord.

The stakes are too high in my view for taking such a risk.

We must keep in mind that the accord is the result of a unique set of circumstances.

The time has now come to repair the damage done to national unity when Quebec was excluded from the 1982 Constitutional Accord.

If we do not take this opportunity now, who can safely predict which such an opportunity will arise again?

In order to illustrate that caveat, I would like to briefly recall the circumstances that led the First Ministers to sign the accord.

In 1984, Canadians elected a new Canadian government which had national reconciliation as a priority.

With all due respect, I think that Senator Kirby's vision of Canada is yesterday's vision marked by nostalgia. He doesn't seem to realize that the Canadian people overwhelmingly rejected that vision back in September 84.

We cannot be governed by nostalgia. Let us look ahead to tomorrow as our constituents have demanded and stop discussing the past.

Canadians were weary of the climate of confrontation that was the hallmark of federal-provincial relations and the constitutional reform process in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

They wanted their federal and provincial governments to work together to provide them with the services they needed instead of prolonging fruitless disputes.

It is in that spirit that the Prime Minister, in a speech in Sept-Îles on August 6, 1984, called for the emergence of a genuine national renewal and put forward a program reflected in the accord before us today.

I had the honour to contribute to that speech and to hear him deliver it. Beyond any partisanship and as a fortunate witness, I can only confirm the Prime Minister's deep commitment in that respect. I would also like to quote part of that speech:

We must ban, once and for all, parallel actions and duplication of efforts by both levels of government. That it why we will set up a standing federal-provincial consultation and coordination agency at the highest level, that is at the level of the eleven Premiers themselves . . .

Indeed, the accord contains provisions that apply to First Ministers' conferences. What better consultations can we have than those between all elected premiers?

Again at Sept-Îles the Prime Minister indicated that, while continuing to help the provinces finance their programs in such basic sectors as health, vocational training, and post-secondary education, the federal government would have to respect their jurisdiction over these matters.

The accord provides that fair compensation be paid to provinces which choose to opt out of shared-costs programs whose purposes or initiatives are compatible with national objectives and, as the Report of the Special Joint Committee of Senate and the House of Commons puts it:

In fields under exclusive provincial jurisdiction it is still possible to negotiate national shared-costs programs to the benefit of both the federal government and the provincial governments.

In 1984 the Prime Minister also decided he would make every effort to convince the Quebec National Assembly to endorse Canada's new constitution with honour and enthusiasm.

The accord enables us to reach that objective.

For their part, Quebecers have since elected a new provincial administration, a government which has devised a realistic program to bridge the gap opened in 1982.

And so it was that in early 1986, in both Ottawa and Quebec City, the governments were therefore eager to finish the constitutional task left undone by the exclusion of Quebec in 1982.

Another step was to be accomplished at the annual meeting of provincial premiers in August 1986 when they officially made the reintegration of Quebec their first political priority. I am sure they did not find it easy to give less priority to their own political objectives. They were certainly tempted to take advantage of the situation to voice some of their concerns.

Still they thought the national interest should prevail and preferred to avoid raising issues which might have stood in the way of agreement.

This decision was confirmed at the November 1986 First Ministers' conference in Vancouver and was to be the launching pad for extensive discussions at both the ministerial and the official levels.

On the federal side we are indebted to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations Senator Lowell Murray who played a key role in these negotiations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: Go ahead, now is the time!

Senator Bazin: The discussions I just referred to proved to be so useful that the First Ministers did reach an agreement in principle at Meech Lake in April 1987 which, concurred in later in June 1987 in the Langevin Building, became the current agreement.

[Senator Bazin.]

There is no indication that similar circumstances will ever occur again. That is precisely why the accord must be passed as is, without amendment.

I hope, however, that all Canadians understand that it will not be impossible to amend the Constitution.

I also hope they understand that the accord provides for future First Ministers conference beginning in 1988 (the so-called "Second Round") and that the amendments which we are ruling out for the time being may be introduced again within the framework of these conferences.

Following the example of professor William Lederman, a top expert on constitutional issues, I hope that the chances of making new constitutional progress will improved as soon as the accord makes it possible for Quebec to resume its place at the negotiation table.

As he pointed out when he appeared before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, we shall accomplish great things towards the Constitutional reform if we can count on Quebec's full and complete cooperation.

I am glad that he dealt among other things with the issue of aboriginal rights, and I quote:

I would doubt, for example, if there is going to be any progress in aboriginal rights until Quebec is an active participant in the proposed future conferences.

That is also the opinion expressed by members of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons who, in their majority report, pointed out that Quebec's joining the Constitution

. . . would benefit native peoples and break the deadlock which actually prevents a number of provinces to progress in this respect.

In conclusion, may I say that the Constitutional Accord of 1987 is not an end in itself but a new stage in our history. That is a perspective which we should not jeopardize, as suggested in the proposed amendments. We should remember that by moving amendments, we could only return to the situation which existed in 1982.

The idea is to turn a new leaf in the Canadian constitutional book together. There will remain many other leaves to turn. Let us not rip off the page which reinstates Quebec within the federation.

Honourable senators, I thank you very much.

[English]

Hon. Paul Lucier: Would Senator Bazin permit a question?

Senator Bazin: Yes.

Senator Lucier: Senator Bazin, I believe you are the president of the Canadian Bar Association. Does the Canadian Bar Association endorse the contents of the Meech Lake Accord, particularly the section that allows premiers to name Supreme Court judges?

Senator Bazin: If you go back to the appearance of the then president of the Canadian Bar Association before the joint committee in August of 1987, at that time the suggestion was made that consultation should be made with judges, lawyers and the public, and that committees should be established in the provinces. The president submitted that these committees should also be set up in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Last week an announcement was made that suggestions for federal court appointments would be reviewed by such committees, including committees in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Senator Frith: Federally appointed judges, not just Federal Court judges.

Senator Bazin: Yes.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, that excludes Supreme Court appointments, does it not? That only deals with appointments of judges under Supreme Court level?

Senator Bazin: I do not want to interpret what has been announced and what will happen. I would say that it is silent on the subject.

Ideally, I think these provincial committees should be used by provincial authorities, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon to gather the appropriate material and make suggestions for Supreme Court appointments.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question for Honourable Senator Bazin. He has tweaked my fancy with some of the information he has given us in his remarks this evening.

Recently, the Honourable Lucien Bouchard stated that he was the writer of the Sept Îles speech. Now we learn that the honourable senator was a writer of the Sept Îles speech.

Senator Ottenheimer: Great minds think alike.

Senator McElman: I assume the Prime Minister may have written the start of it before he got to all the things that were written. Having tweaked our fancy and curiosity, could you list the other writers who were involved?

Senator Bazin: It was an historical speech.

Senator McElman: Knowing the authorship, I am not surprised by your answer.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in this important debate on the Meech Lake Accord. From the time the Meech Lake Accord was made public in June 1987 I have heard many witnesses, both in Committee of the Whole in the Senate and in the Senate Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Accord, and I have also received briefs from ethnic organizations and have had numerous conversations with individuals on the subject.

I would now like to share with honourable senators my views on the many representations that have been made to me on the proposed constitutional amendments. In Canada the federal government, rather than the provinces, has traditionally been the source of support for equalization of rights. In 1918 the federal government extended the franchise to women. However, women in Quebec were not accorded voting rights on equal terms with men until 1940. Similar cases abound throughout Canadian history. The infamous Padlock Law, which restricted political rights, was passed by the Quebec legislature and was nullified only by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Government of Alberta tried to eliminate freedom of the press through its Alberta Press Act, but there, too, the Supreme Court of Canada disallowed the legislation, ruling it ultra vires.

On another occasion the Quebec government restricted freedom of religion, when it closed a restaurant simply because its proprietor was a member of a religious minority. Once again, Canada's Supreme Court had to overturn that basic denial of rights by a provincial government. One can only shudder to think what will happen to the defence of equal rights if the Meech Lake Accord provision allowing provinces to nominate Supreme Court judges should come into effect.

The Government of Manitoba abrogated its commitment to bilingualism in 1890, despite the clear intent of the Manitoba Act, which created that province. Yet again, the Supreme Court of Canada had, belatedly, to rectify the situation, as it had had to do in similar circumstances in a case involving the Government of Quebec.

Now, 98 years after that reversal in Manitoba, and even after the much vaunted Meech Lake Accord has been signed, the Government of Saskatchewan is trying to implement a similar provision that will deny the basic bilingual commitments of the province since 1905.

If the Meech Lake Accord can allow such things to happen, what has it really accomplished?

● (2100)

Senator Flynn: It is not in force.

Senator Bosa: Pardon?

Senator Flynn: It cannot allow that; it is not in force!

Senator Bosa: Well, the spirit of the accord is there.

Senator Frith: By a signatory!

Senator Bosa: It has been signed by the Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan, one of the protagonists—

Senator Frith: Signatories!

Senator Bosa: —of the accord.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Frith: Not at all? You mean Devine did not sign it? What do you mean?

Senator Flynn: It is not in force.

Senator Frith: But he is saying that it was signed by the very premier who reneged. That is all he is saying, and he is right.

Senator Bosa: Apparently the accord does not do much when it comes to extending or even guaranteeing equalization of rights. The only winners in the Meech Lake Accord seem to be the provincial governments, while the losers are both the people of Canada and their national government.

It seems to me that in these matters the Meech Lake Accord moves Canada entirely in the wrong direction. Rather than uniting this country as a national political community, the "distinct society" clause will, in fact, create at least two constitutional spheres—one in Quebec and the other in the rest of Canada. Very possibly, the long-term results may be as many as 11 constitutional spheres. Each province could acquire, through judicial precedent, the right to ban federal provisions at its own discretion, until only limited room would be left for national standards in a small, residual federal sphere. If not a country of sovereign associates, Canada would certainly become a pack of parochial provincialisms.

This apparent move away from the equalization of rights is particularly ironic because a number of the government's own party members have advised following the other direction. The parliamentary committee on equality rights tabled its report on October 25, 1985. That report, entitled "Equality for All," was thoughtful, comprehensive and progressive. The committee unanimously recommended the extension of equality rights to the many groups that at present lack such explicit guarantees; for example, women, aboriginal peoples and ethnic communities.

The only way for such protection to take national effect is for the federal government to set national standards and implement national programs. Provincial governments have a history of not wanting to move far in these areas. Only the federal government has the responsibility and the opportunity to develop a national vision and to give it national support.

One reason for the Meech Lake Accord's cavalier disregard of the equalization of rights and the national patrimony is undoubtedly the lack of public participation in the process. As the National Congress of Italian Canadians has reminded us, public participation in the Constitution process is essential if the final product is to acquire public legitimacy.

Such involvement by all Canadians has not yet taken place. Quite the contrary. In fact, the only participants in the accord were the 11 First Ministers and their select officials. The result shows this, because everyone but the federal and provincial executives are excluded from the constitutional process. We are presented with a document that entrenches narrow executive interests, but precious little else.

Many of those who were unfairly excluded from this latest round of constitutional negotiations, such as native peoples, northern governments and women's groups, are now claiming that not only were they denied the legitimate opportunity to participate but also their political interests and constitutional rights were actually jeopardized. For them the Meech Lake Accord represents more than just negligence; it represents actual regression.

Although it is certainly commendable to bring Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family, this should not be done at the expense of every other consideration. Quebec's constitutional veto was also granted to all the other provinces so as to avoid recriminations. As a result, any one of them can now, under the terms of the Meech Lake Accord, effectively and permanently thwart the national will. This constitutes a permanent institutionalized destruction of consensus. Since the opting-out provisions provide financial compensation to the provinces, there would be practically no incentive for them to cooperate in any future national programs.

The requirement for unanimity on constitutional change in the Meech Lake Accord will likely also harm our prospects for entrenching multicultural or aboriginal rights in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This could bring to a tragic and untimely end the evolution of rights even before they have been extended to all those who need and deserve them.

Let me explain the basis for this concern. The British parliamentary system started off by granting rights to individuals on a person-by-person basis. When the parliamentary system was adopted in Canada, two fundamental changes were necessary to make it work in our particular circumstances. On the one hand, it was necessary to design a federal arrangement with divided jurisdiction to accommodate the provinces. On the other, it was necessary to create group rights so that English and French, Catholic and Protestant would be assured due respect.

Canada has thus been a pioneer in the development of the legal framework of social rights in a parliamentary system. So far, however, only the Charter groups, the English and the French, have received specific guarantees of their group rights. The rights of two other groups still need to be elaborated and entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. Native peoples form one of these groups. Their particular status is recognized, but adequate specification and protection still await action from the federal and provincial governments. The other group consists of those whom the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism called "the other ethnic groups"—that is, those of non-British, non-French and non-native parentage. These Canadians also have needs and concerns which only an entrenched set of rights can fully accommodate.

However, the Meech Lake Accord's unanimity requirement for constitutional change would make any such future progress highly unlikely, if not impossible. The record of provincial neglect in these areas is, unfortunately, well known. Quebec has recently not been particularly enthusiastic about rights for anyone except its francophone majority. Similarly, the western provinces are equally unenthusiastic about responding to aboriginal claims and concerns. Hence, the Meech Lake Accord provides veto power against entrenching any future multicultural or aboriginal rights in the Constitution, except by the miracle of unanimous consent. Surely, in all fairness, this must be unacceptable.

As if to add insult to injury, the Meech Lake Accord also excludes the northern territories from participation in negotiating the agreement, and subjects their desire for provincehood to the aforementioned unanimity and/or veto provisions. Since aboriginal peoples constitute a large share of the population of these northern constituencies, this presents a double insult. Their claims both as native people and as political communities are being ignored by the accord.

Of course, I am not the first to raise those concerns here. The Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau made similar points during his eloquent plea for a sober second look at the Meech Lake Accord. Furthermore, many of the issues which Mr. Trudeau covered have still not been dealt with adequately by the federal government. Therefore, we should ask the same questions again.

One of the things Mr. Trudeau questioned was the government's great and unseemly haste to achieve ratification as it proceeds in such a way as to ignore all the shortcomings, weaknesses and oversights in the accord, and all the criticisms, assessments and amendments suggested for its improvement.

Why so much haste? It took the Swiss 350 years of debate before they adopted their Constitution in 1848. This government, however, went to the other extreme. The Prime Minister and ten premiers made an irrevocable decision on the constitutional amendments in a short period of time. They then said to parliaments, provincial legislatures and to Canadians as a whole, "Go ahead and debate the amendments, but regardless of your views we will not accept any changes." Would it not have been more democratic of this government to issue a white paper on constitutional reform? The government could then have initiated a national debate in which all Canadians would have had an opportunity to express their views, following which the 11 First Ministers could have made a decision based on the aspirations of the people of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau also touched on this point of the lack of public contribution to the accord. Constitutions belong not just to governments but to the people, and constitution-making should therefore involve not just governments, but the people. For my part, I can only repeat what the National Congress of Italian-Canadians has already said: "If the Constitution is to mean anything at all, it has to guarantee equality to all Canadians, and the process of developing a Constitution must involve all Canadians."

The third important question Mr. Trudeau raised involved the government's unwillingness to consider changes to the accord. No constitution should be carved in stone, nor should any of its proposed amendments. The original 1982 Constitutional Agreement underwent changes even after all governments had agreed to a text, and it did not fall apart as a result. Surely, the same must hold true in this case.

Mr. Trudeau also expressed concern about the government's refusal to refer the accord to the Supreme Court before adopting it. When a change with equally far-reaching implications was proposed for the Senate in 1978, the proposed legislation, Bill C-60, was referred to the Supreme Court for an opinion. In 1979, the Supreme Court ruled that Parliament could not unilaterally amend the British North America Act to effect fundamental changes affecting representation in, and the role of, the Senate. The Meech Lake Accord would involve changes of even greater magnitude, and it too should be referred to the highest court in the land so that its constitutionality can be determined before it is hastily, and perhaps disastrously, adopted.

Since the Meech Lake Accord was announced, objections to it have been expressed by federal parliamentarians, provincial premiers, native peoples, northern governments, women's groups, ethnic communities and constitutional experts. In these circumstances, it is our democratic duty to listen to the people and to accommodate their concerns.

For these reasons, I fully support the amendments proposed by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator MacEachen, because these amendments reflect quite extensively the aspirations of Canadians.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, Senator Bosa, in a very proper traditional beginning, said that he was pleased to be taking part in this important debate. My joy is somewhat diminished by the fact that I do not get very enthusiastic about evening sittings. I am still less enthusiastic about taking part in them and, therefore, prolonging them. I know that there have been deliberative bodies through the years who found it either better or necessary to meet at night. Here I am thinking of the Sanhedrin and the Supreme Soviet. When Senator Muir, Senator Phillips and I were sitting in the House of Commons, that particular body found it necessary to sit at least three nights per week. They finally gave up that nonsense—

Senator Frith: The House of Lords sits five nights a week.

Senator Macquarrie: I never aspired that high, although my son is very upset that we have lost the hereditary principle in the Canadian Senate. However, that is just a prejudiced point of view, I think, that he has.

In any event, we are here; it is late and it will be later still before I am through. No speaker speaks as briefly as he thinks he does, and usually does not talk as long as his auditors think he does, so we will have to try to find some realistic appraisal here.

I really did not want to speak tonight, but when I was a youth leader a thousand years ago, one of the slogans I often used to the young unfortunates under my charge was an old statement:

When duty whispers low, thou must,

The youth replies, I can.

Therefore, I had to say, "I can and I will."

I am very sorry, honourable senators, that I was not able to hear all of the speeches in this important debate. Whatever virtues I have lacked in all my years in this chamber, I always believed it was useful and valuable to listen to all of the speakers in any debate in which one himself was taking up the time of his colleagues. However, we had the important Mexican delegation here these last two days and, even though important things such as this debate come up, I think that, once committed, we must honour that commitment to visiting delegations. So I have missed some of the speeches and I will not be able to read the ones delivered today until tomorrow. However, I did have the opportunity to acquaint myself with some of the interesting contributions.

Honourable senators, I am taking part in this debate partly because in recent months I have been a participant—thanks, perhaps, to the long-standing friendship of my whip—in the Meech Lake Task Force and in the Submissions Group, which meant that I heard a good deal about the Meech Lake Accord. Senator Lucier, in his excellent speech, in which he was very kind to both Senator Bielish and me, said that perhaps 104 per cent of the submissions Senator Bielish and I heard in the north were against the accord. I cannot remember very many that were partial to it or that showed an open mind on it. However, at the same time, they seemed to be able to give us hell and leave us feeling that they were most excellent people, and we gave them great marks for the depth of their feelings. There is an old definition that a good diplomat is one who can tell you to go to hell in such a way that you are raring to go. I thought the strength of the advocacy of the people in the two territories was most impressive.

Honourable senators, I had been to the Northwest Territories once before, but I had never been to the Yukon, and I marvel yet at the beauty of that wonderful territory. I was lucky enough to have a hotel room from which, in the early morning, I could see the beauty of the mountains and of the flora and fauna and rejoice that that—to me—new territory was part of my country.

With respect to the Northwest Territories, it was a joy just to visit their legislature, to meet the people and to contemplate the variety of their society. I think there are ten languages spoken in the legislature of the Northwest Territories, two or three of which are not written languages. We think that our translators here in Ottawa are excellent, and they are, but I should think that the challenge to translators in that legislature in the Northwest Territories must be immense.

I was touched by what I call the cleverness and sensitivity of the people in the Northwest Territories. Although tradition is a great thing in terms of the British practice, the symbols in the legislature in the Northwest Territories did not reflect the lions and unicorns of British heraldry. Rather, the symbols there displayed represented the natural life and the historic life and lore of that enormous and important part of Canada, and that was, for me, a revelation.

I enjoyed Senator Lucier's remarks. He was a very good host to us in the north, as was Senator Adams. I agree with him 100 per cent in his encomium of our chairman, Senator Molgat, who conducted every meeting with great aplomb, with great goodwill and with equity. He and I got along very well—

Senator Phillips: Now is the time for that round of applause.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macquarrie: We had only one moment where perhaps I was not as cordial as I nearly always am. That occurred after a flight from Whitehorse down to Vancouver, spending goodness knows how long in Vancouver and then flying over to Edmonton with a stop or two in between. We got into Yellowknife a stroke or two after midnight. Senator Molgat came over and said, "I know we are supposed to start at nine o'clock tomorrow morning, but the press would like to meet us at 8.30" I said, "Well, God Almighty, if they are available to go to all the meetings, do you have to listen to every damned fool suggestion you get? You can have the thing without me." But being a cautious, careful and devoted Calvinist, I was the first guy there. We had that little testiness because down in Prince Edward Island we are not used to this kind of travel. When I fly from Charlottetown to St. John's, Newfoundland, I am not used to going through Chicago and Atlanta before I get there, but that seems to be the way it happens in the vast part of the world to the north of us.

● (2120)

I listened very carefully to all the things I heard there. I listened to many of the things that Senator Lucier said. However, I came out of that experience and those hearings not as upset as the many people who were witnesses before us. I am not so lacking in faith that I think there is nothing to this "next round" theory. If anyone believes that there will not be any more meetings between the provinces and the federal government, he has not been keeping track. Apparently, one of the great pastimes of the two levels of government is having meetings. The last time I looked there were 500 meetings in a year—ministers, deputy ministers, heads of legislatures and so on. So God knows there will be plenty of meetings and there will be plenty of topics coming up.

I noticed among the amendments one that suggests that fisheries be taken off and aboriginal rights be put on the agenda. I do not think it is wise or prudent in a country like ours to suggest that you can project ahead and say, "This is unimportant and that is very important." The time was when the Minister of Fisheries in the Canadian government had a soft touch, a cinch. He had to go to the Lunenburg Exhibition and to the Pacific Exposition, issue a few licences for lobster fishermen, and no other licences were needed. It was a very easy job. But the poor guy who is in charge of fisheries today is in a very tough spot. If it is not the French in St. Pierre and Miquelon, it is the Americans on Georges Bank—or some problem with another jurisdiction. There is the matter of resources and the terrible problems about the depletion of our fishing stocks—a very sensitive matter. If 20 years ago someone had said that this would be a problem of the Minister of Fisheries, he would have been accused of being very much lacking in realism.

I always thought the best question I ever heard in the House of Commons was asked by a Newfoundland member at a time when we were wrestling with very powerful and well equipped Soviet trawlers—and some very attractive actresses in France, and when there was much talk about seals and so on. He stood up and said, "Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if it is now the policy of the government to let the seals eat half our cod fish and the Russians come in and take the other half?" What was a poor Minister of Fisheries to say to that question? Even though the particular minister had a Ph.D., he had difficulty with it.

I note that Senator Lucier observed that Premier McKenna ran on a platform of opposition to the accord. I believe he has criticized it, but I have yet to see where he has said that he is against it. He is a perfectly articulate young man, and if he wants to say that he is against the accord, well, so far he has not said so.

I agree with Senator Lucier that the Meech Lake Accord does nothing to hasten the adoption of a Triple-E Senate. If he notes that I am not weeping over this fact, there is nothing wrong with his eyesight, though as a Prince Edward Islander, I would go for the equality part of it. However, I hope I have a degree of realism as to what the House of Commons would do if they really thought that someone else was going to be as important as they are. So as to efficiency; on that point, I find it a little hard to evaluate or to explain what in fact it means.

I am sorry to give the impression that I only picked out the critical things in Senator Lucier's speech, but perhaps I have done so. I noted what he said about provincehood for the two territories. I have always hoped that I would live to see that day, because it is a natural evolution, but I noted that many of the people who appeared before us did not have in mind the hastening of provincehood. I heard many of them say that they did not expect the territories to become provinces overnight. It seems to me that in my years in caucus in the other place and in hearing spokesmen for various governments—not just Conservative governments because they were less numerous—there was a very strong and sincere view that all of us southerners were in favour of doing everything possible to devolve upon the territorial governments more and more responsibility for their own affairs. I cannot remember anyone at the caucus taking a view adverse to that view, so I believe that the attitude is there and that it remains strong.

Like Mr. Pickersgill, I do not feel that a year or two years from now a group of premiers and the Prime Minister will take an attitude hostile and denigratory to the claims of the people of the north. Although I heard Senator Lucier's well articulated views about the Senate, I could never accept, or envisage, that under Meech Lake, if ever a senator is to be appointed from the Northwest Territories or Yukon—since I like both these people, I hope this will be a long time in the future—the federal government would appoint someone from somewhere else. That seems to me to be the height of exaggerated fear.

Nor do I believe that there will be any difficulty or any reluctance among the 11 First Ministers in dealing with the important issue and related issues of aboriginal rights. I am so old that I belonged to the House of Commons, as did Senator Flynn, for two or three years before the Indian people of Canada were given a vote. I do not think that any of us were people of narrow mindedness or ill intent. We actually did not react as we should have to this matter.

I think it was in 1960 that the Diefenbaker government made that move, but what has happened since has been almost a geometric expansion and expression of the views which, in a smaller way, prompted that. That is why I am more optimistic and, on the whole, I look upon the Meech Lake Accord not just as a mere accommodation or achievement, but as a majestic achievement. I look upon it as a noble step in our national history.

● (2130)

We all, I trust, admire Robert Stanfield, but I do not think anyone has ever written that he was a highly excitable man.

Senator Frith: Nor, in fact, was he.

Senator Macquarrie: But Robert Stanfield said:

Let me say quite frankly that I am ecstatic about this agreement. I am frankly and unashamedly ecstatic that we have achieved an agreement.

Meech Lake has put Canada back on track. Meech Lake really constitutes a constitutional renewal. Let us keep it there.

Then he called it a "... marvel of marvels ..."

Senator Frith: Imagine saving up all those years for that ecstasy and to squander it all on Meech Lake.

Senator Macquarrie: Then we have a comment from a great pragmatist, sometimes called a "fixer" in the House of Commons when I was there, the Honourable J. W. Pickersgill. He went on to say:

Mr. Stanfield and I were together the night before the Meech Lake meeting, and we both said nothing would come of it. I am glad to say we were wrong; but it was a miracle.

I think Mr. Stanfield used similar language.

I am not at all ashamed to say that I think it is a great achievement.

Senator MacEachen did me the honour of quoting me when he made his speech and I appreciate being quoted and, indeed, noted by a man of his parliamentary, political and scholarly attainments, apart from the fact that he is a great highlander and, like myself, probably overgiven to mentioning that subject. He used the word, "euphoric" and I am not reluctant about the euphoria part of it either.

We have here—and Senator Lucier and Senator Molgat and I had something to do with the extravagance of the beautiful cover—the task force report. To me, the most important page in the whole report is page 45 with the signatures of the First Ministers. What is notable about that is that above the line marked "Quebec" there is a blank. Isn't that, really, honourable senators, what it is all about? To conceive of a formal document—as among the leaders of the provinces and the "Dominion", as I think we are still entitled to call it, and yet there is one omission. Why would we not rejoice in the fact that in Meech Lake there is no blank? There is no omission?

We have an important constitutional document supported by premiers representing four different parties and, heaven knows, a wide range of temperaments in all of these other matters; supported by all the leaders of the House of Commons; supported by some of the great savants of the country: people like Gordon Robertson, the distinguished Clerk of the Privy Council, and one of the wisest men we ever had, Pickersgill, and all these people down the line.

Senator Frith: If it is someone on our side, he or she is always distinguished.

Senator Macquarrie: We do not use our adjectives loosely. I think he is a great man. I always said that MacKenzie King was a great man, but I doubt if I would have said that too loudly in the presence of my late father. Now I can say it, and I did so before I even saw the so-called documentary.

In the north I used to hear some regret and criticism about the unanimity in reference to provincial boundaries. Sir Robert Borden, that great statesman, our first internationalist, a tremendous constitutionalist, was very exercised when he was telling the House of Commons how unjust it was that many provinces attracted to themselves vast territories contiguous to them. Manitoba was a little province but all of a sudden it extended all the way up to Hudson Bay. My remarks also apply to Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Quebec and Ontario. He said, "It seems strange that we who began the whole thing are confined to the boundaries that we had and, yet, the whole country, including us, developed these territories."

I submit that perhaps the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, if there are any avaricious neighbours who have designs on their territories, may someday abide by the just strictures that people like the Premier of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia may be able to insert on their behalf.

I am not all that upset that some matters have now moved into the realm of unanimity. I am not going to get into the quotation game but the most impressive witness I ran across was Professor Courchene from York University, the Robarts professor of Canadian studies. Perhaps we tend to quote people who agree with us and, once in a while it may be that we do because we agree with them. He said something that I thought was very important. He said that it is, however, an argument that states that three traditional "have" provinces of the federation, Ontario, B.C. and Alberta, ought not to have a veto on new provinces if the three "have-not" Maritime provinces do not have a veto. There must be some time when we consider that all provinces have a certain proprietary interest.

When I first came to the House of Commons there was some snob of a person there who said, "Oh, we have twice as many people in Scarborough as you have in P.E.I." I said, "Are you saying that Scarborough should be a province? Would that be good for the country?" There are times when even the smallest among us—and I happen to come from that smallest among us where the whole thing began—will say that our rights should not be curtailed or tied to a lower level than those of the great and rich among us.

These unanimity areas have been taken up with care. They are not extended to everything, for goodness' sake, because that would be ridiculous.

Professor Hogg said that when devolution reaches the stage of full provincial status, the other provinces are profoundly, albeit indirectly, affected. He said that the establishment of new provinces would increase the total number of provinces and thus indirectly affect the operation of the amending formula.

[Senator Frith.]

I am hopeful, honourable senators, that after all of the criticism is over, after all of the details have been stretched, exposed and expressed, there will be this great step forward for our people, for our provinces—this move, supported by all of our elected leaders. I heard someone in the Submissions Committee say to us, "Ugh, this cabal." Now, Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley and Lauderdale—Senator Hicks would know them exactly right—were sub rosa, or perhaps subversive, but how did those 11 First Ministers get there? They were all elected. If they did not have a majority in a free election, they would not have been there.

● (2140)

So it is not a little deal that was cooked up. It is something that was worked out by our elected representatives; and I say let us go with them. Let us see further evolution, further expansion, further expression of the kind of goodwill which may, when the historians have a long look at it, raise the expression, "Meech Lake Accord" to a very fine expression of the noblest, most cooperative Canadianism that we have so far had.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon Charles McElman: I have a question for the honourable senator. I am keeping a poll. Could he tell us whether he had anything to do with the Sept-Iles speech?

Senator Flynn: Touché.

Senator Frith: Between you and him, Jacques, he is not excessively modest.

Senator McElman: That is a better answer than I had before. My second question is in more serious vein. Senator Macquarrie spoke with some favour of the principle of unanimity in matters of great concern. As a student of history, I probably do not need to remind him that one of the most important principles established by the Government of Canada, in cooperation with provinces, for our part of the country—the maritimes and with the addition now of Newfoundland—was the equalization formula. It was your gallant premier of the day, Walter Jones, Angus MacDonald of Nova Scotia and John MacNair of New Brunswick who fought mightily to have the federal authority and other provinces join with them in changing the wartime tax agreements to become the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements with the beginnings of the equalization formula; and that had to be done over the great protest particularly of Ontario, and, to a lesser degree, the Province of Quebec. The requirement for unanimity was shoved to one side at that time. Does the honourable senator not agree that there are times when the interests of the nation, particularly our part of the nation, would do better without the unanimity clause?

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the honourable senator. I did say that unanimity is not advisable at all levels and in all areas of federal-provincial cooperation and that it was restricted. Yet it is wonderful what can be accomplished. The federal government, in my opinion, has moved through the years into many fields of provincial jurisdiction, and by that has brought benefits to the people of Canada. That took place with or without a formula.

I often remember what my dear friend, Walter Shaw, our former premier, used to say, that instead of hostility and niggardliness from people like Mr. Frost of Ontario, we received tremendous cooperation and support. I also recall that one of the great occasions in the history of the maritimes—and I think that Senator McElman would agree with me—was when the Diefenbaker government moved powerfully and effectively on such moves as the Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grant; and I suppose that, since special arrangements were made with the Atlantic provinces, they must have had at least the acquiescence of those provinces which were not the recipients. In other words, I imagine, like a true Conservative of the John A. Macdonald school, I am ready to be an enlightened pragmatist in all of these matters.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, for the past year the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord has been under the scrutiny of the press, the public and of Parliament and the legislatures across Canada.

While the first ministers keep reminding the country of their self-proclaimed title as the modern Fathers of Confederation, well respected figures from Canadian newspapers, universities and public life have been demonstrating that the accord has serious, if not fatal, flaws, which could ultimately threaten Canada's existence as we currently know it.

Drafting amendments to a Constitution demands careful and statesmanlike deliberation. Any changes should take the long view of what is required and not be the results of the political exigencies of the moment. Contemporary political figures must remember that their tinkering with the Constitution of Canada will have an effect on our government and society that will last until long after the leaders of today have left the political scene.

There is a common thread that runs through the criticism of the Meech Lake Accord. Briefly put, it is that the provisions of the accord as written would alter the institutions and practices which underlie the constitutional foundations of Canada.

Former Senator Eugene Forsey summed up those concerns in his submission to the special joint committee on the accord. He pointed out that:

... it would produce a massive shift in power from Parliament and the legislatures to the courts: a very considerable shift from the federal government and Parliament to the ... provinces, especially Quebec—

Which already has a National Assembly in lieu of a legislature:

—It might easily produce also, in practice, a massive shift from Parliament and the provincial legislatures to the first ministers' conference, now given a new status, a new legitimacy.

In analyzing the accord's impact upon specific institutions, most commentators agree that the interim role assigned to the provinces for them to submit names for ultimate appointment to the Senate might block any changes to the Senate for the foreseeable future. The decentralization of the selection process for Supreme Court justices might impair the quality of judicial appointments. Choosing judges from provincial lists increases the opportunity for decisions to be based on political trade-offs. This practice could also block the appointment of judges with origins in non-traditional groups such as various ethnic minorities.

Northerners have severely criticized the accord. They rightly argue that section 9, which requires unanimous consent to establish new provinces, can effectively veto the achievement of provincial status by Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

• (2150)

Many thoughtful individuals and groups have expressed the worry that the accord will allow a province to opt out of a national program and yet have the right to compensation from the federal treasury if the province has a program or initiative compatible with national objectives. This provision of the accord begs the question of how national objectives will be determined.

Furthermore, the failure to define a provincial "initiative" gives the accord a most unsatisfactory vagueness. In fact, the accord leaves the door open to different levels of social services in different provinces and to the threat of provincial governments' opting out of a program unless lower national standards are accepted by the federal government.

The section of the Meech Lake Accord which, if adopted, would most seriously upset the traditional balance in Canada involves the two new interpretative clauses of the Constitution. These clauses, set out in section 1 of the accord, specify that the provisions of the Constitution must be interpreted consistently with:

1. the recognition of Canada's linguistic duality;
2. the position of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

At the same time, the accord also affirms the role of Parliament and all legislatures in recognizing and preserving the "fundamental" duality of the country. In addition, the accord establishes the additional role for the Government of Quebec to preserve and promote its distinct identity.

Instead of the vision of Canada as a single entity comprised of ten provincial equalities, the Meech Lake accord splits the country in two. On one hand, there is a "distinct" Quebec, and on the other hand, there are nine English-speaking provinces. The accord destroys the philosophy and the effort that led to the Constitution Act of 1982. The framers of this act went to great lengths to define a country in which all citizens, Quebecers included, could be at home.

The Meech Lake Accord will almost inevitably fragment the country by turning Quebec inwards. It will become a province with less and less in common with the rest of the country. The "distinct society," which Meech Lake will encourage, involves a vision of collective rights that will take precedence over the rights of individuals as guaranteed by the Charter of Rights.

Speaking of individuals, I should like to quote from a commentary made by Professor Graham Decarie of Concordia. He said:

When the Commissioner of Official Languages reported that English-speaking Quebecers felt humiliated, the Quebec National Assembly unanimously censured him. That, in this year of miracles, provoked an awareness in the rest of Canada that something was happening to the anglophone minority of Quebec.

There is some humiliation in being told that our language is forbidden in public, in being told that the towns and districts first settled by our ancestors must have their names changed because English names are offensive, in being told that our institutions like our schools must not be allowed to grow, by a process of attrition, will be encouraged to disappear. There is some humiliation in knowing that, however bilingual we may be, we will never be welcomed into civil service jobs, either federal or provincial, within this province, and we will never have equal access to government services. I feel some personal humiliation in reading in the francophone press that, despite a family history of almost 350 years in this province, I am not a real Quebecer. I am a demographic problem which must be remedied.

There is some humiliation in all of that. But the greater humiliation came when all of the anglophone members of the National Assembly joined the unanimous vote of censure of the Official Languages Commissioner—the only federal official who has ever spoken in our defence.

Like the francophone minorities in other provinces, we have been abandoned by almost all of the political leadership at every level. That is what the Meech Lake Accord is about. It gives free rein to provincial premiers like Mr. Bourassa to harass minorities, to use them as scapegoats, and to ignore even the basic human freedoms in our Charter of Rights.

We're staying in Quebec, and we'll survive in Quebec. Despite political leaders, we'll work with our francophone neighbours—and we have some pretty fine francophone neighbours—to build the sort of tolerant society that Canada was supposed to be.

Meanwhile, Canada, please don't ask us to share the flame. We've been burned too often.

The fact that only the Government of Quebec would have the task of protecting and promoting Quebec's distinct society is very disquieting. In this regard, Premier Bourassa and his Intergovernmental Affairs Minister, Gil Rémillard have made it quite clear that the courts will be required to take Quebec's status into account in all constitutional interpretations involving the province. This will have a particular impact on the future of the measures that are currently included in Bill 101. Although the Supreme Court of Canada has not yet ruled on the challenges to this legislation, the adoption of the Meech Lake Accord will create a whole new set of circumstances that might ultimately alter the effect of any Supreme Court decision.

If Meech Lake comes into effect:

1. The Province of Quebec will no longer be required to allow bilingual signs. The accord will permit the provincial government to argue that the need to preserve the distinct French face of Quebec takes precedence over any court ruling which requires such signage.
2. Quebec will be able to ignore some of its previous constitutional obligations including equality rights, official language rights and minority language education in order to "preserve and promote" its distinct identity.
3. The national government will be able both legally and politically to ignore its previous constitutional obligations to the English-speaking residents of the province of Quebec.

In short, the proposed constitutional provisions of the accord have the potential to remove the rights of the English-speaking residents of Quebec. At its worst, the combined effect of the various sections of the accord could create two classes of citizens: those in the nine provinces with rights that are constitutionally entrenched, and those in the province of Quebec whose rights can be removed to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec.

If Parliament or a provincial legislature in the nine other provinces fails, in the opinion of the french-language minority, to live up to its "commitment" under section 1 of the Meech Lake Accord, presumably the minority could appeal to the courts to restore these rights. At the same time, this recourse would not apply to actions of the National Assembly of Quebec because the accord requires the courts to interpret the Constitution "in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada, a distinct society."

I should now like to quote Mr. Gil Rémillard, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs for the province of Quebec when he addressed the National Assembly on June 19. When referring to the Meech Lake Accord, he said:

[Translation]

A historic agreement, to the extent that it acknowledges Quebec as a distinct society, to the extent that it acknowledges the National Assembly's role in the protection and promotion of the Quebec specificity.

A little later he went on to say, and I quote:

We also have a safeguard provision with respect to the distinct society and the Canadian duality, a safeguard provision which enables Quebec to have a guarantee for its linguistic rights, a guarantee that there is a minimum, a minimum guarantee which may eventually make it possible for us to obtain new elements for this cultural security which is essential to us... The Premier of Quebec managed to convince his colleagues to endorse this provision which enables us to have this guarantee, which now makes it possible for us to build on the basis of what we already have. I have shown that... when referring to the distinct society which is a power, a basic tool to enforce our jurisdictions. And again I show that by means of this safeguard provision which is at the very foundation of our claims as a distinct society with respect to our linguistic rights, our cultural rights. We have these full powers.

[English]

The writing is already on the wall. Gil Rémillard has already indicated that if the Supreme Court of Canada rules that unilingual signs are unconstitutional, the accord would empower his legislature to re-enact the prohibition of such signs.

Today, the spotlight is fixed ever more firmly on the issue of minority language rights. This is the result of Premier Devine's efforts to avoid implementing the provisions of the original act which created bilingualism in Saskatchewan. This province, the first after Quebec to ratify the Meech Lake Accord, is directly attempting to diminish historic language rights. Even prior to the announcement of these measures in Saskatchewan's Bill 2, the Fédération des francophones hors Québec had decided that the Meech Lake Accord needed amendments to preserve the rights of French-speaking Canadians outside that province. The FFHQ currently wants to eliminate the section of the accord which confirmed exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the area of aid to linguistic minorities.

[Translation]

I should like to read a communiqué put out by the Fédération des francophones hors Québec. I quote:

In the minds of many people, and in our opinion as well, this action lays greater emphasis still on the axis of an English Canada and a French Canada. It shows also that the constitutional agreement as it is now worded does not guarantee greater protection for the rights of francophones outside Quebec. This is why the FFHQ is so insistent that the promotion of Canada's duality be written in the Constitution of Canada.

● (2200)

[English]

This was signed by the President of La Fédération des francophones hors Québec, Mr. Yvon Fontaine.

But for many in Quebec, even sensible suggestions such as this are treated as opposition to Quebec and to les Québécois. The editor of Le Devoir claimed that the FFHQ was falling into the trap of "decoupling the francophones of Canada from those of Quebec."

At the same time, this "decoupling" is precisely the strategy of Premier Bourassa. He has failed resolutely to condemn the actions of Premier Grant Devine in restricting French language rights in Saskatchewan.

The question is "why?" and the answer is obvious. Robert Bourassa wants to mute, in advance, any opposition, both by Saskatchewan and by Alberta, to measures that might restrict the rights of the anglophone minority in Quebec. Even if the Meech Lake Accord does not come into force, Mr. Bourassa may use the override clause in the Constitution to prohibit bilingual signs in Quebec—that is, if the Supreme Court decides that they are illegal under current circumstances.

Honourable senators, I quote from a statement the Prime Minister made on March 26, 1988:

We have obtained Quebec's signature on our Constitution on terms that are satisfactory for Quebec and honourable for Canada. And we have done so in a manner that safeguards the rights of our language minorities. As I said in the House of Commons on October 21 last year:

In voting for this Accord, Members are upholding the rights of our language minorities, English-speaking in Quebec and French-speaking outside Quebec. Let no one misconstrue our commitment, either now or at any time in the future. If I, for one moment, thought that anyone's rights were being overridden by this Accord, I would not have recommended it to my colleagues in Government...

I now ask: Is not the Prime Minister ready to amend the Meech Lake Accord now that Saskatchewan has not lived up to the spirit of that accord?

In closing, the omens are already grim. The Meech Lake Accord, if adopted, could provoke a full-scale storm that will not pass in the near future. Ominous clouds could hang over Canada for years to come.

On motion of Senator Ottenheimer, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as far as our side is concerned, all orders stand, all inquiries stand and all motions stand.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I was just going to suggest the same thing.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 20, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY
IN ANKARA, TURKEY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, April 26, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Subcommittee of the North Atlantic Assembly on International Terrorism held in Ankara, Turkey, from April 5 to 8, 1988.

VETERANS AFFAIRS AND SENIOR CITIZENS

SUBCOMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF
THE SENATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the resolution on the Meech Lake Accord will take priority in the Senate today, may I move a motion now rather than waiting until motions are called on the order paper?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is it a motion of which you have given notice?

Senator Marshall: I wish to move that the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens have power to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens have power to sit at seven clock in the evening today, April 20, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, have we actually changed the title of the subcommittee to include senior citizens, or was that merely proposed yesterday and not dealt with?

Senator Marshall: The main committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, has given its consent to the subcommittee to change its name. Yesterday I introduced an inquiry to inform the Senate of my feelings on the subcommittee's mandate and to indicate why I am changing its name. As I understand it, I did not have to introduce an inquiry in the Senate, because the main committee had given the subcommittee the authority to extend the name. I introduced the inquiry merely to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate and to put it on record.

Senator Frith: I am not sure that that is so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am at least relieved that the Senate itself is not being asked to make that change—in other words, to confer on a subcommittee responsibility for the senior citizens of Canada. It may be possible later to discuss whether or not this action is appropriate, but I merely wanted to make sure that the Senate itself had not been asked to make that change and that by permitting the inquiry to proceed it did not constitute a formal decision of the Senate to entrust to the subcommittee the responsibility for senior citizens.

I do not want to inconvenience my colleague at all, and I will not press the matter further at this point. I just want to register some concern about this development.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT OF ADVISORY GROUP TO MINISTER ON REGULATION OF POLITICAL ACTIVITIES IN CANADIAN FORCES ESTABLISHMENTS—RECOMMENDATIONS 3 AND 4—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, several times in the chamber I have asked whether the Minister of National Defence was prepared to table his report on the regulation of political activities in Canadian Forces establishments, and I am very happy indeed to see that that report has now been tabled. The minister was kind enough to send me a copy.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate for clarification of the press release put out yesterday by the Minister of National Defence, which is attached to the copy of Professor Morton's report. There were seven recommendations and, as the Leader of the Government no doubt knows, there is a comment in brackets after several of them indicating the action that the government proposes to take. However, after Recommendations 3 and 4 there is no such comment. I wonder if the Leader of the Government knows what that means. Is there no recommendation from the Department of National Defence, or is that to follow later?

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—
MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

THAT,

WHEREAS the Constitution Act, 1982 came into force on April 17, 1982, following an agreement between Canada and all the provinces except Quebec;

AND WHEREAS the Government of Quebec has established a set of five proposals for constitutional change and has stated that amendments to give effect to those proposals would enable Quebec to resume a full role in the constitutional councils of Canada;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto sets out the basis on which Quebec's five constitutional proposals may be met;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

AND WHEREAS section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987 Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25.(1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B.(1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(Honourable Senator Ottenheimer).

[Translation]

Hon. Gerald Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I am delighted to have this opportunity to share with you my views concerning the Meech Lake Accord and the amendment moved by Senator MacEachen, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

[English]

Senator Frith: Just when I thought I was beginning to understand Newfoundlandese!

Senator Ottenheimer: I am trying to improvise for honourable senators.

[Translation]

We have not come up with Newfoundland French, not yet anyway, but it could happen with a distinct society.

It is not the first time I have the opportunity to consider this issue. As Newfoundland Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, I had the opportunity two or three times to discuss this issue with Mr. Gil Rémillard, the Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs, and also with our friend Senator Murray, the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations). I am therefore quite pleased to pursue this matter in the Canadian Senate.

● (1410)

[English]

As I see it and judge it, the basic purpose of the Meech Lake Accord is to permit the adherence of Quebec to the Constitution of Canada in a manner noble and acceptable to all the provinces and to the federal government. I do not think anyone would claim that what we have is a perfect document, a document which will resolve forever the constitutional issues facing Canada, or which attempts to resolve all of them. What it is, essentially, is an intergovernmental agreement, an agreement reached by the Government of Canada and the governments of the ten provinces. It expresses a consensus of the 11 governments; and that consensus, imperfect though it may be, is what it is.

The resolution, of which notice was given by the Leader of the Government, incorporates that consensus. The amendments proposed by the Leader of the Opposition obviously do not express the consensus reached by the governments involved. The amendments, I assume, express the consensus of honourable senators on the opposite side.

But, of course, whether senators are on the opposition side or whether they are colleagues on the government side, the various governments of Canada, the Prime Minister and the premiers of the ten provinces have not given up their right to form, express and maintain consensus. They have not delegated that to any of us.

Therefore, I, as a member of this chamber, as a Canadian, as a Newfoundlander, will, with pleasure, support the resolution which expresses the consensus actually reached.

Obviously, many honourable senators on both sides of the house, and people throughout Canada, have spoken long, and frequently very well, on this, and I am not so presumptuous as to think that I will or can add anything new. But it is a subject which I think is of sufficient importance that all of us who wish to express our opinion should obviously do so—and I think that is a view shared by all honourable senators.

It has been pointed out that the Meech Lake Accord in no way resolves problems, which will need a constitutional resolution, with respect to the aboriginal peoples, with respect to the Territories, with respect to the adhesion of new provinces within Canada, and also certain problems with respect to women. Of course, what we have to bear in mind is that it was not intended to do that; and, indeed, one could ask one's self, "Would it be appropriate to intend to do that?" I think that Senator Bazin last evening referred to the point that if one were to go ahead and endeavour to find constitutional resolutions to all of those problems without the participation of Quebec there would be something quite anomalous about it.

Indeed, I think that without Quebec's adherence to the Constitution, for the federal government and the other nine provinces to presume to come up with constitutional amendments covering those subjects—of the aboriginal peoples, the northern Territories and other subjects—would be as if the federal government and those nine provinces were separating themselves from Quebec. To me, it appears essential that Quebec be an adherent to the Constitution in order that we, all together, make further progress in other important areas requiring constitutional reform.

No one claims that it is perfect, but it is what has been achieved—and I suppose, in the search for perfection, that Voltaire put it better than most of us can. He certainly put it more briefly than most of us can when he said, "le mieux est l'ennemi du bien."

I should like to emphasize the point that nobody claims that this is perfect, but, from another point of view, to attempt to resolve the other constitutional issues, irrespective of Quebec's adherence, would be, in many ways, inappropriate and it would be as if the other participants in the constitutional process—the other nine provinces and the federal government—were, in a sense, in terms of constitutional involvement, separating themselves from Quebec.

[Translation]

In Newfoundland, the concepts "distinct society" and "duality" have never been a major problem. During the series of constitutional conferences in 1980, the Newfoundland government prepared a document setting forth its philosophy on development and constitutional reform. The same document and the same philosophy form the basis today of the position taken by the government of Newfoundland and of its support for the Meech Lake Accord.

I would like to read a few pages from this document, which is already historic since it was dated August 16, 1980. The French version was published under the title: Vers le vingt-et-unième siècle—Tous ensemble.

The Government of Newfoundland is convinced that in our country, both federal and provincial governments must be strong and viable. The State cannot be stronger than its constituent parts. This means that the eleven governments involved in these consultations must agree on a distribution of jurisdictional rights that will allow both the federal and the provincial governments to meet their obligations.

The Government of Newfoundland does not envisage a Canada where all powers would be concentrated in the central government, nor a loose association that would weaken the federal government's powers and prevent the Government of Canada from acting effectively.

The document goes on to say:

The Newfoundland government's approach to constitutional change is based on the conviction that, like individual citizens, the provinces must be in a position of equality. Whether they are large or small, Anglophone or Francophone or both, whether they are contributors to or beneficiaries of the equalization process, whether their resources are land- or sea-based, legal equality is the foundation of the complex relationships in our society.

On the subject of duality we read:

Canada's duality, as reflected in our official languages, our legal system and our social and cultural values, evolved in a way that is unique to this country. By strengthening the constituent parts of the Canadian federation, we enhance Canada as a nation. Newfoundland believes that this duality should be recognized in the text of a new Constitution.

And in concluding:

This fundamental principle of equality applies not only to the provinces but to all Canadians, to aboriginal people, to all those who make up our multicultural society, to all men and women, whatever their origin, faith or creed. It is this combination of diversity and unity that is Canada's most precious resource.

● (1420)

This was the philosophy that formed the basis of the position taken by the Newfoundland government during the meetings on constitutional reform and also during the discussions on Quebec's adherence to the Canadian Constitution and the Meech Lake Accord we are discussing today.

[English]

The problem of "distinct society" seems to appear to many to be one which is not in conformity with their view of Canada. I think it is regarded by some honourable senators and others as something radical, undermining, threatening of national unity, or however one would wish to phrase it.

Senator Frith: Did you speak of the conflict with one's view of parity? Is that the word you used?

Senator Ottenheimer: I do not recall the word I used—I was ad-libbing.

This fear of "distinct society," I believe, is not well founded, nor is it anything radical or totally new. Its reference in a constitution which is of an entrenched form and not a legislative form will be true of every constitutional provision from this time on.

I think Professor Hogg puts it very well, and I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to his views which were expressed in a study of his, published just last December, entitled "Meech Lake Constitutional Accord Annotated." I will read briefly from that study:

The recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is not unique to the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. The Constitution Act, 1867 created a federal state rather than a unitary state primarily because of the concern of French-Canadians to protect a distinct society in the territory of Quebec. That is an historical fact, never explicitly acknowledged in the language of the Constitution Act, 1867. But the Act does contain several provisions that in effect give recognition to the distinctness of Quebec.

With respect to language, section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides a guarantee of the use of both the English and French languages in the federal courts, and in the Quebec Legislature and Quebec courts. The guarantee does not apply in the other founding provinces. A similar guarantee was extended to Manitoba when it was created in 1870: at that time, Manitoba had a French majority which feared that it would be swamped by English-speaking immigration;—

which, obviously, happened.

—the guarantee is in section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870. In 1982, sections 16 to 20 of the Charter of Rights extended a similar guarantee to New Brunswick. But no similar guarantee applies in the other seven provinces.

With respect to law, section 94 of the Constitution Act, 1867 authorizes the federal Parliament to make provision for the uniformity of laws relative to property and civil rights and civil procedure in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This provision has never been used. What is interesting about section 94, however, is that it contemplates uniform laws in only three of the four founding provinces. (Its scope now extends to the nine common law provinces.) Plainly, the assumption was that Quebec's Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure would remain distinct from the comparable laws in the common law provinces. That is, of course, exactly what has happened.

He then goes on to cite another example with respect to the school system in Quebec. I think the point he is making is that distinctness, the recognition of a "distinct society," is not something that was invented by the 11 First Ministers who agreed on the Meech Lake Accord. It is, according to Hogg—and, indeed, as a recognition of historical fact—a phenomenon which has been operative in Canada for some time.

I could point out as another example the Terms of Union between Canada and Newfoundland. This is a constitutional provision which applies to no other federal-provincial relationship. I will not read it, but it is section 17, the Terms of Union between Canada and Newfoundland, which guarantees to Newfoundland the continuation of what, there, is called a denominational educational system. It points out that public moneys voted must be apportioned on a per capita, non-discriminatory basis for those denominations which had recognition in Newfoundland prior to union with Canada. That is quite different from the provisions with respect to confessional education in Quebec. It is something distinctive with respect to Newfoundland.

So, the distinct aspects of our country—whether they are linguistic, cultural or legal—are factors of our history.

[Translation]

Most of those who criticize the agreement are opposed to the inclusion of fisheries as a subject for constitutional dialogue. Perhaps fisheries is not sufficiently esthetic or the subject of refined speculation. Sometimes fish smells bad, it even stinks—too bad! These are not valid reasons for excluding fisheries from the constitutional dialogue.

To understand Newfoundlanders' sensitivity on fisheries, one must understand the history and even the social psychology of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. Those who came to colonize these shores had only one aim—to fish. They did not come to till the land or to cut down trees or to develop hydroelectricity or for the pleasant climate.

Today, of course, men and, increasingly, women work in forestry and mining, in hydroelectric generation and also in the oil industry.

The fact still remains that fisheries are the basis of the economy and the driving force of Newfoundland's social and cultural life. In my opinion, it can well be said that fishing is Newfoundland's raison d'être, historically, economically and socially.

Why then this fear of including a dialogue, a discussion on the problems of the fisheries in a constitutional setting? Surely it is not because these reasons are not valid. There must be some other reasons.

[English]

In Newfoundland today 40,000 men and women depend on the fishery. They are involved either full-time or part-time in the processing aspect or the catching aspect—some aspect of it. One hears that the reference in the Meech Lake Accord with respect to the fishery is putting up for grabs the whole area of jurisdiction, that it is a grab for power. What does Meech Lake say? It says that the First Ministers will discuss "roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries." If that is a great threat to any power of the federal government or to any economic activity of any province, it must be the most gentle threat that has ever transpired in intergovernmental relations. I really cannot share the view of those who see this as a threat either to federal paramountcy or to the continuing economic activity of other Canadians and Maritimers.

There has been some discussion of the Meech Lake provision for appointment to the Senate. As everyone knows, that is a temporary measure and is not something which is viewed as being permanent.

Reference has also been made to Senate reform. I have to be very careful here, because I do not wish to be accused of conflict of interest. As far as I know, all senators who have spoken on this matter and have referred to Senate reform have supported the concept of an elected Senate and an effective Senate with a suspensive veto concept. I myself support the Triple-E: elected, effective, but also equal.

● (1430)

I support the concept of equality of the number of senators from all provinces and, obviously, appropriate provision for the Territories. I think it is only in this way that in Canada we will be able to balance what we have as the equality of people—one person, one vote—the, roughly-speaking, demographic equality which translates itself at the federal level into elections in the House of Commons and the principle of the juridical equality of the provinces. For example, that Prince Edward Island with 120,000, or Newfoundland with 570,000, and Ontario with 7-point-whatever million possess a juridical equality. Obviously, it does not mean that each is equally rich or equal in terms of employment—it does not mean that—but it means that as constituent elements in the federal system there is a basic equality.

In terms of Senate reform, I would certainly support an elected Senate, and an effective Senate—and I think that means a suspensive veto. I also would be supportive of equality of representation.

In the final analysis, the differences which are apparent during this debate—and I think Senator Kirby probably referred to it yesterday, but in a different manner; and I will be using different terms, because I will not be disparaging things that he disparaged—are basically between two different points of view of Canada. One I would call a highly centralized view, a pyramid in structure, or a hierarchical view, a highly centralized view. The other one I would call a balanced federalism, whereby it is accepted that a strong province or strong provinces are not a threat to a strong federal government and a strong federal government is not a threat to the strength of the provinces; that these are complementary to one another, and we do not build up this false dichotomy of casting federal and provincial governments in adversarial roles.

We often hypothecate that there is always a power struggle, and we have this view of the adversarial position between the federal and provincial governments. I think that is the view of those who see Canada as a highly centralized country. Those of us who view it in terms of a balanced federalism, who welcome the strength of provincial governments and who welcome a strong federal government, view these two orders of government and their strengths, excellences and accomplishments as complementary and supportive one of the other.

Obviously, both views of Canada have been held historically for a long time, are held today, and will continue to be held. I certainly agree that they are held with equal sincerity and conviction by those who adopt one or the other of the views and the various nuances that are in between. I suppose that in the final analysis we are fortunate to live in a country where both views have an equal right to their expression and a tolerant audience from those whose views are different.

[Translation]

I thank you, honourable senators, since this is the first opportunity I have to express my thoughts before this House. I am looking forward to the opportunity of working for the good of Canada alongside all honourable senators, Conservatives, Liberals and Independents alike.

[English]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I apologize in advance. I may lose my voice half way through, so

I hope that you will be patient and try to interpret my croaking.

I am troubled, particularly by Senator Murray, the honourable senator, the minister responsible for this deed, the Meech Lake and Langevin Accords, for he is demonstrably extremely clever. He is also an honourable man, and I believe he cares for the country. So I can only attribute all of the things that I will find faulty in the Meech Lake Accord not to him when he defends them, but to his loyalty towards his government, because I do not think that he himself fails to see these flaws.

To start with, the process itself is terribly flawed. For example, the speed with which the Special Joint Committee was supposed to produce a report—and did. When I was refusing to sign that report, one of the Conservative members told me that he wanted it on the record that I refused to sign, and I told him that I was very glad that it was on the record, because all of my teachers and editors would have turned in their graves if I had put my signature to something which contained the most horribly loose language.

The other part of the process that I find very disturbing is that we are told conflicting things about the same issue by different people. These conflicts are most apparent in relation to the “distinct society” clause, and examples abound. For instance, in Debates of the Senate of March 31, 1988, at page 3050, Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, said this:

The clause recognizing Quebec's ‘distinct society’ is an interpretation clause and it neither creates governmental powers nor overrides substantive rights such as minority language rights in the Charter.

Also, in the report of the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord we see quotations attributed to Maître Yves Fortier, who first seems to agree with Senator Murray. However, if we look further at that report we find that Maître Fortier contradicts Senator Murray, and, thereby, contradicts himself. In one instance, on page 57, Maître Fortier is referring to those who are afraid that the “distinct society” clause might override the Charter, and he says:

...I would simply say we were dealing with a smokescreen.

Why not put in a symmetrical, non-derogation clause that says: The “distinct society” clause does not override the Charter. Honourable senators, the answer comes on page 67 of the same report, where the same Maître Yves Fortier is quoted as saying:

On the other hand, if it were decided to exempt the whole of the Charter from the effect of the “distinct society” clause, including clause 1 of the Charter, then that would mean the death of the Meech Lake Accord...

Again, on March 31, 1988, we have Senator Murray saying:

... this clause, together with the other parts of the 1987 Constitutional Accord, will allow Quebec to recognize and fully consent to the application of the Canadian Charter, while at the same time ensuring that both the Charter and the Constitution as a whole are interpreted in such a way as to consider those factors...

Honourable senators, Mr. Bourassa spoke on two occasions in the National Assembly, first on June 18, 1987, and then on June 23, 1987. In his first speech, he said:

M. le président, je me permettrai, contrairement à mon habitude, comme vous le savez, de me référer à des notes écrites à cause de l'interprétation qui pourra être faite par les tribunaux. Selon la jurisprudence, les déclarations, les intentions du constituant peuvent être très utiles.

• (1440)

He says, in English:

Mr. President, I shall allow myself, contrary to my habits, such as you know them, to refer to written notes because of the interpretation that can be given to what I am saying by the tribunals. According to jurisprudence, declarations and intentions of the constitution framers can be very useful in interpretations.

Mr. Bourassa wants the courts to know what he means by this accord. He says in the Journal of the National Assembly of June 18, 1987, at page 8078:

[Translation]

It should be pointed out that the entire Constitution including the Charter will be interpreted and implemented in the light of the “distinct society” clause. This applies to the exercise of legislative powers and will allow us to strengthen and build on what has been attained.

[English]

This is not just an interpretative clause; it is a motor that will drive the actions of Quebec. He continues:

[Translation]

The only limitations to our powers are found in sections 23 of the Charter and 133 of the 1867 Act.

[English]

The only limitations he accepts are article 133 of the B.N.A. Act and article 23 of the Charter, the Canada clause, which says that if an English-speaking Canadian moves his family to Quebec, he can put his children in an English school provided he took his elementary education in English. Further:

[Translation]

The right to resort if necessary to section 33 of the Charter.

[English]

So Premier Bourassa is saying to us that if there are any obstacles to his interpretation of Meech Lake he will go the “notwithstanding” route. He says that this clause extends to all fields, including immigration, because of the agreement. Here he says:

[Translation]

The exclusive power for Quebec to choose immigrants who want to come to Quebec either from outside Quebec or from Canada...

[English]

The Premier of Quebec is saying that he is going to regulate immigration to Quebec from other parts of Canada. This is what the text says, and I can let Senator Flynn have a look at it if he does not have a copy.

So they will not touch the Canada clause, and they cannot touch article 133. However, they can touch article 6 of the Charter, which says that any Canadian can go anywhere in the country. This point was made shortly after Claude Morin, who was the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations for the Péquiste government, had spoken about the disadvantages of this immigration clause in the Meech Lake/Langevin Accord and indicated that anybody could come to Quebec. I have just read the answer to you. The premier is saying that Canadians may have a barrier to entering Quebec. Constitutions should be precise, and it is easier if one writes them down precisely. Mr. Bourassa can interpret the Constitution in one way, and Senator Flynn can do so in another.

Let me go on to the topic of spending power. Senator Murray said that the accord recognizes that it is constitutionally acceptable for Parliament to establish new national shared-cost programs. This is what we are being told all the time. This is a "new" federal power which we have been given, as it was never recognized before. The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, Senator Murray, said that here on March 31, and it is reported at page 3051 of Hansard.

The accord recognizes that it is constitutionally acceptable for Parliament to establish new national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Bourassa has an opposite view:

[Translation]

We have taken special precautions to ensure that an opting out provision for Quebec would not be construed as a legal recognition of the power of the federal Government to set up programs in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

Whom should I believe, the Premier of Quebec, who participated and was in the room writing this thing, or Senator Murray? Or is somebody going to tell me that what Senator Murray said is constitutionally acceptable and that what Mr. Bourassa said with regard to juridical recognition is not? Here we are beginning to play Byzantine games and splitting hairs several ways. These are extremely dangerous games to play. Not only are they dangerous but they are distasteful because of the high-pressure salesmanship that resembles more the marketing of some over expensive drug than the creation of the fundamental law of the land. We are being flim-flammed. It is a shell game. It is snake oil. It is as if the public relations people managed to fool the drafters of the new Constitution, because must I assume that the drafters of this new Constitution were vague unintentionally—or intentionally? Which was it? Is it too much to expect them to say, "Look, we wanted to get Quebec into the Constitution in order to get Péquiste votes and therefore we gave them everything they wanted, and more than Leveque had ever asked for, and as a price for doing that we have to give the same powers to all the provinces. We have emasculated Canada, but it is just too bad. Electorally, it was necessary."

Senator Haidasz: At 5.00 a.m. they were unconscious.

Senator Gigantès: It is the sort of thing the public should know about. We have to be told the facts about these things, and we are not being told the facts. We are being told that this or that part was not acceptable to this or that premier, that premiers objected to putting in a clause protecting individual rights unconditionally, and to putting in the amendment we proposed that the Charter has primacy over everything. We do not live in Soviet Russia, and this particular attitude on the part of a premier or Prime Minister is something the voters should know about. Which premier was it? Was it the Prime Minister alone? Did a number of premiers say that they were prepared to subordinate individual rights in order to strike a deal? The voters of Canada have a right to know. We cannot wait 30 years for the record to be published to find out. This is a matter of immediate policy. A law is being put on the books which affects individual rights.

We have been told that some premiers did not want a provision giving primacy to the Charter. Well, let us hear about it. Which premiers did not want it? Why the secrecy? Senator Murray said that they would not reopen the accord unless there was an egregious error. On Tuesday, during Question Period in the House of Commons, Mr. Mulroney mentioned such an egregious error, which he says he inherited from Mr. Trudeau, and that is the notwithstanding clause. Did he make an effort to remove that clause? That clause is terrible for the individual, and I said as much in 1982, so I take no responsibility for it. However, in 1982 Mr. Trudeau got something in exchange. First, he got a sunset provision for the notwithstanding clause which said that there would be a vote on the matter every five years. In exchange, he also got patriation, the Charter and an amending formula. What did the federal government get this time? I have read these accords thoroughly, I have read Professor Hogg's comments and those of everyone else, and I find that the federal government got absolutely nothing this time.

● (1450)

On March 31, 1988, Senator Murray said that if the accord were reopened, one provincial premier said that he would want a Triple-E Senate. Therefore, they did not touch that and left it for the second round. Honourable senators, you had better forget about the second round. In his closing speech in the National Assembly, Mr. Bourassa said:

[Translation]

There will be no retreat, it gives us total protection . . .

[English]

He is talking about what he obtained at Meech Lake.

[Translation]

There will be no retreat . . .

[English]

Quebec now has 23 per cent of the seats in this chamber, that is, 24 divided by 104.

Senator Flynn: Including yours.

Senator Gigantès: Including mine. To have a Triple-E Senate there would have to be some retreat on the part of Quebec in terms of giving up seats—not to mention Ontario. Here we are told by Mr. Bourassa: "No retreat."

The talk about the "second round" is something that I particularly resent, because while I am told that we can reform the Senate in the second round, or repair whatever errors were put in Meech Lake, I know that I am not being told the truth. I know that a deal was struck—that people were allowed to bargain about our country and our rights in order to strike a deal, any deal, at any price. We are now being told this myth of the second round where we are going to stamp fish with the coat of arms of one province or another; and where we are going to start debating for the next 120 years what kind of Senate we are going to have.

Why must this be a process that makes us all feel as if the people who made those choices did not care for us? The public out there believes that those 11 people did not care for the individual, because what they produced was something that deals only with government powers. They transferred a fair chunk of federal government power to the provinces and they inserted clauses to protect that government power. However, they did not insert a single clause to protect individual rights. These 11 men had no concern about individual rights. They have concern only for preserving, when necessary, the tyranny of the majority.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Gigantès: No constitution is worth the paper it is written on unless it substantially protects minorities. We have the possibility in this Meech Lake/Langevin Accord of having minority rights interfered with, and not only in Quebec. The powers that Quebec has have now been given to all the other provinces. I would entrust my individual rights to Mr. Bourassa any day, but I would not entrust them to some premiers farther west whom I will not mention so as not to be insulting.

Why was this done in this way? Why was it not open? Why were we not told the reason for the decisions that were taken? Why were individual rights totally disregarded? Why would an intelligent and honourable man like Senator Murray get up and tell me that, yes, there was a certain agreement, and then go on to tell me the opposite of what Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Rémillard say as to what the agreement means? The letter that Senator Murray read from Mr. Rémillard here in this chamber only mentioned not curtailing the rights under articles 15 and 28. He mentioned no others. There is no promise in the extracts of that letter from Mr. Rémillard that are in Hansard to the effect that Quebec will not try to touch article 6. Article 6 is an important article. It gives me all kinds of rights, and someone may try to change them. I might be told that I cannot go back and work in Quebec. Article 6 states:

(1) Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada.

(2) Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right

(a) to move to and take up residence in any province; and

(b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.

(3) The rights specified in subsection (2) are subject to

(a) any laws or practices of general application in force in a province other than those that discriminate among persons primarily on the basis of province of present or previous residence;

We have Mr. Claude Morin testifying that the immigration powers given to Quebec are of no use, because Quebec cannot restrict immigration from other provinces. I have read to you a passage from Mr. Rémillard's speech in which he said that they now have the power to curtail immigration, that is, to control immigration coming from outside Canada or from inside Canada.

Honourable senators, we were a country. I think we are less of a country now. I am a neophyte, newly converted to Canada. While in a prison camp in 1950, weighing 97 pounds and seeing everyone around me dying, I decided that I was going to get out and go to a country where I could live well and bring up my children. In a death camp, on Christmas Eve 1950, I picked Canada. I knew a fair amount about Canada and Canadians. I do not recognize this wonderful character of Canada in this document we are asked to approve. That is why I support the leader of the majority in this chamber and will vote for his amendments.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Coggier: Honourable senators, for a while last summer I had the privilege of substituting for our colleague, Senator Tremblay, so that I chaired the proceedings of the Joint Committee of the Senate in the House of Commons on the Constitutional Accord and heard most of the witnesses who also appeared before the Committee of the Whole of this Chamber, including the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

After last summer's experience and what we have heard in recent months, I have the impression that everything there was to say about the Constitutional Accord has been said. Consequently, I do not intend to prolong this debate unduly by repeating its various elements point by point.

However, I do believe that as a senator from Quebec, I can provide a different perspective, since the province I represent played such an active role and, in fact, formed the crux of the negotiations and was a vital part of the Accord itself and its subsequent ratification.

Perhaps I may say, honourable senators, also as a senator from Quebec, that I am somewhat surprised at the thundering silence observed by my Francophone opposition colleagues. I am astonished that Quebecers, that Francophone Quebecers, would not have more to say about a question that is so important to Quebecers as a whole.

I said before that we have a different perspective on the question. I think that is legitimate, fair and reasonable, since Quebecers, more than other Canadians, felt the impact of those difficult times from 1976 to 1980, followed by an equally difficult period from 1980 to 1982. All Quebecers, whatever their political stripe, were profoundly affected by the pre-referendum period. At the time, Quebec society was in a social, cultural and economic turmoil.

That is probably why, today, so many Quebecers welcome the Constitutional Accord as a breath of fresh air, as the final gesture that calms the stormy waters. At last, we will be able to live our lives with serenity and dignity.

After the referendum, all Quebecers anxiously awaited the promised constitutional reform and earnestly hoped that the deadlock would be resolved.

I will not go into all the details, but suffice it to say that we had to wait for the Constitutional Accord to break this deadlock.

Honourable senators, I think we should bear this perspective in mind when we consider how we shall vote tomorrow. It will probably be one of the most important decisions any of us ever had to make in this Chamber. Before exercising our right to vote tomorrow, I think we should look at the consequences. I also think we should realize that the status quo is no longer possible. If anyone here imagines or has the illusion that we can simply reject or amend the Constitutional Accord, which would mean rejecting the will of eleven First Ministers, ratified by three provincial legislatures, including that of Quebec, if anyone believes that this can be done and that political life as we know it will simply go on as it has before, he does not realize what this would mean to Quebec.

● (1500)

[English]

The point I wish to make, honourable senators—and I think it is the important one in this debate—is that as we vote tomorrow I think it is imperative that we look at the consequences of the vote. Anyone who thinks that we can amend the Meech Lake Accord after it has been ratified by Quebec; anyone who thinks that we can throw it out; anyone who believes or dreams that Canadian political life will keep on going as it is does not know Quebec.

I would like to quote from the words—which I thought were quite eloquent—of Madame Solange Chaput-Rolland, when she appeared before the committee last summer. She said the following—and I wish to make her words mine. To the members of the joint committee she said:

[Translation]

You surely all know that if, for one reason or another, the Meech Lake Agreement fell through, there could be no more negotiations, no more justifications. If Quebec again feels that it is more difficult to enter the Canadian Confederation than to remain outside, you know very well that this can only lead to another form of independence, this time not chosen by a Quebec political party, but perhaps chosen and imposed on Quebec from outside.

She added:

I tell you quite frankly that in 1982 I wondered whether the pain, quarrels and bitterness that followed the referendum were really necessary.

Honourable Senators, I share Solange Chaput-Rolland's vision of a grim future without the Meech Lake Agreement. However catastrophic it may seem, I believe that it is realistic. And if we were to add to the affront of 1982 another snub in 1988, I shudder to think of the consequences.

Honourable senators, last spring our country's political leaders put on paper their collective vision of the Canada of today and tomorrow. Their act was filled with generosity and understanding in the true search for reconciliation.

I think that tomorrow we will be called upon to show the same sentiments. It seems to me that Canada and Quebec expect no less.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, it is not often that I have spoken at length in this chamber, so if my voice cannot be heard I trust that you will advise me.

I welcome very much this opportunity to speak to you. This is an historic debate.

The Senate's duty to advise with respect to a constitutional amendment flows not only from its widely recognized role as a chamber of sober second thought, as a mechanism for safeguarding federal-provincial interests, but it also derives implicitly from the Constitution Act of 1982.

As senators, we have a duty in constitutional matters that is both special and proper. Let no one say we have no right to be here on this subject. We have a duty to be here. It is a duty which we, among all of the players, are uniquely free to discharge according to our best judgment.

One of the tragedies of recent constitutional development is that members in the other place are subject to tight party discipline in deciding where they stand on constitutional matters. Thus, the Constitution of Canada has become a strictly partisan issue. Brian, John and Ed become the arbiters of what Canada should do and what Canada should be—and I think that is both wrong and unfortunate.

It is hardly surprising that the suspicion lingers throughout the country that, in the case of the Meech Accord, short-term advantage—particularly in Quebec—has been far more influential in party positions than has been the long-term interests of the country. The suspicion lingers that many members in the other place would vote differently if they were allowed to vote their own rather than their party's judgment.

That is not a problem that we in the Senate need have. We can, and I suggest we should, approach the Meech Lake Accord as a matter of personal judgment.

In doing so, I would like to begin by saying that I very much regret having to come down firmly and hard against the Meech Lake Accord. I say "regret" quite sincerely, for I have admired the hard work and ingenuity that our colleague, Senator Murray, has brought to his duties. Notwithstanding that he and I differ markedly in our views on the role of the Senate—and perhaps on many other things as well—so vital is the Constitution, and so obviously sincere and diligent is his effort to resolve some of those dilemmas, that I wish him well and would that I could be more helpful.

● (1510)

We are nearing the end of this debate and the end of an even longer process of inquiry during which the Meech Lake Accord has been closely examined. Rather than look at its detailed provisions, which could go on endlessly, I would simply indicate that I concur with the views so ably expressed last Monday by Senators MacEachen and Frith, and with regard to Senate reform and to the contrasting roots of the 1982 and 1987 constitutional amendments, I concur with the views expressed by Senator Kirby last evening. I would that I could have stated the case nearly as well, and I am pleased that by their already having done so, I do not need to.

So now it is time to draw a conclusion, and in my remarks today I should like to do so by making three points. The first is that the Meech Accord is so riddled with uncertainty that it cannot be allowed to form the basis of a major change in our fundamental law; second, the Meech Accord sows such contradictory expectations in the Canadian body politic that it cannot serve as a basis for political unity in our country; and, third, the Meech Accord will so add to the burdens of trying to govern our country that it cannot form a basis for Canada's future political evolution. For these three reasons I will urge that the Meech Accord be remitted for clarification and improvement. I will urge that senators support the opposition amendment, for though it might usefully go further than it does, it does go in the right direction.

Turning, then, to the first of my judgments, namely, that the Meech Accord is not an acceptable basis for justifying a major change in fundamental law, I say this because the testimony of witnesses before us and the points made in speeches by our colleagues that I have mentioned seemed to me to make a conclusive case that the Meech Accord is a hodgepodge without consistency or coherence, clearly the product of a negotiation without a single clear view of the country. It is badly drafted, it is such a tenuous and fragile agreement that the government is petrified to have it reviewed lest it fall apart under the simple light of clarification. It is so ambiguous as to be virtually all things to all men. Perhaps it was intended to be so.

All this is in a constitutional law, in a fundamental law. There is, if I may use the word, something "sacred" in constitutional law. It is a statement of what a country aspires to be and how it plans to get there; it is a view of the country, and that view of the country is also of our individual and collective futures. That is why the Meech Accord is so terribly important to every Canadian. It is the nature of constitutional law that all our other laws depend on it, that ultimately peace, order and good government depend upon it. Therefore, constitutional law must be consistent and systemic; it must be precise; it must reflect a firm, basic and broad popular consensus; it must be unambiguous. The Meech Accord is none of these things.

On the contrary, some of the players in Meech Lake have indicated that they are not exactly sure what parts of the Meech Accord mean. They say that the courts will ultimately decide what the provisions mean. They say it can be left to the courts, that we do not have to know. I say this is a cop out; I say it is downright irresponsible for ministers of the Crown not to know what they are doing and for them to act not by agreement on what they understand but by agreement as a means of passing the buck to the courts. That, it seems to me, is totally unacceptable.

Ultimately, it has even come to be argued that "Pour protéger la société distincte, il faut éviter de la définir." I am quoting from Yves Fortier. Just so has ambiguity been raised to a constitutional cult.

From this we can understand its importance to the proponents of the Meech Accord and the danger that its critics see in the enshrinement of the principle of representational justice.

From this we can understand the use of non-derogation clauses as a constitutional instrument that Senator Murray says, in a most interesting article, was "developed into an art" at Meech. An art, may I add, the purpose of which, it seems to me, was not to clarify or to reassure but to bridge politically irreconcilable positions.

From this we can understand why we have been led such a merry dance with regard to the phrase "distinct society."

Let me make it clear; it is not a question in my mind of the existence in Quebec of a "distinct society." It is not even necessarily a question of what features of this "distinct society" ministers at Meech were trying to protect, though surely that information should be required of those ministers. What I am raising here is that it is a question of what are the consequences of the differentiation of this "distinct society" from others that may exist in Canada. What, in short, are the consequences that the Government of Canada intends to see flow from the "distinct society" clause?

I find it somewhat patronizing to be read a lecture about how there is a distinct society in Canada. I know that. My question is: What are the consequences that the ministers sought to obtain?

Mr. Bourassa and his ministers have already begun to invoke the "distinct society" clause as a basis for special treatment under federal laws. Les Caisses Populaires Desjardins recently took the same road with regard to its opposition to federal financial legislation. Are these the consequences that were seen as flowing from "distinct society," and, if so, where do they stop?

Senator Flynn: That has been the case for years!

Senator Pitfield: Senator Murray may insist that the Charter is not affected, that women's rights are not prejudiced, that unanimity is not a straitjacket, and so on, but Mr. Trudeau's case—including his examination of the conclusions of the joint committee itself—stands, in my opinion, unrefuted. The smudge of uncertainty sticks like pitch to the Meech Accord. Despite Senator Murray's strong assertions, it has not been washed out.

The Meech Accord is riddled with uncertainty. No wonder that almost 80 per cent of lawyers polled last November opposed the agreement. A fundamental law so cast cannot last. Its proponents are putting the country at risk. On these grounds alone we must pull back to consider carefully what is being done.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, if there are any doubts, let us go further, let us go a second step. Senator Murray has said repeatedly, "Quebec has chosen Canada. It is time for Canada to choose Quebec." It is a catchy tune, but parts of this argument are unstated, at least as it applies to the Meech Accord. The implicit meaning is that "the people" of Quebec have chosen Canada; it is time for Canada to choose the "government of Quebec." I do not accept that the necessary and only quid pro quo from the Referendum is the enhancement of the government of Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Pitfield: Quebecers can and should benefit in many ways from opting for Canada.

Moreover, I believe that Canada has been key to the survival of French Canada. I believe that Canada continues to have a key role in the survival of Quebec. I find abhorrent the implication in the Meech Accord that the federal government has no role in Quebec with regard to the distinct society. This is surely a prescription for diarchy, the roots of "two nations, separate but equal," each with its own government, competing, if not warring, within the bosom of a single state.

In "la survivance de la langue, la culture, les gens francophones" on this continent, Canada has been no less important, and may, in some respects, have been on occasion more important, than Quebec itself. Much of the Quebec elite and all of the Quebec bureaucracy do not like this fact. But it is true; the people of Quebec know it is true and the elite and the bureaucracy of Quebec know the people know it is true.

That is why Pierre Trudeau consistently swept Quebec.

That is why the federalist role in Quebec is an honourable one.

That is why the proponents of the Meech Accord did not have to trade the vision of a Canada united by what Canadians hold in common for a view of Canada constantly and forever in confrontation, trying to draw a line between a duality—two communities, two nations, two peoples, and some day, regretably, perhaps two countries.

It is in the name of this duality that this seed of diarchy, the Meech Accord, makes a massive shift of constitutional authority to Quebec. It is not by sections 91 and 92, to be sure; it is not really by a shift of jurisdictions but by a shift of real authority, of real power, nonetheless.

[Senator Pitfield.]

On Monday Senator MacEachen made a powerful analysis of how the so-called "interpretative" clause of the accord will work. I would add only one point to his analysis, and I think it is a key point: It is to a government and a bureaucracy that these powers and the legitimacy of this rhetoric are being transferred, and by the nature of governments and bureaucracies this transfer will be exploited to the full and ceaselessly. That is why definitions and clarity are so vital. That is why a knowledge of what is being agreed to is so terribly important in this case.

By imposing restraints on the federal government, by stopping the spending power, by imposing a representational judiciary, by the ultimate decentralization of the Senate to the provinces, by incorporating—sometimes, I am sure, without knowing it—nationalist rhetoric the federal government has been effectively hobbled. In doing these things the present government has moved skilfully to sell its product. It has developed the idea of "a principle of provincial equality" into an almost magical instrument. What is this "principle"? It is, I take it, merely that every province has a veto on constitutional reform. But that just makes the provinces equal in only the narrowest sense. Quebec voting as a block in federal elections, Ontario as the richest province—they are not made more equal. How the Maritimes or the Prairies really benefit from this "principle of equality" I find difficult to see.

Moreover, in terms of artful manipulation, the language barrier in Canada has never been so skilfully used as in the presentation of the Meech Accord as one thing in French Canada and another in English Canada. For a while even the Francophones hors de Quebec and English-speaking Montrealers were taken in by this double game.

Leaving aside the minorities, however, the majority in each province continues to receive different and contradictory versions of what Meech means. What happens when they are awakened to reality? Will Quebecers be satisfied with a distinct society that is merely comfortable words? Will the other provinces accept a distinct society that is the basis for Quebec's assertions of authority in foreign affairs or for the control of labour mobility in Canada? "No" will say many others in English-speaking Canada.

I have previously made the case that the Meech Accord is unacceptable as fundamental law. Now I argue that it is unacceptable as a basis for political unity. It is riddled with conflicting expectations. Again, I urge that we pull back and consider more carefully what we are doing.

But, honourable senators, let us go further still. Let us take the third step. It has been argued persuasively, and I think conclusively, that the Meech Lake Accord is an extreme statement of the "pactist" view of Confederation. That is to say that it is the implication of the Meech Accord that Canada is the creature of the provinces. I do not believe that the majority of Canadians believe that to be so. Everything we know about Canadian public opinion suggests that the opposite is the case. Canadians want a strong Canada—a country greater than the simple sum of its parts. A constitution founded on the pactist view cannot last. A country true to pactist constraints cannot prevail—indeed, probably cannot survive—in the modern, increasingly interdependent world.

We have had our flirtations with pactism periodically in Canada, and though they have been fewer and never approached success to the point the Meech Accord has reached, they represent a legitimate point of view. They correct for excesses of centralization in our governmental system. They keep our country one of the few true federations in the world. But this time our move to the pactist model has not been accompanied by any compensating corrections to the federalist model. We have given away much of the federal power, but have got nothing in return—not clarification of authority with respect to foreign affairs, not removal of the “notwithstanding” clause in the Charter, not mobility rights for all Canadians, not the removal of economic barriers—none of these things that have been so long and urgently needed for the effective functioning of our polity in an increasingly complex and interdependent world.

On top of that, we are now going to lock the Constitution into the straitjacket of unanimity. Having seen the oscillation of actism and pactism, of centralization and decentralization, having taken matters to an extreme of provincialism never before surpassed, the proponents of the Meech Lake Accord propose to freeze the Constitution in the straitjacket of unanimity.

Senator Flynn: That is false.

● (1530)

Senator Pitfield: Having suffered the effects of provincial blackmail on Canada's constitutional development for 50 years, and having just escaped these constraints at the cost of grave and regrettable confrontation during the early eighties, the proponents of the Meech Accord intend to reimpose a broad provincial veto. The process of blackmail is inevitably about to begin again.

The circumstances of the eighties showed that the law cannot be used to paralyze the cycles of history, but that is not to say that sane and responsible men should put their country through the stress of the confrontation implicit in a constitutional straitjacket. Especially is that so where the Constitution has been impregnated with the seeds of diarchy, where the central government is faced, as our government is now faced, by the Free Trade Agreement, with the harsh realities of an increasingly interdependent world.

At least so far as trade in goods is concerned, I am very much a free trader. However, I recognize that the integration of our economy with that of the United States is going to be an extremely testing matter.

It will not have escaped the attention of senators that the strongest advocates of the Meech Accord are from our most decentralist provinces: Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia. This in contradistinction to the traditional federalist consensus in Ontario and the Maritimes which, with the support in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, has heretofore been predominant in Canadian federalism.

I suspect that we are in for a rocky time as Quebec and the West triangulate for their advantage between Ottawa and Washington. We already have had some notice of this kind of situation in Premier Bourassa's early reactions to Ontario and New Brunswick's questioning of his New England energy export contracts. This is not in keeping with the Meech Accord, it was said, and the National Energy Board should keep its nose out of provincial matters.

And this is the approach of a “federalist” government. What happens as public sympathy in Quebec inevitably drifts some day towards a group like the Parti Quebecois? The interaction of the Meech Accord and of the Free Trade Agreement will, unfortunately, militate in favour of more, not less, nationalism in Quebec.

I previously made the case that the Meech Accord is unacceptable as fundamental law. I then argued that it is unacceptable as a basis for political unity. Now I have sought to demonstrate that it is an unacceptable basis for Canada's future evolution. Again, I urge that we pull back and consider more carefully what we are doing.

In the face of all of this, why force the Meech Accord through now? Why has Parliament been so completely excluded from really considering the Meech Accord and forced to pass it without any chance to make improvements? Why has there been no real or meaningful consultation? It is terribly regrettable that the government has forced everyone to get so dug in, to polarize the debate, and to ensure that for many the Meech Accord will never be accepted. Why have we who want to be helpful been forced to become opponents?

The advocates of the Meech Accord say that Quebec was outside the Constitution and had to be brought in in great haste. The extreme urgency was not true, and the rest is only partly true. In fact, Quebec was in. It is the Government of Quebec that was out. While this is very regrettable and undesirable, that it continued to be the case for a short period of time did have certain advantages to all concerned. First, as Senator Cogger was pointing out, it enabled the country in general, and Quebec in particular, to get on with living, most especially with rebuilding the provincial economy. Second, it enabled Canada and Quebec to put the Constitution and constitutional confrontation back into perspective. Third, it gained time for the emergence to power of new commercial and government elites, both in Ottawa and in Quebec, the emergence in Quebec of the so-called entrepreneurial revolution that would put new values and perhaps find new solutions to old arguments.

It is the third of these advantages that has now been lost. Though Trudeau and his colleagues are gone, the new elites have not fully emerged. The entrepreneurial revolution is still in mid-stream. With apologies to Senator Tremblay, and perhaps Senator Flynn and Premier Bourassa, the Meech Accord, at least on the Quebec side, is essentially the product of old hands and it incorporates old—very old—thinking.

Perhaps it was inevitable that the rivalries of Canadian federalism would continue unabated, and that we would proceed without interruption or respite from the passion of "actism triumphant" to the intensity of "pactism reborn." But the government, the country, this house, the people should be under no illusion that Canada's return to a preoccupation with the Constitution can now be avoided. On the contrary, as Senator Murray has advised, round two is on the way. Indeed, we are to have it every year. As if the Constitution annually is not enough, the same topics can be had under the rubric of economics also every year.

I do not believe that anyone familiar with federal-provincial relations—certainly not anyone in the federal bureaucracy—really thinks Senator Murray's dream of provincial altruism, or federal altruism for that matter, has begun to be realized.

Since the dawn of that brave new world Newfoundland has threatened to separate over fisheries, New Brunswick has been told to get into line on the Constitution, Ontario has been overruled on free trade, Manitoba has been double-crossed on airplanes, Alberta has had a fit on oil taxes, and British Columbia and others have felt ignored on forest products. The list could go on and on and on.

I am not here making any judgments of what was right or wrong. I am simply talking about the heat. In this regard, the Meech Accord will not mark a new age. It will just mark a renewal of federal-provincial rivalry with the feds at a critical—perhaps even a fatal—disadvantage.

I believe many Canadians intuitively sense this to be so. There is no profound, overwhelming popular support for Meech in the country. What support there is is not enough to sustain a change in fundamental law, much less give it any legitimacy.

There is resignation in English-speaking Canada and acceptance in French-speaking Quebec, and this, though viewed from opposite ends, for basically the same reason. The federal government gave away the store, and no one can see how to redeem it from its new owners without seeming to renege. That the Government of Quebec reneged themselves twice in the past is beside the point. That some premiers did not know what they were signing and others signed only when isolated and under pressure seems, even in the light of public reaction—or perhaps because of public reaction—all the more reason for those premiers to brazen it out.

● (1540)

Rather a new government, one elected since the Meech Lake meeting, insists that the accord be reviewed. And I, along with many Canadians, hope that that one will succeed; that, despite the pressures and inducements that the federal government can bring to bear in great size and profusion, there will be a government somewhere that stands up for Canada, explaining that the Meech Lake Accord is not good for Canada and, what is more, that it is not good for Quebec.

It is not good for Quebec, because Quebec is vitally interested in the protection and encouragement that francophone Canadians in Quebec as well as elsewhere have received from Confederation. A Meech Accord that does not carry a national consensus in English-speaking Canada will do no good for Quebec.

On the contrary, a Meech Accord that becomes a focus for stress and confrontation, that is uncertain, that is riddled with contradictory and misleading expectations, that is a crippling burden upon our ability to face an increasingly challenging and interdependent world will ultimately damage Quebec.

So, whether the end is to be that the Meech Accord is reopened for review or referred to the courts for clarification of its confusions, I cannot, honourable senators, for the reasons I have given, support the government's resolution. I will support the opposition's amendments, my only caveat being that they could go further to remedy the deficiencies and dangers that I have mentioned.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we certainly cannot deny that the question before the Senate is of vital importance. If the answer is yes, and the Meech Lake Accord becomes law, it will signal the return of Quebecers to the constitutional fold. Otherwise they will feel even more isolated than they did after the 1982 constitutional statute.

Can we afford to run that risk simply because Meech Lake does not solve certain problems which are not directly related to the main objective I have just mentioned, or which at best are problems of semantics? Well, that is precisely what we are being urged to do in the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen.

We have had a very interesting debate. It reminded me of the 1981 constitutional debate when I sat in the chair of the Leader of the Opposition. But, in a way, today's debate is different. We will find solutions to the problems which are not directly related to Meech Lake. Or, in any case, the objections they raise have been disproved. I think that the remarks of Senator Murray in particular have settled a number of the questions, concerns and fears that have been raised.

As I look at it, the opposition has focused on three major issues. First, human rights and particularly the gender equality; then of course we have heard every kind of argument on the meaning of distinct society; and, third, references were made to shared-cost programs, to compensation provided in case a province should decide to opt out and proceed on its own.

I submit that the amendments proposed by Senator MacEachen do not come to grips with or settle these three points. In other words, there is no basic objection to the notion, for example, of the distinct society since it is repeated in the amendment that the interpretation of the Constitution must consider:

the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

That problem, therefore, if it exists remains unsolved. In this connection, Senator MacEachen mentioned a possible referral to the Supreme Court of Canada. I suggest he was not thoroughly convinced he was right and that he realizes that the Supreme Court is not in a position to address as vague an issue as this.

● (1550)

In 1978, I believe it was, there was a referral of a precise question dealing with the Senate. The Supreme Court responded. The Supreme Court responded also to a question concerning the provinces' veto in Constitutional matters. However, we could have asked the Supreme Court to give us for instance its interpretation of Clause 15 of the Constitutional Act of 1982; when we look at the court decisions rendered since then, we realize that they certainly took unexpected turns.

I submit again, however, considering the way the amendment moved by Senator MacEachen was drafted, that the Opposition and even independent Senator Pitfield, who voted in favour of this amendment after a very long speech, are going to vote in favour of recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

It has also been argued that the distinct society could have the worst consequences. It has been described as a rule of interpretation, but it seems to me that no one emphasized the fact that a rule of interpretation comes into play only when the terms are unclear and require interpretation. When the terms are clear, there is no need for rules of interpretation. It is not possible through a rule of interpretation to change the provisions of the mobility clause mentioned by Senator Gigantès.

Those who oppose the agreement, including Senator Pitfield, have raised all sorts of straw men which they have destroyed angrily. As a matter of fact, the basis for their opposition to the Meech Lake Accord is Mr. Trudeau's vision which they would like to perpetuate. They wanted to use Mr. Trudeau's victory in 1982 which managed to tame a separatist government. They wanted to perpetuate this victory. They would not admit that this agreement would rectify the basic shortcoming of the 1982 accord which had excluded Quebec. Not only the government, but Quebec generally. At that time, it was the National Assembly as a whole and not the government which had objected. Now that we have a Liberal government, I do not want them to come and tell me that it is another separatist government. It is the same government.

I submit that Quebec's current position is consistent with what has been evolving over the years. Apparently Senator Pitfield, although he lived in Montreal for quite some time, has forgotten that evolution. Mr. Trudeau mentioned it in reference to Mr. Taschereau, Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Lesage. It is quite a continuity that is found in the Meech Lake Accord.

What Quebecers wanted in 1980, when they voted "no", was a Constitution that would recognize those aspirations that had evolved over the years under successive governments in Quebec. I submit that, whatever Senator Pitfield may think, such was not Mr. Trudeau's vision, that of a centralizing government that would not recognize Quebec's uniqueness.

Whatever one might say, the facts show that after the referendum, when Mr. Trudeau initiated his process of constitutional renewal, when as we saw he stated he would proceed unilaterally, what did Quebecers do? They voted Mr. Lévesque back into office to ensure that the opposition to Mr. Trudeau's methods would continue.

At any rate, what I wanted to suggest concerning this debate, is that the major positions that emerged from Senator MacEachen's amendments do not change the substance of the objections to the report. By voting for the amendments, we will indeed enshrine the three principles of "distinct society", compensation in the area of joint programs, . . . I am looking for the third area, but anyway—

Senator Frith: Provincial involvement in the appointment of judges and senators. So you can support that?

Senator Flynn: What I mean is: those items are in a way side issues.

Senator Frith: Why not support them?

Senator Flynn: The essential part in my view remains the matter I have just indicated of the "distinct society" as a rule of interpretation, but as a rule of interpretation only, and the matter of financial compensation.

Of course, having a say in the appointment of senators and Supreme Court judges certainly ensures some balance between the two levels of Government. That is important. I view that as somewhat of a side issue.

Should we take the risk at this point, by supporting those amendments that will say "no", and so far as the Senate is involved in the Agreement, as Senator Cogger indicated? I am in complete agreement with him. The impact of that rejection, as I said, is to push Quebec back into deeper isolation than ever since 1982.

I think that I should change the subject instead of carrying out a discussion about the interpretation of criticisms which have been heard, especially those of Senator Pitfield. In my opinion, it could be applied mutatis mutandis to virtually all cases relating to the Constitution of 1982. If we had discussed the problems raised by the uncertainty due to sloppy drafting, et cetera, we would still be debating the 1982 constitutional bill. You only have to read over tomorrow the speech made by Senator Pitfield and you will realize that it could be applied in reverse to the 1982 proposal.

As I said, I should like to consider the matter within the framework of the procedure set in Part V of the 1982 legislation, that is the constitutional amending formula.

What is an amendment to the Constitution? It is legislation. Legislation is a text on which the competent authorities agree. Ordinary and non-constitutional legislation requires the approval of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

The Senate and the House of Commons have agreed under the Standing Orders which are not included in the Constitution to go through a first reading and a second reading of a bill which is then referred to a committee if necessary. There is also a third reading and the Royal Assent.

In the case of constitutional legislation, a resolution is introduced, but its text must be approved. Who should intervene? Usually, the Senate and the House of Commons at the federal Government level and either the legislatures of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population in some cases or all legislatures when unanimity is required.

All those people must then agree on a text. A piece of constitutional legislation is proclaimed and is not given Royal Assent. We then have a problem because usually the Canadian constitution is proclaimed but it is absolutely necessary to agree on the text.

What prompted me to discuss this matter was the suggestion made by Senator Frith after the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau made his presentation before the Committee of the Whole, when he said that the Senate has kept its veto power. I wondered how section 47 could be interpreted this way.

I emphasize that the same text must usually be approved by both Houses and by the legislatures when and in the proportion required. We cannot have two different texts. What happens then if the Senate proposes to amend a resolution already passed by the House of Commons? Had the Senate had a veto power, of course, it could send these amendments and if the House of Commons rejected them, then the draft resolution would die on the Order Paper exactly as in the case of an ordinary bill.

To prevent this—and Senators Frith and MacEachen will remember this since it is provided for in the Constitution Act of 1982—the powers of the Senate were restricted and it was only granted a suspensive veto.

I read section 47. It is perfectly clear and, in my opinion, totally unambiguous. It says:

47.(1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

Thus it is clear that the Senate can accept the resolution passed by the House of Commons as is, in which case the House of Commons has nothing more to say.

The Senate can also say no. In this case, the House of Commons, if it insists, will have to pass the same resolution again. And then the Senate can say yes, with amendments, as Senator MacEachen proposes. But this is exactly the same as if it said no.

A Senate amendment to a resolution on the Constitution adopted by the House of Commons is the equivalent of a no. If you sent this amended resolution, and if the House happened to see fit to accept it, it would have to adopt a new resolution and therefore come back to square one and send it back to the Senate. That is exactly what the situation would be.

The same would apply to the provincial legislatures. A new federal-provincial conference would have to take place. Governments and legislatures would all be back to square one. To propose and adopt an amendment at this stage would mean a refusal to endorse the motion.

In the Senate, a majority is held by the Opposition. What happened in the House of Commons once the question was put regarding the amendments made by Mr. Turner was that 37 Liberals voted in favour of these amendments and the motion was rejected. On the main motion, that is to say the one originally put forward and presented today by Senator Murray, 33 of these 37 Liberals voted in favour without amendment.

In this case, given the way in which the Opposition would have us proceed today, the Senate would never have the opportunity to take a vote on the original motion. I do not believe that this is as it should be. Those who are really opposed to the Agreement should have the opportunity to say so and those who are in favour, such as the 33 Liberals who were in the other place, should be able to voice their support. Moreover, the final vote in the other place was 242 to 16.

[English]

Senator Frith: For something that is supposed to be so clear it is becoming a little obscure.

Senator Flynn: What is obscure?

Senator Frith: Anyway, carry on.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: In the other place, 242 members voted for the original motion, without amendments, and 16 voted against. What I am saying is that it is not proper for the Senate to pass amendments without first voting on the motion without amendments.

It is not difficult. The positions expressed by the Government text on the one hand, and the motion in amendment moved by Senator MacEachen on the other, are not irreconcilable since the Senator's party voted for the government motion in the other place. For these reasons, I submit—

● (1600)

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): If the Senate defeats the amendments, as they were defeated in the House of Commons, the main motion will be tested. The only difference is that there is a majority on this side.

Senator Flynn: No, the difference is—

Senator Frith: Instead of one over there!

Senator Flynn: Sure, but I would like the Senate—

Senator Frith: You would like it to be the same!

Senator Flynn: I want the Senate to be able to decide whether it will approve the motion if—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Then it has to defeat the amendments. You want to change the majority situation, and I don't blame you. I would do the same thing in your place.

Senator Flynn: No, no. I am able to count, and I am very amused—

Senator Frith: This is very amusing!

Senator Flynn: —to see that many senators who are fundamentally opposed to the Meech Lake Accord will be voting for the amendments which in most cases, at least on their substance, are in accordance with the original text which was approved by the Liberal Party in the House of Commons on the last vote.

Senator Frith: Let me make a deal with you. We will let you be the majority here if you will let us be the majority in the other place. How about that?

Senator Flynn: I have a procedural problem with that proposal.

Senator McElman: That is not your only problem, Jacques!

Senator Lucier: That is not the only problem you've got!

Senator Flynn: Senator Lucier, I would suggest that you be quiet.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: I say that in the best spirit possible. I have great affection for Senator Lucier, although sometimes I think that he goes too far, but I do not mind too much for too long.

Senator Hicks: I feel exactly the same way about you, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: I know that, and I have had an opportunity to test it on a few occasions.

Senator Frith: He usually speaks very highly of you, too, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: You said "usually." In any event, I said that I have a problem with the procedure because of the order of the Senate that says that all questions relating to the motion must be put no later than 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. If the questions on Senator MacEachen's amendments were put, let us say, this afternoon, after the vote, I would rise and move the following motion:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the above schedule and to which it desires their concurrence—

The schedule would be the one as amended by the amendments, because Senator MacEachen has indicated that there is no doubt as to the way in which the Senate will dispose of it. My motion continues:

The Senate adds, however, that if the House of Commons should not concur, the Senate does not oppose the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the resolutions which the House of Commons adopted on the 26th of October, 1987, if the House hereafter again adopts the said same resolution.

I give notice that I will put this motion immediately after the vote on Senator MacEachen's amendments.

Senator Lucier: Except there is an egregious error.

Senator Flynn: In that way we will learn where the Liberal Party stands. We will know who is against the Meech Lake Accord in a definite way. Certainly Senator Pitfield will be able to vote no, and that should be helpful to him. We will also know whether there is agreement between the Liberal majority here in the Senate and the Liberal members in the House of Commons.

Senator McElman: You are trying to reactivate Valentine's Day.

Senator Flynn: I would think that you would want to be logical.

My reason for doing that is that this will be the last word that the Senate will have on this motion. If it is interpreted as a definite no, I think it would be unfair. I believe that, really, the majority here is in favour of the motion as originally presented rather than no motion at all, and that is why I want the Liberals in the Senate to be able to say to the House that we would rather have this as amended by Senator MacEachen, but, if not, that we are in agreement with our party in the House that a proclamation be made in the terms of the original motion.

• (1610)

Senator Frith: So our action depends on what they say over there?

Senator Flynn: No, not at all.

Senator Frith: Sure, you're saying it does.

Senator Flynn: I do not think we would be bound.

Senator Frith: If they do not agree, they will say, "No, no, boys, we don't like that."

Senator Flynn: You are not bound, but if you are in disagreement with that position at least you will have the occasion to say so and be frank to the end. Otherwise, we will not really know where the Senate stands if it votes only in favour of the amendments and it does not say a word about the original motion.

Senator Frith: Sure, it does—it says, "We want the motion as amended." Then we will say, "We don't really mean it."

Senator Flynn: No, no. Under section 47 of the Constitution Act, you know that the House may adopt the same resolution again and that we will have nothing to say at that point.

Senator Frith: No, I do not.

Senator Flynn: There is no way you can avoid being put in that position tomorrow if you do not agree with that in any way.

Honourable senators, I am not quite sure how to do this, but I give notice to the Chair that if and when the amendment of Senator MacEachen is put and accepted I shall move that my motion be then put.

Senator Frith: Is that a motion? Are you saying, "if something happens, I will move something"?

Senator Flynn: I am giving notice to the Chair that after the vote on Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment, if it passes, I want to put that before any other question is put.

Senator Frith: You said, "If it is accepted . . ."

Senator Flynn: I will not move it if the amendments are defeated.

Senator Frith: Why don't you wait for the event and then move your motion?

Senator Flynn: The problem is that if the debate is concluded I will not be allowed to intervene after the vote on Senator MacEachen's motion, because it will be three o'clock, and at three o'clock we are supposed to put all the questions.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Would the honourable senator allow a question? I hear his argument, but I do not understand it.

Senator Flynn: I was not expecting that.

Senator Grafstein: If Senator Flynn does not expect senators to understand a resolution or a methodology, how can he expect them to support it? I ask this curiously and honestly.

Senator Flynn: I was not expecting you would support it.

Senator Grafstein: I am not suggesting whether I would support it or not. I am trying to understand what Senator Flynn is asking the Senate to do.

The Senate, if it chooses to support Senator MacEachen's motion, is sending a fundamental message about how the Constitution of Canada should be amended, period. Then you suggest we send an afterthought to the House of Commons which says, "Do not accept that particular message; accept another message." Tell me where in constitutional or parliamentary practice such a procedure is acceptable? Name me one example of that. The Senate speaks, and when it has completed its message it listens to the House of Commons respond.

Senator Flynn: This is the problem.

Senator Grafstein: I do not understand it.

Senator Flynn: It is obvious that you do not understand. If you could only read Part V of the Constitution and section 47 you would understand that this is an entirely new procedure. We are practising for the day when the Senate will have only a suspensive veto in all matters. We will be caught in constitutional matters with a suspensive veto. We have never faced that situation, so I cannot give you a precedent. It is entirely new.

Senator Grafstein: If the Senate were to pass Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment, and if we were then to support your resolution, would you then allow other senators to make resolutions, to send their particular message?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to that.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Pitfield has said that he would like to see a different version of the constitutional amendments, so perhaps Senator Pitfield could then put forward his resolution and we could deal with that. Perhaps I may have a different version. Senator Tremblay may have a different version since he has said that he is not satisfied with Meech Lake, in a different context, and that there are imperfections. Senator Murray has told us that he is not satisfied with Meech Lake. Other senators on your side have said that they are not satisfied with Meech Lake. We will have chaos here. It is not parliamentary practice and it is not constitutional practice.

Senator Flynn: May I ask Senator Grafstein a question? If we send a message to the House that we have adopted the motion with some amendments and the House does not agree with the Senate and again adopts the same resolution as it adopted on October 26, which is provided in section 47, do we want to have something to say about that?

Senator Grafstein: Senator—

Senator Flynn: I am asking you.

Senator Grafstein: Let me answer your question with a question. What would we present to the House of Commons? We could present the House of Commons with a cherry tree of resolutions and say to the House of Commons, "Cherry-pick the resolutions that you like." It would be endless, and that is why the practice seems to me to be, with all due respect, unparliamentary.

Senator Flynn: You did not answer the question I asked you. Are you in favour of defeating any motion regarding Meech Lake?

Senator Grafstein: I will not have made that decision until the debate is concluded. You will hear my speech later and I will tell you how I feel about these questions.

Senator Flynn: In any event, whatever may be the opinion of Senator Grafstein, I give notice that I want the Chair to put my motion after the vote on Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment. If, by a miracle, his motion is defeated, I will ask leave to withdraw mine.

Senator Grafstein: Now we are talking.

Senator Flynn: You should have understood that a long time ago.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order to make it clear that we accept all that Senator Flynn has said as part of his speech, but it has no status as a formal notice of any motion. It is part of a speech and therefore we all know about it, but we are now in a debate and not under Notices of Motions. Certainly, his motion is a substantive one and could not be received as an amendment to the main motion. If any effort is made to interrupt proceedings when the amendments are dealt with we will be contravening the order of the house.

Senator Flynn: No, no. I think you have forgotten what was said by Senator Frith about that. He said that motion could be put at any time and that we might be able to speak on the main motion after your amendment will have passed.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: No.

Senator Flynn: Who said, "No?"

Senator Hicks: I said, "No." I have a very clear recollection of the motion.

Senator Flynn: That was done when Senator Simard started to speak. I am sure Senator Frith will bear me out on that. You will remember it was said that he could speak, and if there was a vote he could speak again.

Senator Hicks: Perhaps I could clarify my position.

Senator Frith: I said that he could speak on both the motion and the amendments if he wished. Then Senator Corbin raised a question of order indicating that he did not see how that would work, because we did not know the order in which the votes would be taken and the order in which persons would speak. Then we said, "Well, yes, but, of course, with unanimous consent we could"; and Senator Corbin said, "If it requires unanimous consent it will not get my consent." The whole thing was wrapped up that way. What you are saying about the exchange between me and Senator Simard is totally irrelevant.

Senator Hicks: The reason why I contradicted you, Senator Flynn—if I appeared to do so—is that my recollection is quite clear that when the house adopted the order it was that all questions should be put not later than 3 o'clock on Thursday; and that would not permit a question on the amendments to be put and then for the debate to continue before the main motion, because the house order required that all questions arising out of the debate would be put not later than 3 o'clock on Thursday. That is why I took issue with you.

Senator Flynn: Do you suggest that we cannot make any motion other than the one that was made by Senator MacEachen?

Senator Frith: Are you moving an amendment?

Senator Flynn: This is an amendment, because it adds to the message.

Senator Frith: There is no message provided for—

Senator Flynn: We can send a message at any time. That is what we did on a previous occasion. I refer honourable senators to Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for August 13, 1987. In connection with Bill C-22, it was Ordered,

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate have passed this Bill with ten amendments—

Senator Frith: It was a bill—

Senator Flynn: Wait a minute. You are in a rush:—to which they desire their concurrence.

The Honourable Senator Bonnell moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House of the recommended amendments, observations, and recommendations on general patent law amendments as contained in the Seventh Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.

Therefore the Senate agreed to send another message, other than the one which followed the adoption of the bill, with amendments, at the third reading stage.

Why do you object? Because you do not want to be put on the spot?

Senator MacEachen: Because it is totally irregular. It is a parliamentary monstrosity.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps at this point we should again put on the record the Senate's order on the question that is before us and which we are debating. It is:

That no later than three o'clock p.m. on Thursday next, 21st April, 1988, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the main motion and any amendments thereto.

If we are looking at another amendment, we can find out whether or not that is in order—but apparently we are not. After we have voted on that motion, in accordance with the house order, if Senator Flynn wishes to put some motions, he will not be precluded. They might be out of order and we might object to that, but there is nothing to prevent him from standing up and moving whatever he wants to move after we have complied with the house order—which is to vote on the questions put by the Speaker, "on all questions necessary to dispose of the main motion and any amendments thereto."

Senator Flynn: You are precluding any possibility of moving amendments after the motion of Senator MacEachen has been adopted or defeated. Suppose for one moment that the motion is defeated. Perhaps someone else would like to move that the "distinct society" paragraph be deleted, purely and simply.

Senator MacEachen: It is too late.

Senator Flynn: Yes. That is exactly what you are saying, that the fact that you moved an amendment is preventing anyone else from moving a further motion in amendment.

Senator MacEachen: No. This arises from the house order.

Senator Flynn: Again I say that the discussion between Senator Frith and Senator Simard was exactly to the contrary, and that is why Senator Corbin intervened and said, "What if we want to make amendments?"

Senator Frith: And then it was suggested that unanimous consent was necessary.

Senator Flynn: He was not saying that unanimous consent was necessary.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, do not misrepresent the point that I was attempting to make the other day. I was attempting to protect freedom of speech. Since then this house has unanimously accepted an order, and we all have to live by it. To me, that is what counts at this stage. The debate that preceded that means nothing any more. It fluttered away with the pigeons.

Senator Flynn: You have changed your mind. I thought you were going to protect me.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I feel certain that the house will not mind if I return the debate to the substantial matters that are before us. I confess to a sense of frustration and invalidation in my participation in this debate, which concerns the value to Canadians of the government's proposed constitutional amendment, 1987 in the form of the resolution placed before us by the government side.

I say "frustration and invalidation" because the attitude of the government has been essentially "our way or the doorway." No changes are to be considered; no improvement is possible. This is it, and it cannot be otherwise.

I maintain that this process is an affront to our parliamentary democracy. The role and responsibility of parliamentarians, as inquisitors of the executive, as guarantors of the right of the public to understand how the public business is being conducted, who will benefit and who will lose, is cast aside. A dominant executive, with a "trained seal" majority in the other place, will have its will.

The government's message to Canadians is, "Trust us," but the standing of the government, and particularly of Prime Minister Mulroney, as expressed in his favourite political polls, shows that the Canadian people do not confide their trust in this government.

Why did the government deny the other place its opportunity to send a committee to consult with Canadians in their own communities? Why did the government severely restrict the list of those who were eligible to be heard here in Ottawa? In 1980-81 I sat as a representative of the Senate on a joint Senate and House of Commons committee to examine the proposals for constitutional change, which resulted in the Canada Act and the Constitution Act, 1982. I sat virtually every weekday for nearly six months, and we heard from Canadians who represented every area and every interest group concerned; and when we concluded most Canadians felt that those constitutional amendments and the Charter of Rights were shaped by them and belonged to them.

Premiers of some of the provinces came before members of this Parliament to argue their case. Parliament played the role it was created to play as the representative of all Canadians. Parliament was then the centre of Canadian attention, the place where it was happening. Parliament was where the interest groups bargained with the government, with the opposition parties and with one another. Our democratic system worked.

What has the Conservative government done with Parliament by comparison? Mr. Mulroney made a deal in the dark of night with ten premiers. I will come to the substance of the deal in my remarks; but as to the process, they all agreed not to consult Canadians, not to consult anyone but themselves, except for show, and to use their parliamentary majorities to ram the deal through. No changes; no improvements; as is; that's it!

• (1630)

The Constitutional Accord could easily have been made ad referendum to a normal process of parliamentary inquiry. What would be the harm in that? It could have been made subject to one more meeting with the Prime Minister and the premiers after public hearings in Parliament and in the provinces. What would have been the harm in that? Canadians would have been listened to, and would have been seen to have been listened to. Can anyone ask what would have been the good of that? Obviously, the government asked itself that question and came to the conclusion that it would not be good for the government genuinely to listen to Canadians, and "genuinely to listen" means to be prepared to make changes.

The government was not prepared to make changes, not prepared to listen. Take it or leave it! That is a sad way to conduct the process of nation-building in Canada. It is a sad way to dispense fairness, show concern and give Canadians the conviction that they are in the process and that they can gain from being a part of the system. This process, I repeat, is an affront to Parliament and to parliamentarians in both houses and on both sides of each house. I believe that Senator Walker's friend, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, would not have tolerated this process. I believe that the Honourable Davie Fulton would not have tolerated this process, and they were among the best Conservative parliamentarians.

Probably the underlying thinking of the Conservative government is that the end justifies the means. In their view, the absence of the political consent of the Quebec provincial government is so egregious an error of the 1982 constitutional process that to obtain that consent is worthy of the greatest sacrifices of parliamentary process, of federal power and of various other groups of Canadians in the pursuit of their rights and interests. But I submit that a government that cared about the secure building of this nation, with a little more patience, with an agenda longer than one term of office, with a sense of Canadian history could have achieved all of those goals and achieved them securely for all Canadians.

Together with a majority in the Liberal Party and in the country, I regretted the absence of Quebec's political consent to the Constitution Act, 1982. Not only the federal government of the day, of which I was a member, but the governments of the nine other provinces, many of them Conservative, parted company with the aims and objectives of the Quebec provincial government, headed by the Honourable René Lévesque of the Parti Québécois.

Clearly, this was unfinished business and would have to be addressed again by Canadians. Frankly, I had hoped that some time would elapse before that day, time to cool emotions, time to allow maturity to grow in English Canada and in Quebec, time to change the players from the combatants of 1980-82 to a new generation who could take a fresh approach from the vantage point of an evolving nationhood tested by the world around us.

I believe that Senator Murray has not made a good case for the urgency of introducing these constitutional changes at this time in our constitutional process. Let me be clear that I recognize that the Constitution Act, 1982 did not meet the fairness test with a majority of Québécois. That issue was on the national agenda. In spite of my concerns about the abuse of process, the objective of including Quebec is not in doubt anywhere. The fairness test, as an essential part of our national process, requires also that fairness be evenly applied. This is not the case in this so-called Meech Lake Accord which is before us. Regrettably, the seeds of future conflict exist in the way this accord has been arrived at.

To settle the Constitution all significant groups in Canada must think that the outcome is fair. Do they? Not women seeking assurances of equality of rights, as Senator Marsden has noted; not natives seeking recognition of their role in Canada as a distinct society, as Senator Lucier has said; not minority francophone communities in English-speaking provinces, and not the English-speaking minority in Quebec, and there are many others.

The Leader of the Liberal Party, the Right Honourable John Turner, the Senate Opposition leader, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, many of my Liberal colleagues in the Senate and in the other place, and many witnesses who have appeared before us, pre-eminent among them, if I may say so, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, have all made the case, and made it overwhelmingly, that this accord is so seriously flawed that it needs to be reopened and revised. It should not be passed as it stands.

Senator MacEachen has introduced amendments to the Resolution which are fair and balanced and which, if adopted, would form an excellent base for a further round of consultation with the provinces. Nothing in these amendments would threaten the gains for Canada as a whole which are contained in the present Meech Lake Accord. The amendments would consolidate that constitutional growth and enhance rather than further divide Canadians.

I have no hope that the Conservative government will pay the slightest attention to the voices of concern that are rising throughout Canada today. Of course, Senator Murray says his mind is open in the case of egregious error, but he can find none. While the political judge has his mind made up—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): That was a statement made by the First Ministers, by the way.

Senator Austin: I understood it was Senator Murray's position that there is no egregious error. Have I misunderstood him?

Senator Murray: No. It was the First Ministers who agreed that only in the case of an egregious error would they agree to reopen the accord.

Senator Austin: Senator Murray is representing his government in this chamber. Do I understand him to say that it is the position of his government that there is no egregious error?

Senator Murray: That is right.

Senator Austin: Then Senator Murray's mind is made up. Still this hearing process is under way, and I wish to argue with Senator Murray a little longer.

Senator Murray: Be my guest.

Senator Austin: My Senate colleagues from the Liberal side have made a comprehensive case for further amendments now. I join with my Senate colleagues in their arguments. The task I wish to undertake is to show that there is an egregious error in the proposed unanimity rule which will apply if this Resolution is adopted.

Some of the most bitter conflict we have experienced in constitution-making has been centred on the amending formula. Until 1982 constitution-making in Canada had floundered on this issue. Failure to agree on an amending formula in the federal-provincial meetings of 1980 led the federal government of the day to proceed unilaterally with a request to the Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom for a constitutional package which included its own preferred amending formula.

A number of factors had moved constitutional change to the top of the priority list by 1980. The growth in economic power in western Canada through the 1970s led to recognition of political ineffectiveness in the federal system. In Quebec it was the need to respond to the explosion of Quebec nationalism, particularly as harnessed by the Parti Québécois for its declared goals of independence and sovereignty association. A traditional Quebec was being transformed by economic, social and cultural modernization. A long series of challenges from western Canada and Quebec unbalanced the role of the federal government and the equilibrium of Canada which had been established in the post-war recovery. The message was clear: Quebec was not satisfied to be a mere province in Canada. Two possible solutions were argued; either escape Canadian federalism through independence or redefine Canadian federalism to a new pan-Canadianism in which Quebec and French Canada could expand in a national system. Certainly, I thought that the Quebec Referendum of 1980 had settled the issue in favour of a new pan-Canadianism on terms stated by Prime Minister Trudeau during that referendum debate.

● (1640)

I have to confess, speaking as a senator from British Columbia, that my province, farthest from Quebec geographically and culturally and with the smallest francophone community in terms of percentages, had minimal interest in the early 1980s in either Quebec's claims or Ottawa's proposed solutions. This was certainly one of the key factors in Mr. Trudeau's low level of support in British Columbia.

The complex judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, rendered on September 28, 1981, forced the federal government and the provinces back to the bargaining table. Honourable senators will recall that the Supreme Court then found that unilateral action was legal, but that convention required a substantial degree of support from the provinces. The court did not define "substantial," except to make clear that unanimity was not essential.

Honourable senators will also recall that in the post-Supreme Court bargaining period, an amending formula was hammered out by the federal government and nine of the ten provinces. The federal government gave up its proposal for referenda as a part of the amending procedure and also surrendered its formula which allowed the possibility of an amendment's being passed against the wishes of up to two provinces in each of the western and Atlantic regions. These were replaced by the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982, proposed by the "Gang of Eight," particularly under the influence of Premier Lougheed of Alberta.

The underlying premise of the existing amending formula in the Constitution Act, 1982 is that all provinces are constitutionally equal and that the only authoritative representative of a province in constitutional matters is the provincial government. By dropping the referenda clause the provincial level was guaranteed that 1980 would never happen again; that is, that a provincial electorate would never again be able to take a position different from that of the ruling provincial elite.

I thought that the Alberta formula for amendment was, in itself, a big barrier to constitutional change. Canadians as citizens are forever, or nearly forever, forbidden to change their Constitution. Only their provincial and federal governments and Parliament can do so with a minimum of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of Canada. If the Meech Lake resolution passes, only unanimity of the federal and all provincial legislatures could permit a referendum to take place.

The resolution before us sets an impossibly high degree of consensus for change. The slowest ship in the constitutional convoy determines the safety and well-being of all. What price will be demanded by the anchor-draggers before they will speed up? Is there any major reform of social policy since the war that could have been won through the use of this formula?

Perhaps we misunderstand the intent. It may be that the unanimity formula is designed to frustrate further change, to force further constitutional debate into silence. It may be that it is designed for stability for those who are in and to protect that stability from those who are out. In this context, at least, the proposed unanimity rule would be logical and understandable in its content and purpose.

However, I submit that it is a hoax of the greatest kind to introduce this amending formula and, at the same time, to promise to the "outs" a post-constitutional amendment agenda, which any person of reasonable understanding must know will be virtually impossible to achieve. What further concessions could the federal government plan to make to the provinces to gain provincial unity of purpose?

The unanimity rule for changes to the Senate and for the creation of new provinces is a real barrier to any future action in those areas. It is silly to suggest that there is any substance to the promise that Senate reform will come about as a result of being a perpetual agenda item in future federal-provincial conferences. The depressing conclusion for the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories regarding their constitutional aspirations has been well presented by Senator Lucier and others.

The Liberal amendment here seeks to remove from the unanimity requirement those items which became subject to it at Meech Lake. Senator Murray argued before the Special Joint Committee, on August 4, 1987, that the unanimity rule was agreed to because of the concept of the equality of the provinces. But how were the provinces treated unequally under the previous rule? Seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population were recognized. All provinces are equal. They are equally able to agree or to disagree to constitutional change, and each vote for agreement or disagreement is equally cast. It was Premier Lougheed's formula and it was agreed to by eight other provinces.

Senator Murray: We have not changed that, by the way.

Senator Austin: Well, you have with respect to the Senate and you have with respect to the establishment of new provinces.

Senator Murray: But the 7-and-50 is still the general amending formula.

Senator Austin: Yes, but in some special and important cases it is not. In those cases you have adopted a unanimity rule.

Senator Murray: Very well—attack the items that we have added to the agenda.

Senator Austin: I am attacking those items, and I am saying that the rule is unfairly balanced and is designed to prevent change. I am saying that you do not own up in an honest way to your design.

Honourable senators, Senator Forsey, in evidence before us, said:

The chances of any amendment being adopted even under the seven-province formula are virtually nil. Under the unanimous consent formula, the chances for a change are microscopic.

The federal government is proposing a unique position in seeking to adopt such an aggressive form of the unanimity rule into our Constitution. No other federal government requires such unanimity from its constituent parts in order to amend its Constitution.

In Australia the state legislatures have no role at all to play in constitutional amendment. The proposed amendment must pass both houses of the federal Parliament, a majority of the voters in the country as a whole, and a majority of voters in a minimum of four of the six states. In the United States approval of two thirds of both houses of Congress and three quarters of the state legislatures is the usual method by which to make a constitutional change, although there is a referendum procedure. In Switzerland passage by the Assembly and a majority of the citizens in the cantons is required. Referenda are in constitutional use in Switzerland, Australia, the United States, Austria, France, Denmark, Ireland, Italy and Sweden.

Honourable senators, there are other and fairer solutions for all Canadians, which can be found and adopted at this stage in our constitutional evolution. The Senate's role is to remind, to prompt, to advise and to elucidate. Canada is a fairness country. Let us ask the federal and the provincial governments to return to the negotiating table to find that fair balance in our federation that will ensure that new and serious grievances are not raised—grievances that will prove to be more threatening over time than the issues we are now trying to resolve.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I first want to thank Senator Lucier for his kind remarks about the attendance of Senator Macquarrie and myself at the Meech Lake hearings in both Whitehorse and Yellowknife. We enjoyed those meetings, in spite of the fact that one might have thought they were difficult. It is never difficult to listen to people who are saying what they desperately want to say and who live as far away as people do in the North. We appreciated everything that they said. We listened to them carefully. I want senators to know that we enjoyed the trip to the North.

Honourable senators, by this time everything that possibly could have been said has already been said twice and three times over. Senator Austin has said he is from British Columbia and is close to the scene there. Senators will realize that I am speaking as the only Conservative senator from Alberta, that it is a privilege for me to present some of the feeling of that province and to put on record some of the things said in the provincial legislature. I shall quote a little later on some of what the premier said in his speech to the Legislative Assembly.

● (1650)

First, I would like to go through the process. I am not as familiar with all legislation that has passed this chamber as some honourable senators are, however, I had to get it on record and learn about it.

The Constitutional Accord of 1987 has been called a miracle. Both Robert Stanfield and J.W. Pickersgill used this term when they appeared before the joint parliamentary committee, and they are right; it is a miracle. For 61 years unanimity eluded us. Just five years ago, when the Constitution was patriated, unanimity escaped us once again with potentially very damaging consequences. Quebec did not share in the agreement. Today there is the widest possible support for an accord that restores Quebec to the constitutional family. Quebec is on-side, all the premiers are on-side, and I hope that all honourable senators will be on-side as well.

Senator Frith: We will be on the right side.

Senator Bielish: The consensus that emerged on June 3, 1987, is the product of political will, political will combined with hard work and many months of consultation and discussion building on past progress in constitutional talks. The Constitutional Accord cannot be properly evaluated as an isolated event. It was not conceived and born stubbornly at Meech Lake. Rather, the accord must be viewed in its proper historical context.

As several witnesses emphasized during the joint parliamentary committee hearings, and as the committee has stated in its final report, the accord was not the result of two all-night bargaining sessions. Its origins extend at least to the unfinished business of the Constitution in 1982, and the issues it deals with have been the subject of discussion, debate, consultation and preparation for even longer. Indeed, all the issues dealt with in the accord have been fully debated by politicians, experts, interested Canadians and commentators for more than 20 years, a point Gordon Robertson and Solange Chaput-Rolland emphasized when they appeared before the committee.

Mr. Robertson, who is one of the most experienced of all Canadians in the area of constitutional negotiations, told the committee that the accord "has to be seen in the context of the negotiations on the Constitution that have been going on, or were going on, from 1968 to the present time." As Madame Chaput-Rolland so aptly put it:

[Translation]

It seems to me that for the last 20 years Canadians have preferred living with their problems to solving them.

[English]

But the unanimity achieved on June 3, 1987, would not have been possible without the benefit of past debate on the main elements of the accord. The experience with federal-provincial immigration agreements since 1971 laid the basis for resolving the one issue which was not previously an agenda item for constitutional conferences.

The accord is built on the work of decades: the constitutional review of 1968 to 1971; the constitutional exercise of 1975 and 1976; Bill C-60 in 1978; the intensive discussions on the Constitution from 1978 to 1979 and the negotiations that followed the referendum in 1980, as well as the exercise of 1981.

Constitutional renewal reached a milestone with the Constitution Act, 1982. It gave us patriation, an amending formula, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, recognition of aboriginal rights and our multicultural heritage, a commitment to reinforce our regional strengths and the extension of provincial jurisdiction over natural resources.

These accomplishments are not to be taken lightly, but they were fundamentally flawed by the exclusion of Quebec. With Quebec on the outside looking in, the country was not whole, the circle of Confederation was not complete, so the debate was not over. As Senator Lowell Murray pointed out in his initial appearance before the special committee, a series of events combined to create what he called "a window of opportunity" for the successful resolution of the Quebec issue.

In his August 1984 speech at Sept-Îles, the Prime Minister first set out his commitment to seek Quebec's return to the constitutional fold. Soon after that, in February 1985, the Quebec Liberal Party adopted its constitutional position in Maîtriser l'Avenir, with five realistic conditions for ending the constitutional impasse. When it took office in December 1985, this became the Government of Quebec's program. A fundamental condition was constitutional recognition of Quebec's distinct society.

In the summer of 1986 informal discussion began on Quebec's program. The issue was subsequently reviewed at the August 1986 First Ministers' Conference, where premiers unanimously resolved that their top constitutional priority would be to seek Quebec's return to the Constitution, that the process would be based on the five points Quebec had put forward, and that other areas of concern to them would not be linked to the Quebec round but would be addressed in subsequent constitutional discussions.

With that mandate, Senator Murray and Gil Rémillard, his opposite number in the Quebec government, each had bilateral consultations with their provincial counterparts. In addition, federal and provincial officials began to review the issue in depth.

At their conference in Vancouver in November, First Ministers agreed that discussion should be intensified and expanded in order to evaluate more fully the chance of success of formal negotiations based on Quebec's proposals.

Finally, the Prime Minister concluded that ministers had progressed as far as they could without substantive intervention by First Ministers, and he convened the Meech Lake meeting on April 30. So there has been long and careful preparation, well known to the public, when First Ministers announced agreement in principle at Meech Lake on April 30, 1987, and a unanimous agreement on the Constitutional Accord on June 3, 1987.

There were no surprises, except that unanimous agreement was achieved. The extensive preparation and consultation which characterized the process leading to the accord has continued with the process of ratification. All First Ministers explicitly endorsed the proposed amendments and committed themselves to tabling them in identical form. The accord is being submitted to the further democratic test of debate and votes in Parliament and the provincial legislatures.

The accord will only come into effect when it has passed this test, that is, when it has been approved by majority votes in Parliament and all the legislatures.

I would like to quote from an excerpt of the Alberta Hansard dated November 23, 1987, when the premier of that province spoke to the assembly.

• (1700)

He said:

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to look at this resolution in a variety of ways but first to say that the government of Alberta went into the constitutional negotiations with a certain principle in mind. They then set three targets, three aims that we would like to reach, and then finally there are the actual details that allow us to reach those targets. The government went into this negotiation—and by the way, the government started this negotiation—in Edmonton at the August Premiers' Conference.

I will continue. He further said:

[Senator Bielish.]

Now, Alberta went into the negotiation wanting to provide a stronger role for regions represented by provinces in the making of constitutional amendments and to result in constitutional amendments that gave a balancing of power, a greater decentralization, if you like, of the powers available to provinces under our Constitution, because as we've said before in this Legislature, the House of Commons is dominated by Ontario and Quebec, then the other House in our Parliament—

He is talking about this house—

—is also dominated by Ontario and Quebec, and that's a flaw.

You will pardon us for saying those kinds of things, but that is a fact of life when you live in the West or in a smaller constituency. He goes on to say:

We also felt that since Quebec was not part of the Constitution, our constitutional process was flawed and that that had to be corrected. So we worked to see whether we could get Quebec fully into the constitutional process but on the basis of no special status, and this accord achieves that.

Secondly, we wanted to establish within our Constitution the principle of the equality of provinces. We were able to do that in a variety of ways within the constitutional accord, and all members will see it in the document. This accord establishes the principle of equality of provinces.

Third, Mr. Speaker, we wanted to ensure that we would have Senate reform in our Constitution, not provided for by a letter of agreement or a handshake but in the Constitution. Now, for 100 years people have been talking about Senate reform in Canada, but until this government went through this process, there was never a provision that there would be Senate reform. We have it as the number one item for constitutional reform, and it's guaranteed in the Constitution. In the coming years we will have Senate reform as the number one item, and I believe we will be able to convince the people of Canada and all the governments of Canada that not only should we have Senate reform, but we should have a Triple-E Senate.

I will go on to the next item. He states:

... we've achieved an accord which does decentralize and give greater balance to our constitutional institutions. We have met our aim of bringing Quebec in. We have met our aim of establishing the equality of provinces. We have met our aim in getting Senate reform in the Constitution.

First, Quebec is a distinct society.

This is the first time that I have heard someone describe "distinct society." It has sort of been left up in the air. This is the way he described it:

... it's pretty clear to anybody who travels in Quebec that by recognizing them as a distinct society in Canada, you are really recognizing a fact of life, and that's what the first ministers wanted to do: recognize an actual fact of life in Canada by the clause that describes Quebec as a distinct society. That clause does not give Quebec any additional powers; it doesn't take powers away from anybody in Canada. But it does recognize a fact of life.

The other thing we were able to obtain in this negotiation is a veto for Alberta . . . Again, it really is foolish to argue that we have equal provinces and then propose an accord that would have perhaps the large provinces, like Ontario and Quebec, have a veto and not the small provinces, and that has always been the argument. We don't accept that in Alberta. We believe again in the equality of provinces; all provinces have a veto if one is going to have one.

The third point we were able to obtain is a curb on the federal spending power, that they could no longer end-run the Constitution of our nation and, by using their huge spending power, get into areas of strictly provincial jurisdiction, as they have in the past. That's no longer going to be allowed . . . A province can opt out of those programs before they're imposed on them and, as long as they meet the general objectives of a program, must be paid for that program.

The fourth item is something that I think is pretty important, that we now will have input into Supreme Court appointments.

The other item which we received input into: the appointment of Senators.

Enough was said in the first place. He goes on to say:

We've also obtained . . . greater input by the provinces into the immigration policy in Canada, and I believe that's important as well. We know that this is an important matter to the province of Quebec, but it's also an important matter to other provinces. Alberta supported Quebec in this matter, and I believe we will have far greater input into immigration to our province and a far better means of planning the future growth and development of Alberta.

. . . the last of the changes in the Constitution, which is to enshrine in the Constitution the principle of first ministers' conferences on an annual basis. This has always been something Alberta has been fighting for.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have achieved our overall principle of a greater balancing of Canada's political institutions to provide greater input from all parts of Canada through the provinces. We have brought Quebec in. We have established the principle of equality for provinces, and we now have Senate reform guaranteed in our Constitution.

In conclusion, honourable senators, it is grossly unjust to claim the 1987 Constitutional Accord was a one-night wonder. The accord was not cooked up in some kitchen overnight, nor was it pulled out of a hat. The process was fully consistent with Canadian democratic practice and reflects the concerted political will of all 11 governments. Without a doubt, the extensive process of consultation leading to the accord contributed to the successful outcome.

To claim that the Constitution was rewritten "on the run" clearly is without foundation. Rather, the accord builds on the consensus that has emerged over the years and lays the foundation for future constitutional growth and adaptation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to make a few comments in this debate, because I think it is one of the most important and interesting debates that I have been involved in since I came to the Senate some ten or eleven years ago.

I think there have been some excellent speeches analyzing the situation, the attitudes of various regions—particularly the provinces of Canada—respecting what is expected of our Constitution, and, indeed, many of the hopes and aspirations that have been expressed here in regard to all of that.

Perhaps I should go over some of that ground. Many beautiful phrases and great words have been put together describing the need for unity in Canada and the need for us to continue to work toward maintaining the unity of all of Canada. The reason why I should repeat those arguments, perhaps, is that I agree with all of those things. However, I think senators will forgive me if I pass up the opportunity of repeating what has been said so well by a number of senators on both sides of the house.

• (1710)

Honourable senators, my reason for participating in the debate is slightly different—in fact, it may be significantly different—and that is that I believe after you have put all of the great prose together, you must finish up with a document that works. It must be capable of being interpreted by the 11 governments and the courts in Canada so that it works properly. That is why I believe that this Meech Lake Accord is seriously flawed.

Senator Flynn: That is your opinion.

Senator Olson: I have confidence in a number of things, but I also have enough experience in negotiating with other jurisdictions, namely the provinces, to know that someone must be in charge of the national interest, and must have the authority to express the national will. I think the Meech Lake Accord weakens very seriously that capability of the federal government and, indeed, if you put it into the Constitution, it will weaken the authority of Parliament also, and that disturbs me.

There are a great number of points that could be argued with respect to this problem, but I only intend to discuss two of them. One is the unanimity requirement for the future respecting the amending formula. That troubles me a great deal. Honourable senators, the situation is not complicated. When a government is elected, they have earned the mandate to bring in whatever programs they wish under the constitutional law. They will be judged by the electorate at the next election on whether or not the programs were good or bad. But I am afraid, honourable senators, that if we accept the Meech Lake Accord, which includes the unanimity requirement for any future changes—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn, why do you say "no"? Under section 9 of the accord, there is a whole list of matters from (a) to (j) that require the unanimous agreement of the Parliament of Canada and of all of the provinces. That is what it says.

Senator Flynn: On certain matters.

Senator Olson: Yes, and the certain matters are listed from (a) to (j). Perhaps I could ask Senator Murray, even at this stage: When we get to the next phase or to a subsequent phase of constitutional amendments, such as the redistribution of powers between the two jurisdictions, does that require the unanimous consent of all 11 governments?

Senator Flynn: At present, yes.

Senator Olson: It does not say in the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Flynn: At present it requires unanimous consent.

Senator Olson: I am not sure that that is right, but I think that that has been the practice in any event. In other words, if the federal government wanted to change a provincial jurisdiction or a provincial power, particularly under sections 91 and 92, the agreement of all of the provinces was required. I see Senator Tremblay shaking his head the wrong way.

Senator Murray: You gave the right for the provinces to opt out of such a transfer in 1982.

Senator Olson: Yes, I understand. In any event, I want to get back on the track here because, as I said, I think a government ought to have the right to bring in its program and its policy. However, if we put this accord into the Constitution now, I do not think that a subsequent government can fix it without unanimous consent.

I see that Senator Murray agrees with that. In my opinion, it is not a good idea to include such things that cannot be remedied if you find that they are unworkable—and heaven knows that the unanimity requirement has made constitutional amendments unworkable for years and years.

Senator Murray: The unanimity requirement is only one of several amending formulae in the Constitution—only one of several.

Senator Olson: But you are now adding a number of matters to those that have the unanimity requirement that were not included before.

Senator Murray: Several matters, yes. You can discuss these matters, if you like.

Senator Olson: I do not want to take a lot of time discussing all of the details. You have been over that and Senator MacEachen gave a great analysis of all of those matters, as did Senator Austin and several others. It is easy to go back over it, but I am just telling you that after having listened to all of this debate, I am advising you now that I have come to the conclusion that it would be doing a great disservice to Canada—and indeed to Quebec as part of Canada—to have this kind of unanimity requirement—Senator Pitfield called it "the straitjacket of unanimity"—applied to the amending formula in the future. Therefore that aspect does trouble me.

Honourable senators, the other point that troubles me is this matter of having a constitutional requirement that there be financial compensation for every program that is introduced, in the event that any province does not wish to accept the national program that is offered.

Senator Murray: New national shared-cost programs.

Senator Olson: Yes, that is right, but every program was a new national shared-cost program when it was first introduced, such as medicare, for example—

Senator Murray: —in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Olson: Yes, I agree. My friend can use all of these expressions, but what is he going to talk about at the table when the provinces are present? You must be practical about it. I have had some experience in this area because I had the privilege of trying to get the provinces to agree to farm products marketing programs. During that entire discussion with the provinces, at no time did we challenge the jurisdiction of the provinces. They had jurisdiction over such things as the right to set prices and production quotas. We never assumed at all that the federal government had the power to do those things. However—

Senator Murray: It is a shared jurisdiction. It is agriculture you are talking about, is it not?

Senator Olson: Very well, I understand that. It is a shared jurisdiction, but what is not shared is the provincial government's exclusive right to set prices and production quotas.

Senator Murray: Is this agriculture you are talking about?

Senator Olson: Yes, it is agriculture.

Senator Flynn: No—

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn can disagree if he wishes. However, I want him to know that, during all of the months that we negotiated, I never once questioned the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, which they claimed.

However, perhaps you should wait until I get to the next stage: After the provinces had had dozens—or perhaps hundreds—of meetings, they came back and said to me: "Mr. Olson, we cannot come to an agreement. We have to have federal enabling legislation in order to get us out of this mess." At that time, eggs were selling for 8 or 10 cents a dozen. That was the most striking problem, but there were others in which the provinces wanted to have some structure whereby they could delegate their authority so that everyone across the country would be treated uniformly and, I hope, fairly. I am telling you of this as an example of the kind of problems you will face when you look for this unanimity that is about to become part of the Constitution.

Honourable senators, in that instance, it was my experience with the provinces that they could hold lengthy discussion and they could all agree that they had a problem and even agree on what the solution might be. But what will happen when it comes to making a commitment to honour a quota? I remember that with the eggs, quota was to be 475 million dozen the first year divided among the ten provinces. Three or four of the provinces did not come in at all because the quotas were to be based on the history of production for the previous five years—

● (1720)

Senator Murray: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson:—and there was also an adjustment in the formula in the event of an increase in the market. I did not hear what Senator Murray had to say. He will have to wait until I have stopped talking so I can hear him.

I want Senator Murray to know that nice words do not mean much. I appreciated his speech. It sounded great when he talked about all the great things that will come out of this accord. However, there comes a time when you have to apply it, and that is when you get mugged with reality.

Senator Neiman: A great phrase.

Senator Frith: “With” reality or “by” reality?

Senator Olson: By reality. If I said “with”, I meant “by.” That is when the provinces want every inch and every dollar they can get. That is normal, because it is human nature, but why does the government try to kid us into believing that we will have all this sweetness and light in the future? Every time the federal government wants the support of some of the provinces to meet the unanimity requirement, it will have to buy it. This has been the situation in the past. However, this time such efforts will weaken the federal government and it will not have the wherewithal to buy that support, or the authority to trade for it, when it wants amendments to the Constitution.

I see Senator Murray smiling as though he does not believe that such will be the case. Some of us who have been through these situations perhaps understand better than he does.

In any event, I would like to conclude by saying, again, that I do not want to support changes to the constitutional requirements in Canada that will weaken Parliament’s capability to deal with constitutional matters. If this government wants to give away its authority and power and commit Parliament, particularly the House of Commons, to giving a great deal of additional power to the provinces, then go ahead. However, I would not like it to change the Constitution in such a way—though I am afraid that it will happen—that we have a great deal of difficulty remedying the situation long after this government is forgotten. Given the experience of some 60-odd years, this is probably what will happen. From 1927 to 1982 we tried to patriate the Constitution, but we did not because we could not agree on what the amending formula would be when it got to Canada.

There will be federal programs that the federal government will help to pay for. Some people have mentioned day care. Perhaps there will be other social programs that will require a major federal financial contribution to be implemented across Canada and to meet the requirement that there be a uniform base of service available to every Canadian, whether he or she lives in Newfoundland, Alberta, Ontario or wherever. One of the major functions of the federal government is to carry out this redistribution exercise from time to time so that minimum standards can be maintained. We all know of major programs in effect now to which the federal government makes major financial contributions and that the provinces simply could not afford them if the federal government did not make those contributions. Medicare is probably an outstanding example, but there are others. I think that the spending power of the federal government will be weakened by the Meech Lake Accord, and that is one of the reasons why I am apprehensive about it.

Honourable senators, I intend to support the amendments moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I think Senator Flynn expected me to take this position. However, I want to say this—

Senator Flynn: Do you agree with all the amendments, including the one that deals with the “distinct society” concept?

Senator Olson: I did not bring up the “distinct society” clause or any of the other clauses because other senators have dealt with them. I said at the outset that I would deal with the two matters that bother me the most. The unanimity requirement for the future is one of them, and the devolution of the federal government’s capability to control federal spending power is the other. I can tell the honourable senator that even if all the amendments were accepted, I would not like to have the Meech Lake Accord added to our Constitution, because the two matters I raised are not sufficiently covered by the amendments. However, I may vote for the main motion after it is amended, anyway.

Senator Flynn: Will you vote for my motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, as a senator representing the Laurentides Electoral College, one of the 24 Lower Canada electoral colleges listed in schedule A, Chapter 1 of the revised Statutes of Canada, I shall describe first of all my perception of the global significance of the constitutional bill now before us.

The purpose of the Constitution Act, 1987, once it is proclaimed, will be to put things back in their proper order in a federation such as ours.

It would not have been natural that the Constitution Act of 1982, the purpose of which was to sever the last colonial link still connecting us with Westminster, should go through all the necessary legal stages without Quebec being part of the operation, the only excluded partner of the federation. It would not have been normal that Quebec should be compelled for instance to abstain from voting as it did during the constitutional conferences on Indian rights, under either the Bourassa government or the previous government.

It was no more natural for that situation to last until 1982. It was even less normal to act as though it would last indefinitely.

When I heard some comments, including those from Senator Pitfield, to the effect that there was no emergency, I really felt the weight of this anomaly which has existed for the past five years. Eventually Quebec and the rest of the Canadian federation would have to get out of the impasse. It is to the honour and credit of Mr. Mulroney to have taken the first initiative towards normalization.

He took this initiative during the 1984 election campaign. He made this solemn promise during a speech in Sept-Îles in early August 1984, a speech widely reported throughout Canada, that should he be elected as Prime Minister, he would have a clear mandate to pursue this objective and convince Quebec's National Assembly to join the new Canadian Constitution with honour and enthusiasm.

He did it, however, in a way which clearly demonstrated how much he was aware of the need to pursue this objective with caution and judgment.

I quote again from the speech Mr. Mulroney made in Sept-Îles:

I am prepared to examine with the provinces a series of changes to the amending formula. But fully aware of the significance and complexity of federal-provincial issues, I shall not embark upon a Constitutional process in an atmosphere of ambiguity and improvisation. To proceed differently might do much more harm than good. Before taking steps which might result again in a deadlock, we ought to clearly establish the terms and goals and to lay the groundwork for success. The necessary dialogue will begin at the appropriate time and continue within the scope of Canadian federalism with the authorities legitimately elected by Quebecers. I am too respectful of our institutions to suggest that I might even dictate how a province ought to elect its representatives.

● (1730)

In the context of time these words had a significant meaning.

I should think that nobody would deny that this commitment on the part of Mr. Mulroney—the way the objective to be sought and the steps to be taken to achieve it were expressed—nobody would deny that indeed they had something to do with the outcome of the 1984 election throughout Canada.

In any event, the opening of the dialogue by the federal side was duly noted in Quebec City. As the Quebec Premier himself said in the following weeks, it was clearly understood that the ball was then in Quebec's court. From then on it was incumbent on the government of Quebec to indicate on what basis the dialogue might be pursued.

I have no intention of going over the various steps which have been accomplished since then but, if only to correct the impression that may have been created by some of the remarks which I heard many times in this chamber and which opposed the people of Quebec and the government of Quebec in the chain of events, we must at least remember that the five points which were the basis of the discussions which brought us where we are now, these five points were in the program of the Liberal Party of Quebec. The very fact that Mr. Bourassa was elected was the only endorsement he needed: the people of Quebec gave him a mandate to open the dialogue, to begin the discussions on the basis of the five points which eventually led to the agreement concluded at Meech Lake.

With respect to the general meaning of things, I would not want to go any further, but I think those are the essential elements. The purpose of what we have before us, of the Constitution Act, 1987, is to re-establish, to restore the normalcy of things in a federation such as ours.

So many comments have been made in this chamber over the past three days that we really have to wonder whether it is still possible, as some others have suggested, to come up with fresh considerations at this stage of the debate, after so many speeches. And so, in the perhaps futile hope of making whatever small contribution I might offer for our collective reflection, my intention was to limit myself to a single point, specifically clause 7 of the bill, which has to do with what has been called the spending power as it relates to national shared-cost programs in fields under provincial jurisdiction.

However I should like to refer to the remarks of Senator Pitfield and those of Senator Olson a moment ago with respect to the unanimity required in certain fields.

If I can rely on my notes, Senator Pitfield said something to this effect:

[English]

—"To freeze the Constitution in the straitjacket of unanimity."

[Translation]

It is not possible to let such a statement go by unnoticed. Allow me to—

Senator Frith: What is the French translation of that?

Senator Tremblay: Geler l'évolution constitutionnelle dans la camisole de force de l'unanimité. Note that the expression "straitjacket" in English or "camisole de force" in French causes, shall we say, problems in both languages.

Senator Frith: In English: "mixed metaphors."

Senator Tremblay: Anyway, I think I have understood what Senator Pitfield said. The important thing is to point out how misleading such an expression can be. The general amendment procedure that applies to all constitutional amendments remains as it was except, of course, for this major change brought in by the Meech Lake Agreement that extends to all fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction the principle already contained in the Constitution Act, 1982, that is, the possibility to opt out of an amendment that would further centralize Canada by transferring something from provincial to federal jurisdiction.

This principle already existed in 1982 whereby a province could opt out and obtain financial compensation; obviously, if such compensation were not given, the taxpayers in that province would in effect be doubly taxed.

This principle was already in the 1982 Constitution for education and other cultural areas and was broadened to all fields of provincial jurisdiction. In this regard, I was very interested to hear Mr. Trudeau's answer to the question I asked him about—

Senator Frith: The one where he asked you why you were asking him?

Senator Tremblay: You noticed it, didn't you? That was very interesting. Anyway, I learned something I was not aware of despite all my research on the subject. He admitted that on November 5 there was no financial compensation coupled with the so-called opting out formula. It was only between November 5 and December 7, the day the vote was finally taken, that financial compensation was introduced for education and cultural matters. But, more important, he added that he offered to Mr. Lévesque to extend that financial compensation to all areas of provincial jurisdiction. So, I asked him: "But what does Meech Lake do?" He answered: "That is what the Meech Lake Accord does." It is there, in the Debates of the Senate. This is amusing. There is at least one point of the Meech Lake Accord on which there should be no disagreement.

Coming back to the question of unanimity, let's have a look at the list of items. There were already five items.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Tremblay: Yes, but I will use my earphone, otherwise I may not hear you.

● (1740)

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have two related questions. Is Senator Tremblay saying that the provision for compensation where a provincial government decides to stay out of a shared-cost program, such as those for highway construction, health care, and the like, should be the same as where a provincial government declines to transfer its jurisdiction from education and other cultural matters to the Parliament? That is my first question. Perhaps, after he has dealt with that question—

Senator Tremblay: I will come to shared-cost programs in a moment. I am talking about the general amending formula in the Constitution. I want to show that the general formula does apply to all changes in the Constitution. For instance, the division of power, sections 91 and 92, are still under that general amending formula, or those related to it. They are not under the rule of unanimity, and that is the point. The items under the rule of unanimity—

Senator Frith: When you use the word "general" you mean the seven/fifty formula.

Senator Murray: Seven and fifty and then opting out of the transfer.

Senator Frith: When you use the word "general", you are referring to the seven/fifty formula?

Senator Tremblay: Yes. I thought everyone knew about that. I am sorry, I should have read it.

Senator Frith: It is just that subjects have been added to the unanimity formula. It is hard to say whether one is more "general" than the other.

Senator Stewart: I have a second question. Senator Tremblay has referred to what Mr. Trudeau said about compensation to provincial governments that decline to participate in shared-cost programs. Is he saying that that compensation was to go to the government of the province rather than to the people of the province?

Senator Tremblay: I know to what you are referring. You are referring to his own document, published in 1969, if I remember correctly, proposing that when a province would not join, in order not to deprive the people of that province of something to which they were entitled, in this perspective, he would make the payments to the individual person.

Senator Murray: The spending power clause.

Senator Tremblay: He said that the title of the booklet was Spending Power. I will talk about that later. To refer to the honourable senator's question, that was his proposal in 1969. In 1982 there is no question of financial compensation in the way of payment to the individual. It is paid to the government. It was his own proposal in the Senate. He has at least accepted the proposal, and he even proposed to enlarge it. That is what I learned the other day, and it is very interesting.

Getting back to the list of items under the rule of unanimity, I should mention first that five of those items were already under that rule in 1982. If you look at the five which have been added, there is, for instance, the principle of the proportional representation of provinces in the Commons. It was under section 42 at the time, and it could have been changed just by a majority of seven provinces plus the federal government.

I never understood at the time why it was under section 42, because it is a basic principle of our democracy, "rep by pop." Why not put that principle under the rule of unanimity?

Senator Austin: It is not the principle of "rep by pop", but by how much "pop" representing each part of Canada.

Senator Tremblay: I am not sure that I understood that.

Senator Frith: It is presently under 42(1). It requires an amendment only under 38(1), which is seven/fifty.

Senator Tremblay: I never understood why it was under the rule of a simple majority.

Senator Frith: Where do you think it should be?

Senator Tremblay: Meech Lake puts it under unanimity. You must admit that there was progress there, to put that kind of item, so basic to our democracy, under the rule of unanimity, instead of keeping it under the rule of a simple majority. Anyway, as a Quebecer, I would not like to be deprived of that just by seven provinces plus the federal government.

Another item is the Supreme Court. The composition of the court was already under the rule of unanimity. We have enlarged the perspective by putting the Supreme Court as a whole under that rule of unanimity. I cannot understand why people have such a strong objection to that. After all, the Supreme Court is a very important institution. Those people who are making so much fuss about the unanimity rule should know that it has been enlarged—

Senator Frith: If it is an important institution, there must be unanimity. Is that the test?

Senator Tremblay: That is further progress, to have enlarged the whole of the Supreme Court, whereas prior to that only the composition was there. I should underline that having the composition of the court under the unanimity rule only in 1982 was a protection for Quebec—implicitly at least; so, at least on that point, Quebec must have had an open mind to allow that for all other provinces also. I could go on.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Senator Tremblay, would you allow a question?

Senator Tremblay: Yes, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: It seems to me however that when you say that the Supreme Court change is not really important, we should not look at that clause only.

We must recall that, overall, the Meech Lake Accord introduces major changes to the Supreme Court. So, if we include this now, the whole membership of the Supreme Court is changed. That is a very significant change. There is the matter of appointments, and so on.

So the importance of that change should not be underestimated, should it?

Senator Tremblay: Senator Molgat, I am discussing that kind of obsession some people seem to have that the unanimity rule will freeze the constitutional process.

I am showing that if the unanimity rule that applies to the Meech Lake Accord is extended to items other than those that were already on the list, this would on the one hand constitute progress. On the other hand, this changes nothing to the fact that the general amending formula remains the rule for constitutional amendments outside the items that are listed.

I will not go any deeper into that analysis. I conclude on this specific point by stating quite simply that it is indeed making a scarecrow out of the extension of the unanimity rule to matters other than those already there.

On the two items I mentioned, that extension is perfectly justifiable in the light of those same values that are basic to the Canadian federation.

Those asides in answer to questions that were put to me have brought me beyond the 6 o'clock deadline.

Honourable senators, do I have the choice of continuing or must we stop at six?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is not yet six, and we stop at six, senator Tremblay.

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Tremblay: Rather than stopping in the middle of a sentence, if there is agreement from the Senate I would like...

Senator Frith: How long do you still need?

Senator Tremblay: I would think another six and three quarter minutes!

Senator Flynn: Are there other senators who wish to speak?

Senator Frith: Yes, four other senators want to do so.

Senator Flynn: We can then adjourn for dinner.

Senator Frith: If we are to conclude the debate we could go on now; otherwise we should adjourn until 8.

Senator Tremblay: Subject to questions that might be put along the way, I think I can make a moral commitment not to go beyond some ten minutes, to correct the impression my reference to six and three quarter minutes may have left!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is now six o'clock and according to the rules I now adjourn the debate until 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8.10 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The sitting is resumed.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, to resume the dialogue started before we adjourned at 6 p.m., I have not forgotten that in my answer to Senator Frith I made a moral commitment not to exceed 10 minutes. As far as I am concerned, I intend to keep that promise. I may add that when I started my speech I thought I would finish before 6 p.m. As I see it, I ran out of time because of the questions I was asked.

So while I intend to keep my promise, I will ask honourable senators to let me proceed without interruptions, so that once I have fulfilled my part of the agreement, the Senate will decide how much time to spend on questions and answers.

I will now proceed with the matter I intended to discuss and which I announced earlier. I intend to speak exclusively to Section 7 of the 1987 Constitutional Accord concerning shared-cost programs.

This is a kind of tour de force on my part, but in my humble opinion I have always thought we should never discuss these issues without considering the general context of the society in which we live.

Clearly, the issue of exercising spending powers in areas of exclusively provincial jurisdiction should be considered within the context of the various periods in which it arose. I think that in the final instance, it depends on the varying concepts we have had of the role of the State as a dispenser of services to society.

In this respect, I think we would do well to recall that at the time of Confederation, the role of government with respect to the services essentially linked with spending powers was defined in terms that differ vastly from the definition given today.

At the time we were still working with the kind of ideology where government took no responsibility for areas like education, health or welfare services. It was up to families, churches and the private sector in general to play a leading if not exclusive role in providing these services. In this context, government spending was, to all intent and purposes, strictly marginal.

Radical changes have taken place since the time of the British North America Act, especially since the last World War and as a result of the traumatic experiences of the Depression.

Our philosophy has changed to the extent that we now believe access to education, health care and social services should be universal, and depend on need and not on individuals' private resources.

This change in philosophy was worldwide, at least in the western world. It was felt in this country at both the provincial and the federal levels.

Some of the Bennett laws, for instance, were clearly drafted from this perspective. We see the same developments in Saskatchewan, which led the way in many respects. In Quebec, provincial governments under Godbout, Sauvé and especially Lesage were influenced by the same philosophy and made their respective marks. This was also the case with the federal administrations we had during the postwar period.

An inevitable consequence of the new philosophy that evolved with respect to services provided to the individual, if I may use that expression, was that since the distribution, extent of the services required and universal access could no longer be provided from private resources, government had to step in.

So the services involved corresponded, according to the British North America Act, to fields of provincial jurisdiction: health, welfare, education, to name only the largest in terms of funding.

On the other hand, the British North America Act also provided that the federal government would have access to much greater financial resources than the provinces, especially the less fortunate ones, since it could use any form of taxation while the provinces were limited to direct taxation.

I am sorry—well, not too sorry—but I think that it is against this background that shared-cost programs in fields of provincial jurisdiction must be considered.

The question of such programs must be seen against this background. This has been an issue since the role of the state evolved for ideological reasons. I use the term "state" without distinction between the federal and provincial governments, except that shared jurisdiction, as I have just mentioned, implies shared resources, as I also mentioned just now.

Thus the question has always been how to reconcile the exercise of provincial jurisdiction in the fields concerned, since the British North America Act stipulated the requirement for federal participation in funding these programs, the resources being found with the federal government.

In other words, how to exploit what is called the federal spending power without at the same time going against the Constitution regarding the use of this power.

Answers to this question have varied over time. I shall only give one example, that of health programs, which have been mentioned several times; more specifically, health insurance or "Medicare."

I find it interesting that the first federal law in this area was given Royal Assent on December 21, 1966, when the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson was Prime Minister. I am struck that despite the terms used, the criteria that provincial legislation must satisfy in accordance with this act for the federal government to contribute to program financing are worded so generally that they correspond in effect to "objectives," to use the language of Section 7 of the Meech Lake agreement. I will spare you reading the full text of the key section on this in the 1966 act. Besides, the formulation is somewhat convoluted, but I only ask that you take from it what I shall deduce.

First, it is provincial legislation. That is stated unequivocally in the text. So a regime set up under provincial legislation must meet the criterion of being administered and applied on a non-profit basis. So it is not the private, but the public, sector. For all practical purposes, it is a free service to be applied uniformly for all citizens of the province. Also, it is to be applied for residents of one province who go to live in another one, with some minimum residence requirement—only three months—and provided that the medical services covered by the provincial insurance plan are clearly identified. And that is all. All the rest is administrative, calculation procedures. So much for the 1966 Act.

So today we ask ourselves this question: Would the Meech Lake Accord make it impossible to set up a health insurance plan? I am not convinced when I look at the text of the 1966 statute. In contrast to the 1966 legislation, what about the act which eventually replaced it? What about the act sanctioned on April 17, 1984? What do we find? That it is much more specific, much more analytic, for the act of 1984 refers to criteria concerning federal contributions. Again I seek your indulgence and ask that I be dispensed from reading all these texts, but there are four categories of criteria: public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability, accessibility, each such criterion being the subject of a more or less detailed section, but fairly detailed in some cases, until we finally get to a provision which I want to emphasize, a provision which, in my estimation, is ultra vires from a constitutional standpoint. This provision concerns . . . well, I will read it:

In respect of any province in which extra-billing is not permitted, paragraph (1)(c) shall be deemed to be complied with if the province has chosen to enter into, and has entered into, an agreement with the medical practitioners and dentists of the province that provides for negotiations and especially that provides for the settlement of disputes relating to compensation through, at the option of the appropriate provincial organizations referred to in paragraph (a), . . .

That is the College of Physicians in fact, or the unions of physicians or dentists . . .

. . . conciliation or binding arbitration by a panel that is equally representative of the provincial organizations and the province and that has an independent chairman; and that a decision of a panel referred to in paragraph (b) may not be altered except by an Act of the legislature of the province.

We are out on a limb with this kind of provision which obviously encroaches on labour relations, as we say. We are a long way from the principles, indeed the only one we know, with respect to spending powers. I will quote from memory, but somewhere in my papers I have the exact quotation. A decision of the Privy Council legal committee following the Bennett legislation of 1937 acknowledges that the federal government can spend and allocate sums of money to individuals, institutions or even governments. That power is acknowledged in that decision, but on condition that when so acting the federal government refrain from regulating, legislating in the provincial jurisdiction involved; otherwise its intervention would be ultra vires.

I did not refer to this example to suggest that section 7 of Meech Lake and Langevin—that such programs correspond to the provisions of section 7. Section 7 concerns new programs only. I simply wanted to show to what extent a certain approach involves dynamics which, in the case I mentioned, led to a provision which, all things being considered, corresponds to the notion of objective, to provisions which indeed amount to interventions in fields under provincial jurisdiction through federal legislation. That is where the problem lies.

On the one hand the dynamics and on the other the following question: Would clause 7 lead to an obvious centralizing trend and to some kind of balkanization of national programs? The new, eventual, programs?

I find it strange that the term “balkanization” is used with respect to programs under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. To begin with, we can answer that if there is to be some “balkanization” it already exists since those areas are under provincial jurisdiction. Apart from that rather superficial comment, it remains that altogether I am not convinced that the so-called “balkanization” exists, because to obtain federal financing the new shared-cost programs under the Meech Lake Accord will have to be consistent with the national objectives. And this is where we are caught in the semantic trap.

Dr. Johnson, who appeared before the Committee of the Whole, had the following to say about the meaning of the word “consistent”:

● (2020)

[English]

Now Meech Lake says “compatible with national objectives.” One is forced to wonder why there is the choice of the word “objectives” and the apparent discarding of the vocabulary of shared-cost programs and spending power—

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Who said that?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Tremblay: Dr. Johnson, when he appeared before the Senate as reported on page 2851 of our Debates.

[English]

An objective is the object of an action.

One also has to ask about the word “compatible.” It is true that in the English language the word “compatible” has two meanings: Capable of existing alongside something else or, in the alternative, concordant or consistent with all congruence. The French word “compatible” has only the first meaning.

[Translation]

I was puzzled to notice such a difference in meaning between English and French as to the word “compatible”. I therefore used my Petit Robert and here is what I found:

Compatible: Qui peut s'accorder avec autre chose.

That is the opposite of what our witness, Dr. Johnson, told us. I believe that the second meaning in English of the word “s'accorder” is included in the first definition in French. The meaning of the word “s'accorder” seems clear to me.

In this case, should we say that to agree with the objectives is not enough? It seems to me that, to use only the example of medicare, the universality and free medical care are all program criteria.

I used this example only to illustrate that it is far from being the problem they want to emphasize by playing this game of semantics. In fact with the help of English and French dictionaries, according to Dr. Johnson's testimony on the English side, and le Petit Robert on the French side “compatible” means to agree. They do not just exist in parallel as Dr. Johnson says later on. But enough with this example.

We must go further within the general scope of the Meech Lake Accord. I have gone over my 10 minutes, so I have not kept my commitment. I relieve you of yours, unless you stick to it better than I, which would indeed suit me fine.

To conclude, I shall borrow from Senator Kirby the sort of synthesis he gave us yesterday of the whole problem.

The Constitution Act of 1982 and the proposed Constitution Act of 1987 translate two visions of Canada: the Liberal vision of 1982 and the Conservative vision of 1987. The terms “Liberal” and “Conservative” are not my own but Senator Kirby's.

When I heard him express his thoughts, I felt very clearly that there were not only two, but three visions of Canada. Having heard Senator Pitfield, I wonder now if there are not four, the third being Senator Kirby's. There would be the so-called “Liberal” vision, of which I am not quite sure, if I remember Mr. Pearson. It is the quite modern “Liberal” Mr. Kirby probably had in mind.

So there would be this so-called “Liberal” vision which would be that of a very centralized, but still Federal Canada.

There would be also the so-called “Conservative” vision which would be that of a really Federal Canada.

There would be finally Senator Kirby's vision which, as I understood it in his developments, would be that of a unitarian Canada within a foreseeable future. It goes without saying that I do not deny Senator Kirby's right to dream of a unitarian Canada.

I, for one choose a truly federal vision for Canada. The proposed Constitution Act of 1987 normalizes the situation in a Canada which has been conceived as a true federation.

It goes without saying that I will support it without equivocation or qualification. My 10 minutes having expired, I thank you very much.

[English]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, we are now coming to the end of the third day of the debate on this motion of the government leader in the Senate concerning the Meech Lake Accord, and the amendment by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, following, as this debate does, on extended hearings in the Committee of the Whole having to do with the Meech Lake Accord where the evidence of constitutional experts—some really expert and some not so expert—have been listened to by all of us.

This has been an interesting exercise and more useful than I expected it would be when it began, because I think that the committee hearings and this debate in our own house have given an opportunity for an important critique of the Meech Lake Accord. Views were expressed on both sides. I venture to suggest, with some sadness, that when the historians have a look at this debate in the years ahead they will find that a great deal more perspicacity has been displayed by the speakers who have questioned and opposed the Meech Lake Accord than by those who have slavishly—perhaps I should not use that term; indeed, I should not impute motives to them—or without sufficient thought, as it seems to me, climbed on the bandwagon of the Meech Lake arrangements.

Well, I will not try to go over all the material that has been covered in this debate during the last three days here. The concept of a distinct society in the province of Quebec has been dealt with by most of the speakers.

Frankly, it does not surprise me at all to characterize the society of Quebec as a "distinct society." I would not have put the term in the Constitution of Canada had I had my way, but undoubtedly there are real elements of a distinct society in the province of Quebec, as I am sure my friends on the Island of Cape Breton and the Island of Newfoundland would also claim. They do not have quite the same language differentiation as the province of Quebec, although I have a large tome in my library at home entitled Newfoundland English, which is interesting reading, that puts in some aspects of the use of the English language that are not seen anywhere else in the world. As I say, it is not the declaration of a distinct society in the province of Quebec that bothers me at all; it is the interpretation that some have put upon the inclusion in our Constitution of the concept of a distinct society that bothers me. They have tried to imply that this may override even the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; that it may enable certain legislative initiatives on the part of the provincial government of Quebec, and that worries me. I may say that that has been stated by the Premier of that province, Premier Robert Bourassa himself. It seems to me that this may not only establish the distinctness of the society of Quebec, but may encourage its isolation from the rest of Canada—or, just as bad, may encourage the isolation by the rest of Canada of the distinct society in the province of Quebec.

• (2030)

I do not think it is necessary for me to refer further to this, or to refer to the effect of the Meech Lake Accord on women's rights. That was dealt with very ably by Senator Marsden in the address that she made here yesterday. I deplore the fact that the plight of aboriginal peoples has not been adequately dealt with, and I share the concerns of some honourable senators in this chamber who feel directly involved with and concerned about this aspect.

As for the effect of the amending formula and the requirement of unanimity on the likelihood of the creation of new provinces, if at some time in the future this becomes likely or necessary or desirable, again I feel sorry that the people of the Northwest Territories and of the Yukon have, rightly, found reason to be so disappointed in the Meech Lake Accord.

Actually, there are two aspects of this accord to which I want to pay particular attention, and my colleague on my left hand, Senator Olson, has preempted me on both of them because they are the same points that he made. However, perhaps I can say one or two things that are a little different about them. The first, of course, is my concern about the devolution of powers of the central government to the provinces.

I have long felt that Canada does not need stronger provincial governments but needs a stronger central government. I have had some friends say to me from time to time: "You were, for 15 years, a provincial politician, and for more than half that time you were a minister of the government in the Province of Nova Scotia, and for a short period during that time you were the head of the Government of Nova Scotia." Even so, while I know there must always be a certain confrontation in a federal state between the central government and the governments of the states or the provinces, even in those days I did not feel that we should weaken the central government to enhance the powers of the provinces.

Indeed, the Leader of the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia and the Premier, when I first took my place in the Nova Scotia legislature some 40 years ago, was the well-respected and much loved Angus L. Macdonald. Angus L. Macdonald had a powerful dislike of the "feds". He was one who believed in the compact theory of confederation, which was referred to by Senator Pitfield in his remarks this afternoon. Towards the end of Angus L. Macdonald's life and career, I felt that his hostility towards the central government of Canada was so great that it was in danger of harming the interests of the province of Nova Scotia. One should not speculate, but I suspect that if Angus L. Macdonald had persisted in this view for another two or three years, he and I would have had to have a major confrontation about this matter. Therefore, I myself have always felt that Canada does not need stronger provincial governments; Canada needs a strong hand at the helm of the federal government, the central government here in Ottawa.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to try to enumerate the ways in which the Meech Lake Accord weakens the power and authority of the federal government, because these have been referred to by many who have talked about the appointment of judges, appointments to the Senate, the absolute veto power and the many, many other ways in which the federal government, as a result of the Meech Lake Accord, has given way to provincial interests. Someone said to me recently that, if you looked at the Meech Lake arrangements as if they were a hockey game, the ten provincial premiers were playing for the provincial side, the Prime Minister of Canada was acting as a sort of referee and no one showed up to play for Team Canada at all. This is what worries me so much about the Meech Lake Accord and about the effect of the things that were done therein.

Honourable senators, I cannot say too strongly that I deplore the weakening, either directly or implicitly, of the authority of the federal government that I think will devolve from the adoption of the Meech Lake Accord, if it is adopted in its present form as a part of our Constitution.

The second thing that concerns me is the amending formula. It is totally ridiculous—and I do not think that is too strong a word—to require the approval, even in the most important amendments, of every province of Canada and, of course, of both houses of Parliament. Although the approval of the Senate has been looked after in a way that I would not have designed, but in the way which was designed by the former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in the 1982 constitutional changes, it seems to me that the amending formula which required the consent of seven provinces containing at least 50 per cent of the population of Canada was practical and reasonable; that it would protect the minority interests of smaller provinces, and so on and so forth. To throw all that away and give an absolute veto to any one province, no matter what the circumstances might be, is, as I said, ridiculous. One can envisage scenarios in which there might be attempts to trade off consent for all kinds of concessions, which, in my view, would not be in the interest of Canada as a country and in the long run would not even be in the interests of the provinces of Canada either.

So those two points made earlier this afternoon by Senator Olson are endorsed entirely by me. The two things that worry me the most about the Meech Lake Accord are the devolution of power from the central government to the provinces and the imprisoning of our Constitution, as someone said earlier today, in a straitjacket by requiring absolute unanimity for any constitutional amendment.

One might say that perhaps there would be some reason to require unanimity for amendments having to do with basic language rights, or even, I would have said, for constitutional changes. However, in 1982, strangely enough, whereas we left the absolute veto in the hands of the Senate with respect to most legislation, which I do not think was necessary and I do not think is even desirable, we removed the absolute veto that the Senate had over matters having to do with the Constitution. But, in my view, if there is any area in which the Senate ought to have an absolute veto, it is in dealing with matters of constitutional import, and perhaps language rights or something of that nature.

Honourable senators, those remarks constitute the observations that I wanted to make about the Meech Lake Accord, and I wanted my views to be placed on the record. I was very interested in Senator Flynn's unusual suggestion this afternoon concerning the way in which we might try to handle a further amendment of his in dealing with the votes on this motion in amendment at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. I do not think it was a practical view, but I do not mind telling Senator Flynn what my position would have been if his rather bizarre suggestion had been adopted by this house. Accordingly, I can state very frankly now that I propose to vote for the MacEachen amendments, even though I do not think they go far enough in that they ought to have included an amendment which would have removed, or at least watered down to some extent, the absolute veto powers with respect to constitutional amendment. In that respect, I am in agreement with Senator Pitfield and with some of the other senators who have spoken. Therefore, I shall vote for the amendment to the motion put by the Honourable Senator Murray, and I shall vote for the amended motion in the event that the amendments carry. If the amendments do not carry, Senator Flynn will be glad to know, I shall vote against the motion.

So, Senator Flynn, you wanted to find out how members of the Senate on this side would have voted had they had a chance to vote for the unamended motion of Senator Murray, and I do not mind telling you that that is the way I would have voted.

● (2030)

As I said at the beginning, I think this has been an interesting debate. I think it may be very interesting for historians and political scientists in the years ahead to refer back to the positions that have been taken by honourable senators during this debate. I feel quite strongly that those of us on this side of the house will be vindicated by history in the attitude that we have adopted towards this legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.'

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, the debate in this chamber over the past several days has been marked by eloquence, passion and humour, and I include the remarks of the previous speaker. I do not think I can improve on the themes that have been propounded here—

Senator Frith: If anyone can, you can.

Senator Spivak: Thank you. Perhaps you should have waited until I had finished my sentence, because I rise to add my support to the achievement of Meech Lake, to the reintegration of Quebec into the Canadian Constitution, to the recognition of the distinct nature of Quebec's society and to the affirmation in the accord of important components of diversity in our society. But, as a Canadian woman, I have to say that my admiration and pride in this achievement, a pride which is reflected in the remarks that I have heard made by colleagues from Quebec, is tempered by the fact that concerns raised by women's representatives in Canada have not been resolved to their satisfaction.

The reason these concerns have not been resolved is that women were seeking an amendment to the accord to allay their concerns about the paramountcy of hard-won gender rights, and all the signatories to the accord—at this stage of Canadian political development, they are all men, the premiers and the federal leader—agreed that amendments could not be contemplated, since to amend the accord was to risk the possibility, to use the oft-repeated phrase, of unravelling the accord. In practical terms, I must admit that I agree with that view. If one looks at all the terms contained in the amendment proposed to us by the Opposition here, it is difficult to see how agreement could be reached without beginning negotiations all over again and risking the whole thing. In the words of Madame Chaput-Rolland, "If Meech is to fail for whatever reason, there can be no more negotiations, no more justification," and, without Quebec in the Canadian constitutional family, no further reform of the Constitution—for example, Senate reform—is possible.

Nevertheless, I do not believe that that ends the matter. I would be remiss if I did not devote my brief remarks to the concerns raised by women who have fought for equality rights, against indifference and opposition, and who are afraid that these rights will be weakened before the benefits of sections 15 and 28 of the Charter have had a chance to be tested in the Supreme Court of Canada.

I might also add parenthetically that among those who appeared before the Senate Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord was a coalition of women's groups from Manitoba. Among their number are 21 groups in Manitoba, ranging from the Anglican Church Commission to the Ukrainian Women's Association and to the Provincial Organization of Business and Professional Women's Clubs. So these concerns are widespread in women's groups.

Even a brief glance at the history of the struggle for women's equality sheds light on why women are so concerned about equality and why they are so anxious to have absolute guarantees on what has been accomplished to date. Women have struggled to attain "personhood" and to ensure that human rights legislation prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. They have struggled for affirmative action programs and for recognition of their distinctiveness.

The history of victory over discrimination is recent. The Person's Case in which the Supreme Court of Canada held that women were not qualified persons within the BNA Act and, therefore, not eligible to sit in the Senate, was overturned only in 1929. The Murdoch Case, which did not recognize Mrs. Murdoch's contribution to her family and, therefore, entitlements to assets acquired through her work, was as recent as 1975. That case resulted in women lobbying for reform of family laws in every province. The Bliss Case in 1979, which denied unemployment insurance benefits to women, inspired women to lobby successfully for equality provisions in the Charter.

With the possibility of equality rights being secured in the Charter, women lobbied in 1981—an extraordinary effort and demonstration of public support—for the inclusion of sexual equality rights in sections 15 and 28 of the Charter. It is important to recognize that, as the National Association for Women and the Law pointed out when they appeared before the Joint Committee on the Meech Lake Accord, "for women equality is still an aspiration." They need to have both provincial and federal governments reaffirm their commitment to women's equality not just in words but in positive action to make the goal of women's equality a reality. It is no wonder, then, given this background, that women would be concerned about the accord, about whether the accord has the potential to place in jeopardy their hard-won rights in the Constitution.

One issue in particular was extensively discussed and analysed by women, the relationship between the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the proposed constitutional recognition of Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct society. The question was asked: Could this recognition override or supersede Charter rights such as sexual equality? In using these new rules of interpretation, women feared that a court might refuse to invalidate a law, despite the fact that it involved gender-based discrimination, on the ground that the law furthered the cause of Canada's linguistic duality or Quebec's distinct society. Just like the recognition of our multicultural heritage, which is found in another interpretation clause in the Constitution, Quebec's distinct identity and Canada's linguistic duality will be factors the courts can take into account in the future when considering the constitutionality of federal and provincial laws in certain cases where there may be ambiguity.

The joint committee pointed out in its report, "The decision was taken in 1982, when the Charter was introduced, to leave these questions of balance to be determined by the courts on the facts of a particular case", and, "Nothing in the 1987 Constitutional Accord relating to the linguistic duality/distinct society rule of interpretation calls for a different solution".

As we know, in considering Charter cases, the courts determine whether particular federal or provincial legislation or governmental measures conflict with Charter rights and, if so, whether they meet the "reasonable limits" test set out in section 1 in relation to a specific set of facts and in the light of current social realities, whether they be those of Quebec or Cape Breton.

One of these realities is that Quebec is different. Quebec lawyers are now free to invoke this reality in their arguments under section 1 of the Charter because, as Professor Lederman pointed out to the joint committee, the courts are now taking into account this reality in their judgments where it is relevant. Since Quebec is now free to invoke its distinctiveness in arguments before the courts, it is clear that to provide that the Charter should not be interpreted in a manner consistent with Quebec's "distinct society" would render the clause meaningless and would oblige Quebec to give up something it already has. First Ministers agreed that the "distinct society" clause of the accord should operate as an interpretation clause making explicit what has already been implicitly accepted.

But, while the accord does not guarantee or affirm that gender equality rights are absolute, the Charter of Rights does not protect rights in an absolute fashion either. Section 1 of the Charter allows the legislatures, and more particularly the courts, to find that legislation which may in some way infringe on protected rights is constitutional because it represents a "reasonable" limit on such rights. Section 33 allows either the Federal Parliament or a provincial legislature to pass a law which expressly overrides certain sections of the Charter, and this is the notwithstanding clause which may apply to section 15 of the Charter.

In fact, the Charter itself may pose more problems for equality rights than the accord. In his book, Peter Hogg states:

The new s. 2 does not override the Charter of Rights. On the contrary, s. 2, as a merely interpretative provision, is subordinate to the Charter of Rights. A law passed to preserve linguistic duality or to promote the distinct identity of Quebec would, like any other law, have to comply with the Charter. If the law was contrary to the Charter of Rights, then the law would be invalid.

● (2050)

He goes on to point out that a law that is inconsistent with a Charter right may be saved by section 1 of the Charter if the law is held to come within the following phrase of section 1: "...such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Senator Frith: But that begs the question.

Senator Spivak: I have not finished.

The concerns raised primarily by women led the joint committee to ask the following questions:

Are certain values such as gender equality so important that in no circumstances should judges place reasonable limits upon them? Should attempts to advance communal values like Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct society always give way if they infringe, however minimally, on Charter rights such as gender equality?

One should note that the committee also pointed out that two major women's groups in Quebec, as well as many constitutional experts, did not see any real potential conflict between equality rights and the collective interests of the distinct society.

Senator Frith: Why not take section 16 right out?

Senator Spivak: I have not dealt with section 16 yet. I am just about to deal with it.

Another great area of concern to women's groups, is the so-called "hierarchy of rights" created by section 16 of the accord. The concern was best summarized by Ms. Beth Atcheson in her appearance before the Senate Committee of the Whole. I would refer to page 2872 of the Debates of the Senate where it states:

[Senator Spivak.]

We made our position clear, to say at the very least, that section 16 is a Pandora's box. ... It troubles all of the equality-seeking groups not only because the way it is currently worded it seems to suggest a hierarchy of rights, that some groups are more protected than others, but, more fundamentally, because it is difficult to predict what it actually means."

Some constitutional experts supported the motion that section 16 may mean a hierarchy of rights. On the other hand, Peter Hogg says:

Clause 16 is a cautionary provision designed to reassure native people and other ethnic, linguistic or cultural communities that the recognition of linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct society is not inconsistent with the protection of other distinct communities in Canada. This conclusion could as easily be drawn from s. 2 itself, which does not imply that linguistic dualism and Quebec's distinct society are the only fundamental characteristics of Canada, and which as an interpretation clause does not in any case override other parts of the Constitution.

The joint committee, in looking at this complex constitutional issue, asks the question: "Whether the courts should be trusted with the responsibility of striking the proper balance between Charter rights and 'reasonable limits'. And if the Courts are to have their hands tied with respect to certain Charter rights and not others, where should the line be drawn?" The joint committee concluded that these issues should be left to the courts to decide since one cannot foresee all circumstances when values may come into conflict; that nothing in the accord calls for a different solution; and that this fundamental decision was taken in 1982 when the Charter was introduced.

Honourable senators, my position on these issues is to welcome Quebec into the Constitution through the accord, but also to pay careful attention to women's issues. These are complex legal issues concerning rights which have been raised by the Charter and by the accord and they need to be reviewed.

The process of constitutional change, as the history of Canada shows, is an evolutionary one. The historic agreement of 1987 completed a constitutional task begun in 1982, bringing Quebec into the constitutional fold and setting in motion a process for constitutional renewal. So the constitutional accord, as the Leader of the Government stated here on Monday, is a continuation of what begins with the BNA Act, goes through the 1960 Diefenbaker bill of rights to the proclamation of the Charter in 1982, and to the 1987 accord. This Quebec round had as its objective the bringing of Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family, and one of the significant results of that is that the Charter will now apply in Quebec with its willing acceptance, and the section 33 override will, perhaps, be a thing of the past.

Once the Quebec round has been achieved, another discussion of First Ministers' regarding constitutional reform is to take place. The Leader of the Government said here on Monday that nothing in the 1987 amendment will override or supersede the important achievements in rights and freedoms that Canadians share. This statement is an affirmation of this government's laudable commitment to the equality of women which was stated in the Speech from the Throne in 1984 and which has continued through First Ministers' conferences.

The joint committee, in its suggestions for future constitutional reform, has given us an opportunity to act to address concerns raised by women with regard to equality rights.

The committee suggests that the fact of omissions of worthy items from the 1987 constitutional accord is, therefore, not to be taken as proof that issues not dealt with have been rejected or deemed unimportant. It was stated that:

Senate reform, aboriginal rights, devolution of power to the territories, multiculturalism, the extension and protection of linguistic rights and further protection of individual rights with the Charter are all matters of utmost concern that must now be addressed by First Ministers.

Quebec has been brought in. If women are not to feel left out of the constitutional process, these concerns should and must be a top priority for constitutional reform. The next round should be the women's round.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would Senator Spivak permit a question?

So far as women's rights are concerned, Senator Spivak referred to the report of the joint committee as having said that there is really no problem.

Senator Spivak: I did not say that. I faithfully reproduced their thinking. I examined the report very carefully, because of course this is an issue in which I am vitally interested, as are the women of Canada generally. Having carefully gone through it, I think what I have given is a fair summary of their thinking. They did raise these questions and they did come down on one side rather than the other.

Senator Molgat: They came down on the side that there was no problem; is that correct?

Senator Spivak: As I said in my speech, they came down on the side that there are problems relating to women's rights that have to do with the Charter more than with the accord and that these problems are unintended, I presume because when people draft documents they do not always know what the results will be—as we have seen through the court's interpretation of Charter cases. They have raised the questions that need to be looked at. In fact, I quoted the forum in which they said these ought to be looked at. As you well know, one of their suggestions is that a permanent committee of both houses should be set up to look at constitutional reform.

Senator Molgat: My question, then, is this: How are we to take the presentations that were made to us in this chamber at the Committee of the Whole and, particularly, at the submissions group from groups like the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women—

Senator Flynn: What did they say?

Senator Molgat: —The National Association of Women and the Law—

Senator Flynn: What did they say?

Senator Molgat: Let me finish, Senator Flynn. I am not asking you a question, I am asking Senator Spivak. When I want to ask you a question, I will address you, Senator Flynn.

What about the presentation that was made by the National Council of Women for Canada and all of those groups who, in each case, told us, "Do not pass the accord because it affects women's rights." That was their statement, not mine.

Senator Spivak: I have looked carefully at their concerns and they trouble me. First, it is not clear that they are all making the same recommendation. Some are recommending the inclusion of section 28 and some are recommending a reference to the Supreme Court. It is not clear what the remedy will be.

Second, let us take a practical look at the situation. I am certainly the most junior member in this chamber to present this argument to you, but if we were to begin to accept amendments, and those were to go back to negotiation again, do you really think that, given that long laundry list that has come up here, we could get any sort of process going without going back to square one? I have tried to present that this was really the Quebec round. I believe it was Mr. Pickersgill who said, "It is not a Christmas tree. You can't hang everything on it", and that the possibility for reform is there in the future if the will is there.

I would like to know why it would be harder afterwards. Then we would have the Quebec round. As I have said, I am not sure, in looking at the briefs that the women have presented, what the solutions really are. These are very complex legal issues.

My last point is that they are talking about potential threat. They are worried; they are afraid. What I am saying is that those concerns are real and they need to be looked at, but I am not certain, in my humble opinion, exactly how. There has been a suggestion from the joint committee that this needs to be looked at very carefully in the future, and that indeed the Charter has all kinds of hazards for women's rights, which have been clearly expressed.

Senator Molgat: Senator, is it not true that, while they did have different questions about the accord, they were in agreement on one thing, which is that we should not pass the accord until they are sure they are protected?

Senator Frith: That's what they said.

Senator Spivak: Not all women's groups said that. You are, of course, aware that most of the women's groups in Quebec did not say that; but, if indeed they said that, much as I sympathize with their concerns, I must say that in the matter of solution I disagree with them. If that is what you are asking me to say, then I state that clearly, and I think it is evident from my speech for the reasons I have stated. It is just a question of disagreement.

Senator Flynn: Look at Trudeau's reply to Senator Marsden.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, the Meech Lake Accord is about the source of democracy—power: who has power in a democratic federal state, who should exercise that power, how should that power be exercised, what checks and balances should there be on the power? Democracy is the means, the Constitution is the method, equality of rights is the goal. In a democratic federal state, each citizen enters into a social contract with the state, and in that social contract there is an exchange of consideration. The citizen delegates powers, and that is exchanged for guarantees of equality of each citizen's rights. Equality, therefore, is the essence of democracy.

As I have sat here and listened to the speeches in Committee of the Whole, and as I have read the report of the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Meech Lake Accord, and as I have listened in this chamber to senators from across the country, I have learned and come to understand that we are conditioned by our politics.

But we are also conditioned by our roots, by our province, by our education, by our family, by our experience, by our values. All of us examine the source of democracy from a different perspective. How, therefore, should we treat, how should we assay, the question of democratic power?

So where do I stand? I am, first and foremost, by conditioning and by conviction, a Charter of Rights man. From my reading of history, had we had an entrenched Charter of Rights, some of the unhappy and unfortunate pages of our history would have been different. Our treatment of citizens of Japanese descent would have been different during and after the war. How we had approached the War Measures Act in Quebec in the early 1970s would have been different with an entrenched Charter of Rights.

Senator Flynn: That's not true.

Senator Grafstein: How we would have dealt with the "Padlock Cases" in Quebec would have been different had we had an entrenched Charter of Rights; and how we would have dealt with our discriminatory immigration policies over the years under successive governments would certainly have been different. Canada would have been different and better.'

So I am a passionate Charter of Rights man. As a high school student in the 1950s I first was convinced that rights were important. My first hero was Oliver Cromwell. It was Cromwell who came alive in the story of the glorious revolution, the establishment of the first Commonwealth, the creation of a Bill of Rights, the historical battle for the supremacy of Parliament over the Crown, the supremacy of the individual, the supremacy of the rule of law; it was Cromwell who led the way. Then the ideas of that first Commonwealth were the seeds that led to the French rights in the French revolution, and the American rights in the American revolution; and ultimately they led to the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, and subsequently to our own Charter of Rights in 1982.

[Senator Spivak.]

To add to my earlier education, as a university student in the 1950s I came across an article by an obscure Montreal law professor who had written about economic rights. He went further and said that, "Civil rights were one thing, but a truly democratic state must give each individual citizen equal economic rights."

So since those days I have been a believer in an entrenched Charter of Rights. I was not satisfied that the common law would protect the citizen against the state. A charter of rights in a Constitution became my formula for a positive, optimistic, flowing democracy.

Over 30 years ago, as a law student in 1958, I read an article by that same obscure law professor, named Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who wrote an article on "Obstacles of Democracy". The following are the first sentences of that article:

Historically, French Canadians have not really believed in democracy for themselves and English Canadians have not really wanted it for others.

He went on to write:

Such are the foundations upon which our two ethnic groups have absurdly pretended to be building democratic forms of government. No wonder the ensuing structure has turned out to be really flimsy.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau wrote that 30 years ago. Was he right then? Is he right now? In that article he went on to trace the hierarchical authoritarian impulses in our political and social structures that, he said, were obstacles to a flowering of democracy.

So, honourable senators, we would have thought that in the course of the ensuing period, with the quiet revolution in Quebec and with the growth of rights across the country, particularly since 1982, those authoritarian impulses would have ebbed, those negative impulses would have been absorbed.

But after 30 years does the Meech Lake Accord not feed once again, or bring alive, those negative impulses—or, rather, will we continue to move painstakingly and carefully along the glorious democratic path first blazed by Cromwell in the seventeenth century?

The 1982 Charter of Rights, for me, was a magnificent milestone of Canadian history. It placed the sovereignty of the individual over the sovereignty of the state. The supremacy of the individual was above the supremacy of Parliament. Since 1982 witness after witness across this country—in the north, in this chamber, before the joint committee—has attested to the fact that public dialogue in this country has been transformed.

Individual citizens from every part of Canada and individual groups from every part of Canada have been vocally exercising their rights against unreasonable or mindless state power. Honourable senators know from their reading of history that citizen rights are hard to earn and are easily eroded. But we have witnessed, over the past decade, a blossoming of democracy, a true revolution in participatory democracy in Quebec, in Ontario and across the rest of the country. Pluralistic democracy is not neat.' It is not quiet.' Some have said that the 1982 Charter has provoked a public dialogue that is too raucous. Some have said that excessive demands are now being made by citizens without any comprehension or recognition of responsibilities. Some have said that people are demanding too much without understanding or being prepared to answer the question of who pays for those rights. Yet, like it or not, the nature of the public dialogue in Canada has changed. With the advent of the Charter, the peaceable kingdom of Pierre Trudeau was transformed overnight into a Twentieth Century Commonwealth, an uncommon Commonwealth.

Senator Flynn: That's a joke!

Senator Grafstein: The year 1982 transformed the political landscape. What happened in 1982 was dramatic. We wrestled the sovereignty of our nation away from the United Kingdom.

Senator Flynn: Wrestled!

Senator Grafstein: Yes, we wrestled the sovereignty of our nation away from the United Kingdom and destroyed our colonial status. By that very same stroke we transferred the sovereignty we had wrestled from the United Kingdom from the state to the individual. What a magnificent and astounding step in the progress of democracy!

The role of the Senate changed in that process as well. The Senate became, along with the House of Commons and all of the legislatures, a guardian of the Charter. Time and time again I have tried to remind honourable senators that the Senate's role since 1982 changed to that of being a guardian of the Charter. If legislation comes before the Senate that exceeds the Charter, the Senate has a duty, as the Supreme Court has said, to change that legislation so that it conforms to the Charter. The Supreme Court has said that it does not want to deal with unconstitutional matters, that it does not want to fix legislation or become a legislator.

Senator Murray: Why, then, do you want to refer the "distinct society" clause to the Supreme Court?

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, if I could complete my argument you will see where I am coming from on that question.

Senator Flynn: We know where you are going!

Senator Grafstein: The resolution before us does not call for that question in that way. Therefore, what is the Meech Lake Accord? If 1982 was a peaceful revolution, is the Meech Lake Accord a counter-revolution?

Let us take a look at the process. The democratic constitutional process was different with respect to Meech Lake. It was a private process in which democratic power was transferred from the federal state to the provinces in a very unusual fashion. Other senators have talked about this and argued about this and said, in conclusion, that perhaps we did not follow constitutional convention. I agree with those who have argued that point. However, that may be an egregious error, but the major flaw, the truly egregious error, was not the process alone but the assertion that the rights of a province, and the collective rights of that province's society, should be paramount to the rights of the individual. So the Charter was damaged. The painful, step-by-step, evolution of transferring the sovereignty of the state to the individual took a U-turn. Some argued that that was the price of bringing Quebec into the Constitution.

Let me refer to Senator Murray's comments found in Debates of the Senate of March 31, at page 3055. He stated:

Quebec was of course duly bound by the Constitution Act of 1982. But as Mr. Trudeau pointed out yesterday, that province in fact disputed the political and moral legitimacy of that Act as well as of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

He went on to state:

The Parti Québécois Government systematically resorted to the notwithstanding clause in an effort to make the Charter practically inoperative in Quebec and it made that a condition of Quebec's support for the Constitution.

That says to me that Quebec was not out; Quebec was in. Was not Quebec in that sense operating under the Constitution by using the notwithstanding clause in the Constitution to opt out of certain provisions of the Constitution? Quebec was operating as though it were in the Constitution.

Senator Murray went on to state:

With Quebec's willing assent to the 1982 Constitution Act, we now have a Charter of Rights which fully expresses pan-Canadian values and is accepted as legitimate throughout all parts of the country.

Are we now to understand that Quebec will not use the notwithstanding clause but will operate differently with the Charter under the Meech Lake Accord? That is a question many have asked and more have answered.

Some have argued that the Charter is now strengthened, as Senator Murray has argued. Senator Murray went on to give us a different view on that question. I refer to Debates of the Senate of April 18, 1988 at page 3076, where he states:

In 1960 Prime Minister Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights set us on a course of articulating and defining the rights and freedoms Canadians share. The proclamation of the Charter in 1982 completed that process. Nothing in the 1987 amendment will override or supersede that important achievement.

He went on to state:

In 1982 First Ministers agreed it was reasonable that the substantive provisions of the Charter should be interpreted in the light of our multicultural heritage and of aboriginal rights. In the 1987 Constitutional Accord First Ministers have complemented and extended those recognitions by agreeing that it is equally reasonable that the Charter should be interpreted in the light of Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinctiveness.

On the one hand we talk about the Charter being paramount and untouched, and on the other hand we find from Senator Murray the idea that we should interpret the Charter now in a distinct way. Which is correct? Canadians have a right to know; Canadians have a right not to be confused; Canadians have a right to clarity, not for future cases but for present cases. An argument has been made—and it is a good constitutional argument—that a Constitution is a living tree that evolves over time. Therefore, and Senator Spivak referred to this indirectly, we should not be so precise in demanding definition. Yet every constitutional expert in the western world will tell you that it is important to take a Constitution and apply it to current cases clearly and effectively. And yet we cannot. We cannot deal with the future and we cannot deal with the present. That is why I say that the Meech Lake Accord leaves too much that is too uncertain, too vague, too unfair, too open, too difficult.

On March 30, Mr. Trudeau dealt with the damage to the Charter. At page 3000 of Debates of the Senate, Mr. Trudeau stated:

• (2120)

Mr. Chairman, I will try to answer briefly. The first question asks whether the arrangements of 1987 are damaging to the Charter or to certain groups. I would say offhand that they probably will not be helpful to the aboriginal people, but they will not be damaging, because section 16 has an exclusion that says that the Charter and other sections will continue to operate towards aboriginals and multiculturals. As I indicated earlier, however, the clause on the Yukon and the Northwest Territories certainly can have some very deleterious effects on the possibility of those territories ever becoming provinces in places where the aboriginals, if they are larger in number, can exercise a role in government.

As to the rest of the Charter, from what has been advised to the joint committee people, as it appears in their report,— and I quote this in answer to Senator Spivak:

—it is quite clear that the Charter will be affected by the “distinct society” clause. It is quite clear that Mr. Bourassa says it will, that Mr. Rémillard says it will, and that the experts, in whom the committee believed in their report, say it will. I give a different answer from that of Mr. Robertson. He says no; I say yes, the arrangements are damaging to the Charter.

Senator Flynn: Who is the more objective of the two?

Senator Grafstein: Is Senator Flynn asking for evidence?

Senator Flynn: I am asking you this question: As between Robertson and Trudeau, who is more objective?

Senator Grafstein: Who is more objective than Bourassa or Robertson? Robertson says “no” and Bourassa says that the Charter will be affected.

Senator Flynn: No, no; answer my question.

Senator Grafstein: I think, Senator Flynn, that you know my answer to that question. I believe that Mr. Trudeau is an objective constitution expert.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Flynn: That is the best joke I have heard yet!

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Grafstein: One man's objectivity is another man's subjectivity.

Senator Frith: Not all of us can aspire to your cool objectivity, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: I am not cool! It makes me boil when I hear those platitudes.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have learned that each successive generation can improve upon the former. I take the liberty, honourable senators, not to quote historians or my elders but to quote my son, Laurence. I asked him last year about his view, as a law student, on this question. Rather than answer me, he decided on his own to do a study of the joint committee's report, and that study was published in the University of Toronto Faculty of Law Review, Volume 46, No. 1, the winter edition, 1988. Honourable senators, I was reluctant to do this, but after I heard Senator Doyle quoting colleagues of his, I thought it would be appropriate for me to quote my son. I think he has said this better than I could.

The article is entitled “Look Back in Anger: The 1987 Constitutional Accord, Report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.” He begins the article by quoting the report of the joint committee at page 58:

It is not, of course, the task of the Joint Committee to deliver legal opinions, and we do not purport to do so.

and again at page 56:

We do not believe that the entrenchment of this [distinct society] clause will in any realistic way erode the present constitutional protections of individual rights, including gender equality rights.

That passage was also quoted by Senator Spivak in her comments.

I would like to read from his concluding paragraphs because I share his view:

Despite its disclaimer about rendering legal options, the joint committee embarks on this task in Chapter VI. It states the problem accurately:

If section 2 is interpreted to permit governments and legislatures to carry out their respective “roles” at the expense of Charter rights and freedoms, then arguably there would be no “derogation” from the powers of any other level of government or legislature. The “derogation” would be at the expense of individuals and such a derogation is not prohibited by section 2(4).

Based on the “great weight of constitutional opinion”, the joint committee concludes that “the fears that entrenchment of the ‘linguistic duality/distinct society’ interpretation will cause such an erosion are not justified”. To the extent that any concerns exist, according to the Report, these “are problems rooted in the Charter provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982 itself”. This seems strange at first blush, but what the joint committee apparently means is this: any derogation of Charter rights will come through a “reasonable limit” finding under s. 1. S. 1 was already brought into existence with the Charter;

hence, the distinct society provision cannot be blamed for any limit on Charter rights that may subsequently be found by the courts, as the Report maintains in the chapter's concluding paragraph.

The article then quotes the report of the committee:

The decision was taken in 1982, when the Charter was introduced, to leave these questions of balance to be determined by the courts on the facts of a particular case.

It goes on to say:

Faced with this brand of reasoning, a reader of the Report will find it hard to know how to respond. If the distinct society clause makes the constitutional validity of legislation more likely under s. 1 (as the joint committee says at various stages), then in relevant cases at least some of the abridgement of the Charter's substantive right must be attributable to the new amendment. The joint committee seems to be arguing that, since substantive Charter rights are already limited by s. 1, it matters little if they are curtailed more sharply under the new amendment. But as mentioned above, the Report's simultaneous claim on this point is a seemingly absolute assertion that "entrenchment of this clause will not result in erosion of these rights".

The illogic continues as the joint committee declares that:

On its face, there is nothing in the 1987 Accord to suggest that the values of linguistic duality or Quebec's distinct society are to override the Charter or that legislation or governmental acts in furtherance of these values are to be immune from Charter Review.

My son now quotes Yves Fortier, an old friend of mine and one of the voices that Senator Murray suggested was federalist, speaking in favour—as indeed he is—of the Meech Lake Accord. Let us see what Maître Fortier, Q.C., said:

I believe those fears are totally groundless. And if it were not for the seriousness of the organizations that expressed those views, I would simply say we were dealing with a smokescreen.

The article goes on to say:

If the fears are groundless, then why not say so by putting in a symmetrical nonderogation clause applicable not only to the distribution of powers but also to the Charter?

The Report goes on to discuss the question of what would happen in the case of a conflict between the distinct society clause and the Charter, spending some time on the potential implications of the recent Ontario Separate School Funding Reference, which dealt with the interrelationship between the Charter rights and the constitutional jurisdictional powers granted to the federal and provincial governments. Again the Report quotes Fortier to back up its position that Quebec's distinct society need not necessarily dilute the Charter. Fortier says that:

The critics who are crying wolf forget that, in comparison with Canada as a whole, Quebec has scarcely been behind-hand in promoting the equality of the sexes. Actually, people seem to be forgetting, within the context of this debate, the very existence of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

We seem to have forgotten all about that. The article goes on to say:

The Report also cites Pickersgill's related argument, namely, that most of the people who have opposed Meech Lake seem to assume that unless you get something into the Charter . . . nothing can be done about it. They seem to think parliaments and legislatures do not matter . . . which seems . . . pretty absurd since they have to get the votes of the people.

This may indeed provide protection of individual rights within Quebec, but one of the primary reasons for the Canadian Charter was the need to embed these rights firmly in the constitution, rather than leaving them contingent on the ebb and flow of local or national politics. All students of constitutional law will recognize that legislatures do not always adequately safeguard rights, as many well-known cases . . . amply attest.

At this point he quotes a number of those well-known cases.

The joint committee, given its reading of the distinct society clause as innocuous, has little trouble shrugging off concerns about its conflict with the Charter. When it comes to considering whether gender equality rights should be treated as a special case, and perhaps included in the Accord's section 16 (which explicitly extends nonderogation protection to multicultural and native rights), the Report views the concerns of women's groups outside Quebec as independent of Meech Lake:

in none of the hypothetical situations cited by the women's groups was it alleged that the "linguistic duality/distinct society" rule of interpretation would have an impact on section 15 itself to permit inequality or discrimination. Rather, their concern is directed to the "reasonable limits" limitation in section 1.

● (2130)

Of course, toward the end of the chapter, the Report reaches still another conclusion inconsistent with earlier passages.

It says this:

Under the terms proposed by the . . . Accord neither gender equality rights nor the "linguistic duality/distinct society" rule of interpretation will be given automatic paramountcy in all situations. Neither overrides the other. Neither is automatically subordinate to the other. The courts are entrusted the task of maintaining a proper balance. The outcome will depend on the particular circumstances of the case.

So: equality rights will not be eroded by the clause. But whether they are eroded will depend on the circumstances of the case. (And please do not suppose that the foregoing is in any way a "legal opinion".)

It is only at the end of the section canvassing the potential conflict between the Charter and the distinct society clause that the Report finally communicates the real reason for its confusion and its obfuscation of the central issues raised by the Accord. In the joint committee's own words: "On the hypothesis that the 'linguistic duality/distinct society' rule of interpretation were capable of supporting a violation of equality rights, then it would be essential for section 16 of the Accord to include at least section 15 of the Charter." In the next sentence, though, the Report invokes the words of Maître Fortier, the person who describes the worries about the Charter as a "smokescreen" and "totally groundless".

I would like to quote some of the Report about what Maître Fortier said:

Yet, as Maître Yves Fortier told us: "I am afraid, however, that if we add to clause 16 of the Langevin accord a reference to certain substantive provisions of the Charter we will be opening a Pandora's box the effect of which will be to create new and quite considerable uncertainty. On the other hand, if it were decided to exempt the whole of the Charter from the effect of the distinct society clause, including clause 1 of the Charter, then that would mean the death of the Meech Lake Accord, period."

At last, the joint committee openly states a coherent rationale for its position. The Accord probably affects the Charter, but this is secondary to the need to secure Quebec's agreement. And Quebec's agreement, as Maître Fortier notes, was conditional on the exclusion of a non-derogation clause pertaining to the Charter. Hence this passage might be labelled the Report's climactic contradiction. It explodes the logic of the lengthy, laborious and acrobatic attempts to minimize the importance of the distinct society clause.

He goes on at length to deal with this question.

The consequences of this disclosure for a proper reading of both the Accord and the Report are numerous. First, it becomes clear that, even if the joint committee and indeed some of the framers of the proposed amendments considered the distinct society clause to have narrow, even negligible meaning, the fact remains that other architects of Meech lake quite deliberately recognized that the clause would offer a measure of insulation from the Charter. Put differently, the Government of Quebec refused to accept a nonderogation clause that would do the same for the rights of individuals as the Accord purports to do for the distribution of powers among governments. In this light, the joint committee's circumlocutions in attempting to characterize the impact of the distinct society clause look ridiculous. The Report's inability to discern a clear, coherent pattern of opinion should give pause to any court considering the document as extrinsic evidence of the intent of the Accord authors.

Second, the new clause will clearly be "capable of supporting a violation of equality rights", to use the Report's phraseology. But although the joint committee claims it would therefore become "essential" to protect those rights in section 16 of the Accord, the Report then implies that this requirement must take a back seat to the need to keep the package wholly intact. And making the Meech Lake Accord subject to the Charter would destroy the deal.

Third, the potential erosion of equality rights does not count for either the architects of the Accord or the joint committee as an "egregious error" requiring amendment. Yet the tone of the Report suggests this was the joint committee's most difficult issue. "Nothing in the proceedings," says the introduction to Chapter VI, "has given rise to more searching examination and consideration on our part." First the joint committee denies the risk but, when confronted by the manifest probability of the risk materializing, the Report shows where its priorities lie. As Maître Fortier says in the context of still another concern about the Accord: "The dynamics that led to the 1987 Accord must not be compromised." But this is not merely a case of procedural negotiating considerations triumphing over substantive issues. This is a case where the erosion of the Charter could not be construed as an "egregious error", because the erosion of the Charter was one of the Quebec government's essential substantive demands.

I would like to read you his concluding paragraph before I conclude. This is a young Canadian looking at his elders, and he says this:

Future generations will look back at the joint committee's Report in anger. They will be angered by the Report's inability to support even its most elementary positions without lapsing into inconsistency, angered by its obscurity, by its denial of plain reality, by the way it verges on outright duplicity. Further, historians will not be impressed by the intellectual rigour of Canada's leading constitutional experts. For a nation that so recently achieved full independence, a nation so obsessed by its constitution, a nation where individual rights are so fragile, it is the careless attitude of the political and legal élites that prompts the greatest anger of all.

Honourable senators, where does this leave me and where does it leave us? Should we assure that this grand "attempt" to introduce Quebec back into the family of Canada is, in itself, a retrogressive step because we sacrificed the Charter? Is the price of the Charter the price we, as Canadians, should be prepared to pay? Was Pierre Trudeau right in 1958 when he said that there are obstacles to democracy? Is this an obstacle to democracy, an obstacle to a Charter of Rights that should be paramount in our Constitution? Any Constitution? Will the sovereignty of the individual be ahead of the sover-eighty of the state under the Meech Lake Accord? I believe not.

I believe that the courts will now be compelled to distort individual rights in favour of collective rights under the Accord. This will be true, as Senator Hicks said, not just for Quebec, but ultimately for other provinces. Ultimately, we will have different regimes. Different rights in different provinces.

On my way back to Ottawa this week I ran into a former Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Ontario, Mrs. Pauline McGibbon. I told her I was coming back to talk about the Meech Lake Accord. She said, "Please, please, remind the senators about American history. Remind the senators about provincial rights. Remind the senators about how the issue of stronger rights to states strangled the growth of the United States and led to a civil war. Remind them of that." That may not be a fair comment, but I pass it on from a reasonable Canadian who was Her Majesty's representative in the Province of Ontario.

So, here we are in the Senate, a day before a crucial moment in our history. We are here to enact a play, perhaps a play in the theatre of the absurd. For, in the Senate we find the only legislature in Canada where the debate was open, where the debate was democratic, and where the conclusions were not foreordained. What a strange paradox that the undemocratic Senate becomes a saviour in its own way of the democratic dialogue. Democratic means, to match democratic ends, come in strange packages.

I ask myself this: Is democracy in Quebec and is democracy in Canada so fragile that we cannot absorb simple democratic amendments? I do not believe that. I have listened to senators from Quebec; I have listened to the premiers. I do not believe that democracy in Quebec is so fragile that it cannot withstand good, proper and fair amendment.

We, in the Senate, are in a suspended state. Our critics attack us for inactivity on the one hand and hyperactivity on the other hand. We please no one. Yet are we on the side of history? History depends on the action of people. Leadership can destroy societies as well as create societies. I believe that any derogation from the Charter is a step in the wrong direction.

The Charter for me is a living document. The Charter has its roots in our economic and political blueprint for our future. It shows us how we can curb the power of the state without eroding the power of the state to shape our future. Let democracy—a democracy where the sovereignty of the individual takes priority over the state—emerge victorious.

So my prayer for relief, honourable senators, is simple. Amend the resolution to ensure that the Charter of Rights is first and foremost. Amend the resolution so that the Charter of Rights is paramount. Let me end with this final prayer: Amend, amend, amend, amend, amend, amend, amend, amend, amend, amend—and then, honourable senators, let us say amen.'

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I do not expect to be too long tonight. However, I would like a chance to speak. I would like to congratulate senators, especially Senator Lucier, for their speeches.

I would like to say thank you to the senators who travelled with us to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I would especially like to thank Senator LeMoyné, who retired three weeks ago. I am sure he would like to be in the Chamber tonight to wind up the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. I would also like to thank Senator Macquarrie, Senator Bielish, Senator Len Marchand, Senator Cools and Senator Fairbairn and the chairman, Senator Molgat. They did quite well, especially in listening to the views of the citizens of the Northwest Territories in relation to the Meech Lake Accord. We feel that we are part of Canada and that we are Canadians. However, we especially feel that we have been ignored by the rest of Canada. I definitely feel that way myself.

This month I will have been in the Senate 11 years. I came here as a Canadian to represent a particular part of Canada, the people of the territories. However, today it would seem that I am here only to represent the rest of Canada, not the people of the territories.

To my way of thinking the Inuit and the Indians are the people who built Canada. We were here first and survived, and we helped other people coming to Canada. The people who came to the north, especially to Hudson Bay, were helped by us. The French traders and others started off there to come up to the territories, and we helped them. In a way this is in the past because today there is a different feeling. Back then we were given a taste of their food and an idea of how they lived on the land. While we were never paid anything for the meat we allowed them, at least we were given tea, sugar, flour and things like that in exchange—at least until it started to get a bit more organized, and then we started to buy a few things from them.

It does not seem so long ago that they showed us how guns could be used to hunt more fox. By the time the hunters reached Hudson Bay they could buy a six-foot or seven-foot gun. We at least could buy one gun. At that time we did not even consider how much it would cost to buy a gun from the Hudson Bay Company. We used to go out on the land and trap and we used the furs to buy a gun long enough to reach the distant fox. Until today, I thought Hudson Bay was as rich as the rest of Canada or as Europe. We wanted to feel we were part of the Constitution of Canada, but now the past is coming back to us. We are not included in the Constitution today.

Perhaps history repeats itself. Other waves of people came into the north to hunt whales and live with the aboriginal peoples. Even famous people—some of them from New York—came up to the Canadian north and lived with us. Sometimes it was because they got caught in the ice and could not go back home. How did they expect to survive in the winter time? They lived on their ships. However the ships were sometimes ruined by ice, and they then ended up living with our people in our communities.

For our part, in 1982 some of the Indian organizations went to England to see how much compensation they could have for agreeing to have the Constitution come to Canada. It has been a year since the Meech Lake Accord was drafted, and we are still left out of it.

Some of the witnesses we heard when we were travelling in the territories told us, "We feel like second-class citizens." I was going to say tonight that I felt the same way. I was to be the last speaker here tonight, but Senator Molgat will be the last person to speak. I think he did a lot for us by helping us through the worst concerning the Meech Lake Accord.

The people in the territories would like to know what our future is. We do not want to have it determined for us by ten premiers who have never been up there and who do not know what is going on or how the people up there live. All they know is "We want more power." Well, power is not good for the premiers, and in the meantime they will ruin our culture because they do not know how to live with the people up there.

Over the last 30 years, since the government entered the northern community saying it wanted to help us, we have not had a better life. Our people had a better life before the government set out to teach us and the community how to learn the English language and everything else.

Children coming out of school today are not better off. At least people living on the land survived and were happy with their families. Today the children are not better off than they were 30 years ago. In fact, they may be worse off today.

Comparing the old system and the new, since the government stepped in to give us the law of the Government of Canada, approximately 85 per cent of the Indian and Inuit people have been jailed because they have broken the law. But we did not make that law. Other people came up there and made that law. I do not want to see my people affected by that system.

On the one hand, people have come in to help us with our education system and so on, but on the other hand, they turn around and start bringing liquor into the community, and that affects the people in the community in a much worse way than lack of education. To me that is not the way to teach other people. And at first we did not even have the RCMP; we had not even heard of crime before others came into some of our communities. Today, however, we live in crime. At the moment, people come up to the north and we do not really care where they come from. I have lived for many years in the north, but I go back down south because it is better for me to live up in the north and then go south where I can have a better job with better wages. However, that is not the way to do it. In any kind of job you do, if you do it well, you can always be promoted.

● (21:50)

I have many good friends both in the north and in the south, and it does not matter to me what nationality they are. However, once the Meech Lake Accord is in place, I think people will start realizing that nationality and colour and race are important. People will start asking themselves: "What does 'distinct society' mean?" Does it mean that if you are French, you are distinct? Does it mean that if you are French you are better than I am? Until last year when the Meech Lake Accord was signed, people never thought about any of this. We are all Canadian citizens. We all have the right to live in Canada and to live our lives in the way in which we ourselves choose, and to develop our country. In my opinion, the Meech Lake Accord changes all that.

The day after Mr. Trudeau's speech, Senator Murray, during his submissions, said that he did not care what Mr. Trudeau said. However, on listening to Mr. Trudeau, I learned about the Constitution. Now I understand what it means. So I say to Senator Murray that we in Canada have a big country; we have different people with different ideas. I say to him that one man, even the Prime Minister, cannot give everything to everyone. Although everyone has the same rights, they may not understand everything about the Constitution. Up in the north, people are already saying to me that the premiers are going to run Canada; that they will take territory away from our two territories; that they will expand, and that we in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon can do nothing about that. If at some time in the future the two territories want to become provinces, it will be very difficult for them to do so because of the powers that the premiers of the provinces now have.

Some of us in the north have often been of the opinion that education was the ruin of some of us and that it changed some of our lives. Of course, we have always appreciated that education had good aspects to it. I think some of us are beginning to realize that, if we are not careful, we will find that the people from the south will be running everything in the north, including the way we live. People are beginning to realize that if we do not have education, then in the future we will not be in charge of our lives or our business or even our communities. It is becoming apparent to some people in the north that they can no longer survive by living off the land, and the only way to survive is in the same fashion as the white people do, and that is by being in business.

Another aspect of life in the north today is that organizations such as Greenpeace are now telling us what we can and cannot do. They tell us that hunting seals and foxes is bad to the extent that people who, in the past, made a living from their hunting can no longer live on their earnings from this source. Last week when I was in Rankin Inlet, I heard talk about some uranium mine operation starting up at Baker Lake. That was done without consulting the people in the community as to what they thought about uranium mining and what effect it might have upon their community. Greenpeace are now in there, protesting the opening of that mine. They have been in Yellowknife talking to the government, urging the government to disallow the opening of that mine at Baker Lake.

In the meantime, there is unemployment in the community at Baker Lake because Greenpeace has told the rest of the country and the rest of the world that people in the north of Canada are killing and slaughtering animals. They have been so successful with this propaganda that people who hunted for generations can no longer make a living by following their traditional way of life. So now they have a chance to work in the mine and Greenpeace is saying that uranium mining is not good for the people or for the community. What, then, lies in the future for the people of the north? On the one hand, we have the Meech Lake Accord which will not work; on the other, Greenpeace is running our lives and telling us how we can live in the north.

Living here in Ottawa, as I do a great deal of the time, I sometimes have an impulse to go back north. Even in the small communities as soon as you walk in, at least someone will recognize you and say: "Hi, Willie, how is everything?" In the south, people do not do that. However, with the adoption of this Meech Lake Accord, people will start realizing what is happening and will start asking: "Do you come from Quebec?" They will say: "You are distinct. Why do you come up here? Do we have to help you because you have a distinct society?" In my opinion, it does not matter where you come from or what nationality you are. The important thing that we should concern ourselves with is whether or not we are good Canadians and good citizens and whether or not we have a good way of life. I do not like to ask people where they come from or what nationality they are. I am quite content that they are here in Canada. I think that is the right way to view it.

Honourable senators, I have been in some other places in the world outside of Canada and I am always glad to come back here. I was in Guatemala four or five years ago and, in my opinion, that is no way to live, with the military visible in the streets night and day. I am afraid I did not very much like the idea of having machine guns pointed at me. As far as I am concerned, Canada is a free country and I do not think we should do anything to ruin that. To me, the amending of the Constitution is not the end of the world. We did not have a constitution for over 100 years, and we still have lots of time. This is a vast country and we still do not know what we have here in Canada. In my opinion, we should be concentrating on creating a better future for our children.

The Prime Minister and Senator Murray are anxious to have the Meech Lake Accord approved between now and the summer recess. However, if this is not done and the Constitution is therefore not changed, in my opinion Canada will be no better or no worse.

I have been involved in politics at the municipal level. It is nice for the community to have a little bit of power. It is nice for the mayor to be able to explain to people what he has done for the community. Oftentimes, people at the community level are able to do a better job because they understand the needs of their community. I do not think the premiers understand the needs of our community. They may know what is needed within their provinces, but they should not be telling people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories what to do.

I have talked to representatives of mining companies and oil companies, and there are lots of opportunities in the north. With changes in technology, we can do things today better than we could 15 or 20 years ago. This, in fact, is the case in Rankin Inlet where a nickel mine was closed in 1962. The mining company had found a better deposit in Thompson, Manitoba. The same company was back in Rankin last week to determine whether they should start the mine up again on the basis of improved technology. To me, it is better for representatives of the community to talk to these companies about such matters as creating jobs.

However, once the Meech Lake Accord takes effect, these companies may begin to think that the premiers have the power, that the premiers can do anything they want in their communities without consulting people in the community. Perhaps people are not thinking in this way, but I wonder what will happen once the Meech Lake Accord takes effect. I think that many people in the north are wondering what the House of Commons will do if we send these amendments back to the House of Commons tomorrow. I think that many northerners will recognize, at least, that the Senate tried and that if the politicians refuse to do anything about changing the accord, we had no control. In five or ten years' time, people may be saying that at least the Senate understood what the Meech Lake Accord meant. They will not be saying that about the Prime Minister or Senator Murray.

If we fail in our efforts, I hope that the Meech Lake Accord will not ruin our country or our people. I hope that the Prime Minister and Senator Murray will not forget that we in the north are part of Canada, too, and that we do not want to have our lives ruined in the future. We want to keep our culture, not have it ruined by the ten premiers.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have listened intently to this debate. I feel more knowledgeable about Canada than I did when it started. I am particularly grateful to Senator Adams and to Senator Lucier, who have spoken to us from their hearts and who have tried to impress upon us the feelings of the people and, yes, governments, but more particularly, the feelings of the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I do not think that it would be too strong terminology to say that they have shown a sense of deep resentment that the future of those territories and, more particularly, the future of the people of those territories should be left in the hands of the Government of Canada and the ten provinces. I think I understand better their situation, and I hope the Senate understands better the depth of feeling the people of those territories apparently hold today. I can only wish that in their wisdom the people of Canada will recognize that the people who live in the north are quite distinct within the nation and that they should have, at least, the treatment of consideration, but not by, as Senator Adams said, the ten premiers, most of whom have never even seen the north. So, again, I am grateful to both Senator Adams and Senator Lucier for the message they have brought to the Senate.

I would like to speak for a moment about the position of New Brunswick in this debate. First, I should say that I do not and would not pretend to speak for or on behalf of Premier Frank McKenna. It must be accepted that when he speaks, he speaks for the people of New Brunswick. He is a very bright and dedicated young man. He is also a very tough young man, and he has strong fibre. Premier McKenna is dedicated to improving and enhancing conditions for the people of New Brunswick and the Province of New Brunswick within Confederation, and he is as deeply dedicated to the future of Canada. His position on the Meech Lake Accord is quite clear; he does not accept the seamless-web theory that the accord cannot be amended. He believes deeply that it can be amended by rational debate, discussion and decision and that it should be amended. He is not a "wild card", as some people have expressed it, and as the media seem to wish to cast him. There is nothing wild about the man. He believes in logic.

I have a word of advice for my friend, the Honourable Senator Murray, in his capacity, and for the Right Honourable the Prime Minister—if you wish to discuss matters rationally with Premier McKenna you will find a receptive person for such discussion; but if attempts are made to push or threaten Frank McKenna, you will get the opposite result from that you might wish.

Honourable senators, a word about the proposition that the former Prime Minister, Pierre Elliot Trudeau, is responsible for many of the problems to do with the Constitution. I would like to remind the government that Prime Minister Trudeau, of that day, was not the only person at the table. Parliament itself held long, extensive, detailed hearings into the proposed amendments to the Charter and the patriation of the Constitution. Changes were made in what the government proposed. They listened to people from all across the country. There was nothing false about the hearings that took place. They were good for the country. That is the Trudeau whom some tried to cast in the role of a confrontationalist.

It should also be remembered that there were ten heads of government at that time who debated and eventually reached agreement. Nine of them were provincial premiers. It was not Prime Minister Trudeau or his government that opted for the notwithstanding clause, clause 33—it was the premiers of the provinces. At that time, the governments of those provinces were as follows: British Columbia—neo-conservative Social Credit; Alberta—Conservative; Saskatchewan—NDP; Manitoba—Conservative; Ontario—Conservative; Quebec—Separatist; New Brunswick—Conservative; Nova Scotia—Conservative; Prince Edward Island—Conservative; and Newfoundland—Conservative. There were seven Conservative governments, plus the Socreds, one NDP and one Separatist. There were no Liberal governments.

Senator Murray: Except the big one.

Senator Frith: That is a nice way to put it.

Senator McElman: The big one, indeed. The one that spoke for Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator McElman: It was big, indeed—big enough to believe that it was time to patriate the Constitution and to become fully a nation. That was opposed.

Property rights were not included. It was not the federal government that wanted property rights excluded, it was provincial governments, particularly those of the west.

[Senator McElman.]

We started out with a strong Charter of Rights and Freedoms which became seriously watered down as the discussions proceeded. It was not watered down by the Government of Canada; it was watered down by the demands of the provinces.

Senator Murray: How did that ever get through Parliament?

Senator McElman: You should not look so puzzled, Senator Murray; you know what I am saying is right.

Senator Murray: I voted against it.

Senator McElman: Because that man, that confrontationalist, was prepared to negotiate to obtain what he thought was awfully important—

Senator Murray: Compromise.

Senator McElman: —for the people of Canada, that is, their own Constitution in their own land, a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for people, not for governments. Those were things he was prepared to negotiate.

Senator Murray: And compromise for.

Senator McElman: All right, compromise. That is a rather honourable process in Canada and it has been for a long time.

Senator Frith: One you have a chance to do tomorrow.

Senator Austin: I am surprised he even knows the word.

Senator McElman: This week, the Prime Minister made rather cutting reference to the notwithstanding clause. Senator Murray speaks of compromise. What a wonderful opportunity this government has had up to this point to negotiate with the provinces to remove that section.

Senator Murray: And keep Quebec out. That is the inescapable inference of what you said.

Senator McElman: No, that is not what I said.

Senator Murray: Yes, yes—keep Quebec out until you fix the notwithstanding clause.

Senator McElman: I said that there was a marvellous opportunity for this government, and the much-vaunted negotiator at the head of the government who is supposed to be the greatest negotiator who has ever come down the pike. Here was his opportunity to negotiate away something that he has told us again this week he finds so deeply offensive—a thing that was so desperately wrong with the Constitution that he inherited. Well, he has missed that opportunity now for sure.

Honourable senators, since it is rather late, I will try to be brief.

I assume that Senator Murray will be closing this debate sometime tomorrow and, before he does, I would like to draw to his attention some of his comments. I refer to the Senate Hansard of December 7, 1981 at page 3307 where he was attempting to cast his own views of what Senator Molgat had to say in the debate. I do not see it as being too accurate a reflection but, perhaps, it was close. In any event, he said:

I am always intrigued by the intellectual gymnastics of some honourable senators.

I am too. It is a study of a lifetime and I enjoy it. He went on to say:

A year ago they would brook no opposition from eight of the ten provinces of Canada. A couple of months ago, after the Supreme Court handed down its decision, they agreed, in the words of Senator Molgat, that "the provinces must be heard." Tonight Senator Molgat implies that to be committed to the process of provincial consultation is to be committed to whatever the process produces, even if the end result excludes the Province of Quebec. That argument would make Parliament a cipher, and it is an argument that I, for one, can never accept.

I wonder how Senator Murray, in the light of the word "never," could possibly accept the process which tells Parliament that it is a cipher; that tells 11 first ministers they should reach an agreement; and that tells each of the provincial legislatures and the Parliament of Canada that not a word can be changed. What is a cipher? Not the Parliament of Canada alone. What this government has proposed is 11 ciphers for the nation. I, like him, do not accept that. Perhaps he will deal with it tomorrow.

● (2220)

There has also been a bit of good fun poked back and forth about people following party lines. Others have referred to senators who in this and the Meech Lake Accord have not perhaps followed the party line; and there have been attempts to ridicule.

Again, on December 7, 1981, Senator Austin, referring to remarks made by the Honourable Senator Murray, said:

His speech is deeply felt, I know—

I agree; Senator Murray expresses himself well and with conviction. I have a lot of respect for Senator Murray and for the work he did in New Brunswick over the years. The quotation continues:

—but could he explain the reasons why his leader in the other place, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, voted in favour of the resolution—

That was the resolution for patriation and amendment of the Constitution. It continues:

—which is now before us, and why he differs so greatly—

That is, Senator Murray:

—in his conclusions with that of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place?

Senator Murray said:

I do differ from the conclusion of my national leader.

So Senator Murray should not be surprised that Liberals, by and large, are as independent of thought as he was at that time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator McElman: I have one further comment. I have, by question, raised the matter of Supreme Court reference, and I recall the answer given by the Honourable Senator Murray and by the Deputy Minister of Justice. I say to him once again—I plead with him once again—that the government, of itself, should do as was done back in 1981, with the reference to the Supreme Court. The answer that it is not possible to do, that it is not possible to frame the question, does not hold water. Despite the legal advice that was given, there is contrary advice, and there are those with good credentials who say that it is more than possible and that it should be done in the interest of the nation.

It is the contention of the government that it really does not know what the "distinct society" clause means. It is the contention of several of the premiers that they really have not the vaguest notion of what it means or what its effect will be. Surely, in the name of reason and common sense, with the possible effect of that clause on this nation, it would not hurt to make an appropriate reference and to get the advice of the court—"which", it is said, "we will get later." Why not get it now before the deed is done?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, it is very tempting at this very late hour in the day, and very late in the debate, to forgo any further comments, particularly when so much has been said on the issue.

Senator Phillips: Yield to the temptation.

Senator Molgat: Well, Senator Phillips, I would if I did not consider this to be the most serious debate that we have been engaged in during my time in the Senate. To me, the very being of Canada is at stake in the debate that takes place here, and I think it is to the credit of the Senate that it has had this extended debate and the extended hearings that were held here, in the Submissions Group, and in the north, to give Canadians an opportunity to debate this issue. I think that the work of the Senate in that regard is an example of exactly what the Senate should be doing. We have provided that opportunity for sober second thought.

There is disagreement as to the best solution to the issue before us. There is no disagreement on the objective. Yes, we do want Quebec to sign. There is no disagreement about that. The question is: How do we arrive at that?

I think that the fundamental question before us is: What kind of Canada do we want; what kind of Canada do we individually seek? What is this country? Is it 10 dukedoms and a weak king at the centre? Is it two nations? Is it a tenuous agglomeration of independent states—or is it something more than that?

To me, the Meech Lake Accord is a 180 degree turn from the direction that I had hoped the country would take. Senator Murray says that it is not, that it is a continuation, that it is an incremental development. Well, I certainly do not see it that way. To me, it opens the door to incremental separatism—not simply separatism of Quebec. We are establishing the base for potential separatism in many other areas of this country. I think that is a fundamental question that faces us here as senators.

Once upon a time I was a Canadien français, associated with my friends in Quebec who were also Canadiens français.

Then they became Québécois, and I became, I am told, Franco-Manitoban. The Saskatchewanites became Fransaskois, and the Albertans became Franco-Albertans.

It seems to me that we are developing in this country a parochialism and an attitude that province comes first and nation comes second. That is what we have to ask ourselves: Is it, indeed, province first and country second, or are we Canadians to begin with?

For me, the direction that this takes is to set us up more and more as provincialists. The moment that we argue against that, we have very bright, good constitutionalists, like Senator Tremblay, who will say, "Oh, you are a centralist." They have raised the bogey of centralism. It is not a question of centralism; the question is: Are we building a nation or are we building 10 provinces? To me, Meech Lake leads to a ten-province development and not to a national development. The national government loses, the provinces gain.

There are those who say, "Oh well, wait until the next round. During the next round we will be able to correct that." Honourable senators, if they could not correct that this time when there was a will to do something and a desire on the part of the provinces to get something done to make a deal, if they could not agree that some of the fundamental things are wrong in the accord—which my honourable friends even admit themselves—what makes them think the next time around they can correct what is wrong?

The only defence they have now is: "You cannot touch it." We are told, "You must not touch it now because it will fall apart. We know it is wrong, but you cannot touch it now. You cannot put in rights for women because it will fall apart."

The provincial premiers are elected. They have a clear mandate. They are there to protect their own provinces. They are not there to protect anyone else's interests. They will fight for their own interests. That is their job. Our job, as national legislators, is to think of the national interest. That is what Meech Lake does not do.

Honourable senators, I had a number of detailed items I was going to deal with. I will forgo a number of them, but there are still a couple I wish to touch on.

Senator Lucier: You have lots of time.

Senator Molgat: The first is the process, the process by which we completed this Meech Lake affair. For 11 men to get together one night and prepare a plan of action is not unreasonable. There were some discussions beforehand—Senator Murray was in charge of them. That was reasonable. There is one egregious error I will come to later when I deal with the north, but that was not an unreasonable method by which to proceed. But to say at the end of that night, "That's it, we eleven have decided," is unreasonable.

Incidentally, while we are talking about the 11, I reject the concept of 11 First Ministers. That is not my view of Canada. There is one Prime Minister and ten premiers. The 11 First Ministers concept, with them all being equal, is exactly part of the problem that this government has. Premiers have clear responsibilities, and in their fields they are certainly the leaders, but there is also a country and there is a Prime Minister.

Let me come back; for those 11 to say, "You cannot touch it," is absolutely against every concept of democracy. True, Senator Murray will say that those are elected premiers. They are elected premiers, but that does not give them a mandate. Most of them were elected by a minority of the people in their province, and since when can they suddenly bind their province and all of the people living in their province to a deal which the people have not even been consulted about? Surely that is a wrong process. To make an arrangement, yes, but then they should go back to get it ratified.

Senator Murray: Well!

Senator Molgat: After saying that we cannot touch it, after saying that there is absolutely no change that can be made? If you said, "Yes, go back and have it ratified with the understanding that it can be changed—"

Senator Murray: How many legislatures passed it in 1982?

Senator Barootes: None.

Senator Molgat: Your trouble is you always want to fight the battle of 1982 or the battle of 1867. I am dealing with the accord that is before us. I am not interested in what Mr. Trudeau did in 1982. I am not here to defend his actions. I am dealing with what this government is doing.

Senator Murray: Compared to what?

Senator Molgat: Let me go to the next step. Let us deal with the next item in the process. If you are looking for an egregious error, well, my honourable friend, you have created one. You have one.

Let us deal with the process and how it affects the north. At a meeting of the Senate Task Force on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and on the Yukon and Northwest Territories in Yellowknife, Mr. Nick Sibbeston, the Government Leader of the Government of the Northwest Territories, stated:

From the very beginning, our government has been frustrated in trying to become involved in the Meech Lake discussions. Our government and I as leader were not invited to the Meech Lake meeting. When the results of the Meech Lake meeting became public and we realized that the Northwest Territories was very much affected in the proposed Constitutional Accord, we attempted to get involved. I wrote to the Prime Minister and all of the Premiers asking to be invited to subsequent meetings dealing with the matter.

On June 3, when the First Ministers were holding their meetings in Ottawa in the Langevin Building, Tony Penikett—

And I add that Tony Penikett is the Government Leader of the Government of the Yukon Territory:

—and I were pacing the streets of Ottawa waiting to be invited into the meeting, which never happened.

[Senator Molgat.]

That surprised the members of the committee a little, and when he concluded his statement I asked the following question:

In the process leading up to the Meech Lake accord, it is my understanding that Senator Lowell Murray, the Minister responsible for Federal-Provincial Relations, was negotiating. Were there any negotiations with you; did he come to Yellowknife to discuss with you, or did he invite you to Ottawa to discuss with him?

Mr. Sibbeston replied:

Not at all whatsoever, sir. Our letters were simply not answered by the Prime Minister and the Premiers.

He repeated that they waited outside the Langevin Block and they were not invited in. I then asked:

Have you ever met Senator Lowell Murray, the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations?

Mr. Sibbeston replied:

No, sir. And I have never met the Prime Minister.

I then asked:

You have never met the Prime Minister either?

Mr. Sibbeston replied:

I have never met the Prime Minister to discuss matters of mutual concern. I attempted to arrange a meeting with the Prime Minister last winter and when he became aware of the agenda items, which included constitutional development, the meeting was . . . It seemed as if we were going to get a meeting with him, but the meeting was suddenly not available. He insulted us by agreeing to have a meeting, just to have a picture taken of him and me. That is the closest that the northern . . . that is the closest I, as Government Leader, have ever got to the Prime Minister. He offered to have his picture taken with me.

That, obviously, surprised me somewhat and I asked:

Oh! But you have had no discussion with him of any kind in this regard?

Mr. Sibbeston replied:

Absolutely zero, absolutely nil. Nothing.'

Senator Frith: That seems fairly clear. There is not much doubt there.

Senator Molgat: What does the Leader of the Government of the Yukon Territory have to say? I am referring to Issue No. 1 of the Whitehorse hearings at page 118. Again, I asked Mr. Penikett the following question:

In the process leading up to Meech Lake, did Mr. Murray, as the responsible Minister, come to see you in Yukon to discuss the matter with you, or did he invite you to Ottawa to discuss it with him?

Mr. Penikett replied:

Neither Mr. Murray nor Mr. Mulroney had ever communicated with us on the substance of this issue.

I then asked:

And did not come here to meet with you or your government?

Mr. Penikett replied:

Neither here nor in Ottawa, nor anywhere else.

• (2240)

Senator Frith: Not even a snapshot for the family?

Senator Molgat: Not even an offer by Senator Murray to have his picture taken with them.

Senator Murray: I am too modest.

Senator Doyle: What happened in 1982?

Senator Molgat: You fellows are certainly obsessed with 1982. Why don't you talk about the issues right now? That is the problem. I am dealing with what is proposed right now in the Meech Lake Accord.

Honourable senators, neither the Prime Minister nor the responsible minister met with the government up there, nor did they discuss anything with the northerners. In the face of that, what do we find? We find serious changes to the north—changes that will be implemented through this accord. There is nothing for them on the question of boundaries; there is nothing for them on the creation of new provinces; there is nothing for them on the matter of the appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the Senate, and there is nothing for them on the matter of aboriginal peoples. And all of this was done with absolutely no consultation. Honourable senators, if there was ever a colonial attitude displayed by a government, it could not have been worse than this.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: I think back to the formation of my province in 1869 and 1870, when the then Government of Canada sent surveyors out there. They trampled all over the land of the poor Métis, but at least the Métis reacted. It was the lieutenant governor who was sent out of the province and out of their country, much to their credit. At least they got something as a result of their actions. That area was created a province and those people had some rights. But in this case, the government has ridden roughshod over these people of the north without even consulting them.

If there was ever an egregious error, Senator Murray, it is there. If there was ever a case of grand injustice, it is right there.

Senator Lucier: We haven't seen Senator Murray or Prime Minister Mulroney in the north since, either!

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: I will only refer to one other matter, although there are many others to cover, that of the situation of French Canadians outside Quebec.

The other day, Senator Simard beat about the bush on that matter but he seemed to indicate that French Canadians outside Quebec were satisfied with the Meech Lake Accord.

I asked him at that point whether he had gone through the speeches made before the Submissions Group on the Meech

Lake Constitutional Agreement. I can only conclude that he did not. I would simply like to correct the impression he left that there was an agreement or a deal or some support. This is not the case, and for very good reasons.

My dear friends opposite are not very interested in listening to what Canadians have to say. They certainly spent very little time listening to the witnesses who came here, and clearly very little time reading what was said.

Let me quote here from issue No. 1 of the Submissions Group on the Meech Lake Constitutional Agreement, that of February 29, 1988. The witness was Mr. George Arès, president of the Association canadienne-française de l'Alberta. Mr. Arès stated on page 1:121:

The main issue for us is how we can dare to accept the Meech Lake Accord with no changes when it contains serious basic flaws that absolutely must be corrected before the Accord is proclaimed.

He went on to say:

How can we accept such an accord? For ACFA, this defies the imagination and common sense. Canadians from every province and of every political stripe, representatives of numerous associations, have pointed out serious and pertinent flaws in the Accord. We find it inconceivable that politicians could agree to ratify this accord without correcting these serious flaws.

And further, on page 1:124, he stated:

ACFA urges the Senate to do everything in its power to prevent the Meech Lake Accord, as it was signed and now stands, from becoming an integral part of our country's Constitution. Once the Accord is proclaimed, it will be very hard to amend it and to correct the serious flaws that it contains.

And finally, he had this to say on page 1:128:

Obviously, (it) would be Alberta, where the provincial government is making war on its francophones. There are other provinces that are doing the same thing. But for us francophones in Alberta, it is obvious that our provincial government is making war on us. It would like its francophones to disappear.

Well, honourable senators, if the Meech Lake Accord is not amended and if there is no obligation for the Canadian Government both to promote and preserve French-speaking groups outside Quebec, what Mr. Arès suggested will indeed happen, to us at least in western Canada—maybe not in New Brunswick, but in western Canada we will all disappear. That will be the result of the Accord. It will ensure that those groups that have been working to maintain at least a small group that is small but very important however to the concept of Canadian federalism, a group that is very important to an alternative perception of our country, the perception of a great bilingual country, different from the United States, with another kind of richness.

[Senator Molgat.]

This will not happen unless there is an obligation for the Canadian Government to promote, and if provinces in turn do not face up to their obligations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, you only have to read Bill C-72 to find out how the Canadian Government will promote bilingualism.

Senator Molgat: My dear colleague should instead admonish his colleagues in the other place who are now stalling.

Senator Murray: Don't worry, I will have the honor to table the Bill in the Senate in due time.

Senator Molgat: As far as Bill C-72 is concerned, my dear colleague, Senator Murray, knows very well it is some of his party's members in the other place who are stalling, not my party's people.

The fact is that with the Meech Lake Accord those groups are going to be a lot worse off than today.

Senator Murray: How's that?

Senator Molgat: Just ask them! It's precisely because the federal Government is not committed to promote bilingualism. You support the two nation theory, not the national bilingualism theory; no, you are going back to the two nation theory.

Senator Murray: Read the Commissioner of Official Languages' comments.

Senator Molgat: Senator Murray, if you have questions for me, I will be happy to answer them.

Senator Murray: Mr. D'Iberville Fortier has already identified the constitutional recognition of linguistic duality as a gain for Francophones outside Quebec; he said so several times.

Senator Frith: He also said something else concerning Meech Lake which is not very encouraging.

Senator Molgat: The fact is that I have just quoted one of the leaders of the French-speaking community outside Quebec. The Francophones in Saskatchewan and those in my province had the same reaction.

So do not come and tell us that the local people are not in a position to judge what effects your actions will have. It is precisely because you do not want to listen. You are so sure that you are right that you refuse to listen to anybody. Senator Murray, did you come here to listen to the witnesses?

Senator Murray: Listen . . .

Senator Molgat: You were never here. You do not want to listen to anybody. The fact is that these groups know what this means for them. So take heed. If you insist on pushing through the Meech Lake agreement as you are doing, and if you insist on doing nothing else, if you refuse to see what the federal Government and the provinces are really doing, you need only observe what is going on in Saskatchewan to realize that what is at stake is the disappearance of these groups.

At any rate, as I said at the outset, the entire Meech Lake Agreement will cause the disintegration of this great country. It runs completely counter to the national development of Canada.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 21, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that one-day car rental charges, supported by a receipt, for an intermediate car be permitted as a travel claim or option where appropriate and reasonable, in lieu of taxis or other means of ground transportation.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this is a short report. Normally I would want to give honourable senators a chance to read it before discussion, however, it deals merely with an adjustment in the ground transportation allowance permissible to senators when travelling between airports, or between their homes and airports.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT
NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS AND POSSIBLE MEDIATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder whether Senator Murray has anything to tell us about the current situation between Canada and France. A day or so ago I raised in the Senate the necessity of taking some measures to recover from the low state to which Canada-France relations have fallen as a result of the incidents involving St. Pierre & Miquelon and Newfoundland.

My analysis as to the state of the relations has been confirmed by the reception which the retiring Canadian ambassador received in Paris by the President of France and by the Prime Minister of France when he paid his final call on the leaders of the country. Indeed, Minister Bouchard himself described the situation as serious and as requiring special measures to avoid further deterioration.

My question is: Is the government seized with this, and what steps is it proposing in order to overcome the present unsatisfactory situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, our conviction is that the best way to start—I think the only way to start—is to find a means by which to agree on a process for resolving the dispute that engages Canada and France on the fisheries question. That is the purpose of the meeting that is taking place today in Paris.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I made that point a day or so ago, and at that time the minister was not prepared to say when negotiations on the fisheries and boundaries questions would be resumed. He has now referred to a meeting that is taking place today. Could he give us more details as to the purpose of the meeting, the personnel involved, and its location?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is a meeting taking place in Paris. I am aware that Mr. Yves Fortier from our side is attending and that the meeting is about a process by which to resolve the disputes. I underline the fact that the meeting is about mediation, not arbitration.

In any case, three meetings have taken place in the past month or more on the question of interim fish quotas and on the boundaries dispute. Today's meeting, as I say, is an attempt to agree on a process that will let us resolve the disputes. We are not at this moment agreed on a process.

Senator MacEachen: I find it an interesting comment that Canada and France have not agreed on a process. Am I to take from that statement that the agreement—which was announced more than a year ago, which contained provisions with respect to arbitration of the boundaries dispute and proposals with respect to fish allocations, and which was to last throughout 1987, I believe—has now been abandoned or is not in effect? Are we starting again as if that agreement had no longer any bearing on the situation? The simple question is: Has the agreement, to which Premier Peckford and others took exception, and which we referred to the Committee of the Whole, now fallen to one side?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition will be aware that, on October 9, the French broke off negotiations on the compromise containing the terms of reference for international judicial settlement of the maritime boundary around St. Pierre & Miquelon off the south coast of Newfoundland. These negotiations also addressed interim fish quotas for French vessels in Canadian waters for the three- or four-year period involved in obtaining a decision on the boundaries dispute. My note indicates that the French have refused to refer the boundaries dispute to judicial settlement without a fish quota agreement.

Honourable senators, I obtained some notes on this matter in response to a question from Senator van Roggen the other day, and I can tell him that the preference of the Canadian government continues to be the International Court of Justice as the most suitable forum for a judicial settlement of the boundaries dispute. There are other options, including the possibility of an ad hoc tribunal of five or seven eminent international jurists, that are also under consideration, but no final decision has been made as to which forum would be the most appropriate for the adjudication of this issue.

In any case, Canada has been telling France for over a year that when it comes to Canadian fisheries management, arbitration is totally unacceptable. Canadian fisheries management, setting fishing quotas in Canadian waters, is the responsibility of the Canadian government, not of a third party.

• (1410)

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate the force of the comment which the Leader of the Government has made with respect to Canada's authority and prerogative in establishing quotas in Canadian waters. The agreement, which was entered into more than a year ago, provides, as we all recall, for the establishment of fish allocations, including a portion of northern cod which is to be negotiated, and also for the reference of the boundary question to arbitration. My understanding is that it is under the umbrella of that agreement that these negotiations have taken place. It is my further understanding that that agreement expired at the end of 1987, and unless it has been extended it is no longer in effect.

My question is: What is the status of the agreement? Is it not in effect, or is it still a guide or an umbrella for our negotiations between Canada and France?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think it would be prudent to obtain a very precise answer to the question the honourable senator has asked.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate that answer. But I return to the question of mediation. It is a fact that the government has replaced our negotiator, Mr. Lorne Clark, who appeared, as we all recall, in the Committee of the Whole, by Yves Fortier—at least, that is the name mentioned by the Leader of the Government—and he will conduct the negotiations. These negotiations have failed up to the present, despite the entry of a fresh, new, non-departmental person. It is as if it were a labour dispute and we were to bring in a person like Bill Kelly to help settle the problem between Canada and France. Because of the intriguing possibilities of mediation, I ask: Who will mediate? Will a third country be brought in to mediate the dispute between Canada and France? I would like to get some intimation, if it is available, as to how that process will unfold.

Senator Murray: That is precisely what is being discussed in Paris today.

Senator MacEachen: Will we ask a third country to mediate?

Senator Murray: A trusted third party, yes.

Senator MacEachen: Are we proposing any candidates—

Senator Frith: Is there a long list or a short list?

Senator MacEachen: —as a trusted third party?

Senator Frith: Who is in the running? What is their political background?

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCHOLARSHIPS—AVAILABILITY IN 1988-89—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS—METHOD OF SELECTION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last the government dealt with a question that I had asked earlier concerning the new federal government scholarship program. I would like now to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, whether these scholarships will be available to students for the academic year 1988-89, and were the details for the program arranged with the universities directly or through the Council of Ministers of Education?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am almost certain that the answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, but I would like to confirm it, and, at the same time, I shall obtain an answer to the second part of my friend's question.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have another question, one I am sure that the minister, given his responsibilities, will be ready to answer today. The question is this: Will the undergraduate scholars who are to receive federal scholarship money be selected by boards or committees within the colleges and universities, or will they be selected by a federal agency such as one of the granting councils?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, when last I looked that matter had still not been determined.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps the minister could tell us when this will be determined. If the minister is saying that this program is to be in place by the beginning—indeed, well before the beginning—of the academic year, these important administrative arrangements will have to be finalized. Otherwise, the program will be in an ungodly mess.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, yesterday in the Senate of the United States a resolution was passed compensating Americans of Japanese descent for actions taken by the American government from 1940 to 1944, including their incarceration and confiscation of their possessions. You will recall, honourable senators, that Americans of Japanese descent were incarcerated in the United States during the war period to 1944. Thereafter they were released and their possessions were returned. The Senate of the United States has decided to compensate each of those Americans of Japanese descent by payment of $20,000 on an individual compensation basis.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall that since 1984 I have persistently asked whether or not the government will fulfill the promise made by Mr. Mulroney almost four years ago—in June of 1984—when he promised during the election campaign that he would compensate Canadian citizens of Japanese descent and apologize for acts taken by the government during World War II and until 1949, when they were first given an opportunity to vote. Is there any change in government policy?

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS AND POSSIBLE MEDIATION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, when I walked into the chamber this afternoon, slightly late, I heard the word “mediation” being used with regard to the present situation between Canada and France. Because of my sense of humour, I thought this meant that somebody was going to arbitrate the discussions between cabinet ministers and the former ambassador to France to try to decide who had done what. Obviously, it is more serious than that. The suggestion that we call in a third party for arbitration between France and Canada is quite extraordinary.

[Senator Stewart.]

My question is this: Would this person or these persons mediate the boundary issue, the fisheries issue, or would the two items be tied together? I consider it a very serious mistake that these two issues shall be linked together, as was done some months ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, those are the matters that are now being discussed in Paris. If I can obtain more precise information on what is on the agenda and what is planned, and if I can properly convey it to the Senate, I will do so within a day or two.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When you say “those matters,” I take it you are saying that the possibility of third party mediation, even by another nation, is included in the considerations?

Senator Murray: Definitely.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Last night, during the presentation by Senator Molgat on the Meech Lake Accord, I interjected. At that time the debate was concerning an injustice that had been perpetrated on the North by the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations. In Debates of the Senate dated April 20, 1988, at page 3201, I said:

We haven't seen Senator Murray or Prime Minister Mulroney in the North since, either!

I want to take a minute of your time to say that I want both Senator Murray and the Prime Minister to know that we would welcome them to the North at any time. Whether we agree with what they say or do at times, I do not think is very important. I want them to know that the tradition in the North has always been that we treat our guests properly, and we will continue to do that if they should come to the Yukon or to the Northwest Territories. I not only say that we would do that, honourable senators, I sincerely invite them, if they have an opportunity, to visit the North.

(i) by deleting paragraph 16 of the Schedule and substituting the following therefor:

"16. Nothing in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 derogates from any of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or affects Part II of the Constitution Act, 1982."—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, let me first congratulate and thank honourable senators who have participated in what has been, for me at any rate, an extremely interesting and stimulating debate on a very important subject.

Let me single out, if I may, the speech made by our newest senator, Senator Gerry Ottenheimer from Newfoundland.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: He made an excellent speech, delivered in both of our official languages, from the perspective of considerable experience in politics and government in his province. He also revealed an admirable national vision.

Senator Ottenheimer is the first senator to have been appointed to this place under the interim process of the Meech Lake Accord, and I may say that if the process produces many senators of his high quality, then Parliament and the country will be the winners from Meech Lake.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Speaking in the Committee of the Whole on March 31, Senator MacEachen described something I had said as "apocalyptic." The word kept coming back to my mind as I listened to the debate in the last couple of days—the word "apocalyptic" in its dictionary sense of "an impending grand or violent event." It kept coming back to me, especially when I heard the rhetoric about diarchy, massive transfers of authority and even about counter-revolution in this debate. I must say it is to wonder whether this is the same Meech Lake Accord that John Turner says that he is on the right side of history in supporting and Senator Royce Frith says that he finds nothing in it that he likes. I wonder, in listening to those two former senior public servants, Senator Pitfield and Senator Kirby, now become prophets of doom, whether the Meech Lake Accord in which they see the impending disintegration of our country is the same Meech Lake Accord that Gordon Robertson, J. W. Pickersgill, Eric Kierans and so many others applaud.

Senator Frith: The answer is: Yes, it is the very same one. It is precisely that.

Senator Murray: What is it that inspires such holy terror on the part of some honourable senators? Well, it is the "distinct society-linguistic duality" interpretation clause in our Constitution. Yesterday our colleague, Senator Flynn, dealt very concisely in one or two sentences with the role of an interpretative clause in our Constitution. Where there is a substantive provision in the Constitution that is ambiguous, that is not clear enough, then the interpretative clause can be brought into play to shed some light on that ambiguity or that lack of clarity. Yet, honourable senators are terrified of it. They say they do not know what "distinct society" means, and yet they voted for it—they voted for its inclusion in the Constitution at the Liberal conference of 1986.

Some of them say, as Senator Marsden said, "Oh, yes, we agree that Quebec is distinctive," and "Oh, yes, we agree that Quebec's distinctiveness must be protected," but they do not want to put it into the Constitution or, if they do want to put it in the Constitution, they insist that it be absolutely meaningless, void of all meaning or significance.

An Hon. Senator: What is the government's definition of "distinct society"?

Senator Murray: I do not mean any personal offence by this, but I cannot help but remark that in some of the speeches I heard in the last day or two there runs not far beneath the surface a real paranoia about Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I really wonder on the basis of what folklore some honourable senators and their gifted sons, Senator Grafstein, have formed their impressions of Quebec society.

Hugh MacLennan's phrase, "Two Solitudes," kept coming back to me as I heard some of the speeches that were delivered in the course of this debate and the underlying fear of Quebec and Quebec society.

An Hon. Senator: Come on!

[Translation]

Honourable senators, my friends opposite are suggesting an amendment that would exempt the Charter of Rights and Freedoms from the Agreement. What they want, in fact, is to have the Charter interpreted in accordance with our multicultural heritage and native rights under sections 25 and 27 of the Charter but not in accordance with the reality that Quebec constitutes a distinct society within Canada. I do not think that the Charter would thus reflect the true character of Canada.

The new provision on the distinct society would only be a symbolic gesture, meaningless for Quebec. The Liberals make this proposal although the Right Honourable John Turner himself said in the other place that there was no conflict between the "distinct society" provision and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[English]

Liberal senators know that the Government of Quebec would never accept, and that this government would never propose, that the "distinct society" clause be void of meaning. The reason is clear.

An Hon. Senator: What does it mean?

Senator Murray: Legal experts tell us that in interpreting the Charter the courts already take into account different social realities, be they those of Quebec or of Cape Breton. The Quebec government—

Senator Frith: Don't bother putting it in!

Senator Murray: —can already use Quebec's distinctiveness in the context of a section 1 argument of the Charter, and the courts have taken this into account in rendering their decisions. Our legal advisers point, as a matter of example, to the Protestant School Board case in this respect.

The "distinct society" clause put in the Constitution gives Quebec the added assurance that this reality will continue in the future. In this way the accord makes explicit what has been an implicit presumption of judicial interpretation. To have exempted the Charter from the application of the "distinct society" clause would have meant a loss for Quebec vis-à-vis the status quo. Quebec would have been left with less than it had before Meech Lake.

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Murray: Is it realistic to expect that the wounds of 1982 could be healed in this fashion?

Honourable senators, we hear Senator Marsden expressing grave fears about the interpretation clause overriding fundamental rights and freedoms, and Senator Wood asserting that Meech Lake would enable Quebec to prohibit bilingual signs. Honourable senators, the power of any provincial legislature to curtail rights and freedoms set out in our Charter arises not from this accord but from the "notwithstanding" clause which the previous government agreed should be part of the Charter of Rights.

Senator Frith: Which you did not negotiate out!

Senator Murray: I heard Senator Kirby the day before yesterday, and Senator McElman last night, stating that the Liberal Party was against, and continues to be against, the "notwithstanding" clause.

What revisionist history is this? What is it doing there if they were against it? They brought it to Parliament and they got it through Parliament. The answer is that the "notwithstanding" clause is part of the enormous compromise that Mr. Trudeau had to make in order to secure patriation of the Constitution.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Senator Murray: In order to secure patriation of the Constitution, he allowed provinces the power to override the Charter.

And what about the rest of the compromise? Part of it had to do with minority language rights. I heard Senator Kirby the day before yesterday asserting that Ontario and New Brunswick had shared what he called the federal government's bilingual vision in 1981-82. How I wish it were true. New Brunswick signed on, but Ontario never signed on, and neither did any other province sign on to the entrenchment of minority language rights in our Constitution.

But, you know, Mr. Trudeau had a judgment call to make, and the question was: "If I cannot get minority language rights entrenched in that Constitution, should we put off patriation until we can get it done?"; and his answer was, "No."

When I hear Senator Kirby and Senator Molgat raising the Saskatchewan situation and blaming it on the Meech Lake Accord, well, in the context of disappointed expectations, I can accept that argument from someone like Jean-Robert Gauthier, who voted against the 1982 exercise precisely because, in his view, it abandoned the minority language groups. But coming from senators who were actively associated with the passage of the 1982 exercise it absolutely lacks credibility.

Honourable senators, the essence of the argument that is used by Senator Kirby and Senator Molgat and others is that we should have kept Quebec out until we had entrenchment of minority language rights agreed to. We should have kept Quebec out, others say, until we had aboriginal rights settled. We should have kept Quebec out now, according to their amendment, until we get the advantages of the development of the Canadian Economic Union—another hobby horse of my honourable friend, Senator Kirby—until we got that agreed to.

Honourable senators, will someone tell me—I ask the question in a rhetorical way, because I do not have time to discuss the answer—

Senator Frith: We might not take it rhetorically. Give us a chance to answer.

Senator Murray: I have until 3 o'clock. You can take the time after I have finished. Will someone tell me how the interests of minority language groups are served by the constitutional isolation of Quebec? How are the interests of our aboriginal peoples served by the isolation of Quebec? The truth of the matter is that the absence of Quebec from the table—

An Hon. Senator: Nonsense!

Senator Murray: —is inimical to the interests of minority language groups, and it is hardly less inimical to the interests of aboriginal peoples, as we found in the constitutional conferences of 1985 and 1987, when the absence of Quebec was one of the factors that led to our failure to achieve a consensus and to achieve an amendment of self-government for our aboriginal peoples.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is clear to me, from the amendments that have been proposed, that the Liberal senators do not agree that the highest priority should be attached to the repatriation of Quebec to our constitutional family before moving on to other constitutional issues. It is ironic, it seems to me, that this is the case, since some of those same honourable senators were at the source of Quebec's isolation in the first place. Their amendments today would make Quebec's return contingent upon achieving Senate reform. They have an amendment that would provide for the election of senators for a nine-year term. Where is the evidence that the 11 signatories to this accord would readily accept such fundamental changes now? Yet they would put off Quebec's reintegration into the constitutional family in order to achieve that.

Honourable senators, there has been an agreement since August 1986 that Senate reform is a second round issue, and the terms of the Meech Lake Accord fully reflect the distinction that the First Ministers have made between the Quebec round and the second round.

Then, honourable senators, we turn to the doomsday scenarios about the Meech Lake provisions on the spending power. What does the Meech Lake decision on the spending power do? As Mr. Pickersgill has pointed out, it affirms for the first time, in a constitutional sense, the power of Parliament to spend in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. What we are talking about here is the new régime for new national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

I say in passing that the example the Honourable Leader of the Opposition cited the other day—the new national anti-pollution program—does not qualify, since the environment can hardly be said to be a matter of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

[Translation]

The Trudeau government proposed in 1968 and again in 1978 and 1979 that the consent of a majority of the provinces with a majority of the population would be required before the federal government could implement a new joint program.

[English]

It was a consent mechanism that Mr. Trudeau proposed, a consent mechanism of a majority of the provinces with a majority of the population before the federal government could even launch a new shared-cost program.

Honourable senators, it was quite a bogey that Senator MacEachen raised on Monday in suggesting it would be impossible under Meech Lake for the national government ever to launch a program such as Medicare. I say it would have been a lot more difficult for the federal government to negotiate Medicare under Mr. Trudeau's consent mechanism, and probably a lot more expensive as well.

I also want to note in passing that in their years in office my friends opposite never included standards in a shared-cost program. I draw honourable senators' attention to the following passage in the joint committee's report:

There will inevitably be federal-provincial negotiations leading up to the establishment of any such program. Such negotiations are as likely in future to result in a reasonable compromise on such programs as has been the case in the past. Thus, standards, conditions or criteria could well form part of the program approved by all the governments.

Honourable senators, let us remember that, although there is a national framework for health care in Canada, there are, in fact, ten separate provincial programs that vary in a number of respects. In some provinces the provincial share of the cost is covered by the Consolidated Revenue Fund; in others there is a monthly premium paid by individuals who earn more than a basic monthly income; in some provinces ancillary services are covered. But all provinces respect the national objectives of universality, accessibility and portability. In short, the national objectives are met in Medicare notwithstanding provincial variations in methods of provincial financing, administration and ancillary services.

Medicare could have been established under the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. Parliament would still have the right to offer financial inducements. Public opinion, when the time is ripe to introduce a program, would still operate. All provinces, whether officially opted in or carrying out their own programs or initiatives, would receive financial support from Parliament if their programs or initiatives are compatible with the national objectives. But the new provision on the spending power will place a higher premium on cooperation and inter-governmental negotiations. In doing so, it will lower the risk too frequently encountered in the past of sudden, unilateral federal changes in conditions and funding that present special hardships for the smaller provinces.

I heard the day before yesterday Senator Stewart's apprehensions on the spending power and what that would do to the poorer provinces. I say to him that a lot more damage has been done to the poorer provinces by the exercise of unilateral actions by the federal government in cutting back on revenue guarantees, unilaterally imposing caps, maximums and ceilings on the federal contribution to shared-cost programs. A lot more damage has been done to the poorer provinces by that kind of provision than could ever be done by this kind of provision. In fact, I say that this new process will make it far less likely that a federal government will be able to do that sort of thing and get away with it.

Honourable senators, let me say a word about the amending formula. Senator Tremblay spoke of it last evening in some detail. The general amending formula requiring the consent of Parliament and seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population is still with us. We have added some subjects to the list of matters that will require unanimity. Senator Tremblay mentioned proportional representation last evening. I say to that: Why not, because it is one of the fundamental things about our democracy?

To Senator McElman, who worries about the effect of unanimity on smaller provinces and poorer provinces, I say that there is the Senate floor that protects the representation from the provinces in the House of Commons from falling beneath a certain minimum that is covered by the unanimity rule. I say to him: Who does the unanimity rule protect there if it is not the smaller provinces?

Senator Kirby and others have said that Senate reform will be impossible under the Meech Lake Accord. I say to him and to those others that it is my conviction that Senate reform is impossible so long as Quebec is not at the table, and I ask the question whether it is a good thing for Confederation to have a situation in which a province—or perhaps three provinces—can have their representation in the Senate reduced without their consent. Senator Kirby clearly thinks it is all right. Indeed, nothing comes through more clearly from what he said in his speech the other day and from his view of what a reformed Senate should look like than that he and others in this place would be perfectly willing to reduce the representation of Quebec, for example, in the Senate without Quebec's consent. I say to honourable senators that you do not do things that way any more.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: The creation of new provinces will change the working of the amending formula, and the change in the amending formula requires unanimity, so why not the creation of new provinces and why, as Senator Macquarrie pointed out the other day, quoting Professor Tom Courchesne:

Should the richer provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia have the veto over the creation of new provinces when the poorer provinces, which might be affected financially by this, have no veto?

Honourable senators, our colleague, Senator Pitfield, in his speech the other day paraphrased that old cliché of Lord Durham's about two nations warring in the bosom of a single state. Perhaps this is a timely moment to comment on the charges by him and by Senator Kirby that the accord somehow affirms the compact theory of Confederation. What is being affirmed through the Meech Lake Accord is not the compact theory but a vision of cooperative federalism that is deeply Canadian, but anathema to the government that Senator Pitfield and Senator Kirby served. What is being rejected is not a strong central government, for there is no change to the division of powers through Meech Lake. What is being rejected is a unilateral and confrontational approach to governing Canada—an approach that betrays the federal vision and only breeds division and distrust.

It is illuminating that this is the same accord which Mr. John Turner has said is good for Canada and good for Quebec. Mr. Turner is, indeed, on the right side of history, as he said on June 4, because he knows that far from leading to the compact theory, the accord is based on a vision of partnership and interdependence in the federation. I suspect that Mr. Turner supports the accord, because he, too, rejected the unilateral and confrontational approach espoused by Senator Kirby and his former leader—and as he, Mr. Turner, indicated in a speech in Vancouver on August 1, 1984, during the course of his election campaign, when he said:

I am going to give you a strong national government that yet respects the provincial jurisdiction and the impetus of the regions. And I want to say that if we do work together and that if we do pull together, I believe that we can realize the potential that we all thought we had.

How foreign to the vision of Canada espoused by Senator Kirby and Mr. Trudeau! This accord is concrete affirmation that this government, too, rejects the unilateralism of the 1980s—the National Energy Program, for example, and we all know what Mr. Turner said about that when he was in private practice—and that this government stands for a new sense of partnership. Nor does the Meech Lake Accord lead to “two nations,” as Mr. Turner himself said in the other place on September 29.

Honourable senators, Senator Kirby talks about two visions of Canada. However, it is not a Liberal vision and a Conservative vision that he has in mind. The two visions of Canada that he refers to are two visions of Canada warring within the bosom of a single political party, namely, the Liberal Party of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: We have the Right Honourable John Turner and his colleagues in the House of Commons sharing one vision of Canada and we have the gang of 81 reunited here in the Senate of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the amendments proposed by the Opposition would require the governments to reopen practically all the sections of an agreement that has unanimous support.

[English]

I suggest that those who propose such amendments are not seeking to improve the accord, as they claim. The amendments being proposed are killer amendments. They have one purpose in mind—they are designed to kill the accord. And for some Liberal senators, even those killer amendments are “far from being adequate”—as our colleague Senator Kirby told the press the other day.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the government is not prepared to jeopardize the opportunities for national reconciliation and constitutional progress that the Agreement represents by reopening the negotiations. The government shares the conviction of Mr. Gordon Robertson, former Secretary of the Cabinet, Senator Kirby's and Senator Pitfield's distinguished predecessors, who stated before the joint committee:

... it seems quite unlikely ... that a better agreement than the present one could be negotiated.

[English]

Finally, honourable senators, I leave you with a word from the premier of the smallest province in our country, Premier Joe Ghiz of Prince Edward Island, who played a key and very honourable role in the Meech Lake process. Speaking the other day to the Institute of Island Studies at the University of Prince Edward Island, he said:

I should say that I envy somewhat those people—perhaps including some on the panel before me—who can address the Accord on the basis of what it might have been or how it can be improved in some theoretical fashion. I envy them because I enjoy the challenge and freedom of debate. As a First Minister living in these times I am, however, somewhat constrained by reality. The real-life challenge before me and other First Ministers is to heal the wrongs of the past and restore a sense of belonging and partnership to the people of Quebec who felt betrayed by the way the 1982 Act came into being. I am constrained by the fact the Accord is the product of an extraordinarily complicated series of negotiations, is the result of goodwill and generosity of spirit, and is the beneficiary of a certain amount of good fortune in that a complex puzzle of elements came together with success. Having gone through the experience, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained by the knowledge that if the Accord is reopened to deal with a threat which the weight of evidence says does not exist or is very remote, then the country will be exposed to almost certain political and social harm. This harm will come from denying Canada future constitutional evolution and from the alienation that will grow in Quebec.

Those were the words of Premier Ghiz of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Frith: Pretty apocalyptic stuff, that!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is no pragmatic reason to reopen the accord, if it is not to be scuttled, since many of the changes sought will be easier to achieve in future than in the present context. I submit that there is no morally justifiable reason to do so either. Quebec was the only party left isolated in 1982, unlike a number of those now seeking changes.

Senator Buckwold: Down with provincial vetos!

Senator Murray: I now invite all honourable senators to unite in ending that isolation and unblocking the process of constitutional reform by ratifying this accord unamended.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1450)

Senator Frith: Oh, come on—take a bow, for goodness' sake.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as it is now 3 o'clock, pursuant to the Order of this house we shall proceed to the vote on the motion in amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacEac-

[The Hon. the Speaker:]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Fairbairn, who is unavoidably absent for medical reasons, has asked me to report that had she been present she would have voted in favour of the motion in amendment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I move—

Senator Frith: What, in the middle of a vote?

Senator Flynn: I move, seconded by Senator Roblin:

That the motion as amended be further amended by adding after the last line the following paragraph:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the above schedule and to which it desires their concurrence; the Senate adds however that if the House should not concur the Senate does not oppose the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the resolution which the House has adopted on the 26 of October, 1987, if the House hereafter again adopts the said same resolution.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Could you read the French version, please?

Senator Flynn: Here is the French version:

Que la motion telle qu'amendée soit de nouveau amendée en ajoutant après la dernière ligne le paragraphe suivant:

Qu'un message soit transmis à la Chambre des communes pour l'informer que le Sénat a autorisé la proclamation d'une modification de la Constitution dans les termes de l'annexe ci-dessus et à laquelle il désire son agrément.

Le Sénat ajoute toutefois que si la Chambre décidait de ne pas indiquer cet agrément, le Sénat ne s'oppose pas à la proclamation d'une modification à la Constitution dans les termes de la résolution que la Chambre a adoptée le 26 octobre 1987, si cette dernière préfère adopter de nouveau ladite même résolution.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order, this motion is clearly out of order. Apart from its other weaknesses and apparent weaknesses, which would be there even if it were made at an appropriate time, if such exists, it is clearly an inappropriate time now, because we are operating under a house Order that says:

That no later than three o'clock p.m. on Thursday next, 21st April, 1988, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the main motion and any amendments thereto.

At three o'clock p.m. today there was only one amendment, and we voted on that amendment. I suggest that Your Honour put the motion that he announced he was going to put, in accordance with the house Order. This motion is clearly out of order. I expect it would be out of order even later for other reasons, but it clearly is out of order now.

Senator Flynn: The house Order speaks only of deliberation.

Senator Frith: No, it does not. It does not say anything about that.

Senator Flynn: Yes, it does. The Speaker has to "put all questions necessary." The motion does not say "questions put before the Senate at that time."

Senator Frith: It says, "questions necessary to dispose of the main motion and any amendments thereto."

Senator Flynn: In any event, your objection is very easily understood. You are afraid and you lack courage.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this has nothing whatever to do with courage; it is a point of order. I do not know how courage comes into it. I suppose Senator Flynn thinks he is very courageous. Let me say simply that the question of courage is also out of order and has nothing to do with the fact that this is a disorderly motion.

Senator Corbin: Put the question on the motion, as amended!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in Debates of the Senate of April 19, 1988, Senator Phillips' motion said, in part:

That any recorded division demanded on any amendment proposed to the said motion be deferred until the conclusion of the debate on the said motion; and

That no later than three o'clock p.m. on Thursday next, 21st April, 1988, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings—

I am in a bit of a quandary here. At 3 p.m. today we were debating Senator McEachen's amendments, and I think that prohibited Senator Flynn from introducing a motion. On the other hand, it was agreed that we would vote on the main motion.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, you must proceed with the house's Order that has asked you to do what you are doing.

Senator Flynn: Your Honour, I suggest that when in doubt you have to allow the motion to be put, unless the Senate decides that they want to impose closure.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I should remind you that the motion that established the house Order was a motion by the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: That does not change the meaning.

Senator Frith: No, it does not change anything for you.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, on a point of order, Senator Flynn could have moved his amendment previously. There was only one amendment before the Senate. There was a possibility of a second, sub-amendment, had he wanted to move it. Therefore, it is incorrect to say that he did not have an opportunity to move it. He could have added it on to the proposed amendment in exactly the same way.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, honourable senators, we will have to vote on the main motion.

Some Hon. Senators: As amended!

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as amended?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion, as amended, please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion, as amended, please say "nay"?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Can we have copies of the motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: This is a motion by Senator Flynn, seconded by Senator Roblin, that a Message be sent to the House of Commons adding after the last line the following paragraph:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the above schedule and to which it desires their concurrence; the Senate adds however that if the House should not concur the Senate does not oppose the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the resolution which the House has adopted on the 26 of October, 1987, if the House hereafter again adopts the said same resolution.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, before you put the motion, which has not yet been put, I wish to raise a point of order with respect to the acceptability of the motion. In order to really advance the point of order, I think we need some clarification from the mover and the seconder.

As I read the proposed motion, Senator Flynn, seconded by Senator Roblin, is moving, if it is put:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the above schedule . . .

Here I take it for granted that "the above schedule" is the amended resolution—

Senator Flynn: Obviously!

Senator MacEachen:—which contains the amendments which have been proposed and carried on this side of the house and opposed by the government, and amendments which the Leader of the Government called “killer amendments,” on which there is now a motion asking that a Message be sent to the House of Commons asking the House of Commons to concur in the “killer amendments.”

Senator Frith: That is what it says.

Senator Flynn: That is what it says.

Senator Frith: That is what Senator Flynn wants to do!

Senator MacEachen: Am I understanding it correctly?

Senator Flynn: The Senate itself, yes. But it was not adopted on division.

Senator MacEachen: But the Senate is now asking the House of Commons to accept the amendments.

Senator Frith: He is asking the Senate to do that; that is right.

Senator Flynn: That is the effect of the decision of the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: But it is not the effect that we are asking for now. There is a new motion in which Senator Flynn, seconded by Senator Roblin, is now requesting, having voted against these amendments, that they should be sent to the House of Commons with the request from the Senate that the House of Commons concur in the “killer amendments.”

Senator Flynn: You don’t want that?

Senator MacEachen: That is what is said.

Senator Frith: That is what it says.

Senator MacEachen: I would like to know if Senator Murray would support that motion to ask the House of Commons to concur in that.

Senator Frith: Yes; the “killer amendments”! Let’s hear it!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Yes, you now want the House of Commons to concur in them.

Senator MacEachen: Not only that, but you voted against them at first, whereas now you would be voting for them. That is the first—

Senator Flynn: Are you on a point of order?

Senator Frith: Yes, he is on that point of order.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I am on a point of order.

Senator Flynn: If you are on a point of order, don’t discuss the motion itself. Don’t discuss the substance.

Senator Frith: What do you mean? What should he discuss? The price of tea in China? He is discussing whether the motion is in order or not. Why is he not allowed to discuss the motion?

Senator Flynn: A point of order is not as to the meaning of the motion; we can discuss that!

Senator Frith: A lot of bizarre stuff today!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have been asking for clarification of the first portion of the motion, and it is now clear that Senator Flynn is asking the Senate to adopt a motion which would request the House of Commons to concur in the schedule, namely, the amended motion, which includes the so-called “killer amendments.”

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator MacEachen: That’s the first clarification, and he says “yes” to that.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray says “yes” to that?

Senator Murray: The Message is going anyway.

Senator Frith: Yes? Good! But you are asking for concurrence in it.

Senator Murray: He is noting what you did.

Senator Frith: Do we have something of the road to Damascus—a change of heart?

● (1540)

Senator MacEachen: I do not say that Senator Flynn’s motion said, “to take note of the amendments,” but now the Senate, presumably supported by the government members—

Senator Frith: And the government leader.

Senator MacEachen:—and the Leader of the Government, is asking the House of Commons to accept amendments which they themselves refused to accept, because the wording is:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the above schedule —namely, the amended resolution—and to which it

—namely, the Senate—

desires their concurrence;

So, suddenly we have it clarified that the government, including the Leader of the Government, even though he would refuse to vote for the “killer amendments,” would send them to the House of Commons and ask the House of Commons to support them. That’s the motion.

Senator Frith: It’s the government representative in the Senate, the minister in charge, who wants to do that.

Senator MacEachen: I go now to the next part, which says: the Senate adds

—we are asked to add—however that if the House of Commons should not concur—

Well, I ask the question: Will the House of Commons have an opportunity to concur? In other words, will the government undertake to put a motion before the House of Commons asking the House of Commons to concur in the “killer amendments”? I want to find out—

Senator Frith: This question is not rhetorical, as yours were.

Senator MacEachen:—whether the government will undertake, “if the House of Commons should not concur—”

Senator Flynn: This is my motion. The Leader of the Opposition is arguing on the meaning of the motion. He is arguing, in a way, against the motion rather than on the point of order. You may make jokes. Your people are bound to laugh. They are obliged to find you funny, but you are not as funny as you think, or as you sound.

Senator Frith: And you are a lot funnier than you think you are.

Senator MacEachen: There may be an element of amusement arising from the content of Senator Flynn's motion, seconded by Senator Roblin, but there is a very important procedural point here which is related to my point of order: namely, is it proper to put any motion to which there is attached the condition, the hypothetical, “if the House of Commons should not concur”? Only the government would be able to put a motion seeking concurrence. So I am saying that there is a hypothetical condition, namely, that a motion would go before the House of Commons, put by the government, asking the House to concur in these amendments—which, if put, would indicate that the government now has accepted the amendments which we have moved in the Senate; otherwise, there is no meaning.

The Senate adds, “if the House of Commons should not concur.” Well, to achieve that it must have a motion asking it to concur, which can only be moved by the government. Will that condition be fulfilled?

Senator Flynn: You are making a joke of this, but it is not a joke.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, this is very serious. Yesterday I described this proposed motion as a “parliamentary monstrosity.” It is now a political monstrosity, because, if the government puts a motion to concur, it goes on to say, “and if that motion is defeated . . .”. In other words, we are asked to believe that the government will put a motion to concur, and that the House of Commons will then disregard the wishes of the government and vote against it. The government will then put its original resolution, and if those two conditions are fulfilled, then we will say, “Well, we accept some other resolution.”

So I find the conditions impossible—conditions and qualifications about which we are in ignorance and about which we cannot formulate any judgment.

Senator Frith: And it's out of order.

Senator MacEachen: For that reason I think it should be removed quickly from further public scrutiny and put in the desk—and then put the lights out!

Senator Frith: Or perhaps in the dustbin.

Senator MacEachen: The “killer amendments.” Let's go for them, boys, and the Prime Minister will move their concurrence.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Frith: We are awaiting your reply.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Opposition does not deserve a reply, except something that would be unparliamentary.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there is a motion on the floor.

Senator Frith: But we are saying it is out of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Well, I have not been asked for a ruling.

Senator Frith: We are asking for a ruling on whether it is out of order.

Senator MacEachen: I am sorry, Your Honour. I raised a point of order. I have argued that this motion is out of order, and I ask for a ruling on the grounds that it is replete with conditions, which is unacceptable in a motion of this kind, asking the Senate to deal with unknowns—conditions which we know will not be fulfilled.

The Hon. the Speaker: Of course, we do not know that. With regard to the motion being out of order, on August 13, in connection with Bill C-22, a vote was taken and a motion was moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House of the recommended amendments, observations, and recommendations on general patent law amendments as contained in the Seventh Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22—

That was after the vote had been taken on:

An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, as amended.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

I find some similarity—

An Hon. Senator: Conditional motions are always out of order.

• (1550)

Senator Frith: What were the conditions? There were no conditions. There were no “ifs”, “ans” or “buts.” Are you ruling that this one is in order on that basis? Are you ruling on the basis of that precedent—which, it seems to me, is not applicable; there are no conditions at all—that therefore this is in order?

Senator Guay: As an ex-Minister of Justice, Senator Flynn will tell you all about it!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if you will allow me about ten minutes, I will take it under advisement.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: If honourable senators agree, while I deliberate, I would ask Senator Asselin to take the Chair and continue with Orders of the Day.

Senator MacEachen: We would prefer to have a short recess.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1610)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when deciding whether or not a motion is in order, the Chair must rule according to the rules and practices of the Senate.

It appears to me that with respect to this motion, most of the arguments are centred around the logic of the motion. It is not for the Chair to decide whether or not a motion is logical. For example, if a motion were proposed saying, "If it rains tomorrow, the Senate will adjourn at three o'clock," the Chair would be bound to put such a motion and the senators would decide on the merits of the motion.

With respect to the procedural problem of attaching a condition to a motion, in this instance the House of Commons is not bound to deal at all with the Senate's resolution. It appears to me that Senator Flynn is suggesting that if the House deals with the resolution certain events will follow which the Senate has agreed with. If that is the desire of the Senate, I feel the Chair cannot stand in its way.

The Chair, however, has other procedural concerns about this motion. Rule 46(s) states that no notice is required for "other motions of a merely formal or uncontentious character." It appears that this motion cannot be characterized as "merely formal or uncontentious." It therefore requires some advance notice. This shortcoming disturbs the Chair. It is for this reason that I must rule the motion of Senator Flynn not in order.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, after the last two rather lengthy days, I believe that the Senate would be in a mood to stand all remaining orders, all inquiries and all motions. Therefore, I move that that be the case.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 26, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 26, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 26, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a Message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-118, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, April 28, 1988.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MESSAGE TO COMMONS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 28, 1988, I will move:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the following schedule, to which it desires their concurrence:—

The schedule is the motion in amendment that we adopted last week. If senators wish, I can read it.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Dispense!

(For text of Message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Murray is absent today. He is in Atlantic Canada on government business. He will be in the chamber tomorrow. If there are any questions that honourable senators feel cannot wait until tomorrow, I will take them as notice and obtain the answers.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS AND POSSIBLE MEDIATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not give notice of any questions, but I wonder whether Senator Murray informed his colleague as to the status of the fisheries-boundaries agreement about which I asked him last week and about which he took notice. If the information is available, I would be pleased to have it from Senator Phillips. If not, I can easily wait until tomorrow.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I believe I shall be able to provide the honourable senator with an answer tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR 1988-89 CROP YEAR—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to register a complaint with respect to the way questions are answered in this chamber. For several days now I have been asking the Leader of the Government if the initial prices for the 1988-89 crop year could be announced so that the producers in western Canada would have that information now, near the end of April, and could govern their plans accordingly. That announcement is usually made in March. As late as last Thursday—perhaps last Wednesday—the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave me confirmation that the price for the current crop year had been changed, and had risen by $10 per tonne in the case of one category and $15 per tonne in the case of another category. I specifically asked the Leader of the Government if he could tell us about the ensuing crop year, 1988-89. He gave an undertaking to get that information for me.

My complaint is this: The next day an announcement emanating from the offices of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board was made in Winnipeg. That leads me to the conclusion that the government and the minister, if he had been in touch with the other ministers, knew the answer to that question last Thursday. However, he refused to give the answer in this chamber. I think that is treating this chamber and the legitimate questions that are put to the government with something less than the respect they deserve. Therefore, I would like the Leader of the Government or the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government to take this grievance to the right parties. I would also like a full and complete answer to my question. The newspaper article said that the increase was going to be $10 to $20 per tonne in some cases. We did not get a specific answer from the Leader of the Government with the kind of detail that producers and, if I may say so, senators deserve.

Now that you know the background to the grievance, I am sure the honourable acting deputy leader will want to take some action to ensure that this does not happen again.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, as a relative newcomer to this chamber, I have heard similar questions over a number of years concerning the Wheat Board. I have also heard similar complaints. However, I shall direct this complaint to the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he returns.

Senator Olson: And perhaps his colleagues also?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

(Later:)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ensure that the acting deputy leader understood part of the question. Did he give an undertaking that he would communicate with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board so we can obtain further details respecting the announcement of the initial prices for 1988-89? I think he gave an undertaking that he will convey it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I would like to have the answer before we adjourn on Thursday, April 28. Therefore, I would like him to give an undertaking that he will contact the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in order to obtain the details of that announcement.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I shall be happy to contact the minister of state responsible for the Wheat Board.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONTROL OF EDUCATION—IMPACT OF MASTER TUITION AGREEMENT

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a question that I would like Senator Phillips to bring to the attention of Senator Murray when he returns tomorrow.

I have had a rather urgent communication from an organization supporting all Indian bands in British Columbia. This communication relates to the master tuition agreement on education between the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia. There have been continuing negotiations relating to the bands' attempt to get out of that agreement and the government turning over the responsibility of funding education to the bands.

Recently, I understand that the Government of Canada, through the Minister of Indian Affairs, signed a new five-year agreement with the Province of British Columbia. The bands are very angry about this. Self-government is very much in the minds of all our people nationally, and control of Indian education is certainly a current topic. It is one of the areas in which they can and should have control.

This master tuition agreement, as it now stands, sets the whole process back a great deal. I want to inform Senator Phillips that I would like to raise this rather urgent matter with Senator Murray tomorrow.

• (1410)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I thank the Honourable Senator Marchand for his notice, and I shall see that Senator Murray is advised of this.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

EXCLUSION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA FROM ADJUSTMENT COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that the honourable senator will take as notice a question that I would like to have answered by the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he deigns to return to the chamber to listen to questions from the opposition.

The first effects of this free trade deal between the United States and Canada—at least, the proposed free trade deal, “free trade” being a misnomer—has been a statement by certain banks in the province of British Columbia that they will not loan money to our grape growers, because this arrangement will ruin the grape and wine industry in the province of British Columbia.

The same thing is happening to the grape producers on the Niagara escarpment. All the government has offered in response to the pleas for assistance from the grape growers are excuses and vague statements that the government will look after things.

I want to ask the honourable senator why it is that the third largest province in Canada, the Province of British Columbia, has been totally excluded from the adjustment committee that is being put in place to assist those who will be dislocated by this Mulroney-Reagan deal. We were promised representation on that adjustment committee, and, cynically, the Prime Minister of Canada has left British Columbia off. It is not good enough. The waffling statements being made today by the government to the grape and wine producers of Canada are not good enough. We want some answers. He has 24 hours to get some facts together.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Would the honourable senator like to repeat the question?

Senator Perrault: I knew the senator was out of touch, but now he has lost his hearing!

ANIMAL PEDIGREE BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bielish, seconded by the Honourable Senator

Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill C-67, An Act respecting animal pedigree associations.—(Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C.)

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not plan to take up much time on this bill. It is not a controversial bill and we do not want to hold it up unduly. These amendments have been a long time in coming and are generally welcomed by the industry. But there are a couple of points in the bill that we would like to deal with. We would like to have it referred to committee where we could call officials—and perhaps some other witnesses if need be, but mainly we would like to start by hearing officials from the department.

I shall relate a few of the concerns to you. There was concern about the ability of one breed association, for instance, to register or identify the animals of any other breed or breeds. A conflict of interest could develop, for instance, where the competitive breed would be dependent on another breed for their registration procedures.

There was also some concern raised about the meaning of the word "register" in connection with the use of the word "purebred." For instance, the word "register" could cover animals which have as little as 50 per cent of the blood of the breed to which they are registered.

Honourable senators, these are just a few of the items that come to mind. I am sure if this bill were referred to committee, and if we had the officials before us, we could clear up the matter very quickly and proceed to third reading of the bill in quite short order.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Bielish speaks now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Bielish, do you wish to speak now?

Senator Bielish: No.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bielish, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-102, An Act to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act.—(Honourable Senator Adams.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Adams intends to speak to this order today. I understood he was on his way into the chamber, but he has been detained in his office. Perhaps we could proceed with other orders and then revert to this order when he arrives in the Senate.

(Later:)

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 4:

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I apologize if I have delayed the debate on Bill C-102, to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act. I would like to congratulate Senator Macquarrie on his speech on this matter a couple of weeks ago. I read that speech with great interest, since it is always good to hear people say nice things about the territories.

● (1420)

I am concerned about some of the organizations that are coming into the north and am glad, therefore, to see this Bill C-102 being introduced. The Inuvialuit claim was settled some time ago, around 1984, giving the Inuvialuit the right to claim the ownership of land which consists of so many thousand kilometres in an area between the Beaufort Sea and the Mackenzie Delta. Since the claim was approved by the government and the Inuvialuit we have not heard very much about its effect on the community. I have not heard of another claim that would be better for the people. Or, for that matter, for the lawyers. They usually get their money before the community gets any. I refer here to lawyers who draw up the regulations that will guide the government and the organizations. I have heard Senator Watt make similar comments. For some time he was involved in the negotiations surrounding the James Bay Agreement. I believe that newspaper reports indicated a couple of years ago that something like $300,000 was spent on the legal fees for that agreement. I do not know how much it has cost the Inuvialuit so far, but I hope that they do not end up with the same expense.

There is one other thing I would like to tell honourable senators. I have spoken to some of the people in the community and I think they will feel much better when they have more control over activities in the Beaufort Sea, the Mackenzie Delta and the rest of their territory. They are particularly interested in being more involved in the negotiations between Ottawa and the oil companies interested in exploring on their property. In the past couple of years oil and gas prices have gone down, and this has affected exploration in the north. The Inuvialuit have hired experts who are familiar with dealing with oil companies to represent their interests with regard to their property.

I began my speech on Bill C-102 by indicating that I did not know how much money had been spent toward the settlement of this land claim. Not too long ago I heard and read in the newspapers about a request that some of the leases involved in the agreement, and particularly some of our organizations that are part of the agreement, be audited to determine how much was spent prior to the agreement with Ottawa. The people in the community want to know what the agreement means in this regard. We receive so many millions of dollars from Ottawa to create jobs in the communities, particularly in small businesses. I would like to know some time in the near future whether there will be an audit of these organizations to determine how the money was spent.

It is hoped by those living in the community that this agreement will result in job creation and more money being available to those who earn their living off the land. Often, as a result of agreements such as this, many high-paid jobs are created for, say, directors of the organization. However, it is hoped that in this instance the money will go directly to those people living in the community.

I believe that those who run the organization for Inuvialuit are familiar with how that operation should be run. As a matter of fact, only a couple of years ago, when oil and gas exploration slowed down in the north, it was decided that the Nunasi Corporation should buy some of the shares of NTCL.

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources is keeping a keen eye on the future of oil and gas exploration, especially as it relates to northern parts of Canada. As you know, in 1980 there was a boom in the territories, but, by contrast, in the last three or four years practically nothing has happened.

It seems that much of the focus has been on the Mackenzie Delta, with lesser emphasis on what has been happening to the Inuvialuit community.

The people of the north will be quite prepared to go along with any Inuvialuit organization so long as it has the best interest of the Inuvialuit community at heart.

It is my understanding, honourable senators, that this bill may be referred to committee. It is my understanding from telephone conversations with the president of COPE that he sees no problems with the bill and that it should be passed immediately. However, I think the bill should be referred to committee for further study.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Macquarrie speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I always feel momentarily so important when His Honour the Speaker issues that warning, which conveys the impression that my few words would be so effective and almost catastrophic.

I would just like to say how much I appreciate what Senator Adams has said. I have always had a high regard for him; but that regard and high opinion were enhanced when I had the opportunity to visit his jurisdiction with the Meech Lake Task Force and saw at first hand how highly he was regarded, how faithfully he served his people, and how he responded to, and discharged, that high repute with such modesty and restraint.

He is far too young for me to say that he is a sort of father to his people, but perhaps he is a slightly older brother to most of them. I appreciated the way in which he moved among his people and the way he hosted us who came from other parts of the country.

I appreciate what he has said, and it is my intention, after we conclude this phase of second reading, to move that the measure be referred for study by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, where people from the department may be heard and where we can hear the views of honourable senators such as Senators Adams, Marchand, Lucier, Watt, Fairbairn and others who are very well informed on these matters.

I do not claim to be an expert, having visited the Northwest Territories twice, but I do claim to have great interest in this legislation. I know that the minister is interested in it and that he would like to have a full discussion and wider participation by the people in the north whose future is so very important to all of us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord (Parliamentary Document no. 332-571A).—(Honourable Senator Tremblay.)

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, given last week's debate on the constitutional resolution and since we have heard many witnesses in this chamber after the tabling of the report of the Joint Committee on the Meech Lake Accord, I wonder if it is necessary to resume the debate on that report. If honourable senators agree, I suggest that we consider that item, which would have been timely a few months ago and given everything that has happened since then, to have been indirectly debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree that during last week's debate on the Meech Lake Accord reference was made several times to the report of the joint committee which is on the Orders of the Day. Therefore, we can decide to have it withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the Senate. The order having been debated, we agree to have it withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, do you agree that this item on the Orders of the Day be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

FIFTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING HELD IN BANFF, ALBERTA

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Friday, October 9, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association held in Banff, Alberta, from 21st to 25th September, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, I am torn between two realities. All my political life I thought it was very foolish and even hazardous for any member to involve himself twice in the day's occupations. Despite the fact I spoke for only a few minutes in reference to Bill C-102, here I am again, but the—

Senator Frith: By popular demand! A return engagement. Look at it that way.

Senator Macquarrie: It is almost that. I was going to say that I have been getting the odd little dig about how ancient some of my inquiries are. If that is popularity, I suppose I shall have to live with it. I have been told that it has been quite a while since I set down this inquiry about the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association meeting which was held in Banff last fall.

Most of us in Parliament know that it is much easier to find oneself selected to attend a parliamentary meeting held in Canada than in the shadow of the Mauna Loa, the Great Wall of China, or some other faraway place with a strange sounding name. In any case, I knew what I was doing when I put my name down for the Canada-Europe meeting in Banff, one of the most glorious parts of our country. Anyone who goes there could not fail to exult in the beauty of the mountains, the streams, the flora and the fauna. We held our closing meeting at the Banff Springs Hotel, one of the great hostels of the world, which was celebrating its 100th anniversary. That great entrepreneur, Sir William Van Horne—for whom I have the greatest regard, because he opened both his heart and his purse strings to Sir Robert Borden when he was running for election in 1911—said, "If we can't export the scenery, we'll import the tourists." That is why the Banff Springs Hotel was built and it has enjoyed an excellent reputation for 100 years—quite a long time for Canada.

Sometimes, honourable senators, these events work out well; sometimes they are fair, sometimes they are poor, and sometimes they are great. But as I recall that evening, everything worked very well indeed. The scenery outside the window of the salon was totally inspiring, and the conduct of the meeting under Mr. Ellis was perfect in every way. The service and the cuisine left nothing to be desired—there was nothing the Europeans or any others could teach those people in that regard. Every little incident seemed to add something to that which went before and caused all of us to think that it was good for us to be there. Mr. Hovdebo noticed in the main lobby a poster saying, "We are better together"—which I believe is from an advertisement of a Canadian airline—and made a comment about how fitting it was for Canadians and Europeans.

The exchange of views between the Europeans and the Canadians was most useful. Sometimes, however, I thought it became a little distorted. Because I come from Prince Edward Island I know how important the fisheries are. I noted, however, that we discussed fisheries for 129 minutes, which left only 29 minutes remaining for such things as human rights, development policies, and third world debt. I thought that perhaps we got carried away downstream, if I might use that expression. And sometimes things are almost there but not quite realized. Mr. Hovdebo, I am sure, was quite prepared to talk about his party's view on NATO. While not being a paid adviser to the New Democratic Party, I will still have served it, in a way, by my advice. I think that with respect to NATO some political people make a great mistake. They do not realize that Canadians who are committed to NATO—and even Mr. Trudeau found out how much they are so committed—are not in that position because they worship Capitol Hill in Washington. Many are committed to NATO because they realize it is enormously important for Canadians to conduct a dialogue with Europeans in a friendly and meaningful way. In fact, in that regard, I said at this meeting that I have often thought, when I have seen American statesmen going over to Europe to brief Europeans on important world problems, that they usually took their microphones with them and left their earphones in Washington. It is far wiser to listen to the Europeans on many matters about which they have learned through painful experience. That is why I think that, while we in Canada do not articulate too much about foreign policy—and we know, as Robert Thompson said 20 years ago that the Americans are our best friends whether we like it or not—on the other hand, I think we consciously value our close association as equals with the Europeans.

It is often said that these delegations are not worth very much, that they are only junkets. However, the long discussion on fisheries was a useful one. Mr. Henderson, MP, from Prince Edward Island was extremely well informed on the subject. Afterwards some Europeans indicated that they were re-thinking their position on the seal question. They said that perhaps they had made a mistake, that perhaps their allies were more important than their actresses—that is my expression, not theirs. However, we were at a parliamentary gathering where there was no press. "So what can I do about my recantation?" said the German delegate. And there was something in what he said, honourable senators.

Senator Rossiter was with us, as was Senator Rousseau, who made a most excellent presentation on some important and timely problems. I was pleased that at the closing banquet our colleague, Senator Olson, told an excellent story, which I hope he passes on to senators either today or at some other time, because it provides a great illustration of his knowledge of some of the basic problems encountered in agriculture.

Honourable senators, I have now discharged my duty in proceeding with this inquiry, and if not moving it off the Order Paper, at least altering it in terms of sponsorship. I must say that I was very proud to represent the Senate in this beautiful part of Canada at a meeting with delegates from countries whose importance to us cannot be overestimated.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to join with Senator Macquarrie in making reference to some discussions that took place at this meeting of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association in Banff a few months ago. I thank Senator Macquarrie for all of his kind words about those of his colleagues, including me, who attended that meeting. I also want to say that his contribution to discussions that took place, particularly with respect to the fisheries problem, was extremely useful in generating a better understanding on both sides of the Atlantic about the ramifications of the sort of action that has been taken by the European Parliament with respect to seals and, from there, to fisheries, and, I suppose, to all animals hunted, trapped and so on. We had an extremely useful exchange.

I also want to agree with him when he said that perhaps many of us do not fully appreciate the value of these meetings at which parliamentarians really get down to the business of telling it like it is to each other. In other words, these discussions are not filtered down through diplomatic channels, through the media or whatever. I did not keep track of the time spent discussing agricultural problems or the consequences to Canada, for example, of the subsidy war going on between the European Economic Community and the United States, and the depressing effect all of that has on international cereal and grain prices. I believe Senator Macquarrie said that they took 129 minutes to deal with the fisheries matter and something less than 30 minutes to deal with a whole list of other extremely important subjects. I guess I have to take some comfort from the fact that you cannot solve all the problems of the world at one meeting. I do not know the precise number of minutes spent on agriculture, but enough time was spent to have a very clear exchange of views. The Canadians stated their position very clearly on the extent of the damage being done because of the fight or the war or the contest, whatever you want to call it, between the United States and the European Economic Community.

● (1450)

I think it was useful in another respect, and that is that it helped me to understand that there was another point of view than the one we picked up at a number of the meetings we had in Geneva, Brussels and Paris only a few weeks before. That group was also a parliamentary group made up of members of all parties who went to the OECD in Paris, to GATT in Geneva, and to the administrative offices of the EEC in Brussels. We were mostly talking to the administrators. When we were in Banff we were talking to the politicians, the ones who are directly involved with and get reaction from the people who are affected. In Senator Macquarrie's case, that would be fisheries; in my case, of course, it would be agriculture.

After talking to the politicians in Banff, I have a great deal more hope now than I did after talking to the administrators in Geneva and Brussels that they are going to find a solution. I remember being in Geneva, for example, and the representative for the European Economic Community at the GATT was a West German. One day he said to me, "Senator Olson, if you are putting your hopes on the fact that the industrial sector of West Germany is getting tired of paying the subsidies to agriculture and that it will only come to an end when they refuse to make further payments of $30 billion a year, don't hold your breath, because you will wait a long, long time." That is the political reality in Europe, and in Germany in particular, from some of the grain-growing areas where there are relatively small farmers who depend on the political action and the subsidies they are receiving to keep them going. By the way, they get three or four times as much per hundredweight of grain than Canadian farmers get.

To get back to what the representative for the European Economic Community was telling me, he said, "Don't hold your breath, because the political importance of Bavaria and a couple of other small provinces to the government in West Germany is so great that they will be paying it and paying it and not complaining about it either." So there is this business of the United States and Europe trying to test who has the deeper pockets. For each of those countries to pay subsidies of $30 billion per year you would think it would not take them long to get weary. But the representative of the EEC said not to expect that weariness to emanate from the German industrial establishment, which is paying the larger portion of the taxes to maintain these subsidies. That discouraged me.

In case senators do not know who was in attendance at Banff, the Canadian guests were the members of the European Parliament. While they do not have a great deal of administrative responsibility at the moment, they explained to us that they are moving gradually, but steadily, into the area of more and more administrative responsibilities for the economic, financial and other activities in Europe. After I had been talking to those people, I felt a lot better, and I felt that there was a disposition by the politicians to resolve this matter, because they were aware of the distress it was causing not only in Canada but in the United States and other parts of the world.

I only wanted to add a few words to what Senator Macquarrie had to say about this meeting.

Senator Macquarrie: Don't forget your story, senator.

Senator Olson: I told a story at the banquet, and I appreciated the response I got. The story deals with surpluses in the agriculture area. It is called "the champagne story," but I will not tell it here. It is better told at a banquet, but it was so appropriate.

Senator Frith: Try us!

Senator Olson: Well, if you want to hear it, I will tell it. I should explain, honourable senators, that during the discussion on agriculture there was one common theme, and that was that there were surpluses everywhere—surpluses of beef in Ireland; surpluses of grain in France, Canada and the United States; mountains of butter in parts of Europe and other places.

The story comes from a situation back in 1969 and 1970 when I was Minister of Agriculture. There was a desperate situation in Canada because of surpluses of wheat and other things at that time. In a situation such as that, you need a little comic relief.

The story goes like this: There was a couple who had been married for ten years. When the husband looked back on those ten years he decided that his wife had been very helpful to him. So, he was going to buy her something she had always really wanted. He tried to remember her fantasies.

I see my wife is in the gallery!

The husband tried to remember her fantasies, and he remembered that she had fantasized about having a bath in champagne. He decided that that was what he would do. He bought four cases—that is, 48 bottles—of champagne, warmed it and put it in the bathtub. His wife got in the bathtub and had a bath. When she was finished, he looked at all this champagne and, of course, he had to make a decision: whether or not to pull the plug. He looked at it and it looked the same; he smelled it and it smelled all right; he tasted a little and it tasted all right. So he decided that he would put it back in the bottles.

He proceeded to fill the bottles, and after filling the forty-eighth bottle there was a cup left over. Now, the problem was not what to do with the surplus, but the fact that little bit of surplus was known and it lowered the value of all the rest!

Senator Macquarrie will understand that when you have been talking about surpluses, and the depressed prices that a little surplus gives, the story was perhaps appropriate at the time.

● (1500)

I think it was an extremely useful meeting. Some of the indications that have come out of Brussels since—maybe the meeting was not in Brussels, but it was certainly in Europe—where the heads of state met to discuss what they were to do about future farm subsidies, bear out that the indications we got from those members who were in Banff at the meeting were far more accurate than some of the other impressions that one could have picked up if one talked only to the administrators. Since then I think they have even adjusted the assessment on some of the countries. The Prime Minister of the U.K., Margaret Thatcher, has been against paying these enormous subsidies, and I think they have made some adjustment in the assessment of the U.K. because of that.

In any event, whether that is a fact or an impression is not important. What is important is that I now sincerely believe that we will find some resolution to this problem, because the politicians, thank God—or whoever is responsible—appear to be in charge of making some of the changes that are necessary so that we can get some common sense back into the international grains arrangement. This, by the way, started to come through clearly at Banff when we were talking to the politicians from Europe.

So, honourable senators, I think it was a useful meeting. Lots of other meetings are useful, too, but this one was particularly topical. The discussions that we had about fisheries and agriculture were topical, useful, and, as I said before, very worthwhile.

Perhaps I could close by saying that we were happy to have this meeting in my part of the country, and I hope that the Canadians, as well as the other guests, were happy with the arrangements that were made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak I declare this inquiry debated.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY
IN ANKARA, TURKEY

Hon. William M. Kelly rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, April 20, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Sub-committee of the North Atlantic Assembly on International Terrorism, held at Ankara, Turkey, from April 5 to 8, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to say at the outset that the meeting I am to report on, probably for reasons that I think will become clear, will not include a preamble such as the excellent preamble of Senator Macquarrie on the ambience, and so on. Of course, I can never try to equal the eloquence of Senator Olson, but I would like to report on the committee meeting at this time.

During the past year the North Atlantic Assembly created a special subcommittee to study and report on international terrorism. I was appointed as the Canadian delegate to that committee, representing the Canada-NATO Parliamentary Association.

During the week of April 4 I attended a meeting of the subcommittee which was held in the cities of Ankara and Diyarbakir in Turkey.

The meeting was extremely well organized and was attended by representatives from Denmark, West Germany, Greece, the United Kingdom, Turkey and myself from Canada.

Following the lifting of martial law in Turkey, which followed the most recent elections and the arrival of the new government, a serious increase took place in terrorist activities, primarily in the provinces of Eastern Turkey, close to the borders of Syria, Iraq and Iran. The perpetrators of the incidents were dissident Armenians. The terrorist attacks occurred primarily in small villages, where small groups of terrorists, two or three, would move into a village or small settlement and kill everything and everyone—men, women, children, and even animals—and then disappear.

Honourable senators, as background I would like to comment on the government structure, and then go on.

The current government structure of Turkey consists of a central government in the western form, with a prime minister and cabinet. The country is then divided into provinces, each with an elected government headed by an appointed governor. Within each province cities, towns and villages have their own elected governments.

In terms of security—again the western system—each city has its municipal police force responsible to the municipal government. The villages and outlying regions are policed by the gendarmes, which functions under the direction of the Ministry of the Interior. Finally, the army, navy and air force, under the direction of the Ministry of Defence, exist for the protection of the country outside its borders and also provide supplies and training to the gendarmes.

Due to the serious increase in terrorist activities, it was decided to designate 11 of the provinces as a “state of emergency region” and move part way back toward a form of martial law, but under the auspices of the Ministry of the Interior rather than the Ministry of Defence, thereby giving the responsibility for control to the gendarmes rather than the army. For this special purpose an additional governor was appointed with responsibility for all 11 provinces, specifically for matters involving counter-terrorism. Responsibility for countering terrorist activity in cities remains with the municipal police, but is coordinated by this new “super governor” and his staff. The remainder of the counter-terrorist work was, and is, being carried out by the gendarmes—also, of course, under the direction of the “super governor” and his staff.

During our visit we were briefed by the Minister of National Defence and his senior officials, the Minister of the Interior and his officials, the Chief of Internal Security and his officials, the Major General commanding the gendarmes and his officials, and were flown by helicopter for part of the trip to areas where terrorist attacks had occurred. During the course of that trip we were flown along the borders between Turkey and Syria, Turkey and Iraq, and parts of the Iranian border. Also during part of that journey we landed at one of the mountain camps and met with one of the local armed village forces who are described as “village guardians.”

Our main objective as a committee was to develop some understanding of the problem and to see first-hand a command structure that had been found to be most effective in situations of this sort. Turkey was considered an ideal subject for study, because there they had faced a real problem and had been able to design, through actual practice, a command structure that worked. It was clear that there is a continuing commitment in that country to the protection of the rights and freedoms of the individuals with minimum challenge to these rights and freedoms, but at the same time to bring a bad situation under reasonable control. The success of the initiative was evident in the sharp reduction that took place in terrorist activities almost immediately.

But, honourable senators, some alarming facts which came to light during our discussions bear on events that have occurred in Canada, and which perhaps may occur again.

Honourable senators may recall the study and report—which I am sure you are getting tired of hearing about—carried out by the special committee of this chamber which, among other things, analyzed an attack which took place in Ottawa at the Turkish Embassy on April 1, 1986. At that time an attempt was made to seize the Turkish ambassador. The ambassador, fortunately, escaped by jumping out a second storey window of the embassy.

I think it might be useful to review the chronology of similar attacks through the 1970s and early 1980s, if you will just bear with me:

- January 1973 Santa Barbara, California, Turkish Consul General murdered.
- October 1975 Vienna, Turkish Ambassador assassinated.
- October 1975 Paris, Turkish Ambassador assassinated.
- February 1976 Beirut, First Secretary of Turkish Embassy murdered.
- May 1976 Frankfurt, Essen, Cologne, simultaneous bomb attacks on all three consulates.
- June 1977 Rome, Turkish Ambassador to the Holy See assassinated.
- June 1978 Madrid, Turkish Ambassador murdered.
- October 1979 The Hague, the son of Turkish Ambassador assassinated.
- December 1979 Paris, tourism attaché at Turkish Embassy assassinated.
- July 1980 Athens, administrative attaché at Turkish Embassy assassinated.
- December 1980 Sydney, Turkish Consul General assassinated.
- March 1981 Paris labour attaché at Turkish Embassy murdered.
- June 1981 Geneva, secretary at Turkish Consulate assassinated.
- January 1982 Los Angeles, Turkish Consul General assassinated.
- May 1982 Cambridge, Turkish Honorary Consul in Boston murdered.
- June 1982 Lisbon, administrative attaché and his wife at Turkish Embassy assassinated.
- July 1982 Rotterdam, Turkish Consul General murdered.
- August 1982 Ottawa, military attaché at the Turkish Embassy assassinated.
- September 1982 Bulgaria, administrative attaché at Turkish Consulate assassinated.

July 1983 Brussels, administrative attaché at Turkish Embassy murdered.

July 1984 Brussels, administrative attaché of Turkish Embassy assassinated.

• (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What is the distinction between "assassination" and "murder"?

Senator Kelly: The result is the same.

Senator Frith: Yes, I had observed that. At least, that is certainly what I understand, but is the distinction that one is done in public and the other is done in private?

Senator Kelly: In response to that question, I might say to honourable senators that I anticipated that exact question from Senator Frith, and I was prepared to give him the answer I gave. I am very pleased that the honourable senator did not let me down.

However, that is the way in which they are recorded in the chronology that appeared in a recent publication put out by the Turkish Embassy, so I simply used their wording. I was also puzzled at the difference, and the reason for the one as opposed to the other. My impression is that the distinction is where the occurrence took place. When it took place actually inside an embassy or a consulate, they seem to refer to it as an assassination; when the incident took place on the street, they seem to refer to it as murder.

As you know, in the judgment of our own committee, we insist that these are not political acts; that these are simple criminal acts, so my terminology would normally be murder in any case.

Honourable senators, there is little question that the ambassador in the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa was well aware of all of the facts that I have just recited, and no doubt in his attempt to escape he believed that he was escaping certain death. Senators may remember that our own committee was highly critical of the behaviour of our media, where Mike Duffy displayed on live television the location of the escaping ambassador at the foot of the wall, which certainly would have made the work of the terrorists quite easy had they happened to be using the television sets in the embassy—a not unusual activity of terrorists in such incidents, because part of their tactic includes measuring the psychological effect of their activities. Therefore, it is very normal, in an incident where an embassy is taken over and occupied, that the television sets are switched on and the terrorists are watching the local news stations; the radios are switched on and the terrorists are listening to the local news.

I cannot help wondering if Mr. Duffy would have reconsidered his action had he known what had taken place in numerous other incidents around the world where Turkish ambassadors were involved. I cannot help but wonder if our own Solicitor General would not have reconsidered his decision not to get involved in discussions with media and not to play a role as catalyst in encouraging discussions amongst media people on appropriate behaviour during such incidents. Had he known what took place in all of those other embassies and consulates around the world involving Turkish ambassadors I believe he might have reconsidered, since in each of those cases the ambassador was murdered.

The results of the counter-terrorism initiatives in Turkey are impressive, and the command structure offers some interesting lessons for others. The problem I see developing now is that as it becomes more and more difficult for dissidents to use terrorist tactics inside a country, the risk will increase that the targets will become more and more government offices abroad—in this case Turkish offices abroad. Countering terrorism of this sort must include not only the protection of the sites themselves but must also include the most careful possible screening of all those entering the country, particularly the refugee flow, and this is an area in Canada where, at the moment, we are probably the weakest of all the NATO countries.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I wonder if I could ask Senator Kelly a question. Perhaps he could refresh my memory. I had thought that in the particular incident to which he referred concerning the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa the fault lay mainly with a police officer at that particular scene when he was briefing the reporters. To my recollection, Mike Duffy was not solely responsible for the release of that information. However, I cannot remember the detail, and perhaps Senator Kelly can refresh my memory.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I think Senator MacDonald is mixing up two incidents. I remember the incident to which you refer where the police officer gave out information on the deployment of the SWAT team.

In the case I was referring to, Mr. Duffy was operating or directing the operation of a live camera and the material was being piped directly back into the television station and going out on the airwaves. That was the matter to which the committee took objection. You will remember that there was a great deal of discussion about how clearance on the spot could be achieved. In other words, once that material is captured on the live camera, could there be a delay while some senior official undertakes the responsibility of saying, "Yes, let's go," or "Hold it!"? There was no such interface at that time, nor is there now, to my knowledge.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—METHOD OF APPOINTMENT TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA AND OTHER BODIES AND APPLICATION OF OTHER PROVISIONS BETWEEN SIGNING AND PROCLAMATION OF ACCORD

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it has to do with the filling of a vacancy in the Supreme Court of Canada and other vacancies.

For practical purposes I would refer to the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada. I understand that appointments to some other vacancies would normally be made under the old regime. Is it government policy that the seat in the Supreme Court of Canada will be filled by the federal government in the traditional fashion—by the Prime Minister after consultation with the provinces—because, for now, the Meech Lake formula does not apply to the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada in the period before the constitutional amendment comes into force?

Senator Frith: Is it also correct to say that when the Meech Lake agreement was reached with the First Ministers the understanding was that those aspects of the Meech Lake Accord applicable would apply during the period between the agreement and the issuance of a proclamation?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, part of the political accord reached by the First Ministers was that Senate appointments would be made according to the interim procedure, even in advance of proclamation of the Meech Lake amendment. That was part of the accord relating to Senate appointments. No such agreement was reached with regard to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Frith: Or to other section 96 appointments, that is, other superior court judges?

Senator Murray: Other superior court judges are not covered by Meech Lake, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Right. So, as I said, we can speak only about the vacancy or vacancies in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Was the appointment procedure for judges of the Supreme Court that is provided for in the Meech Lake Accord specifically excepted, or was it just not mentioned? In other words, was it the understanding at the time between the federal government and the premiers that it would apply to the Senate and that it was specifically provided that the section that deals with appointments to vacancies on the Supreme Court would not apply in the interim—or was it simply just not mentioned?

Senator Murray: The latter is the case, honourable senators. I can only speak for what is in the accord, and what is in the accord is that the interim procedure for appointment of senators would be followed by the Prime Minister, even in advance of proclamation of the Meech Lake amendment. There was no such commitment with regard to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I can, and do, say, however, that in the lifetime of the present government there have been, if my memory serves me correctly, three appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, and in all cases I think it fair to say that there has been very close consultation between the federal government and the province concerned.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sure that is true. I was not suggesting that there had not been such consultation in the traditional way. What other parts, if any, of the Meech Lake Accord are to apply in the meantime—to use the expression which I am sure my honourable friend understands, in view of what we have been discussing?

Senator Flynn: In the amendment?

Senator Frith: No, in its original form.

Senator Murray: The matter of Senate appointments is the one that comes to mind immediately. My honourable friend will have to give me a few minutes to reflect as to whether there are others.

Senator Frith: My honourable friend might well imagine what other aspect of the Meech Lake Accord would interest me in terms of interim application—that is, the amending formula. That is, will unanimity apply? Was there an understanding with the premiers that during the interim period the amending formula would require unanimity?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the provincial premiers, as long ago as August 1986, agreed in Edmonton that the first priority would be to get Quebec back into the constitutional family, and that other constitutional reforms would be put off until a second round. So the question raised by my honourable friend is quite hypothetical. We do not envisage any initiatives to amend the Constitution until we have ten provincial players at the table.

Having said that, I should note the one exception that has come up—that is, an amendment to the Constitution affecting, as I recall, confessional schools in Newfoundland, which required the consent only of the House of Commons and Senate and of the Legislative Assembly of Newfoundland.

Senator Frith: Very specifically, honourable senators, what I think Parliament and the people would like to understand is the following: Is it correct that the understanding and agreement that was reached at Meech Lake and confirmed at Langevin is that the Meech Lake amendment, tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate—the government initiative—will not take effect and that Her Majesty's representative, the Governor General, will not be asked for a proclamation on the basis of the 1982 formula, but only on the basis of a resolution by the House of Commons and the Senate and by all or each of the provinces?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that hypothesis was never considered.

Senator Frith: What!

Senator Murray: As a practical matter, because some of the amendments to the Constitution involving the Meech Lake agreement required unanimous consent, it was obvious to everybody that it would take unanimity to put it together. As it took unanimity to put it together, it will take unanimous consent to reopen it, and anything less than unanimity will inevitably lead to the unravelling of the accord.

Senator MacEachen: But it is supposed to be without seams! "Unravelling" is an unfortunate expression to use when talking about a seamless web.

Senator Frith: Certainly, one would start to unravel a garment at the seams, but no seam is to be found here.

Senator Murray: Unravelling is very much on the minds of those opposite today!

Senator Frith: The Meech Lake Accord is very much on my mind today, and on yours also.

I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate will understand that most Canadians understood that the formula for implementation of the Meech Lake Accord was unanimity, and not seven of the provinces with 50 per cent of the population, as under the current law. In other words, legally there is no question that Meech Lake could be implemented under the 1982 formula, depending on the subject matter.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: Is it correct to assume that that is so for all aspects of the Meech Lake Accord? In other words, no aspect of the Meech Lake Accord will be implemented without unanimous consent, that is to say, in accordance with the Meech Lake formula rather than the 1982 formula.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, these are very complicated hypotheses that the honourable senator is raising.

[Senator Murray.]

He is correct in stating that some of the elements of the Meech Lake Accord could have been implemented by the federal houses of Parliament together with seven provinces having 50 per cent of the population. Other than those amendments would require unanimity. As a practical matter, it was therefore necessary to obtain unanimity to put together the package, and I, for one, do not see as a practical matter how the package could hold together in the absence of unanimity.

Senator Frith: I do not think that is much of an answer, but it is a start.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS OF JUDICIAL ARBITRATION AND SELECTION OF MEDIATOR

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he can bring us up to date on the results of the negotiations in Paris on the boundaries and fisheries dispute, and whether the two parties—namely, Canada and France—have selected a mediator or have decided upon the country from which they will select a mediator?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the answer to the second part of the question is in the negative; we have not yet reached agreement on the country or person or persons who will mediate.

There has been agreement by our representatives ad referendum to governments that we would have mediation of the dispute on quotas covering the period when the boundaries dispute is under judicial consideration.

• (1410)

Senator McEachen: The word "arbitration" is the word that was in the agreement that was signed. Has it now been decided by the two parties to send the boundaries dispute to judicial arbitration and, while the arbitration is proceeding, the mediator will attempt to reach a solution of the fish quotas? Am I correctly understanding the situation?

Senator Murray: The question of the quotas is to cover the period during which the boundaries dispute is being judicially adjudicated. There will be no quotas in the absence of an agreement to put the boundaries dispute to judicial settlement. That agreement has not yet been reached. The terms of reference for this boundary adjudication are now under discussion between our two countries.

REFERRAL OF DISPUTE TO INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

A week or so ago I asked whether or not it was still the position of the Government of Canada that it would be prepared to submit the question of the boundaries to the International Court of Justice, that the French were resisting this and have been to date. I believe you undertook to give me—

Senator van Roggen: I am sorry, I was not here.

I would like to pursue my supplementary question. Has an agreement been reached at this time between the two governments to send the boundary dispute to a court or an arbitrator?

Senator Murray: That matter is still under discussion. The terms of reference are still under discussion.

PARLIAMENT

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT— TIMETABLE FOR LEGISLATIVE IMPLEMENTATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to inform us this afternoon if the Prime Minister was correct in saying that he will not ask the Governor General to dissolve this Thirty-Third Parliament before this Parliament has passed all of the implementing legislation with regard to the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am confident that the Prime Minister would much prefer to go the people with the Free Trade Agreement and other important legislation having been passed by Parliament. However, I would very much doubt that he would have tied his hands in the way my friend suggests on the exercise of his sole prerogative to recommend dissolution to Her Excellency.

Senator Haidasz: Could the Leader of the Government tell us, then, whether the implementing legislation for that Free Trade Agreement is ready, and, if so, when will it be presented to the Senate and the House of Commons for approval or disapproval?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the legislation will soon be ready and will soon be presented in the other place. I am encouraged to think that it will be acted on expeditiously by that chamber and by this chamber, given the continuing high levels of public support for the Free Trade Agreement with the United States.

I am also encouraged by the fact that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is discussing the agreement that was reached with the United States, and I would encourage honourable senators concerned to consider very seriously whether a pre-study of the trade legislation might not be in order.

Senator Haidasz: When the Leader of the Government in the Senate says "soon," does he mean before June 24 next?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—GEOGRAPHIC LOCATION OF FISHING PATTERNS AND QUOTAS

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. When he uses the phrase "there will be no quotas until the judicial process," is he talking about the French or the people of St. Pierre & Miquelon fishing inside the disputed zone or outside the disputed zone in what are traditionally called Canadian waters?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I am talking about the quotas on which we are asking for advice from a mediator. Until there is agreement on the terms of reference to submit the boundary dispute to judicial interpretation, the mediation process will not begin. I would have to look to see exactly what the proposed terms of reference for the mediator are in order to answer the honourable senator's question in detail.

Senator LeBlanc: If there is to be mediation, I suppose that there is an object or a subject that is being mediated. Is it the fishing patterns and the quotas within the disputed zone around St. Pierre & Miquelon, or is it what is called the "Canadian waters quota"? This is what triggered this fight when the government appeared to have agreed to allow fishing in 2J&3KL, which is considered to be the crucial zone for Newfoundland cod stocks.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I know what the question is that my friend is asking, but I would have to consult my notes more carefully, and I will do so.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—INTERPRETATION OF "DISTINCT SOCIETY" CLAUSE VIS-À-VIS ANGLOPHONE CANADIANS

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, regarding the reference in the Meech Lake Agreement to the distinct society, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether this part of the Meech Lake Agreement endangers the English language or the English-speaking community? Would it be in great danger? If not, why not?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the interpretive clause on the distinct society is closely related to the interpretive clause on Canada's linguistic duality. This clearly stipulates that we have two language communities in Canada: English-speaking Canadians concentrated in nine provinces but also present in Quebec and Francophones centred in Quebec but also found across the country.

So the distinct society clause is tied to the linguistic duality clause as a fundamental characteristic of our federation.

Senator Denis: You mean that this clause will not exclude English or the English community in Canada or cause it to disappear?

Senator Murray: Far from it, honourable senators.

ARCTIC SOVEREIGNTY

ENVIRONMENTAL CONCERNS—LACK OF CONSULTATION WITH ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I was watching a television program with great interest when the question of Arctic sovereignty was being talked about. I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a subject related to Arctic sovereignty.

Canada will have to make a stand sooner or later—probably in the highest court of the international communities—relating to Arctic sovereignty. Realizing that, there seems to be a great lack of communication between the various countries that are anticipating working in the North where there is scientific knowledge that needs to be collected from the Arctic waters. By that I mean that there are a few countries utilizing the Arctic waters, including the Soviet Union. I know that a committee was established some years ago to determine how the various countries could educate themselves in order that they might have a better understanding of the sensitivity of the Arctic environment.

I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate, together with his cabinet colleagues, to realize that a communication gap between the South and the North in this country really does exist, and that we must do whatever we can to close that gap if we are sincere in our efforts to do something meaningful concerning the scientific knowledge that we, as a country, require. I think there is a need to work out some arrangement whereby we can begin to focus on the certain fundamental issues which relate to the Arctic, keeping in mind the fact that the aboriginal people have been occupants of those Arctic islands and have utilized the Arctic waters and the sea ice for many years. I cannot begin to say how long we have been occupants of the North, but, in any event, we have been there for a lot longer than anyone else.

I would say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate: What do we know about the scientific requirements of this country? What do the aboriginal peoples, the Inuit, the "Eskimos", know about the technical requirements needed by this country in order to determine how the Arctic should be handled? I am sure you have your own opinion on that matter, but the reality is that people live up there in the North. We have learned to cope with the North and we have learned to live with it. We have lived through the hardships, including starvation, but the aboriginal peoples, or what is left of them, are still there in the North.

Another problem that we have had in the past is in trying to bring back from the Soviet Union the Inuit, the "Eskimos" who originated from Alaska. At some time in the past they managed to go across the land bridge to the other country, but because of the international situation they have been unable to return to their home base.

By listing all of these things I am attempting to illustrate that there is a definite need for us to do our utmost to close the gap between the South and the North so that we can start focusing on some of the fundamental issues which affect our people and also affect the Arctic. I would suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he regard this matter in a serious light and work with his cabinet colleagues to establish a way in which this communication gap can be closed.

Coming from the Arctic as I do, in my opinion, there is a need to establish some sort of a platform or system whereby knowledge can be exchanged. Until the aboriginal peoples in the North know exactly what it is that the government requires of them and of the North, it will be very difficult for them to work with the government in order to help this country.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, what began yesterday with the passage of the bill respecting the western Arctic is an important event for this country and also for the other countries surrounding it. However, without the input of the aboriginal peoples who live in the Arctic, I think the people of Canada and of the other countries surrounding the Arctic would have a great deal of difficulty in realizing and understanding what life in the Arctic really means. Does this country consider the Arctic an area it can fool with as it pleases? If so, it had better consider the effect of its actions on the atmosphere of this planet.

● (1530)

I am sure that many people think that I am talking over my head here, but I speak from experience and from what I know of the part of the country from which I come. It is a very sensitive area and a sensitive issue. We must overcome the barriers between the South and the North if we intend to do anything within the Arctic waters that will be beneficial to Canada.

Senator Steuart: Yes or no.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I appreciate the representations the honourable senator has made. I shall study them more carefully and I shall ask my colleagues to do the same. If there are points that I believe call for immediate response, I shall be glad to place that response on the record as soon as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT OF ADVISORY GROUP TO MINISTER ON REGULATION OF POLITICAL ACTIVITIES IN CANADIAN FORCES ESTABLISHMENTS—RECOMMENDATIONS 3 AND 4—GOVERNMENT ACTION—QUESTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, April 20, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about a report from the Minister of National Defence on political activities on Canadian Forces bases. By accident, I met the minister, discussed my questions with him and got my answers. Therefore, I would like to withdraw my question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will not stand for these kinds of private arrangements between my colleagues! As a matter of fact, Senator Phillips has a delayed answer to the question, which he had intended to present later today.

Senator Argue: Let's hear from Senator Phillips!

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—DEFINITION OF QUEBEC AS DISTINCT SOCIETY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, not wishing last Thursday to interrupt the concluding speech on the Meech Lake Accord debate made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, this afternoon I would like to ask him whether he would enlighten us in an explicit way on what the government means by Quebec as a "distinct society"?

Senator Flynn: Ah, come on!

Senator Haidasz: Here's is your chance.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must draw to the attention of Senator Haidasz that the matter has been thoroughly canvassed in the Question Period here since last May, again in the Committee of the Whole when I testified at the end of March, and during last summer and fall before the joint committee. I believe that there is really nothing I can usefully add to the matter at this time. I do say, however, that my honourable friend must have known what he meant when he voted for it at the last Liberal Convention.

Senator Argue: What is going to happen to the accord in Manitoba?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am asking the Leader of the Government to tell me his government's definition of "distinct society." Does it mean that Quebec is an autonomous province and society and that, therefore, it can do whatever it wants, particularly in light of the fact that it has not signed the Constitution Act, 1982?

Senator Argue: Hurray for Manitoba!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the autonomy of any province, I think the honourable senator would do well to review various constitutional arrangements, beginning with the BNA Act of 1867.

Senator Haidasz: Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us today whether the Province or the Government of the province of Quebec is legally and constitutionally bound to follow the Constitution Act, 1982, even though that province has not signed it? Yes or no?

Senator Murray: The legal and constitutional position on that matter has never been in doubt so far as the Government of Canada is concerned. What we are talking about is a moral and political agreement of the Government of Quebec to the 1982 act which was not forthcoming. Our position is that a Constitution which does not have that moral and political commitment on the part of one of the major partners in Confederation is very seriously flawed. I made a speech on this subject in the course of the 1982 debate to which I would refer my honourable friend.

• (1430)

Senator Haidasz: Therefore, we are to conclude, honourable senators, that the Government of Quebec is not legally and constitutionally bound by certain articles of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Senator Murray: Not at all, honourable senators, I have never suggested that Quebec was not legally bound by the 1982 act. She is.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS OF FORMER AGREEMENT—APPEARANCE OF FORMER AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE AND MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS BEFORE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for clarity, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question on fisheries and boundaries which I intended to ask earlier?

Am I understanding the situation correctly by concluding that until the terms of reference for the arbitration have been agreed upon—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): On the boundary.

Senator MacEachen: —that the mediation process on the fish quotas will not commence?

Senator Murray: That is my understanding of the situation. In any event, there will be no quotas.

Senator MacEachen: Earlier, honourable senators, I asked whether the agreement from which these subject matters flow had been extended or had lapsed, because, as I understand it, that agreement had expired at the end of 1987 and I wonder whether it has been extended or just forgotten about.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think it would be accurate to say that it has been overtaken by events.

Senator MacEachen: So, there is no agreement. In any event, it has not been extended.

I wonder whether, not having concluded an agreement either on fish or on boundaries at the end of 1987, the two governments might have agreed to extend it for another year in order to work out their problems. I wonder whether that active extension has taken place.

Senator Murray: I believe I undertook to obtain that information for the Leader of the Opposition the other day. I apologize that I do not have it. I will bring it in tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: I have one final point on this, and that is with respect to the Committee of the Whole. I have expressed an interest in having some witnesses, already mentioned, come before the committee so that we could ask these questions and get some detailed answers.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us if he has asked Mr. Bouchard whether he will come, or Mr. Fortier or, at a certain point, the Minister of Fisheries, so that we can conclude our discussion in Committee of the Whole on fisheries and boundaries?

Senator Murray: I have not done that, honourable senators, but I shall make inquiries immediately.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to questions.

ENERGY

GEORGES BANK DRILLING MORATORIUM—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question asked on April 19, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Energy—Georges Bank Drilling Moratorium—Consultation with Government of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if the honourable senator would be good enough to read that answer into the record.

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

In recent weeks the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his officials have consulted regularly on this issue with the Government of Nova Scotia, including a meeting between the Honourable Marcel Masse and the Honourable Ken Streatch, Nova Scotia Minister of Mines and Energy, which was held on March 28.

It has been the policy of the Nova Scotia government for some time to seek a moratorium on drilling on the Georges Bank. It is clear that the Nova Scotia government fully supports the announced moratorium. The Premier of Nova Scotia was informed prior to the announcement made by Minister Masse.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am not trying to pick a quarrel with the honourable senator, but is it a fact that the Government of Nova Scotia has sought a moratorium, or did they seek an outright prohibition of drilling on Georges Bank? There is a difference between a moratorium—which has been announced until the year 2000, I believe—and an outright prohibition, period. I was of the impression that the Government of Nova Scotia had sought an outright prohibition. Could we have some conclusive comment on that point?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I will ask the minister responsible to attempt to clarify his answer in such a way that the honourable senator will understand.

Senator Olson: He is sitting right there—the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Ask him!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT OF ADVISORY GROUP TO MINISTER ON REGULATION OF POLITICAL ACTIVITIES IN CANADIAN FORCES ESTABLISHMENTS—RECOMMENDATIONS 3 AND 4— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question asked on April 20, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding National Defence.

The Minister of National Defence has accepted recommendations 3 and 4 of the report. The new policy will permit political meetings, advertising, and statements on the part of dependents and civilian occupants within the confines of individual married quarters in Canada. As well, the present restrictions on political canvassing and the distribution of political advertising to married quarters and single quarters on Canadian Forces bases will be removed. While security or privacy considerations will dictate that some quarters remain closed to canvassing, the objective is to ensure minimum interference with the right of the occupants to be informed on political matters.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR 1988-89 CROP YEAR—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have today is in response to a question asked on April 26, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Grain—Initial Payment for 1988-89 Crop Year.

(The answer follows:)

These are the press releases to be tabled today, as requested by the honourable senator.

Documents tabled.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION (SHARE ISSUANCE AND SALE AUTHORIZATION) BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-125, to enable the Northern Canada Power Commission to issue shares, to authorize the sale of those shares to the Government of the Northwest Territories, to repeal the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and to provide for related matters.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak in support of the Northern Canada Power Commission Share Issuance and Sale Authorization Bill. This bill, when enacted, will enable the Northern Canada Power Commission to issue shares, to authorize the sale of those shares to the Government of the Northwest Territories, to repeal the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, and to provide for related matters.

Bill C-125 is enabling legislation for an agreement in principle which was signed in February of this year by Nellie Cournoyea, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the Northwest Territories, and our federal Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Honourable Bill McKnight. That agreement provides for the sale of the Northern Canada Power Commission to the territorial government.

As honourable senators know, this bill has received the support of all parties in the House of Commons. That is because it is beneficial to all the parties involved and because it is an important and historic step in the political evolution of the Northwest Territories.

The federal government is seeking Senate approval of Bill C-125 so that the sale and transfer of the NCPC may be accomplished as soon as possible. I believe this legislation deserves our unqualified support for a number of reasons.

The first is that northerners are eager to assume control of their day-to-day lives, which, incidentally, was so evident in the several speeches in this chamber during the Meech Lake Accord debate last week. They are doing that by achieving and accepting responsibility for provincial-type institutions, programs and services now administered by the federal government.

Residents of the Northwest Territories have special ties to the Northern Canada Power Commission. The commission was established in 1948 as the Northwest Territories Power Commission, a federal crown corporation set up to provide electrical services and power to mining operations in the Northwest Territories. In 1956 the commission's name was changed to reflect the fact that its services had then been extended to the Yukon.

Over the years NCPC evolved into the principal federal agency which was generating and transmitting electrical services in the territories. A year ago the Yukon assets of the commission were transferred to the Yukon territorial government. I had the privilege of introducing that bill, Bill C-45, in this chamber. Today we are reviewing legislation that would complete the transfer of power and electrical generation to the Northwest Territories.

It is ironic, honourable senators, that it has actually taken 40 years to transfer control of this rather vital service to the people who depend on it. To delay the transfer any longer would be a miscarriage of our responsibilities as legislators.

NCPC, as it exists today, is a commercially viable utility that serves some 13,000 customers in the territories. It has an installed capacity of 137.7 megawatts, and last year it sold 385 million kilowatt hours of electricity. It will continue to be a viable utility after transfer to the territorial government, but it will also be more responsive to local needs and more accountable to the people of the Northwest Territories.

● (1440)

Unlike the Yukon agreement of a year ago, which required federal financing, the Canada-Northwest Territories agreement is a simple cash sale. Honourable senators will recall that the Yukon sale was an asset sale.

In effect, honourable senators, the Government of Canada will sell the newly created and acquired shares in the Northern Canada Power Commission to the Government of the Northwest Territories. NCPC will then become the Northwest Territories Power Commission.

The two levels of government have agreed to a price of $53 million. To finance this purchase and the utility's planned capital expenditures of $25 million in 1988-89, which are additional, the territorial government must exceed its currently authorized borrowing limit. To allow for that, the federal government will process an order in council to increase the Government of the Northwest Territories' borrowing authority.

The price includes all of NCPC's operations in the Northwest Territories, including its 53 generating stations. In addition, Public Works Canada will transfer the housing in several of the communities involved.

Under the terms of the agreement, federal subsidies of electricity rates to small businesses and private households in remote communities in the Northwest Territories will end on the date of transfer. Upon transfer, the successor utility will continue to have the same access to those facilities, to the use of federal lands and to the water rights that are involved.

A key element in the agreement, and one about which I know that honourable senators will be interested to hear, is the protection afforded to current employees of NCPC. Both levels of government have given assurances that the transfer—which means that the utility's head office will eventually be moved from Edmonton to the Northwest Territories—will occur with a minimum of disruption to NCPC employees. At that date the NCPC staff will become employees of the Northwest Territories Public Service. They will continue to receive a compensation and benefits package at least equivalent to the package they now receive.

Honourable senators, this transfer is fully consistent with the federal government's northern political and economic development framework. That framework is based on the following principles: first, that, like all Canadians, northerners have the right to self-determination; second, that government services should be administered at the local level as close as possible to the people served; and, third, that Canadians should not be subject to overlap, duplication or extra costs in the delivery of government services.

Devolution is a necessary and desirable process arising out of that framework; and the transfer of NCPC assets to the Government of the Northwest Territories is only the latest in a series of measures taken to facilitate that process. They include the formula financing arrangements established between Ottawa and both territorial governments; the transfer of NCPC Yukon assets to the Government of the Yukon in 1987; and the transfer of a host of other programs and responsibilities to the territorial governments. For example, there was the transfer of the forestry service in 1987; the transfer of health services to the eastern Arctic in 1987; and the anticipated or planned transfer of health services to the western Arctic government.

The sale of NCPC also meets those principles contained in the Memorandum of Understanding signed by the federal and territorial governments in November 1985. Those principles were as follows: first, that the quality and integrity of electrical services in the territories be maintained; second, that the legal and financial integrity and the mandate of NCPC be maintained during the transition period; third, that the interests of Northern Power customers be protected; and, finally, that NCPC employees affected by the transfer be given fair and equitable treatment.

As a result of this agreement, the people of the Northwest Territories will soon be managing their own utility and their own affairs in that regard. For the first time there will be local control over rates, subsidies, planning and services. Elected leaders, who are directly accountable to the people of the Northwest Territories, will make decisions on capital projects and on using the territories' electrical system to stimulate economic development and diversification.

I am sure that honourable senators will join with me in commending both levels of government for negotiating this agreement in such a short period of time and for the benefit of everyone involved.

It is rather appropriate, in relationship to the recent debate on the Meech Lake Accord in this chamber, that this bill is being discussed today. We heard at length, particularly from my good friends, Senators Lucier, Adams and others, regarding the future aspirations of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories for provincial status. This bill, when enacted, will be a further step forward in the preparation of the Northwest Territories toward provincehood. We can do our part in that respect to ensure that the process is not stalled by providing quick and unanimous support for Bill C-125.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments concerning Bill C-125. I was in the chamber last year when we passed Bill C-45, the bill that was mentioned by Senator Barootes, which gave the Government of the Yukon Territory control over the Northern Canada Power Commission in the Yukon.

I should again like to thank Senator Barootes, as I did last year, for the fine job he has done in connection with these two pieces of legislation. They are very important to us in the North and we appreciate the comments he has just made.

I believe the Yukon has proven, during the past year—and it will be proven again by the Government of the Northwest Territories in the next little while—that when responsibilities such as this are given to it, it does a good job of dealing with them. Bill C-45 gave the Yukon an opportunity to do something a little bit different, to take over a crown corporation from the federal government and to include the private sector in the working part of the arrangement. It has worked very well in the Yukon, as I know it is going to work in the Northwest Territories. I spoke to the Honourable Nellie Cournoyea yesterday or the day before about Bill C-125. They are very anxious to see it. I think that she should be thanked, along with members of her government, for her input into this procedure.

• (1450)

This is a difficult procedure for them. They do not have too many people to call upon to put these things together. When a small cabinet such as that found in the Northwest Territories is trying to put together packages which result in the borrowing of $80 million or $83 million, that is not taken lightly. They take their responsibilities very seriously in the Northwest Territories. I think the Government of the Northwest Territories should be congratulated on the excellent job it has done in this regard.

What makes this bill very acceptable to us is the fact that the employees of the Northern Canada Power Commission will be very well looked after. Whether those employees come from Edmonton or other areas of Canada, when they land in the territories they quickly become Yukoners or citizens of the Northwest Territories. Just as I do, they see the rest of Canadians as being outsiders when they go up there.

As I said, the employees of the Northern Canada Power Commission will have their interests safeguarded in this agreement. I congratulate the government on the effort it made in that regard. When Bill C-45 was passed respecting the Yukon, that was a key element of the bill. That key point is present in this bill. Their interests must be protected, and they are protected in this piece of legislation.

Honourable senators, as you are aware, I have taken this government on for its treatment of northerners as far as the Meech Lake Accord is concerned. I will not back off from anything I have said in that regard. The Meech Lake Accord is not kind to the North, but, in spite of that, I take this opportunity to congratulate the government—and I shall congratulate the minister personally if I have an opportunity to speak to him—on the continued devolution of powers to the Northwest Territories.

This government has followed the tradition of seeing that the North is recognized as an important entity, started by Prime Minister Diefenbaker. That tradition was continued by the Liberal government when it was in power, and, quite frankly, except for the skip of Meech Lake, that tradition has been continued to a large extent by this government.

As Senator Barootes has stated, one has to look at this in the long term. We want to show Canadians that we, as northerners, can govern ourselves properly. We can do that if we are given the opportunity. This legislation gives us that opportunity. I think it is important that we continue this process. The elected representatives of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory are responsible people. When they do not act in a responsible manner, they answer to the electorate, as is correct, and that is the way we want it to continue.

We have no interest, as I have said before, in seeking provincial status at this time, but we certainly have a strong interest in continuing to go down that road. We know we are going to get to that point, although we do not know when. I thank Senator Barootes for introducing this piece of legislation. Quite frankly, honourable senators, I have no problem at all in supporting this bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes:—I want to thank Senator Lucier for his most gracious remarks, particularly his reference to the late 1950s and early 1960s and the tradition embarked upon by the various governments that have been in power since then, including the current government.

Indeed, the evolution of devolution—which is what is happening here—does bring services closer to the local level, and the closer we get those services to the local level—be it provincial, territorial or municipal—the more accountable they are, the better they are received, and the more closely administered they will be. We, too, congratulate the Government of the Northwest Territories, and particularly its minister, on achieving this result.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate resolve itself later this day into a Committee of the Whole to receive the minister so that he can answer questions with respect to the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that this bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I believe someone has gone to get the minister. I suggest that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to hear from the minister.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If the minister is ready, I think we should do that, honourable senators. I know that Senator Lucier has some questions he wants to raise with the minister.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle in the Chair.

● (1500)

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, pursuant to rule 18, I ask that the Honourable William McKnight, P.C., Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1510)

Pursuant to rule 18 of the rules of the Senate, the Honourable William McKnight, P.C., Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to introduce to you the Honourable William McKnight. Mr. McKnight was elected to the House of Commons in 1979. He has been Minister of Labour and is now Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Do you have a statement for us, Mr. McKnight, or are you prepared to answer questions?

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-125, to enable the Northern Canada Power Commission to issue shares, to authorize the sale of those shares to the Government of the Northwest Territories, to repeal the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and to provide for related matters.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to listen to the statement that will be made by the minister if he wishes to do so?

Senator MacEachen: We would be delighted to!

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable minister?

Hon. William McKnight, P.C., Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development: Thank you very much, honourable senators.

First, I would like to apologize for my tardiness. I was making a television clip for a fund raiser for a high school—and I know that all senators would understand that.

The bill that honourable senators are proceeding with today represents a continued devolution of the responsibility to the duly elected governments north of 60. It is a responsibility that those elected legislators in both Yukon and the Northwest Territories are ready and willing to accept and are certainly capable of administering. It is our belief—and I am sure it is a belief shared by honourable senators—that the people who can best look after a public utility such as an electric utility are those who live in the region and have the ability to respond through an elected legislature.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: This is the second part of the divestiture of the Northern Canada Power Commission. The first was divested to the Yukon over 12 months ago. I appreciate the assistance I received from senators at that time. This, the final divestiture to the N.W.T., will conclude the involvement of the Government of Canada in the Northern Canada Power Commission.

I would be pleased to answer any questions that honourable senators may have.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

I have on my list the Honourable Senator Lucier to start with. Any other senator who wishes to speak will show his willingness by raising his hand later.

Senator Lucier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would first like to welcome the minister. It is a pleasure to have you here, sir. As has been stated before, you are well known in both the northern territories, and we appreciate what you are doing with this bill. As I stated earlier in reply to Senator Baroote's comments, it is an ongoing devolution of power to the people of the Yukon, where we like to see it.

You just said, sir, that you are anxious to conclude this agreement. So are we, but only because we think that you should now start to move something else into our area. We want you to continue the trend that you have set.

Mr. Minister, one of the questions I would like to ask concerns the headquarters staff in Edmonton. The staff from Edmonton will eventually be moving to the Northwest Territories if they so choose, but in any case the Edmonton office will cease to operate. Is that correct?

Mr. McKnight: That is correct. Opportunities for employment are being offered to the present employees at headquarters. Naturally, because the ownership and control will go north of the 60th parallel, I am not sure where the headquarters will be located—that is the responsibility of the Government of the Northwest Territories—but employees in Edmonton have been offered their jobs at the new headquarters.

Senator Lucier: We talk about Public Works housing being part of the deal. In most of the communities the housing is supplied by Public Works for the people who are now employed by Northern Canada Power—I think I am correct about that. If so, I would assume that that is what you mean when you say that the Public Works housing will continue to be part of the deal.

Is there a possibility that the people who will be moving from Edmonton to the Northwest Territories will also receive some kind of Public Works housing until they are established in the territories?

Mr. McKnight: As the honourable senator is aware, a majority of the housing in the Northwest Territories is supplied by Public Works Canada in the more remote communities. The Public Works housing that will be made available will be that that is not presently occupied, or as units become available for those people in headquarters as they move from Edmonton.

In the bill, the housing that is available will be the housing that the present employees are being housed in. So there is no dislocation of those employees who are already employed and live north of 60.

• (1520)

Senator Lucier: I will move on to the employees. As I stated earlier, one of the keys to Bill C-45, as far as we in the North were concerned, was the fact that the employees of Northern Canada Power Commission in the Yukon were able to continue to enjoy the same benefits they enjoyed as employees of the previous Northern Canada Power Commission. I know that there are extra benefits that the employees will receive due to the fact that the commission will now be owned by the Government of the Northwest Territories. However, if there are some benefits that they now have that are not enjoyed by other members of the Public Service of the Northwest Territories, will they maintain those benefits, or is there a chance that any benefits that they now have will be taken away from them?

Mr. McKnight: I am pleased to inform the senator that all benefits that presently exist, including those pension benefits, will be continued. In addition, by becoming members of a different bargaining unit, but of the same union, a dental plan and some other benefits, which I could identify later, are available to the employees at this time.

Senator Lucier: So it could be better, but it could not be any worse?

Mr. McKnight: That is correct, sir.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly, I think that the questions that I had have pretty well been answered. I have gone through the House of Commons Debates and there were some pertinent questions that were asked in that place and answered there also.

Perhaps some other honourable senators have some questions to ask. I thank the minister for answering the questions that I had.

The Chairman: I thank Senator Lucier. Next on my list is Senator Buckwold, and then Senator MacEachen.

Senator Buckwold: First of all, I would like to welcome another distinguished son of Saskatchewan, and one who has brought great distinction to his office and to himself. We are delighted to welcome you here to the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: My only concern is with respect to the ability of the new corporation, whose shares will basically be owned, I gather, by the Government of the Northwest Territories, to finance the capital requirements of a power producer and distributor. Many of us in this chamber have had some experience with power companies and provincial agencies. I, personally, have been a director of Saskatchewan Power Corporation and I know of the immense requirements for long-term capital by such corporations.

My question, then, is: How will this matter be handled in an area of the country which has a limited ability to raise long-term capital, and will the Government of Canada be available to give the necessary financial assistance and back-up that is required to produce the kind of power that is needed?

Mr. McKnight: Senator, the assurances that you need can be found in the Government of the Northwest Territories, itself, which is on a very sound financial footing. The share value of the new share offering will be available to be used to go to the market in order to acquire any long-term capital that is needed. We had a long discussion with the Government of the Northwest Territories and the people involved in privatization from the Government of Canada and we were assured that the opportunity and the strength to acquire long-term financing was there on the part of the Government of the Northwest Territories. Also, the shares with which they can go to the market at that time are of considerable value.

Senator Buckwold: I can say that I doubt whether the share capital would provide nearly the requirement of the long-term financing for any kind of major projects, and I am delighted to hear that this has been considered and that there will be the kind of back-up that is required.

Perhaps I can get from the minister a statement that the Government of Canada will be available to ensure that the territorial governments will have the financial backing—and probably the guarantees—that are required for the sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars that may be needed.

Mr. McKnight: Senator, because of the fiscal transfers that take place between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Northwest Territories, the federal government is, in all cases, the final backstop. However, the Government of the Northwest Territories, as the Government of the Yukon Territory, is strong and is recognized by the financial community of Canada as being able to operate in a very businesslike manner. Its strength alone, senator, will allow it to borrow the long-term capital that will be needed to finance this operation.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Next on my list is Senator MacEachen.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I will ask my question when you call the clauses.

The Chairman: If there are no other senators who wish to question the witness, we will proceed.

Honourable senators, shall consideration of the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 relating to the short title of the bill stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, with respect to clause 6, this is, I am sure, a point that can easily be clarified. I understand that "the Corporation" referred to in clause 6 is the Northern Canada Power Commission, because in clause 2, the interpretation clause, the definition of "corporation" is given. It states:

"Corporation" means the Northern Canada Power Commission, a corporation without share capital established by the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and continued by section 3;

Clause 3 then states:

3.(1) The Corporation is continued as a corporation with share capital.

Then clause 6 says:

6.(1) The property, rights and interests of Her Majesty held in the name of the Corporation and used in relation to its operations in the Northwest Territories are transferred to the Corporation.

I presume that we are talking about the same corporation. My question is: Is it an expression with legal significance that you are transferring the property rights and interests from the corporation to the corporation? That simply confuses me.

Mr. McKnight: Senator, I can share your confusion. I had not looked at the bill in that way. I suppose where it says in clause 6:

in relation to its operations in the Northwest Territories are transferred to the Corporation.

We could perhaps substitute "the new corporation" or a name. However, it is not the responsibility of the Government of Canada to put a name on the new corporation.

Senator, you are asking a legal question and I am a dirt farmer, so I shall have to have advice on that matter.

Senator MacEachen: Senator Phillips is sitting next to you. He is a good lawyer.

Senator Buckwold: He is a dentist!

Senator MacEachen: In any event, I just wanted to know why it was necessary to include a provision transferring property from the corporation to the corporation, and referring to precisely the same corporation. However, I just leave my question in suspense.

Mr. McKnight: I very much appreciate it, senator.

Senator Frith: It is what lawyers call a nice question.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions on clause 6? If there is none, shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, we thank you for taking the time to come here today, and we hope that you will come back.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Rhéal Belisle: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-125, to enable the Northern Canada Power Commission to issue shares, to authorize the sale of those shares to the Government of the Northwest Territories, to repeal the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and to provide for related matters, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on March 24, 1988.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the Senate a piece of legislation that cries out for an even-handed approach on—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Sinclair, would you move the adoption of the report first, please?

Senator Sinclair: I thought that I would do that at the end of my remarks.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Lefebvre: Have it your way, Ian.

Senator Sinclair: Very well then. I move the adoption of the twenty-third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain!

Senator Sinclair: As I was saying earlier, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I draw to the attention of the Senate a piece of legislation that requires action to bring about an evenness, an even playing field, and to support vividly and without any ambiguity whatsoever students and the educational system of our country, which are being overlooked in the bill that has been presented to the Senate. This omission was dealt with in one of our amendments. People look upon copyright law as a very complicated area and one in which certain people over the years have made a great deal of money. Some of those people have been lawyers and some of them have not been lawyers. I was a little startled to find, with regard to two collectives, that Canadians spend some $40 million annually on rock and roll music and other pieces that run all the way from good music to opera to "When did you last kick the can?" or some of those other delightful pieces one hears.

This bill creates monopolies. We all know that monopolies have only one compulsion, and that is to take all the traffic will bear, unless they are regulated in some way. This is why in copyright law an even field or balance, exclusions and careful drafting are essential. If any one of these elements is missing, then great harm is done to all people, both creators and users.

This bill does some good things, and there is no reason why, in the time available, good things cannot be done and things that are not good cannot be corrected. One of the good things that is introduced in this bill is moral rights. They are very welcome to creators. Another good thing introduced here is protection through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to software and high-tech utilization and placement of what we call "computer technology." Those things can be done.

The bad things come in two areas. First, the minister appeared before the committee and talked with some pride about the fact that she was leading the parade. She said that no other country had, as yet, introduced a requirement of exhibition by statute dealing with the visual arts. She was proud that "Canada was going to lead the way," she said. There is nothing wrong with leading; where the harm comes is when you lead and you do not know where you are going. She certainly showed that she did not know where she was going on the exhibition-right principle in this bill, because the whole community—creators, curators, museum managers and others—recognized that clause 2 of the bill, as drafted, was seriously flawed and needed some change. They got together and arrived at an agreement. Unfortunately, somebody whispered in their ear that if they amended it, as they had agreed, it would cause some delay. It was suggested that what they should try to do was to convince the other party not to require this amendment at this stage of the copyright legislation, but to put it off. "Well," said the other side, "uh, uh, not us"; that isn't the deal we made. The deal we made was to have this amendment now, not to allow this section to proceed, as the Canadian Bar Association said, "with some question as to how it is to be interpreted."

What it really does is give to somebody who is not an owner an ability to interfere with an owner's right in regard to a painting. For instance, they can even go so far as to say to a museum that has received a painting from a donor that it cannot be hung along with other works that would normally be part of the exhibition, but that it has to be put up on a pink wall with a green light. Of course, the curator would say, "No, not in my museum." If this bill is passed, we will have given that person the right to say, "If you will not do what I want, you cannot hang it at all." This is how far this goes and this is why people have said that there are difficulties with the clause. "Certain difficulties with the clause" is the wording of the Joint Copyright Legislative Committee of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Duncan Cameron, who appeared before our committee, is a man of quiet voice, with 30 years experience in dealing with and managing museums. He appeared on behalf of the Association of Curators and Directors. He stated that determining and locating the holder of a copyright, the exhibition right, could create an onerous administrative burden for exhibitors. He stated that, further, the holder of the copyright can determine whether or not the work of art may be exhibited and that he or she may also determine when, where and in what context the work is exhibited. Honourable senators, that relates to my example of the pink wall and the green light. Copyright holders do not have to be the artists, because this bill is silent on that.

An interesting thing, honourable senators, is that the proposed legislation specifically says that you cannot assign a moral right, but that you can assign these other rights. Therefore, you can own all the rights, such as reproduction rights, ownership with all its aspects, with the exception of exhibition rights, and find that no museum, no matter how much it wanted a painting, would take it, because it would not be prepared to take it into its organization and to make it part of its repertoire when it would be unable to deal with it in all the ways that curators and museums might wish.

As I indicated, honourable senators, this whole area of exhibition rights is a controversial matter—one that sets artist against curator, curator against artist, and neither can exist alone. That is the funny part about this, because museums need artists and artists need museums. Therefore, it is essential that these two very important segments of our society get together. And they did, but their deal was aborted. It is most unfortunate that the government decided to proceed, and particularly to proceed by introducing a completely new right into the visual art community without resolving what obviously was a matter of great controversy and great difficulty.

Therefore, I do point out that lest you be misled by certain publicity and other matters, this matter affects not only museums and galleries; it influences and affects schools of art, universities and any other place where artistic works are publicly displayed.

[Senator Sinclair.]

The committee was somewhat taken aback, if I may use that phrase, by having the minister acknowledge—not easily, but she did acknowledge—that they were concerned with the definition of "artistic work" as it is carried in the interpretation clause of Bill C-60. She informed the committee that they were engaged in reconstituting what would be an "artistic work." She told us they were going to come up with a revised definition.

Of course, this again points out the necessity of solving these problems before introducing new legislation and new rights. For that reason the consensus of the committee—and when I speak of the committee here I am referring only to the majority, but I will have a word to say about that later—is that the exhibition right should be withheld until these fundamental issues are effectively dealt with and the parties that know most about them, that is, the museum associations, the directors, the curators and the artists, arrive at an accommodation that enables all of them to live in harmony. That will benefit not only artists but all Canadians who appreciate art.

So much for that amendment. But before I leave it, it might be well to draw to your attention one rather unusual aspect of this exhibition right and how it adversely affects people. The following is an extract of a letter received from Conservator of the University of British Columbia, Miriam Clavir:

The UBC Museum of anthropology has the distinction of having been the first to innovate and build a visible storage rather than a closed storage system, allowing the public access to over 90% of the collections rather than the usual 5%. As our storage is on public view, it appears we would have to pay public exhibition rights on all our pieces all of the time. This would not be possible financially, and we would be forced to close this much admired and now internationally copied public service.

Honourable senators, I draw that to your attention to show how what looks like a simple matter can mushroom and cause harm to people, to students and to those who are interested in the whole subject of anthropology.

If I may, I will turn now to another aspect. This comes under the general legal definition of what we call collective management. This bill gives monopoly power to a collective. It enables the participants to take their repertoire, to acquire the rights from the owners, and to say to the users, "Either deal with me, pay what I say, or you must not touch my repertoire in any aspect."

As I indicated earlier, such monopolies generally have to be closely watched; and they have to be closely watched particularly where they deal with such matters as the right to study, the right to do research, the right to lift from learned journals entire articles.

As I have indicated on more than one occasion, when we go to school, one of the things we like to think about is getting an A. One of the ways to get an A is to work hard; but another way to get an A is to make sure that we completely cover an issue that we start. In other words, don't just try to lift little bits out of manuscripts; take the whole manuscript, study it carefully, and make sure that we interrelate the various parts.

Under this bill, a student could not do that. If he were doing research and wanted an entire manuscript, he would be in breach of copyright. If it was part of the repertoire—

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): He is not. It is illegal now.

Senator Sinclair: My friend knows all about copyright law. Maybe he does. I say that if he wants to sue me, go ahead, but this bill enables him to give the right to a collective, who will say, "You cannot have any of the articles out of the X Law Review, because you have to take my whole repertoire."

I suppose that we should all be concerned about the rights of people who create things—writers; and I am sure that every honourable senator is much concerned about protection and full monopoly rights being extended to collectives holding the works of such distinguished authors as Davey, Doyle, Newman, Berton, and Mulroney. They all need help. They all need to be protected—and I suppose they need to be protected from students as much as from anybody else.

An Hon. Senator: And from voters.

Senator Sinclair: Someone said they have to be protected from voters. I think voters may be able to protect themselves. In any event, here we are the only country in the free world which is allowing a collective to establish monopoly rights in the education field without reasonable exceptions—where the courts have put a very restricted view, a very restricted interpretation, on the existing provision of the Copyright Act.

We have also to bear in mind that once we set up these collectives, make an arrangement with them, have the arrangement approved by the Copyright Appeal Board, and it then becomes legally enforceable, we always have to remember that there is some maverick out there who may not have joined the collective, and he will be tripped up, if he is a nasty person, in the way that Senator Barootes said: "I, individually, have a right, if you copy the whole manuscript and you are a student, to make life difficult for you."

So we have to be careful to define what use can be made of copyright material in the education system. That is why we had such strident, forceful presentations on behalf of school trustees, of presidents of universities, of school teachers and librarians, who said, "Don't proceed. Save us from these great collectives until we know what we are going to deal with, what exemptions we are going to have under fair dealing, what exemptions we will have for education work, what exemptions we will have for spontaneous use."

The overwhelming weight of evidence was therefore directed to the action taken by the government of dealing with this very complicated issue in two phases, and not maintaining a level playing field.

I was impressed by a letter that the committee received from Susan Merry of the Special Libraries Association, Copyright Law Implementation Committee. I will quote one small extract as follows:

Missing from the present bill is a balancing of the interests of authors and publishers with the needs of users. It is necessary to ensure that Canadian researchers have access to information equal to that provided in other countries as, for example, the U.K., the U.S. and Australia, where exemptions for certain uses within libraries, research centres or archives are provided in their copyright acts.

• (1600)

What does the minister say to that? In that trembling contralto voice, she says, "Wait until phase two." But the educationalists say, "No, you wait, minister, until fairness is brought into this bill." Thank goodness the Senate was there to bring an amendment that brings fairness to all. The minister said that phase two is imminent, phase two is just around the corner. She said that anybody that is going to be hurt is going to be looked after in phase two. She said to look after her artists, her writers, and not to worry about the users, to leave that for the future.

As I said, thank God for the Senate that brings fairness to the minister with the amendment it has proposed.

Honourable senators, I do not want to take too much time this afternoon, but it is very easy to see that the minister got carried away. The minister introduced the bill in May of last year. It wandered around in the other place under no forced draft, was given no priority, it just took its place along with other bills of little moment, I suppose, if there are any bills of little moment, but, in any event, some nine months later it came to the Senate. That was in the latter part of February. The bill was then referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The members of that committee obtained a précis of the material that was brought forth in the committee of the other place, gave it intensive study and put their finger on the flaws that had to be corrected. We said that the main thrust of the bill had the full support of the committee. It protects—maybe more than protects; maybe it goes too far—the creative side. However, it certainly does not look after the other side, the user side. Users' rights must be adequately protected. Balance must be maintained in copyright matters. The amendments the committee made make this possible.

Certain people appeared before the committee who said, "Don't touch it, please." Possibly the minister was one of those people. She said that there was such a heavy agenda in the other place, that there were so many things that had to be done, that the time was so short, that if the Senate fixed this bill, if it brought fairness to bear by proposing amendments and referred it back to the House of Commons, it would get lost in the shuffle over there. We were told not to do anything even if it were flawed, to just quiet down and not do a thing.

One witness who appeared before the committee asked what the point was in having hearings before the Senate if, although the Senate might recognize problems, it would pass the bill anyway. That witness said the Senate committee had to have some purpose behind it, that if the committee saw problems with the legislation it should send it back with recommendations for amendments. That is exactly what we have done.

All members of the committee, those from this side of the chamber and the opposite side of the chamber, expressed concern over the two-stage approach, but the members of the committee who sit opposite did not support the aforementioned amendments, at least when we signed off the report.

I wish to read a letter from the Chief Librarian of the University of Toronto Library. All members of the committee have received a copy of this letter. She writes:

I write to emphasize the importance of your voting in favour of the Senate Committee's amendments to Bill C-60.

She goes on to state:

I join other Canadian universities, colleges, schools, libraries and museums in urging the Senate to pass the Senate Committee's recommendations on copyright.

It could not have been better said, honourable senators, and, as I have said, when we signed off the report, our colleagues who support the government did not support the amendments, but, in view of the numerous people who do, and in view of the necessity of being fair, I expect that they will support the report when it comes to a vote.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I am indeed grateful to Senator Sinclair. If I may dare speak on behalf of Senator Davey, I am sure that he, too, will be filled with gratitude for the senator's concern about our individual positions under the law of copyright.

It did occur to me that a question of conflict of interest might come up here. I do own a copyright. I might say that I checked with my accountants before coming here and found that over the course of the past 35 years that copyright has returned me $2.70. That would put me in a very difficult position. However, the bill, fortunately, does not apply to work that has been written, sculpted, painted, broadcast, or whatever, in the past. It is not a bill that is retroactive. Nevertheless, the concern is hard to come by, and we are grateful.

Senator Sinclair: I do not like to interrupt the senator, but I suggest that he is wrong. The bill does apply to—

Senator Doyle: I will certainly not say that the honourable senator is wrong; I never do. Yes, indeed, I will check on that, but my accountant has checked and tells me, "There is not a penny in the bill for poor old Doyle."

Honourable senators, it is a great disappointment to me that those who are asked to sponsor legislation in this chamber are not always able to follow a bill through the committee process. I understand that committee appointments cannot always be made on the basis of legislation that might be reviewed, and sponsorship cannot be limited to committee members. At any rate, I was honoured to be asked to speak to Bill C-60 on second reading and, at the same time, regretted that other committee responsibilities would keep me away from the subsequent hearings. When possible, however, I did attend the meetings when the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee considered the proposed amendments to the Copyright Act. I was welcomed with great courtesy by the chairman and by the deputy chairman.

• (1610)

But, for the most part, I am no better informed than any other senator in this chamber in my understanding of the report, which found its way to my desk before the Easter break. I know what it says; I know how it was presented to committee members and how they voted on its recommendations, but I do not understand how it could have been adopted or how I could defend it from attack as the very stereotype of what might be expected from the aging keepers of the status quo in this blessed place. If I did not suspect that the fate of Bill C-60 was a by-product of a larger exercise in political delay and diversion, I would have to concede that it did speak for out-of-date, out-of-reason, out-of-conscience service to recognized establishments, that it is testimony to the fact that the Senate is what it is cracked down to be.

Honourable Senators, what we are dealing with here is a bill intended by the minister to open the doors to fair practice for artists, authors, composers, performers and choreographers; to give them bargaining rights and negotiating vehicles and voices in the use made of their work; to lift them out of the constraints that have lasted the 64 years of the present act's lifetime; to go beyond the time when it was considered reward enough for Milly to have her nice little water colour of the Gattineau shown at the Art Gallery of Ontario, or a sufficient source of pride to Willy to have his book of poems right there on the shelves of the public library alongside the works of Pauline Johnson and Duncan Campbell Scott. Creators, of course, have had other compensations. They have had buckets of praise. As Flora MacDonald, the Minister of Communications, said in her testimony to the Banking Committee:

Politicians are always the first to acknowledge the importance of Canada's artistic and cultural heritage. We talk about uniqueness and identity, about the soul and the spirit of the nation living in the expression of our artistic personality. We are ready to rush into print at the merest suggestion, real or imagined, of a threat to our country's intellectual independence, and the battle is never so thick, so furious, as when one of our beloved cultural institutions faces the least constriction of its pipeline to the national treasury.

The minister then separated what we say from what we do, and, although there is little in their report to confirm it, I cannot believe that any one of the committee members was not appalled to hear that the average annual income of a professional writer in Canada today is about $10,000. Librarians, who classify and distribute their books, earn twice and three times that amount. Teachers, who draw upon their books in classrooms, earn three, four and even five times that amount. But writers—writers are the economic elite of the cultural community. Painters, sculptors, choreographers, composers and film makers too often must turn to incomes from other occupations to finance the products of their talents. For some of them, if it were not for public grant money there would be no money at all. And some of us say that when artists seek such support they "suck at the public trough."

Miss MacDonald told the committee that our artists do not want lifetime sinecures and pensions but respect for their rights as creators—rights which in many cases already exist, but which remain unenforceable. She said:

It is the opinion of the Government — an opinion which I am happy to say is supported by both opposition parties in the House of Commons — that it is high time to stop paying lip service to those rights and to prove our commitment to them. This is what Bill C-60 will do.

The bill, we all know, would not begin to relieve all of the risks and disappointments of an artist's life. But it would, after 64 years in which attempt after attempt was made to achieve copyright equity, provide rules for the game that were not tilted unbelievably in the user's favour.

Was it too much to expect that the committee's report would, at least, be written from the point of view of the creators we would protect rather than from that of the users we would shelter?

A subsequent bill is to deal with exceptions for users—those who wish to provide maximum access to classroom, library, gallery, archival and museum use of the expertise, elegance and beauty of the work our artists have provided. There is no quarrel with that, but the committee asks, "Why not wait for the other shoe to drop and have everything come together in one big bill for everybody? What's a year?"

Are we to wait? Are we to seek compromise between the two factions, which have been unable to agree, when agreement seems impossible as long as the users have everything to gain and nothing to lose from stalemate?

It must be interesting to honourable senators to note that the committee had no difficulty with that section of Bill C-60 which provides copyright protection for the information technology industry—a corporate sector which has great need of legislation to halt the drain of $400 million and 8,000 jobs annually.

At the close of her lengthy examination by members of the Banking Committee, Miss MacDonald said this:

I have not heard much comment this evening on behalf of a segment of the community which has been disenfranchised for 60 years; and I think there really has to be some balance in this. I recognize the concerns of the educational institutions, I also recognize the clout and weight of the educational institutions. Certainly they have many people involved in it. I recognize also that authors, artists and creators are not well organized, that no one really speaks very clearly for them or with any great power.

It was after the minister spoke that we were made aware of how strongly Canadian creators were willing to speak on their own behalf. A delegation of artists, authors and composers appeared at the Senate door to present a message to this chamber. If I may, I will quote from it:

Copyright infringement has become institutionalized in Canada, and the damage done to the owners of the stolen property is considered to be of such little consequence that it is sanctioned and encouraged by teachers, librarians and museum directors.

I might say that when this message was delivered, several of us were there to meet those representatives. Senator MacDonald was present as the deputy chairman of the committee, and Senator Frith, Senator Phillips, Senator Anderson and Senator Rossiter were also on hand.

I quote further:

We do not believe that the people support the system of institutionalized theft of Canadian authors' works. Nor do we believe that the public wishes to finance political action that has forced artists and authors to engage in a protracted 30-year battle to secure their rights.

● (1620)

And then this:

For without the revenues that should accrue from the sale and use of copyright works produced here, Canada will continue to depend on imports of works by foreign authors and artists, made in environments where such work is properly protected.

And finally:

To the Senators of Canada we say this: You can vote to pass Bill C-60 or send it back to Parliament. If you choose the latter course, your message will be clear and unequivocal. You will be telling Canadian authors and artists that you refuse to put into place the legislative tools necessary to bring the level of protection for our work up to the standard of developed countries around the world.

Senator Sinclair has just told us what a number of the users of copyright have said. Perhaps I should mention the names of those groups that were represented at the door of the Senate who sent that message to you: The Canadian Music Publishers Association; the Canadian Musical Reproduction Rights Agency Limited; the Canadian Artists' Representation; Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Ltd.; Playwrights Union of Canada; the Canadian Recording Industry Association; the Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists (ACTRA); the Performing Rights Organization of Canada Ltd.; Periodical Writers Association of Canada; the Writers Union of Canada; the League of Canadian Poets; Canadian Songwriters Association; ANPAC/RACA, Association of National Non-Profit Artists Centres; Information Technology Association of Canada; Canadian Independent Record Production Association; Independent Artists Union; Canadian Reprography Collective; Canadian Authors Association; Canadian Copyright Institute; Writers Federation of Nova Scotia; Manitoba Writers Guild Inc.; Saskatchewan Writers Guild; the Association of Canadian Publishers; and the Canadian Conference of the Arts. There are 24 organizations, and there have also been individual letters from persons concerned with this legislation, just as Senator Sinclair says he has received letters from the presidents of universities and the chairmen of the associations representing libraries and others.

The signatories of that message are hoping that there will be some sensitivity from this place they have not yet recognized. I should say that there were words spoken clearly and powerfully on creators' behalf by senators from both sides of this place while the bill was before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Those words are not reflected in the report submitted to this chamber.

Conscience should tell us what to do with it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Would my friend object if I were to make my contribution to the debate at this moment?

Senator Frith: No. That is why I looked around to see if anyone wanted to speak. Of course, not only Senator Roblin but everyone here or anyone out in the corridors who wants to speak may speak. At the end of that process I would like to adjourn the debate.

Senator Roblin: I would like to thank my friend. I acknowledge his courtesy.

I had some hesitation about rising, because, after listening to the moving statement made by Senator Doyle, I think my contribution might be regarded as a bit of a plodding counterpoint to the picture that he sketched as to the emotional, cultural and intellectual aspects of his statement and the view that this Senate ought to concur in this bill without amendment at the present time, a view with which I concur.

This bill has not had an easy passage. In the other House there were some 256 briefs, 88 witnesses appearing, five months of discussion in committee. In our own chamber it also received more than the usual amount of consideration, and it aroused more than the usual amount of interest on the part of people from many sectors of the public who had views they wished to present to this chamber to influence us in the decisions which we were about to take. We heard about many different kinds of intellectual rights: copyrights, computer software, industrial design, choreography, and in that wide range of intellectual activities to which I think the vast majority of the dollars and cents signs are attached we found ourselves able to agree.

However, there was one category of person who is gifted in the presentation of cultural activities—the creative artists of the country—whose case we have decided to put aside for the time being, because we do not like the way in which this bill deals with it. I am glad the chairman made it clear—and I thank my friend, Senator Doyle, for emphasizing the fact—that the committee was not unanimous when this amending motion was placed before it. In fact, on one or two occasions—at least one occasion—if it had not been for the casting vote of the chairman, I do not think we would have advised the Senate to amend this bill.

So, it was a matter of some real debate and concern, and I pay my respects to those who presented points of view which differ from my own. I only wish that I had been eloquent enough at that time to persuade them that another view was possible.

When you come down to the essence of the quarrel, the meat of the substance that divides us, it is quite simple: It is the interest of the creative artist versus the interest of the user. It is as simple as that. The various types of creative artists were listed by my friend who just spoke, and we know that they cover the whole gamut of our cultural activities. We know from what the chairman of the committee said that the users consist of very important bodies of people in the educational field, in museums, and in institutions of that kind. That is where the balance lies. These various issues can be decided by accepting the point of view of the creative artist or accepting the complaints of the users that the situation is not agreeable to them.

If I were to sketch the case for the artistic community, I could do no better than to plagiarize Senator Doyle, so I will not do that. He is much more eloquent than I can be, being much closer to this cause. All of us understand from common sense and from our observations that people in the cultural field do not get a very good economic deal. Most of the time they do not get enough money to keep body and soul together. This situation is nothing new. It has been with us for 64 years, since the last time this legislation was amended.

It seems to me that if we have that concern for the cultural character of our country, if we really believe that that aspect of human life and activity ought to be encouraged to establish a truly Canadian approach to these humane matters, then surely the question as to whether or not the people who have the genius to express these cultural ideas and notions have some expectation of adequate support, and the work that they do is something that cannot escape our notice. In my opinion, it should not escape our favourable notice.

Low rewards for creative people have been the order of the day as long as most people in this chamber have been alive. We are now offered an opportunity to do something about this. Let us consider it carefully.

Bill C-60, unamended, is what I call the artists' charter. But if the amendments proposed by the committee are accepted, then, I believe, we have to call it the users' charter, because the creative artists are back where they have always been, which is nowhere in particular. I think I could include the chairman of the committee in the group of user witnesses, although he is not here to hear this encomium delivered. Every one of these witnesses, I think without exception, expressed sympathy with the statement of the artistic community. They had plenty of sympathy, and said that something should be done. But they all wanted some kind of amendment to the bill that would protect them from the impact of the legislation which is before us now. If the Senate has its way in adopting the resolutions from this committee, then sympathy is about all that they will get—at least until some time in the rather indefinite future, and I will certainly come to that.

● (1630)

Let us try to understand what the users are complaining about, because it is not good enough simply to dismiss what they have to say without some reasonable consideration of their point of view.

I hope I do not minimize their problems if I say that one of the main things that came through to me was: "Senate, House of Commons, government, you are making a change." Whenever you make a change of this sort, which affects a lot of people, you will find that they will consider that change troublesome, inconvenient and rather awkward. "We will have to do something differently from what we did before. In fact, we will have to deal with the artists. We have never had to do this in any regular or legislated manner heretofore, but now we will have to deal with the artists. You are asking us to do this." There were plenty of impressions that certainly came across to me that the people who were complaining about this bill were really saying, "This will be a considerable inconvenience to us if you put this through, and, what's more, it will probably be rather expensive. We do not want to do it until we have our point of view fully expressed in the legislation."

These two questions of "a change, something new, inconvenience and awkwardness," married to the question of money and, "how much will it cost us?" were the two impressions that came across to me from the people who were objecting to this bill.

I see that one of my senatorial comrades is shaking her head. I daresay she will put me right in due course, but that is the way it impressed me as I listened to the evidence before the committee.

One of the things we examined was, "Well, how much money is it likely to cost?" Indeed, the whole purpose of Bill C-60, as far as this and other clauses are concerned, is money. People will have to pay for something they did not have to pay for before. That is the purpose of the bill; that is the idea. So there has to be a concept of money. When you get to a concept of money, all kinds of institutions, which have a hard time with their budgets right now—and I do not minimize that in any way—feel that they will be asked to put up more money than they have had to put up so far, and they find that a difficulty that they are not willing to face at the present time.

When the minister was in the committee, she told us what that extra money was likely to be. I do not know how accurate her estimate was—it was a number of millions of dollars—but considered as a per cent of the total amount of money spent on education, museums and all that vast apparatus of public service, it certainly did not strike me as being an excessive amount.

It seems to me that these monetary fears are exaggerated, because, in spite of the fact that my honourable friend, the chairman of the committee, talked about "monopoly power" and the fact that these collectives and other people would have "monopoly power" to impose whatever they like—that is the impression he gave me—on the users who will be subject to this bill, that is not the case.

Before the bill was amended, there was a clause in there, 50.2(1), which set up an appeal board to deal with cases where the user and the supplier of a cultural artifact or service could be entitled to go if they found that they did not think they were getting a fair deal one way or the other. It is not an unrestricted monopoly situation; it is a monopoly situation in respect of a certain artistic creation. But there is a procedure and a mechanism to ensure that the monopoly power is not abused.

It is just like a public utility board, I guess. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee is not here, because he knows all about appearing before public utility boards in order to deal with monopoly situations.

Senator Flynn: But he has forgotten.

Senator Roblin: But in their zeal the committee has decided to abolish this appeal board. If you look at the amendments, the appeal board is out the window; it is abolished. Well, not entirely. It is abolished for one year, or until such further time as may be decided by the people who are in charge of this administration. In other words, it is given an indefinite hoist. No one can say, reading the proposed amendments to this bill, when, if ever, this monopoly control board will be reinstituted. Why it is being tossed out astonishes me. I cannot find any rational reason why that should be the case.

I suppose one could say, "Roblin, read a little further in the amendments and you can find a reason." Of course, I guess I can. It does not really matter what they do about this appeal board, because the collective which it is designed to control is also knocked down with this bill. It is postponed for one year, or until such further time as it may be proclaimed. In other words, it is given an indefinite hoist.

So the two matters—the collective, which is designed to mobilize the artist's rights, and the appeal board, which is designed to ensure that the user gets a fair deal—are knocked out of this bill and put on indefinite hold. That is a curious procedure for this Senate to adopt, in view of the explanation of the nature of the amendments given to us by the chairman of the committee. The collective is gutted; it is out. Whether it will ever come back, heaven only knows.

The other thing that this bill does is that it removes entirely the exhibition rights. Exhibition rights are struck out. They are not just given an indefinite hoist like these other two items. They disappear; they are struck out. No nothing! They are killed. They are excised. They are abolished. The very core of the case for the artistic community resides in the exhibition rights. If they are discarded from this bill and struck from it, as indeed they are, then there is nothing at all for these cultural activities to rest their hopes upon. The exhibition rights are the very heart of the rights that the artists hope to acquire. If we adopt this report, they will be abolished and they will be out of it—period.

So the Senate has been nothing if not thorough. It has taken all the clauses of the bill that have to deal with artistic rights and has got rid of them, saying that they are no longer part of this piece of legislation. The hopes of the creative artists will be sadly misplaced if this Senate decides to proceed on the course recommended in the report before us now.

The exhibition rights are excised, the collectives are indefinitely postponed, and the appeal board designed to assure fair play is also indefinitely postponed—all on the ground that there are some further things that need to be brought in before we can consider this bill. I suggest to you, as my honourable friend just did, that that is a false argument, because if you say, "We will not pass any legislation until some people outside the legislative ambit have made their decision," where does it leave us as arbitrators of the public good? Waiting for what they decide to do if and when they decide to do it? Surely, that cannot be the function of law makers.

The procedures that are laid down in this bill provide that the creative artists can proceed at once with their collectives and appeals. The question of resolving the differences between the two parties can be settled in these appeal boards, which are public operations where the whole artistic community and the nation as a whole can take part or see what is going on.

The procedure for resolving any ambiguities that one finds distressing in this bill is provided for, in my opinion, because of the appeal board, which is given the full power to adjudicate on these matters. It is a public procedure on which all can be informed and in which all can take part. Therefore, to say that I do not like this bill and I will not pass it because it has some defects in it; that there are some definitions lacking and matters of that kind which, we can all agree, might well be of concern; to say that they are sufficient in themselves to lead us to amend this bill in the way in which we have done and take whatever risk there is—and I am no expert on that, but it might get lost in the shuffle in the other place—I am not sure that that should weigh our considerations to any great extent.

However, to say that the defects that we perceive in this bill are sufficient for us to amend it and thereby risk its abandonment is, I think, not justified.

Honourable senators, if there are points in this bill that concern the users, as they no doubt concern the artistic community, we had in this bill before it was amended a procedure for adjudication which, it seems to me, would take care of these difficult matters in a reasonable and democratic way. However, if we say that we are not going to do it until outside parties get together and make up their minds as to what they are going to do, what then becomes of the legislative authority of this chamber? Are we merely to react to the kind of propositions that are put to us by outsiders when we now have the opportunity to do the right thing ourselves? It seems to me, honourable senators, we should not consider that course. It seems to me that we should decide right here and now that this bill should not be amended and that it should be passed in its present form.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Roblin would entertain a question. As he points out, I would like to speak on this matter tomorrow in order to make the argument for the other side. However, Senator Roblin said in his speech just now—and I may not have the precise words—that if the amendment on exhibition rights is accepted, then exhibition rights are killed for all time. Does that mean that Senator Roblin has some information that we do not have that the minister is not planning a second phase of this bill? In other words, is it not possible for the minister to reintroduce exhibition rights in the next stage of the bill, as everyone has agreed?

Senator Roblin: I am sure my honourable friend appreciates that a bill can be brought in at any time by anyone to do anything. Therefore, when I talked about its being abolished I meant with respect to this bill. With respect to this bill, it has not merely been given an indefinite hoist, as has been done with the tribunal or with the collective rights. Those matters have been given an indefinite hoist, and it is hard to tell when they may be proclaimed. However, this particular clause has been struck entirely from the bill, so, unless and until there is some new legislation—and who knows whether that will come?—it is dead. It is certainly dead in this bill, and it cannot be resurrected by any order-in-council action if we pass this bill as amended.

Senator Marsden: I thank Senator Roblin, but hasten to point out that he has just put his finger on my question. He just said, "until there is some new legislation, and who knows whether that will come?" If I understood the minister correctly, we were promised the next phase of that legislation very quickly. I would like to ask Senator Roblin: Is that no longer true?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am dealing with the bill that is before the chamber now. When my friend shows me the new bill, then I will be willing to talk to her about it.

Senator Marsden: We, too, are very anxious to see the new bill.

Senator Roblin: You may wait a while.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I had the opportunity to reread what Senator Molgat had said and my own remarks. I have no real objection to adopting the report. I would not object to putting the question.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGISLATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 19, 1988, moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be; and

That, within 120 days after the adoption of this resolution, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should consider the advisability of tabling in the Senate the response of the government to this recommendation.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the hour is late and that Royal Assent is scheduled for this afternoon, I shall not speak on this motion this afternoon but shall move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 28, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to table its sixth report, respecting its examination of farm finance, assessment of current problems and consideration of policy and programs, entitled "Financing the Family Farm to the Year 2000".

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

May I suggest, honourable senators, that either the Clerk or I read it? It is quite short. I shall be proposing that its consideration be adjourned so that we may have an opportunity to look at it; but rather than dispense with its reading, I think it important that honourable senators know its content.

The report reads as follows:

Your Committee recommends the approval of the Guidelines for Senators' Research Expenditures attached to this Report.

There is a schedule attached.

With respect to the Ad Hoc Committee, your Committee recommends that it be established and composed of the following Senators: Hays, LeBlanc (Beauséjour), Leblanc (Saurel), Molgat, Nurgitz, Phillips, Sinclair and Tremblay.

That is a total of eight senators.

Your Committee also recommends that Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour), be the Chairman of the said Ad Hoc Committee.

Respectfully submitted,—

It is signed by me as deputy chairman of the committee.

The guidelines run to three pages.

(For text of appendix to report, see Appendix, p. 3262.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ORDER OF CANADA

NOTICE OF INVESTITURE CEREMONY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is not really a report from the Internal Economy Committee. I merely wish to apprise honourable senators of something about which they may or may not know, and about which I think the Senate in general should know. The ceremony for the Order of Canada investiture will take place in the Senate chamber on Friday, May 6, 1988, at 6 p.m. That arrangement has been made because the accommodation that is normally used at Rideau Hall is not available, and Her Excellency asked if she could use the Senate chamber on two occasions. This is the second of those two occasions. So it will take place on Friday at 6 p.m., and there will be a reception in some of the adjacent rooms—I believe in the Reading Room and in the foyer.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 3rd May, 1988, at two o'clock on the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—SUGGESTED FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the Meech Lake Accord. One thing that was consistent during the hearings, from everyone who made presentations, whether to the task force, to the Committee of the Whole, and even to the joint committee, was that they did want an accord. They agreed with the principles that the government was trying to establish; they agreed with what the government was trying to do—

Senator Flynn: I disagree!

Senator Lucier: —but they had problems with the contents of the Meech Lake Accord.

Now that Premier McKenna has said that he will not accept the accord as written, and that Sharon Carstairs has said that the accord is “dead” as far as she is concerned, and Justice Willard Estey of the Supreme Court of Canada has said that the accord should be looked at again—

Senator Flynn: What?

Senator Murray: Who was the last person you referred to?

Senator Lucier: Justice Willard Estey.

Senator Flynn: He is retired.

Senator Lucier: He retired on Monday; he has not gone yet.

Yesterday the results of a poll were released that indicated there are now only 25 per cent of Canadians who support the Meech Lake Accord.

Is the government considering recalling the premiers to try to come up with something that would make the Meech Lake Accord acceptable rather than just let it die? It seems to me that the objective of everyone in this exercise has been to try to improve the accord.

Senator Flynn: That's not true! You want to kill the accord.

Senator Lucier: Senator Flynn may laugh, but it does not take much to make him laugh.

Senator Flynn: You tried to kill the accord, not improve it.

Senator Lucier: One has to change it to improve it. I do not know whether or not Senator Flynn understands that.

Senator Flynn: You wanted to kill it!

Senator Lucier: I am trying to ask a serious question. I think the people of Canada want some kind of an accord that would allow Quebec to sign. That is what I am trying to say, and that is what Canadians have told us.

Is the government considering bringing the premiers back together to come up with something that is acceptable?

Senator Buckwold: Or is the government going to kill it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government will see the Meech Lake Accord through to the end. We are committed to the Meech Lake Accord. The choice is not between this accord and some other hypothetical accord; the choice is between this accord and no accord.

With regard to the situation the honourable senator has described, he persists, as the saying goes, in seeing the glass half empty. I prefer to see the glass half full, or more than half full.

● (1410)

Senator Lucier has mentioned the Premier of New Brunswick. The Premier of New Brunswick has decided to send the accord to a parliamentary committee. As far as I am aware, he has not anticipated the recommendations of that committee, nor has he said that he would not accept the accord. Mrs. Carstairs is the Leader of the Opposition in Manitoba. The Premier designate of Manitoba has stated that he is in favour of the accord and has undertaken, as had his predecessor, to send the accord to a parliamentary committee. I trust that Mrs. Carstairs, the new Leader of the Opposition of that province, would not attempt to block a study of the accord by a parliamentary committee.

On the other hand, the accord has been ratified by the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Quebec. It will be placed before the legislators of the province of British Columbia during the present session. This is also the case in the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. In Ontario, a legislative committee is nearing the end of its work. I would expect, therefore, as I have said on previous occasions, that the vast majority of the provinces will have ratified the Meech Lake Accord by the summertime.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, it seems to me that the Leader of the Government is not being realistic. The three provinces that have passed the accord tried to sneak it through in a hurry before anyone found out what was in it.

Senator Buckwold: There was not even one public hearing!

Senator Lucier: The accord has not yet been ratified by every province, and the people of Canada are now taking a look at what is really in it. I believe the Leader of the Government is now saying—and I would like him to confirm this—that it is going to be this accord or no accord at all. Therefore, what he is saying, in effect, is that this government is going to kill the accord. If there must be unanimity in the ratification of the accord and there is no such unanimity, then the accord will die. The Premier elect of Manitoba said yesterday that the accord will not be one of his priorities. Obviously, he will not be able to get it through, so he is not going to introduce it. In effect, then, this government is saying, “Fine, let it die!” Is my understanding correct?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Government of Canada, together with ten signatories to the Meech Lake Accord, has committed itself to that accord. We will see it through to the end.

Senator Flynn: If you don't like it, you can lump it!

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—TERMINAL DATE FOR APPROVAL—PROVISION FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PROVINCIAL APPROVAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would clarify a point for me. I believe that some month in 1990 is the terminal date by which all of the signatories to the accord have the opportunity to take legislative action with respect to it. If the action is taken, then, presumably, the accord will be the law of the land. If not, it will not become the law of the land. That is my first point.

My second point is this: Is it contemplated that a province could reverse a position previously taken if there were an election before the terminal date? Let us take, for example, the case where an election took place and a new government sought the legislative disapproval of the accord before the expiry date. Is that contemplated or provided for at this time? Could a legislature within the specified time frame withdraw its adherence to the accord?

Senator Flynn: You can read the Constitution as well as anybody else can.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the second part of the question, my information is that a new legislature can withdraw its support for the accord at any time prior to proclamation, but not after proclamation, of course.

Senator Flynn: And a legislature could also support the accord if the previous legislature had refused to approve it.

Senator Murray: With regard to the first part of the question, the date, if my memory serves me correctly, is June 1990.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., for the adoption of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on 24th March, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Marsden has agreed that I proceed. When I have concluded, she will either adjourn the debate or speak on this bill.

I am in a difficult position on this bill, Bill C-60, and the report of the committee. I am between, I guess, what some people these days call a rock and a hard place. I suppose if I have to describe them, the rock would be my own personal feelings about this bill, and the hard place is the position that, so far, the majority of the Liberal caucus is taking on the bill. That is one way of describing it. A dilemma is, perhaps, another way of describing it. Another way of picturing it could be this: The cartoonist who does the cartoon called "The Far Side" did one showing a devil standing in front of the gates to hell. On the top of one gate or door a sign said, "Damned if you do," and on the top of the other gate a sign said, "Damned if you don't." The devil, armed with a fork, was saying to the poor chap who was standing in front of the gates, "Come on, come on, it's one or the other!" Fortunately, that is not the only final response available to the Senate under our rules.

Honourable senators, I do not want to review all aspects of this bill. Senator Sinclair and Senator Doyle have done so, and I believe they have summarized well the results of the studies of this bill both here and in the other place. My understanding of its essence is that it provides for the collective enforcement of rights that already exist. It does not create copyright. These rights exist and have existed for many years. However, this bill makes it clear that they can be enforced collectively. They could be enforced collectively now. There is nothing to prevent the collectives from forming, but there is a question mark as to whether that would be contrary to restrictive trade practices legislation.

There are weaknesses in the bill. I think it is too bad the legislation is being enacted in two stages. I think it would be much better—and those who support the bill have admitted that it would be much better—if it were enacted in one stage and not two stages. Many of the problems that have arisen have resulted because of that.

Other weaknesses have been underlined by Senator Sinclair, and I agree with many of them. On balance, it is a judgment call, and the metaphor used has been to describe it in terms of a level playing field. I have never understood what that metaphor means. It never seemed to me to be an appropriate metaphor. I know that it means to say there are some unfair playing conditions, but I cannot picture a playing field as unlevel. You think of a billiard table perhaps being unlevel, or you think of a pinball machine being unlevel, but not a playing field. If it is saying that it has some bumps in it, then that is fair to both sides.

In any event, the idea is that there are two players and that it is unfair to one of them because the playing field is not level. I notice that Mr. Safire, who writes a weekly column in the magazine section of the Sunday New York Times, has launched an inquiry into the subject under the auspices of our ambassador to Washington, Mr. Gotlieb. Excuse me for that parenthetical comment, but the next time someone uses the words "level playing field," I hope they can explain the appropriateness of the metaphor.

As Senator Doyle has said, and as Senator Sinclair has agreed, it has been a long wait for the creators who own copyright—a wait of 64 years—and I do not think it is fair to ask them to, in effect, continue to subsidize the users, which is really what they are doing, by refraining from enforcing the rights they have and have had for so long. Again, on balance, what we gain by passing this bill without amendments greatly outweighs the interests of those who want further delay.

● (1420)

So, as senators may know, I have tried for a week or ten days—longer, really—to find a compromise between the position of the minister on the bill and the amendments that are proposed by the committee. I can report that that undertaking is not yet over; it is not dead. I think it is still a possibility. I hope—if honourable senators agree—that Senator Marsden will adjourn the debate and give us at least until next week to see if we can come up with an agreement between the minister and the majority members of the committee. If we can't, honourable senators, we should get rid of it next week and return it to the House of Commons, either with these amendments or, I hope, with amendments that the minister would be prepared to accept.

I hope I have made it clear that I am not speaking for my caucus, I am speaking for myself. My Liberal colleagues are not to take this as an appeal on the basis of my position as deputy leader, but I do not mind if they accept its appeal on its merits—that is up to them.

For those reasons, and between those two positions, I felt that I owed an explanation to all of my colleagues in the Senate as to why I propose to abstain. I believe the bill should be passed without amendments, but at the present time we, in the Senate, operate on the party system, and I do not want to vote against my party.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eileen Rossiter moved the second reading of Bill C-118, to amend the Customs Tariff.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-118, to amend the Customs Tariff, gives effect to the tariff amendments tabled by the Minister of Finance as part of the budget of February 10, 1988. They have been in effect on a provisional basis since the day following the budget, as is the traditional practice.

The House of Commons has given speedy approval to this bill and I believe that we should do the same. The tariff changes in the bill are of benefit to the Canadian firms and individuals who requested them, and they do not adversely affect other Canadians. These amendments reflect the long-standing practice of amending the Customs Tariff as part of the budget process in order to respond to new problems and needs in the tariff area which require statutory amendments to the legislation.

The package of tariff measures in this bill is quite small compared to most previous budgets. It is, nevertheless, important to those who benefit from the changes. The oil sands industry is receiving duty-free entry for a wide range of equipment it has to import. Farmers will benefit from removal of the duty on steel rods used in the construction or repair of silos. Transportation companies and consumers are the beneficiaries of the amendments which remove the tariffs on certain air compressors and differentials used in motor vehicles. Consumers also gain from tariff elimination on certain model kits. The tariff on burial shrouds is being removed at the request of a synagogue in Vancouver. The blind will benefit from removal of the duty on certain audio tapes which are used to make cassettes.

The bill contains a few technical amendments as well. Most of these are designed to ensure that goods which have been entering Canada free of duty for some time will continue to do so, notwithstanding certain technological changes in the products or other factors which, without corrective action, would result in their reclassification and the assessment of duties on them.

It is important for senators to note that none of the products covered by these tariff changes is made in Canada, so, as I said, the amendments do not have a negative impact on Canadian manufacturers.

In light of these factors, I hope that we can all agree that this bill is a good one and need not be held up. I urge my colleagues to approve it without delay.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

EMERGENCIES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to Bill C-77, which has been referred to as the Emergencies Bill. In several respects, this bill is a companion piece to Bill C-76, the Emergency Measures Act, passed by the Senate on March 31 of this year.

The bill before us today finally implements a commitment of this and previous federal governments to replace the out-moded and draconian War Measures Act with more balanced and appropriately safeguarded emergencies legislation.

Everyone in this chamber knows the history of the War Measures Act. It was passed quickly and in some panic in August 1914, as our infant country tried to put itself on a war footing to respond to the conflagration about to consume Europe. It was used to intern suspected "communists" in Canada in the days following the Russian Revolution in 1917, and it was used in one of the darkest periods of our history to intern Japanese Canadians during the Second World War.

The War Measures Act was used most recently in 1970 in response to a perceived "apprehended insurrection" in Quebec. I see no point in dredging up the history of this unhappy period and debating whether the government of the day acted reasonably and properly in invoking the act at that time and under those circumstances.

There are, however, three basic points that I should like to make that spring to mind from that experience. First, whether or not invocation of the act was required to meet the situation in Quebec at the time, it never should have been used as a pretext for arbitrary arrest and detention of people in Simcoe, Ontario, or Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Second, I think the best that can be said of the events in 1970 is that when the government went to the cupboard, the only thing available was the War Measures Act, a very blunt instrument designed, as its name suggests, for wartime use.

The third point resulting from the 1970 experience is that as a practical matter—because of the 1970 experience and the subsequent reaction to it—the War Measures Act will almost certainly not be used again in peacetime, or, at least, it will not be used for anything short of an urgent threat of an insurrection akin to a coup d'état.

In other words, Canada does not have, as a practical matter, access to legislation to define governments' responses to emergencies of lesser magnitude than a pending declaration of war. As such, we stand alone. Every industrialized country in the world and every province in Canada has emergency legislation to allow governments to respond to a range of emergency situations. I think that everyone in this chamber agrees that this lack represents an unacceptable situation that cannot be allowed to persist.

One of the most enduring and fundamental principles of government is salus populi suprema lex—the safety of the people is the supreme law. As parliamentarians, we would be derelict in our duty not to correct this anomaly. Agreement that the anomaly must be set right is the easy part. How to do it is fraught with complexities and divergent views.

This is a complex and difficult bill. I have thought long and hard on how best to describe it and have come up with the following two basic objectives that this bill is trying to achieve: The first is to provide Canada with a legislative framework that allows governments to take measured and appropriate, but effective, responses to a host of peacetime emergencies that may occur within Canada. The second objective is to solve the dilemma posed by President Lincoln toward the end of the American Civil War:

It has long been a grave question whether any government not too strong for the liberties of its people can be strong enough to maintain its existence in great emergencies.

In short, how can we protect the civil rights of citizens while, at the same time, providing governments with effective powers to respond to emergencies?

● (1430)

Let me take those two objectives as foundations for the examination of this bill. As I said earlier, the War Measures Act was designed for use in wartime. Its powers are too blunt, wide-ranging and draconian for use in lesser emergencies. In order to allow governments to make an appropriate response to a host of emergencies, Bill C-77 defines four kinds of emergencies, each with its measured response. The four types are: public welfare emergencies, public order emergencies, international emergencies and war emergencies. These four emergencies fall under the umbrella of "national emergency" as defined in clause 3 of this bill, which reads:

For the purposes of this Act, a "national emergency" is an urgent and critical situation of a temporary nature that

(a) seriously endangers the lives, health or safety of Canadians and is of such proportions or nature as to exceed the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it, or

(b) seriously threatens the ability of the Government of Canada to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada and that cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada.

Honourable senators, let us now look at the bill's definitions of each of the four subsidiary emergencies.

Public welfare emergencies are those peace-time challenges that are brought on by forces of nature—drought, storm, earthquakes, fire, flood—and by man—chemical spills, contagion, major accidents, and so on. Although these emergencies may bring about social disruption and imperil property and the safety of Canadians, there is no threat to the security of the state, and it will usually be isolated in one or a few provinces. Public order emergencies encompass actions by a relatively few people within Canada that endanger the safety and security of Canadians or the security of the state. Terrorism would fall within this category of emergency, and, once again, the emergency would tend to be isolated in one or a few provinces, although there may be a danger that these emergencies could spread.

Questions have been asked, for example, why a terrorist incident could not be handled locally by the RCMP, the local police forces and perhaps by the Special Emergency Response Team under the current Security Offences Act. As the hijacking of the Kuwaiti Airlines' 747 in April demonstrated, terrorists are becoming increasingly sophisticated. It is conceivable that a hijacked jet could fly from place to place in Canada. We have known since 1975 that some terrorist groups have access to highly lethal, chemical, radiological, bacterial agents that could devastate a huge area. Terrorist attacks on electrical, natural gas and telecommunications systems could trigger an emergency, chaos and civil disorder that could be regional, or perhaps even national, in scope.

For these kinds of reasons the Security Offences Act is, unfortunately, inadequate, and more general legislation along the lines of Bill C-77 is required.

"International emergencies" is defined to cover periods of international tension such as the Cuban missile crisis, where a declaration of war may result. The declaration of a state of emergency, less than a full war footing, allows a country to take the civil, military and economic measures necessary to prepare for war, without taking the precipitate and perhaps provocative step of declaring war. Obviously, such a declaration would apply to the entire country. "War emergencies" are those for which the current War Measures Act was designed. Under this bill, such an emergency may be declared only at a time of war or conflict, actual or imminent, and would, obviously, apply to the entire country.

Let me now turn to the second dilemma this bill attempts to resolve; balancing a government's requirement for effective action with civil rights of citizens. The current War Measures Act is particularly flawed in this respect. It lacks any real safeguards to protect individual rights and freedoms. Bill C-77 attempts to correct these flaws in the following ways.

Bill C-77 confirms Parliament's pivotal role in controlling developments. The bill requires the government to convene Parliament within one week of declaring any emergency. Once Parliament is in session, the government must describe the actions it has taken and the reasons for those actions. Time must be allocated to debate the subject continuously for three sitting days. Parliament has the authority to negate any motion for continuation of an emergency. Even after Parliament has confirmed a motion for the declaring of an emergency, Bill C-77 provides a mechanism whereby ten or more members of this place, and twenty or more members of the other place, may table a motion to revoke an emergency declaration, and ten hours of debating time must be allotted and the motion voted on.

The bill also requires that an all-party joint review committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be constituted when a declaration of emergency occurs. All orders and regulations relating to the declaration would be referred to Parliament. Any secret orders may be referred to the committee and the committee would have the power to revoke or amend them. Furthermore, the committee would report to Parliament every 60 days during the time in which an emergency declaration is in force or whenever an emergency declaration is continued or revoked.

In these ways, Parliament will have a very effective way to guard against excessive zeal by a government, both by approving the initial emergency declaration and the orders and regulations thereto; and by monitoring the on-going need for an emergency declaration at any time.

Any action taken under Bill C-77 would be subject to full review by the courts and the courts could declare null and void any emergency declaration under this bill.

Whereas the War Measures Act is silent on the question of compensation, Bill C-77 provides for mandatory reasonable compensation to people who suffer loss or injury through its application.

Under the War Measures Act, there are no time limits. Under Bill C-77, precise time limits for the length of any emergency are clearly set out: 90 days for a public welfare emergency; 30 days for a public order emergency; 60 days for an international emergency; and 120 days for a war emergency. After these periods, the government must take action to continue the emergency declaration, if required.

Under Bill C-77, as I said earlier, not only declarations of emergencies but also all orders and regulations are subject to review by Parliament. This is not the case with the War Measures Act. The War Measures Act can be invoked on what the act calls "conclusive evidence," and the action is not subject to contest or review. Under Bill C-77, the government must base its actions on reasonable grounds, and, as I mentioned earlier, those grounds can be examined and contested by Parliament and the courts.

Pursuant to an amendment in the other place, the bill specifies that the Governor in Council cannot order the detention, the imprisonment or internment of Canadian citizens or landed immigrants on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, and so on.

Honourable senators, there are those who claim that governments should refrain from the use of general emergencies legislation in favour of ad hoc, narrowly-focused statutes enacted by Parliament whenever the country is confronted with an emergency situation. In this way, the argument goes, the measures adopted would more likely be linked to the problems involved and the affected parties would enjoy whatever safeguards flowed from a parliamentary debate.

I find this argument difficult to credit on a practical level. I also do not believe this approach would necessarily protect civil rights any better. I think it far better that the government and Parliament put in place a framework to handle emergencies during a time of calm that allows calm deliberation rather than responding ad hoc when emotions may well be running high. Would, for example, Japanese Canadians or suspected communists have fared any better through special legislation passed by Parliament during a period of war hysteria? I think not.

Is this bill perfect in its protection of individual rights and property during a declared emergency? It is probably not, but, in my view, this bill goes further in this regard with both substantive and procedural safeguards than analogous emergencies legislation in the United States, Germany, the United Kingdom or Australia. It is certainly a vast improvement over the current legislation.

Will Bill C-77 allow the federal government to respond effectively to emergencies? Honourable senators, in this regard, I have some concern. I think it would be helpful, when this matter goes to committee, that these concerns be aired with the minister and his officials and put to rest.

I am concerned that the bill's requirement for extensive consultations with all provinces affected by an emergency declaration may erode the federal government's ability to respond fully and with dispatch.

• (1440)

In the case of a public welfare emergency, the federal government may not declare an emergency without prior consultation with the lieutenant governors of the provinces that are affected. In the case of a public order emergency confined to one province, a federal declaration may not occur without a request coming from the lieutenant governor of that province.

In the case of a public order emergency, the lieutenant governors of the provinces affected are to be consulted before or after the declaration.

In the case of an international emergency, or a war emergency, the lieutenant governors in council in each province must be consulted to the extent that the federal government believes "it is appropriate and practicable to do so in the circumstances."

In this context, I must ask: What does "consultation" mean? What happens, in this context, if, after consultation, one of ten provinces opposes the action, or five out of ten oppose, or nine out of ten oppose? Furthermore, what effect will this bill's requirement for extensive consultation have on the so-called emergency doctrine?

Simply described, the emergency doctrine is the ability of the federal Parliament unilaterally to exercise concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction over matters that otherwise would fall within exclusive provincial jurisdiction in order to respond to an emergency situation.

Government officials inform me that this provision is entirely workable—and therefore I believe it is—on a practical basis, and that what is meant is that the federal government would be required to at least "notify" affected provincial governments prior to the declaration of an emergency.

If that is what is meant, I trust that this intention and understanding will be aired during the committee hearings so that it can appear on the record for reference later on, should questions arise as to whether the federal government honoured the letter or spirit of the legislation in its consultations with provinces prior to or after the declaration of an emergency.

Honourable senators, let me make it clear what I am saying. I am not proposing an amendment. I simply think it is worth the time and effort to explore this matter and have the record clearly set out what was intended by this wording. I think that would be the purpose of the committee to which we refer this bill.

I am also concerned about an amendment agreed to in the other place, which now appears in Bill C-77 as subclause 59(3). The clause would permit only one house—the Senate or the House of Commons—to revoke a declaration of an emergency. This obviously is a major change from the requirement for agreement of both houses, as the bill was originally drafted.

This was presented to me as something of a victory for the Senate. The problem, to my mind, of course, is that this clause is a two-edged sword. Obviously, the House of Commons can revoke a declaration without the involvement of or approval by the Senate, as well as the Senate's revoking a declaration without review or approval by the House of Commons.

I also wonder about the constitutional precedent that we are setting here. We have a bicameral Parliament. Our Parliament speaks as a Parliament only when both houses agree. What precedents are we setting when we allow one house alone, and independently, to revoke a declaration that has been approved by both houses? What impact is this precedent likely to have on our constitutional fabric? Have these implications been considered, and are they worth whatever benefits are foreseen? I wonder.

[Senator Kelly]

I wonder whether, in our haste to replace a manifestly "bad" or "deficient" act with a far better one, we are giving too much away or setting precedents that will return to haunt us later. As the "chamber of sober second thought," they are issues that, I believe, should concern us, and I strongly urge the committee and all honourable senators to turn their minds to them and to receive assurances from the minister and his officials.

Honourable senators, I want to see this bill passed, because I think it represents a vast improvement over the current situation. I also want to see it passed during this Parliament, because it would be a shame to waste all of the effort that has gone into this bill and the substantial progress made to date.

The simple fact is that Canada requires balanced legislation to allow the federal government to respond appropriately and effectively to emergency situations. I think we all agree with that proposition.

I do have some concerns, however, about the legislated requirement for federal-provincial consultations and the ability of one house to revoke an emergency declaration. In committee I will be looking to the minister and his officials for assurances on these matters. Having said that, I think that the "fundamentals" of the bill are right.

Honourable senators, I commend this long overdue and important bill to your careful attention.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Kelly would consider two questions.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I counselled with Senator Stewart—whom, I must say, I respect and fear—and reminded him that if he were going to ask me a question, and he asked for my permission, my answer was going to be "no." He will have a chance to ask questions in committee, surely.

Senator Stewart: There was an assertion in the honourable senator's speech, and I wanted to be sure that he meant what he said, because I could hardly believe that he meant it seriously. But if he wants to leave it on the record, I will not object.

Senator Kelly: In that event, I have no choice but to answer "yes." I will try to answer the honourable senator's questions.

Senator Stewart: As I understood the honourable senator, he said that the statute that would eventuate from this bill would give us a situation that would parallel that which prevails now in the United Kingdom. I ask him if that is true with regard to the provisions of the bill concerning international emergencies and war emergencies. I believe his statement is inaccurate on that point. It is a very important statement, because it helps sustain the legitimacy of the bill.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I believe I said that we started out far behind those countries mentioned and that this measure puts us ahead. I did not regard any part of this as being in parallel with any of the countries I mentioned.

Senator Stewart: Does the honourable senator realize that there is nothing on the statute books of the United Kingdom comparable to our War Measures Act as of this date, nor has there been for years?

Senator Kelly: Yes, I am aware of that; but I am also aware—as I think we all are—that even though the War Measures Act sits as part of live legislation for the moment, we are also aware, from a practical standpoint, that it would not, under any circumstances, be used—I am sure, because of history—for anything other than for war emergency, and therefore effectively it is just as dead.

Senator Balfour: What about the Official Secrets Act?

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the second reading of Bill C-52, An Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, this bill amends the Canada Shipping Act with respect to the coasting trade in Canadian waters. As honourable senators know, I am sure, the present legislation on the coasting trade in Canada is contained in Part XV of the Canada Shipping Act. Its provisions, dating back to the 1900s, forbid ships not flying the British flag to take part in Canada's coasting trade. Bill C-52 will therefore replace Part XV, which will be repealed.

The legislation will reserve the coasting trade for ships flying the Canadian flag and will broaden the scope of the laws on the coasting trade to include from now on: (i) all commercial marine activities within 12 miles of the Canadian coast; (ii) all commercial marine activities related to resource exploitation or exploration and to passenger transport within 200 miles of the coast.

However, some exceptions must be mentioned: First, hydrocarbon-drilling platforms; second, fishing vessels covered by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and oceanic research activities for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Third, passenger ships with facilities to accommodate 100 persons or more for the night.

Fourth, ships operated or financed by a foreign government which has sought and received permission from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to conduct research activities in Canadian waters.

Fifth, vessels helping ships in distress.

Sixth, rescue operations more than 12 miles from the Canadian coast.

An exemption procedure similar to the existing one to allow foreign registered ships to take part temporarily in the commercial activities covered by the act is included in the new Act.

Fines up to $25,000 per infraction are provided for violations of the law. The act will be enforced by the persons named for this purpose by the Minister of Transport.

Enforcement procedures are provided to permit the detention and possible sale of a vessel. Safeguards have been provided to protect the privacy of the crew's quarters.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 8:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be; and

That, within 120 days after the adoption of this resolution, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should consider the advisability of tabling in the Senate the response of the government to this recommendation.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

● (1500)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not want to spend a great deal of time on this subject today, because I introduced an inquiry in a similar context in December of 1987 and spoke to it extensively on March 1, 1988. I can eliminate many of the recommendations that I would otherwise have made, because they are all contained in my address of March 1. What I want to outline today is what happened after I gave notice of this motion on April 19.

Mr. Percy Mercer, the National Secretary of the Canadian Veterans' Association of the United Kingdom, appeared before the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs and Senior Citizens on April 20, 1988. He gave evidence to support the repeated requests of that association of 1,000 strong to strike out one of the clauses of the Veterans' Charter, a clause that restricts Canadian veterans from eligibility for war veterans allowance or civilian war allowances and demands that they return to Canada for 365 days in order to qualify. I should tell honourable senators that Mr. Mercer is a Newfoundlander who decided not to return to Canada after the war. He served during World War II not as a Canadian but as a soldier with the 59th Newfoundland Artillery Regiment under British command. He was one of those veterans who decided to remain in a foreign country—in this case, the mother country—and take up a new life. He chose to live in the United Kingdom in a small part of the free world he fought for. Through his initiative, he became successful and does not need the war veterans allowance, but he has taken it upon himself, as secretary of the Canadian Veterans' Association of the United Kingdom, to work on behalf of those veterans who do need the allowance.

Honourable senators, it is strange that so many years after the War Veterans Allowance Act was introduced in 1930 we have found, through evidence like that of Mr. Mercer, that somebody is not doing his job. Mr. Mercer testified before the committee about a widow, a Mrs. Simmonds, now aged 88, who wrote to him on March 25, just prior to his leaving for Canada. She told him how difficult it was to get by these days and to keep her home going. Her husband was a prisoner of war for three and one-half years. Mr. Mercer said:

To my knowledge he received no compensation during his lifetime, and certainly she doesn't get any compensation now except the £16 a month, from the Assistance Fund for the Needy.

The government kindly gives that amount to some 260 veterans overseas. At this point, I interrupted him. Honourable senators, we have in place a POW Compensation Act, which was introduced 11 years ago, and that veteran, Mr. Simmonds, should have been receiving a 25 per cent POW compensation, which is the equivalent of the disability pension of 25 per cent and is now $404.30 per month. Further, his wife should now be receiving a pension of half that amount, which is $202. That would help her considerably. Whoever represents the Department of Veterans Affairs—and I understand that it is somebody from the Department of External Affairs—did not contact Mr. Mercer with this information and really ought to have been responsible for advising these people of these allowances. It is obvious that in all these years their record of service or medical records were never checked for possible eligibility for pension benefits.

Honourable senators, I was happy that two officers of the Royal Canadian Legion found the committee meeting interesting enough to attend and listen to the evidence. I discussed this with Mr. Ed Slater, the Director of the Service Bureau of the Royal Canadian Legion, and Miss Janet Mather, Imperial

[Senator Marshall.]

Service Officer of the Royal Canadian Legion, both of whom were in attendance, and they confirmed that I was right. The next day they took from Mr. Mercer the names of all of those who were in destitute condition, many of whom served in battles in different parts of Europe, in order to check their medical records to see whether such veterans were entitled to disability pensions.

Honourable senators, as a result of a visit by the committee to the Department of Veterans Affairs Headquarters in Prince Edward Island, we found that they are looking at 14 or 16 cases of veterans who might have been entitled to disability pensions for many years. Honourable senators, here we are many years later bragging about the greatest legislation in the world, yet there are people living in destitute conditions who might have been receiving a lot more money than they have received—money that they desperately needed. This supports the allegation that the Canadian government should look after these people and do away with that outdated and outmoded clause in the act which restricts them from receiving the War Veterans Allowance unless they return to Canada for 365 days. They must wait here for no other reason than that, only to get an allowance they are due.

Honourable senators, upon looking through my files, I found an article that appeared in The Evening Telegram of St. John's, Newfoundland, September 8, 1987. It is headed "Premier declares Sept. 6-12 Legion Week". In closing, the article states that:

...in the Act to Incorporate the Royal Canadian Legion, Chapter 84 of the Statutes of Canada, shows that under "Purposes and Objects" the Legion is obligated as follows:

To ensure that proper attention shall be paid to the welfare of all who have served and the welfare of their dependents, and to see to the maintenance and comfort of those who require special treatment, particularly the disabled, sick, aged and needy, and to promote the welfare of their dependents.

There have been resolutions for the past ten years from the Legion to do what I am asking the government now to do—to eliminate that clause which is so unfair.

Honourable senators, many inconsistencies are especially noticeable in the correspondence that has been exchanged over the past four years. This all started in 1984. In October of 1984 Mr. Donald Smith, the Agent General of the Province of Nova Scotia, who is also a veteran and president of the Canada-UK Veterans' Association, wrote to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. There are two responses to his letter. The minister, in a response dated November 22, 1984, finished by saying:

Having said the above you can rest assured that both I and the officials in my Department are giving serious consideration to relaxing this requirement even further, and will be doing so, if it is at all possible bearing in mind the current economic climate.

Honourable senators, that is the standard response from government. A couple of weeks later, on September 10, the minister sent another letter in which he stated:

I cannot see a strong case being made to extend the income maintenance provisions of Canada's social assistance legislation, of which War Veterans Allowance is a part, to individuals who elected to remain in another country at the end of the war or who now reside in another country and want to apply for a Canadian benefit such as War Veterans Allowance.

There are no plans at the present time to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act with respect to the eligibility requirement for veterans residing abroad.

On the one hand, honourable senators, the government is giving encouragement and, on the other hand, it is taking that encouragement away.

● (1510)

Just recently the minister appeared before the House of Commons committee and the same question was asked by one of the members of Parliament. He is asking the minister about a reciprocal agreement—

At this point the proceedings were interrupted by the sounding of the fire alarm.

Senator Marshall: Somebody doesn't like me!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I have no alternative but to adjourn the Senate because of the sounding of the fire alarm.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Marshall has adjourned the debate. He can complete his remarks on another occasion.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 3, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX TO THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT

APPENDIX

Guidelines for Senators Research Expenditures

A research allowance has been proposed by the Committee of Internal Economy and subsequently approved by the Senate. The proposal allows those Senators who require it to draw down up to $40,000 in the fiscal year 1988-89 for the purpose of research and office assistance in relation to their duties in the Senate.

The $40,000 is broken down into two components:

- A. Up to $10,000 which may be allocated at the Senators' discretion, and
- B. Up to $30,000 which may be allocated upon application to an Ad Hoc Committee which is to be established.

The purpose of the research allowance is to provide funds to assist Senators in carrying out their duties in relation to their Senate responsibilities.

While the monies allocated must be expended on Senate related activities, Senators should have full discretion in selecting the public policy topics and studies they wish to pursue and these funds may be utilized for other matters such as the preparation of speeches, draft replies to correspondence, clerical assistance or other related matters according to the needs of the individual Senator.

Inasmuch as this is the first year of operation it should be considered a pilot project subject to further review and amendment by the Committee of Internal Economy. The Ad Hoc Committee of Senators would be expected to allow latitude when reviewing applications in order to ensure that each Senator is able to carry out his or her mandate in a manner consistent with the Senators interests and objectives in the Senate. Likewise, individual Senators must be conscious of the requirement to expend public monies prudently.

Procedures

1. Senators wishing to utilize their maximum of $30,000 allocation will apply in writing to the Ad Hoc Committee indicating:

- A. The general area or areas of work to be undertaken.
  - B. The expected duration of the work, and
  - C. The maximum amount of money to be expended.
2. The Ad Hoc Committee will meet as required to review the applications:
    - A. On approval, the appropriate Senator will be advised and the application will be forwarded to the Personnel and Finance Branches for administrative purposes.
    - B. If the Committee has reservations about an application the Senator will be advised as to the reservations and will be given an opportunity to appear before the committee at its next meeting in person.
  3. Once a Senator has received approval from the Committee he or she will be authorized to commence the contracting process and upon obtaining a suitable candidate or candidates, arrange with the Personnel Branch for the execution of the appropriate contract or contracts.

Provided the general area or areas of work does not materially change from the initial application the Senator is entitled to spend a sum, up to the amount approved for the fiscal year, and make any personnel changes necessary without further recourse to the Committee.
  4. The Personnel Branch is responsible for the preparation and maintenance of standard forms of contract, subject to the following points:
    - A. Contracts are not to extend beyond the fiscal year.
    - B. The amount expended is not to exceed the total that has been authorized.
    - C. Each contract must provide for termination after reasonable notice.
    - D. Senators who are letting contracts shall establish the terms and conditions of each contract.
    - E. The contractor will not be an employee of the Senate or the Senator. Accordingly, payroll

- deductions at source will not be made and employee benefits are not available.
- F. Individuals under contract with Senators must be 18 years of age or over. Senators cannot engage their own parents, spouse or children under contract.
  - G. Full-time employees of the Senate, House of Commons, Library of Parliament, any Department or Agency of the Federal government, or other individuals receiving full-time employment income from the consolidated Revenue Fund, may not be hired by Senators under Contract.
  - H. Senators may share the costs of an individual or firm under contract out of their $10,000 discretionary allowance. The $10,000 allowance may also be utilized for facilities and equipment related to their Senate duties.
  - I. All contracts must be in relation to work or studies being undertaken by a Senator in their capacity as a Senator.
  - J. No person shall be paid a contract fee if such person has not performed the services. Services shall be performed during the period for which payment is authorized. Aggregate payments to an individual of firm shall not exceed $100,000 per fiscal year.
- 5. The Finance Branch is responsible for:
    - A. Making all payments, according to the contract, directly to the contractor.
    - B. Advising each Senator, who has received committee approval for expenditure of funds, of the amount expended, and balance remaining on a quarterly basis for the first three quarters and monthly in the last quarter.
    - C. Providing a record of expenditures, under the heading "Research Allowance" for each Senator utilizing the research monies, in the annual publication of Public Accounts.
  - 6. Office space and office equipment for additional staff.
    - A. A limited budget has been make available in the 88/89 Estimates for office equipment for additional staff. Senators cannot expect equipment to be provided beyond basic items such as a desk, chair, typewriter, telephone and office supplies.
    - B. Space is also severely restricted. Senators who cannot accommodate additional staff in their existing office space may encounter delays before additional common space for staff can be obtained.

QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONTROL OF EDUCATION—IMPACT OF MASTER TUITION AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, last week I raised this matter in the absence of the Leader of the Government, and Senator Phillips took it as notice. My question relates to the master tuition agreement on Indian education between the Province of British Columbia and the Government of Canada which has been in effect for some time.

Through negotiations with the Indian people of British Columbia, it was what they called "effectively cancelled" in July of 1987, but on April 20, 1988, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development signed a new five-year master tuition agreement between the federal government and the Province of British Columbia. This was done despite the clear and explicit objections of the Indian people of British Columbia.

Over many months the Indian people of British Columbia have been negotiating in good faith in an attempt to reach a mutually agreeable solution to the problem of the master tuition agreement. They are deeply disappointed by the action of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate shed some light upon this and perhaps tell us why this particular action was taken?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I regret that I am not in a position to do that today. I noted the question in Senate Debates that was asked last week by Senator Marchand. I have asked the office of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for a reply. I shall make further inquiries and will bring in a reply during the course of the present week.

Senator Marchand: Similar agreements are now commonplace in most of Canada. It would not have been a revolutionary move to have done away with the master tuition agreement in British Columbia and to allow bands, tribal councils or other government units to make tuition agreements with local school boards.

Control over education is largely related to control over the money paid to the local school district, and the $20 million spent on behalf of primary and secondary education of Indian children would go a long way to reaching that goal.

We Indians from the province of British Columbia think that we have some of the best educators to be found anywhere in this country, whether they be Indian or non-Indian. We have made a deliberate attempt over the past number of years to direct some of our people into the field of education. That is something of which we are very proud, and we feel slighted by this action.

I have two questions: Why did the minister do what he did, and will the minister get back to the bargaining table with the Indian people of British Columbia with the view to either throwing the current MTA out this year or next year?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, while my friend was asking his supplementary question I located some information that had been sent to me by my colleague following Senator Marchand's question of last week. I can only place this information on the record at this point.

My colleague states that the federal government accepts financial responsibility for the education of Indian students who live on reserve or crown land, that for such students attending provincial schools the federal government reimburses the per-student costs incurred by provincial authorities, subject to agreed-upon terms, and that the new federal-provincial agreement with British Columbia provides for the development of local level tuition agreements between Indian bands and provincial school districts.

My colleague insists that this new provision, which is the result of consultation with Indian representatives, supports Indian control of Indian education.

He states further that, given the previous lack of any meaningful involvement by bands in provincial education, the possibility of bands now being able to negotiate local level agreements is regarded as a major positive development.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, the Indian people do not agree with that assessment. It is not a positive development. The minister still has control over the money, and that is where the power is. If the Indian people had control over that money, where the power is, this would be a great step forward. That would be a step toward getting the quality of education we want in British Columbia. Provincial governments understand the language of dollars, especially the Government of British Columbia.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I understand it, provincial legislation and fiscal arrangements with school districts in that province have precluded any type of tuition agreements at the local level.

I understand the position that is being advanced by my friend and by the people he represents. They want the federal government to enter into bilateral agreements with them and to advance the funds to them so that they can negotiate with the school districts. That seems to be the issue between the bands and the minister at this point. I can only undertake to convey to my colleague, Mr. McKnight, the views and representations made by Senator Marchand on this issue.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I will conclude by saying that I will wait for Senator Murray's report to me. I have indicated the position of the Indians of British Columbia.

With the permission of honourable senators, I would like to table a telegram that they sent to me concerning this issue.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Document tabled.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which pertains to the distressing drought conditions that exist at this moment in western Canada across the prairies, and the prospects that perhaps the most disastrous summer in many, many years will affect the farmers in those areas.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to give senators an outline of the preparation of the cabinet to date for the prospect of this drought?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am aware of the concern expressed by the honourable senator, because I have heard it directly from ministers in provincial governments in the west as well as from my own colleagues. However, for a more substantial report I will have to inquire of the appropriate federal minister.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The most immediate problem is to find some means of taking care of brood cow herds, because the grass has not even started to grow this spring. Is any help contemplated to move these cattle to somewhere where they do not have to be dispersed, or to move feed into the area where the drought exists?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—VIEWS OF FORMER JUSTICE OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Last week former Supreme Court Justice Estey, in a parting series of interviews, implied that the division of powers and the Charter may be affected by the Meech Lake proposals made by the government.

Would the minister responsible be prepared to comment and give his views in light of the former Supreme Court judge's view?

Senator Olson: A former Supreme Court justice!

Senator Murray: —who may be a former Supreme Court judge, but who spoke, I trust, as a private citizen.

If I recall the quotation correctly, he thinks things should be left as they are. He further believes that some aspects of Meech Lake could lead, as he puts it, "to the ruination of Confederation." I wonder whether he thinks that prolonging and perpetuating the isolation of Quebec would lead to the ruination of Confederation, and whether he gives a damn about that!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: I raised that question not by way of making a political argument but in light of the proposition that the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave for considering changes. His point was that if there were no "egregious errors"—that being the test with respect to the division of powers, the effect on the Charter, and so on—this was not an unreasonable cost with respect to the relationships between the provinces in order to invite Quebec, as he said, "back into Confederation."

• (1410)

My question is not related to the argumentation but, really, to the substance of his point. A respected jurist, a former Supreme Court judge, implies that there may be a change in the division of powers, and also implies that this may affect the Charter. I am asking the Leader of the Government to direct his attention to the issue of whether or not, in light of that ex cathedra opinion, that may not constitute grounds for considering that there may, in fact, be an egregious error.

Senator Murray: I think my honourable friend needs some instruction on what an ex cathedra judgment or opinion is, but that is another point.

The honourable senator infers something from Justice Estey's statement. I do not know whether or not that inference is warranted. All I can do is observe that his former lordship has entered into the political debate, and I wish him well in his new business career.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

DEBT AS GLOBAL PROBLEM—AGENDA ITEM

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I will resist a commentary on that testy remark by the Leader of the Government.

However, by way of soft postscript, I should add that at least Justice Estey has left his job, unlike some ambassadors who are still in the public service and have engaged fully in politics. I said, "fully in politics." I should say: engaged in political debate, without any concealment of their political position. However, that is not the point I want to raise with the Leader of the Government, now that he is in a better mood.

I have in my hand a brochure, or, shall I say, a somewhat lavish document—moderately lavish—produced for the official visit of Prime Minister Mulroney to Washington on April 27-28. In this document there is a reference to the Toronto Economic Summit. It is to that subject that I want to address myself. I would like to quote a sentence from this document:

The Summit leaders will seek to strengthen initiatives taken in such fields as economic policy coordination, trade (including agriculture), and debt.

Honourable senators will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, some months ago, did release and present a report on the question of Third World debt. I am pleased that the matter is to be dealt with at the Toronto Economic Summit.

My question is this: Is the matter of debt as a global problem on the agenda of the Toronto Economic Summit as a separate item—and I hope it is—and will Canada be taking any initiatives to have the summit leaders focus on some of the proposals which have been made by the Senate committee and others in an effort to resolve the debt crisis?

I do remind the Senate that in our own way the Government of Canada has taken some initiatives with regard to debts owed by governments in the Third World. There was an initiative announced at the time of the francophone countries' conference, and I believe an initiative was announced at the time of the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver.

In any case, I shall ask for a report on the matter from the Prime Minister's office.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do appreciate that steps have been taken by the Government of Canada to relieve the debt problems of the poorest countries, particularly debts between governments. I have in mind the situation of middle-income debtor countries, including major debtors in Latin America.

[Senator Murray.]

RE-ENERGIZING OF DEBT STRATEGY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PROPOSALS—THIRD WORLD DEBT PROBLEM—ROLE OF WORLD BANK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I might just ask two other questions, which the Leader of the Government in the Senate can take as notice if he wishes. In a speech that he made in Ottawa on April 24 of this year, entitled "Perspectives on the 1988 Summit", Mr. Wilson dealt with the question of debt, particularly the debt situation of the middle-income countries which he himself said was worrisome. He then went on to say that new efforts are required to re-energize the debt strategy.

I wonder whether Canada is considering making some proposals on new efforts at the Economic Summit. I fully agree with the minister that new efforts are required to re-energize the debt strategy. That is my first question.

My second question has to do with the negotiations that are currently taking place between Brazil and the banks on rescheduling its debt. My understanding is that a proposal had been made that the World Bank take a guarantee position in this debt situation with respect to Brazil. I also read somewhere that the World Bank itself, and the United States Government, had resisted any such role for the World Bank.

It was certainly the view of the Senate committee that the multilateral institutions, and particularly the World Bank, should take an increased role in the resolution of the Third World debt problem. I am wondering whether Canada expressed a view on this matter and whether Canada also opposed—for whatever reason—this idea that the World Bank should take a guarantee position in the current negotiations with Brazil.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to several questions.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS AND POSSIBLE MEDIATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on April 21, 1988, by the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, regarding Fisheries—Canada-France Relations—Dispute-Settlement Negotiations—Status and Possible Mediation.

(The answer follows:)

No, the two issues are not linked together. The mediator will discuss interim quotas while the negotiators will continue discussions aimed at referring the boundary dispute for a decision.

Senator Phillips: The next delayed answer is in response to questions on the same subject-matter raised in the Senate on April 21, 26 and 27 by the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen.

The agreement of January 1987 contained some time limits which have now passed. The mediation agreement which has recently been agreed to is designed to allow discussions on the substantive issues to resume so that we can achieve a resolution of the boundary dispute, as referred to in the earlier agreement.

ENERGY

GEORGES BANK DRILLING MORATORIUM—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer. This is in response to a further question raised in the Senate on April 27, 1988, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Energy—Georges Bank Drilling Moratorium—Consultation with Government of Nova Scotia.

The proposal to impose an environmental moratorium on Georges Bank drilling had been discussed between Mr. Masse and the province prior to the April 18 announcement.

This proposal for a moratorium is supported by the Government of Nova Scotia and is entirely consistent with our mutual desire to protect one of the "richest most economically important fisheries in the world".

As the minister indicated at the time, federal and provincial officials have been actively meeting and are close to an agreement on appropriate amendments to proposed federal and provincial legislation which would provide for a moratorium and for a public review of exploration drilling on Georges Bank prior to the year 2000.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., for the adoption of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on 24th March, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Marsden)

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the bill to amend the Copyright Act, Bill C-60, is very difficult legislation. I think it is worth emphasizing—although I know that honourable senators recognize this fact—that the current Minister of Communications did not originate these amendments to the Copyright Act. In fact, they have been around for a long time. Also, this minister has inherited from her predecessor some of the complexities with which we are now faced.

As the report of the committee states, and as we all agree, since no one has dissented, copyright law in this country needs amendment. Also, we are all in agreement that most of the changes contained in this bill are needed. They are worthy and satisfactory amendments, and those arguments have been reviewed by previous speakers on this motion.

However, some balance is required. As I have said before, during my speech on second reading of this bill, the relationship between creators and users is a symbiotic relationship. In other words, one does not exist without the other. It is the role and duty of Parliament, and of the Senate, to ensure that there is a balance as between the demands made on both sides, and, furthermore, that there is an orderly process. It is because of the need for balance and for an orderly process that I support the amendments proposed by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

In speaking on second reading, Senator Doyle and I both suggested many changes that might be made to the legislation, and I am sorry to see that so many of the issues that were raised have not made it further; but this is not the end of the process, and I am sure that we will be able to consider such changes in the future.

I should like to say that the debate in committee and in the Senate has been informed by many excellent speakers on both sides of this issue. There has been a thorough airing of the problems in correspondence, in committee, and in conversation, and it is impressive how many Canadians who will be affected by this bill have participated in the debate and have represented their interests very fairly and honestly on both sides of the issues.

We have heard from a great many people who were mentioned by Senator Doyle, and also from others: from elected school trustees, librarians, teachers at all levels of the education system; from associations representing all of those institutions, from the software and music industry, from graduate students, and from many others, and they have made serious and compelling cases to which we have listened, I hope, with open minds.

I should like to comment on the speeches made on April 27 by Senator Doyle and Senator Roblin. Senator Doyle made a very good case concerning the need of creators, particularly artists—I believe he had mainly artists in mind—for earnings; and, of course, he is quite right. There is a very great need. Senator Doyle was praised by Senator Roblin for the emotional content of his speech. I am tempted to say that that is the trouble, that you men are so emotional that it is hard to deal with you. But I won't say that, because I know that it usually goes the other way.

But I would like to suggest that Senator Doyle is absolutely right, that there is a need for an increase in earnings for artists in this country. It has existed for a long time. I agree with him unequivocally, and I suggest that the government should quickly set about allowing deductions of all expenses of artists under the tax law, allowing them to defer income from year to year—because, of course, they face great inequalities in earnings—and that the government substantially increase its grants for those agencies which support the arts in this country, including, of course, all of the granting councils, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—the second channel would do a great deal to support the earnings of many artists—and increasing grants to public galleries, theatres, dance companies, exhibitions, work for External Affairs, and so on. There are many ways in which the earnings of artists could be, and should be, substantially raised in this country, and copyright, I am afraid, would make only a very marginal contribution to the increase in earnings, although it might make a more substantial one to some other occupational groups. I am in agreement with Senator Doyle on the need for increased earnings, but not on this remedy.

Senator Roblin called Bill C-60 the artists' charter, and it is on this and one or two other points that I am in substantial disagreement with him. This should not be a situation of its being unbalanced in favour of one side or the other, of the artists or the users. It surely is our role and our duty to try to balance those interests. The amendments that have been proposed are very mild amendments to bring about some balance. But Senator Roblin went on to make two comments which, I must say, I regarded as being offensive, and I indicated so at that time. He suggested that people who are in disagreement with the amendments proposed to Bill C-60 are in disagreement because they do not want change and they think it might cost them some money. I dispute both these charges absolutely fundamentally. Change is being called for and change is coming.

An international expert from Norway on changes to copyright law recently visited Ottawa. He pointed out that in Norway, where copyright amendments were brought in with all educational exemptions in them, there have been six years of negotiation and they still have not reached agreement with the collectives on changes that are needed. I would also like to point out that meetings are going ahead with reprography and other collectives in this country. Only last Monday the large school boards in Ontario indicated willingness to proceed. But one has to proceed in an orderly way. As long as it is not clear to those institutions that must make an agreement with collectives whether there will or will not be exemptions or how the system is going to work, matters cannot proceed in an orderly way. These amendments allow for orderly procedure and allow for a delay of only one year. If the Norwegian example is anything to go by, such changes will take longer, but I hope we can do better than that.

Senator Roblin also raises the question of costs. I have not heard any witness say that amendments should not be proceeded with on the basis of additional costs. I challenge Senator

Roblin, who, unfortunately, is not here but may read this debate, to find any testimony to that effect in the records. Of course there will be additional costs, and everybody, as far as I know, accepts that. Taxes will rise, for example. It is only fair that those copyright expenses should be paid. Who will pay and how they will pay are matters that have yet to be worked out exactly, but the fact that there will be increased costs is accepted. I suggest to honourable senators that Senator Roblin is incorrect in both of those accusations against people who are proposing amendments.

I was very much hoping that the minister would find it possible to put forward the second phase of the legislation while this matter was still in process, because there is a great deal in the current bill which would be highly desirable to put through. I was hoping that the minister would find it possible to put forward details of the second phase content and a timetable. After all, phase two was promised for last year, and, as I understand it, the meetings on the various matters that are in contention have proceeded in a satisfactory way.

There are three areas in which it would seem to me to be highly desirable for the minister to bring forward her proposed changes in the second phase. It would be desirable if the minister were to say that she intends to incorporate the agreement that is apparently worked out with respect to exhibition rights and public museums. She told us in her testimony before the committee that she intends to redefine "works of artistic craftsmanship." I understand that that is far advanced. It would be helpful if the minister were to say to us what she proposes in that regard. Of course, it would be helpful if she were to clarify the definition of "public exhibition," which I understand is defined in case law. It would be helpful, indeed, if the minister could tell us the categories of educational exemptions that are being proposed so that orderly negotiations between collectives and educational institutions could proceed. It would also be helpful if the minister could tell us that single copy exemptions in public libraries will be allowed. These are essential for scholarly research and for those citizens who use public libraries in this way.

We are being asked, however, to pass a law which contains clauses that the minister has indicated will be substantially amended very quickly in the next phase of the bill. We are being asked to pass legislation which, in effect, the community knows is not going to be working legislation with respect to exhibition rights. That is a very disorderly process and one that is difficult to condone.

• (1430)

With respect to education, with exemptions, I believe that passage of this bill without amendment would freeze the process. After all, as senators on the other side have been at pains to point out, there is an imbalance of power, and this imbalance of power will not be helped by passage of legislation which does not say what types of educational exemptions are to be brought forward. The only possible solution is to support the amendment here. I have already made the case with respect to public libraries.

I still hope that the minister will find it possible to amend the Copyright Bill, Bill C-60, and bring it back within this parliamentary session. I urge her to do so. In the meantime, I propose to vote for the amendments that the committee has put forward and hope for very fast progress in changes to copyright.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I am not going to delay the sorrowful passage of this report. I have just a few short observations to make as one who attended all of the meetings of the committee dealing with this particular bill. I can assure you that the work of the committee was not very onerous, since it only sat on three days and heard 20 witnesses.

The observers who attended the meetings obviously knew a great deal more than the committee members about this subject. It was the first time that I, as a member of that committee, had that feeling. I always felt that members of that particular committee knew as much as the witnesses did, or, if we did not, we would employ professional assistance to advise us. We did not have that.

As you will remember, it was a close run situation on the vote to report the bill without amendment. The vote was seven to seven. Thus, we find ourselves in the situation we do today.

I congratulate the distinguished academic Professor Marsden on her remarks. They reminded me of the enormous amount of mail we seem to be receiving in connection with this subject. I do not know who has been reading it. I have mail which I think I should read into the record, and, particularly, I have a letter from the distinguished President of York University, which states:

Dear Senator:

I am writing you as a University President, as a well-published scholar, and as a sometime teacher of industrial property law, to ask that you support a delay in Bill C-60—

He goes on to say:

My concerns . . . are not with the general principle of the law. They go immediately and dramatically to its impact on universities and other educational institutions. The new legislation will adversely affect archival research, scholarly commentary, the preparation of informal teaching materials, and library and other administrative practices. It will entail great aggregate costs to users, with little advantage to individual creators.

Good heavens! Why did he not add, "the ruination of Confederation" and "the spread of some communicable diseases"?

The other three letters I have are from friends and they are all from the office of the president.

Senator MacEachen: Who is the president you quoted?

Senator MacDonald: I quoted the President of York University, Mr. H.W. Arthurs.

I now quote three other presidents: The President of Saint Mary's University; the President of University College of Cape Breton; and the President of Ryerson. They are all old friends.

They all write, "Dear Finlay . . .," and then follows the same letter. It is the same letter under a different letterhead. I ask you: Has a committee ever been subjected to establishment institutions as we have in this instance when dealing with galleries, museums and universities?

I believe Senator Marsden has a question.

Senator Marsden: I urge you to read the letter from Brian Segal again. It is quite different from the letter from Harry Arthurs. I also have both of them in front of me.

Senator MacDonald: The letter is dated April 25. Would you care for me to read the whole letter? It is identical to the letter I have from two other university presidents. I will be happy to table the letters. Mr. Arthur's letter is the fourth letter and is different.

Senator Marsden: And I shall table mine.

Senator Frith: There may be a copyright question here!

Senator MacDonald: I get the distinct impression from senators on the other side that had a few more weeks elapsed we might have had a different situation on our hands. I would particularly commend Senator Frith's comments of April 28, when he said:

As Senator Doyle has said, and as Senator Sinclair has agreed, it has been a long wait for the creators who own copyright—a wait of 64 years—and I do not think it is fair to ask them to, in effect, continue to subsidize the users, which is really what they are doing, by refraining from enforcing the rights they have and have had for so long.

Here, he mentions his key point when he says:

Again, on balance—

That is the word used so often by Senator Marsden during her discourse.

—what we gain by passing this bill without amendments greatly outweighs the interests of those who want further delay.

The intentional taping of recordings and the photocopying of books, articles and works of art are illegal acts under the existing system. The copying of computer programs has become a daily practice and normal routine in major publicly-funded institutions such as schools, universities, libraries, museums and art galleries. Copyright infringement has become institutionalized in this country and the damage done to the owners of the stolen property is considered to be of such little consequence to this place that it is sanctioned and encouraged. We have been influenced by teachers, librarians and museum directors. We apply ourselves to a bill for creators and we listen only to the users. It is not a particularly great day for this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., that this report be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

● (1440)

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Please call in the senators.

● (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The doors of the chamber will now be locked.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Frith                      Thériault—2.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I did not speak on the motion, but I want to explain why I abstained.

Senator Guay: That's not necessary!

Senator Thériault: I have nothing against the amendments. My concern is that if the bill is sent back to the other place, it will never be brought back on the order paper and will die because of an election or something. I believe that the artistic community wants this bill, as bad as it is, and therefore I abstained.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Ian Sinclair, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill, as amended, be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Rossiter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-118, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, on Thursday last the Honourable Senator Rossiter explained this bill on second reading. I would recall to you two remarks that she made. She noted that the amendments in the bill reflected the long-standing practice of amending the Customs Tariff as part of the budget process in order to respond to new problems and needs in the tariff area which require statutory amendments to the legislation. She further noted that the products covered by the tariff changes are not made in Canada.

Honourable senators, the bill is not one that requires very much analysis. It arises in part through the harmonization process of tariffs that the Senate dealt with in another bill earlier this year, and in part by updating and changing language to fit changes in commercial life. However, in order to take a look at this bill with officials to find out if there is anything beyond that, and in view of the fact that customs matters sometimes are difficult to follow, I would suggest—and I hope Honourable Senator Rossiter will agree—that the bill be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I hope that we could hear from officials early next week, and that would be all that would be required.

Motion agree to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Rossiter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-83, An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Could someone tell us why Senator Stewart is standing this order? It has been on the order paper since February 4, 1988.

I am raising this point so that someone will warn him that we would like to know tomorrow if he intends to say something or if he is stalling.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps Senator Flynn would explain why the government let the bill stand for three months on the order paper.

Senator Olson: At least that long.

Senator Flynn: It is before the Senate. I have nothing to do with the other place.

Senator MacEachen: I am talking about this chamber. You let it stand here.

Senator Flynn: We waited for someone to move on the other side. In any event, we have been dealing with this bill for a long time.

Senator Olson: Nice try, but wrong!

Senator Flynn: You don't know what you're talking about!

Senator Olson: You were not waiting for anybody on this side.

Senator Flynn: There have been discussions as to how this bill could be disposed of, and that is why there was a delay on the part of the sponsor of the bill. Since then, Senator Stewart has stood this order without giving any reason. If he says that you do not want to proceed with the bill, at least we will know where we stand.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think it is a fact that the bill was not moved by the government and it rested on the order paper for several months. There were certainly no discussions with me as to what ought to be done with the bill.

I do not think it is very seemly for Senator Flynn to complain about this delay in light of the delay which he tolerated when the bill was stood in the name of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I do not mind the delay as long as it is explained. That is the point.

● (1510)

Senator Olson: You did not explain it when you did it.

Senator Flynn: You certainly did not ask for an explanation, so don't complain now. In fact, stay put, if that is all you have to say.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the thirty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (guidelines for Senators' research expenditures), presented in the Senate on April 28, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PROBLEMS OF THE AGED

SUBJECT MATTER REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 29, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the problems of the aged, including the substantial increase in population of those age 65 and over as well as problems of income security, retirement, housing, transportation and social welfare in general, including abuse and health care.

He said: Honourable senators, since the Second World War the average age of the Canadian population has gradually increased to the point where, by the year 2000, it might well constitute a crisis in Canada. That crisis could arise for two reasons. First, because of the low birth rate there will be fewer young people in the work force to support the aging population; second, the baby boomers who were born after the war will then be senior citizens, together with all of those people who were born after 1910—a year of high birth rate. All of these people will then be in an age group that will need a lot of health care, hospitalization and chronic care of one kind or another.

At the same time, the youth of our nation will be, in proportion, of small numbers, too small to carry the burden of providing the necessary financial support to provide this aging group with proper care. In this respect, I have some statistics. In the year 1921 only 5 per cent of our population was over 65 years of age. In 1986 11 per cent of our population was over 65 years of age. It is estimated that by the year 2001 14 per cent of our population will be over the age of 65, and by the year 2030 27 per cent of our population will be 65 years and over.

Honourable senators, this situation represents a social problem for which plans should be made soon so that it does not get out of hand. However, it is not a problem that is liable to persist for long periods of time, and will probably gradually correct itself after the year 2030. It is very possible that we will end up with a declining seniors population and be left with a great many facilities for which we will no longer have a need. Therefore, long-term planning is necessary to take care of not only the aging population, which we will have in the next quarter century, but also the decline in the numbers of seniors in proportion to the rest of our population after that quarter century.

In the recent past we faced a somewhat similar situation when we were forced to increase the number of our school-rooms because of the burgeoning number of younger school children. Now that the number of school age children is declining, we find in many parts of our country that we have too many classrooms to accommodate the number of children that we now have attending schools.

To make the problem worse, the birth rate in Canada in 1921 was 29.3 live births per 1,000 population. However, in 1985 that figure was down to 14.8 live births per 1,000 population—almost exactly half. Apart from the fact that the birth rate is going down and people are living longer, we also have the factor of the aging of the baby boomers coupled with the fact that most of the people arriving in Canada as immigrants are past the child-bearing age. This will add to our senior citizen population rather than to the population of young people who will help support this aging group.

Also, we find that the life expectancy of our population is growing. In other words, our senior citizens are living longer. Thanks to good medical care and good hospitalization programs, our senior citizens are living much longer than seniors did in the past. Another factor, however, is that a greater proportion of these aging seniors are women who are living alone. Consequently, certain types of housing have to be prepared for those women.

● (1520)

Then, of course, there will be men who are living alone. In such cases, meals must be provided, whether they be Meals on Wheels in their own home or, perhaps, in a senior citizens' home where meals can be brought in. Perhaps it could be the reverse of Meals on Wheels, that is to say, that the community becomes involved and takes seniors out to a central place to eat at least once a day—in other words, to make it a program of recreation and to enable the seniors to mix with other members of the community.

[Senator Bonnell.]

So, a serious program has to be looked at. I believe that the federal government has some views on this, because for the first time we have a minister responsible for the aged. I refer to the Honourable George Hees, who, I believe, is one who is concerned and who understands the aging program, because he himself is getting to be a senior citizen and perhaps has a better feeling for them than a younger minister might have.

So, I believe the time is ripe for this whole field concerning senior citizens to be studied, and we should introduce a program for the future. With regard to housing, we should consider whether it should be specific housing for senior citizens or whether it should be housing in their own home, whereby they can have some kind of nursing care such as veterans have with their VIP program. Should it be similar to the aging veterans program, where they have home nursing care, or should there be a home similar to a hostel, where senior citizens could stay and receive board? Should it be an establishment where they could receive nursing care in a chronic care facility or should it be in the form of a community chronic hospital where seniors can receive more active nursing care?

We will find that chronic hospital beds across Canada are full. There is already a waiting list. We do not have enough of such beds. There are not sufficient beds in our chronic care or acute care facilities. So, when there is a great demand in the next two or three years, we will find that we will be very short of beds. Therefore, some long-range planning should take place to take care of this matter.

I believe that we will find also that there are various costs involved in different types of hospital care. So perhaps we should consider that in some cases there should be a mix of senior citizens with younger people to supervise them. In other cases they perhaps could be grouped together where they could socialize. In others there could be so many together with one person looking after the unit. There may also be larger places where nurses are available to look after the unit.

There are also transportation problems. When people age, often their eye sight begins to go and they can no longer drive their car. In rural areas there are no taxis, and in Prince Edward Island there are no longer any trains; also, there are no subways. Therefore, we have to provide some arrangement whereby the community can become involved and support senior citizens by providing a senior citizens' bus that will pick them up and take them to a fair, a church, a hospital, or to club meetings. We should get the community involved rather than leaving it always to the taxpayers. There are many volunteers in the community who would love to help. There is great satisfaction in providing a helping hand. But some kind of organization is needed to bring the support together.

There is also a problem concerning the abuse of seniors. I can give you an example of a gentleman who thought that he was going to go into a government institution, and that perhaps the government might take away his home, which he wanted to pass on to members of his family later. So, to avoid that he signed his place over to his son.

Until that time his son and daughter-in-law had been very good to the old chap. But not long after he signed on the dotted line, the poor old fellow had to stay in his room at the back of the house. If anybody visited the house, he had to go to his room. The next thing, he had to have his meals in his room. He could not eat with the company. He was then moved off to a home, with his Old Age Pension, and he had to pay his own way the best way he could, and his property was taken over by his "honourable" son.

It reminds me of a story my father told me many years ago, of a fellow who lived on a farm with his son and daughter-in-law. The son and daughter-in-law were good to the father, who had some money. The son and daughter-in-law were so good to him that he said, "Son, let us go to the city and I will sign the papers and put the property into your name, because I am now getting old and it will save lawyers' fees later on." So they hitched up the horse and wagon and the old fellow drove the son and daughter-in-law to the big city and signed the property over to the son.

When they got into the wagon to return home, the son reached over, grabbed the reins, and said, "That's my horse"; and the son drove home and the father had to sit to the side. It wasn't too long before the father was in his bedroom, having his meals by himself, and the son and daughter-in-law had the house to themselves.

But the father was a little cuter than the son. He had a little more experience, and he slipped off to town one day and saw a lawyer and told him the problem. The lawyer said, "I will tell you what to do. I have a few $1 bills here that I am not using. I will loan them to you. I will put them in this small suitcase. Take them home and put them under the bed. Every time they come in with a meal, you start to count them. When they see all those dollar bills, they will probably be a lot nicer to you."

The next morning, when the daughter-in-law came in to give the old gentleman his breakfast, he had the dollar bills on his bed and he started stuffing them back into the suitcase. She went out and told her husband and said, "You take in his dinner and watch." Sure enough, when the son went into the bedroom, his father was stuffing the dollar bills back into the suitcase.

The next day the old gentleman was out in the kitchen with the rest of the family. He was even allowed to listen to the radio and read the newspapers. He said to them, "You know, I have some money under my bed. Perhaps we should go to see the lawyer and straighten this matter out." So the son hitched up the horse and wagon and drove him into the city. The lawyer said, "Look, the best way to handle this is for you to sign everything back to your father, and then we will see what happens." So the son signed the property back to his father, and the father said, "Thank you very much. I will think about signing it back to you later on." On the way home the father reached out and grabbed the reins, and said, "Son, that's my horse."

That is the type of thing that can happen to senior citizens. Let me say that there should be a program for all of those senior citizens, and I myself am reaching the age where I can see 65 approaching around the corner, not too far away. I think that this program is so important that I would like to move that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for its consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to speak briefly to the motion, not on the issue.

• (1530)

It is my understanding that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has already discussed this and has decided to refer the issue on aging to Senator Marshall's subcommittee. I know that Senator Marshall intends to move into that study shortly, that is, as soon as some of his work on veterans affairs has been cleared off the desk.

Senator Bonnell: As I understand it, we cannot refer a matter to a committee that is not a standing committee of the Senate. It is also my understanding that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology may refer the matter to the subcommittee on aging, the committee chaired by Senator Marshall.

Senator Frith: When did we form the subcommittee on aging?

Senator Bonnell: As I understand it, the matter must be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and then it is the committee's decision as to whether it should be referred to a subcommittee.

Senator Robertson: Perhaps the honourable senator is correct in that this has to be referred to the standing committee and then that committee can refer it to the subcommittee. I merely want to inform the Senate that this was discussed and the composition of the committee is in place. If necessary, I would second Senator Bonnell's motion that this subject be formally referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology so that that committee can then more properly refer it to Senator Marshall's subcommittee.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question concerning the procedure being followed in this case. Inquiry No. 7 is to establish the subcommittee, but here we are referring a matter to a subcommittee before it is established. I am wondering about the propriety of the motion at this time.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, my motion is specifically to refer the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was set up months ago. I would also point out that Senator Phillips, the government whip, moved the motion that that committee be established.

Senator Phillips: I am aware of that particular standing Senate committee. It is nothing new, since it has been in place for years and, as a matter of fact, even before Senator Bonnell's arrival. Believe it or not, it functioned then. Senator Bonnell, in his remarks, said that this should be referred to the subcommittee, and that is the point I am questioning, since the subcommittee has not been properly established according to the order paper.

Senator Bonnell: I said that it could be referred to a subcommittee. I would point out that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology was not set up before I arrived. The committee was formerly called the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, but since my arrival I moved the motion to have the name of the committee changed. I made the recommendation and Senator Phillips agreed with it.

Senator Phillips: The honourable senator is trying to be very scientific, but I am not so sure he is correct.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was not aware of the fact that a subcommittee could change its name and, in so doing, add something to its mandate by simply having the main committee say that the name of the subcommittee will be changed and that it will have a matter referred to it without the Senate being involved in any way.

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology's mandate covers veterans affairs—and veterans are often older persons, I suppose; Indian and Inuit affairs; cultural affairs and the arts; social and labour matters; health and welfare; pensions; housing; fitness and amateur sports; employment and immigration; consumer affairs; and youth affairs, which, of course, involves age.

Senator Marshall is not moving that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have authority to establish a subcommittee with a particular name or that it establish a subcommittee to deal with a particular subject—a subject which is not clearly within the mandate of that committee, although it could be argued that it is. What he is doing is simply calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that he has done it. I would draw your attention, honourable senators, to Inquiry No. 7, where he simply says that he will call the attention of the Senate to a change in the name. He is not asking for authority.

I think this is something that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders might consider. I have nothing that I can cite directly against this procedure, but I was always of the opinion that this kind of step should have the approval of the Senate at some point and that we should not just be told of it ex post facto.

I suggest that we await Senator Marshall's explanation.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, subject matter of inquiry referred to Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

[Senator Bonnell.]

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION FOR MESSAGE TO COMMONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1988, moved:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House that the Senate has authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the following schedule, to which it desires their concurrence:

SCHEDULE

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987 Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

(c) the recognition that aboriginal peoples constitute a distinctive and fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(d) the recognition of the multicultural nature of Canadian society, and in particular respect for the many origins, creeds and cultures as well as the differing regional identities that helped shape Canadian society; and

(e) the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union."

(2)(a) The role of the Parliament of Canada to preserve and promote, and the role of the provincial legislatures to preserve and, subject to subparagraph (2)(b) to promote, the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph 1(a) is affirmed.

(b) The role of a province in relation to promotion applies from the time it is adopted by a resolution of the legislative assembly of that province.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph 1(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25. Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, and until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the government of Canada shall, within six months after the vacancy occurs, call an election in the province or territory to which the vacancy relates for the purpose of filling that vacancy, and, notwithstanding the provision of section 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867, for a term of nine years."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens"

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B. (1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, we are in new waters in terms of what is the exact relationship between the House of Commons and the Senate on amendments to the Constitution by resolution under the sections providing for it in the 1982 amendment.

It is clear that the amendments are affected by separate resolutions by the Senate and the House of Commons and by the necessary number of legislatures. It does not say exactly what will happen. We have to assume that at some point some of the institutions will be required to gather together all the necessary resolutions and take them to Her Excellency and ask her to proclaim an amendment.

I think that there is good reason, on constitutional amendments, for Parliament, that is, the Senate and the House of Commons, to try to speak with one voice, or, at least, to explore that possibility. I do not think that we can explore that possibility formally without advising the other place of what we have done. That is the reason for this motion. It is to send a Message to them to tell them what the Senate has done with a resolution that was tabled in the House of Commons by the government and then tabled separately here in the Senate.

I think it is reasonable, if we want to explore the possibility of speaking with one voice, that we ask them to concur in our amendments.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STUDY OF ELEMENTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND AGREED TEXTS—FOURTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX—FIFTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourteenth and fifteenth reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and, if it is agreed, I shall speak to both of them after tabling them simultaneously, as they relate to the same subject matter.

More formally, honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its fourteenth report respecting constitutional jurisdiction pertaining to certain aspects of the Free Trade Agreement. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 3288)

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its fifteenth report, requesting power to travel outside of Canada for the purpose of such study.

(Text of report follows:)

Wednesday, May 4, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on November 5, 1987, to examine and report upon elements of a Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States, tabled in the Senate on October 6, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-589), and texts subsequently agreed to, respectfully requests that it be empowered to adjourn outside Canada for the purpose of such study.

Your Committee notes that on March 22, 1988, the Senate agreed to the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration recommending that it be authorized to release no more than 3/12th of those approved funds until the end of June 1988 for Committee budgets submitted to it for the financial year 1988-89.

In accordance with the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, your Committee will therefore present to the Senate, a copy of its budget and the report thereon of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, once the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has examined and reported all committee budgets.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE VAN ROGGEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, if I may, I ask that the report be taken into consideration now, and I will have a few words to say to you at this time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), it is moved by the Honourable Senator van Roggen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I am now speaking to both reports.

When the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs last November, we, of course, did not have texts of the agreement at that time. As honourable senators are aware, we are still awaiting the implementing legislation.

I said to the members of the committee, when we first met as a result of that reference, that the committee's information at that time as to the nature of the agreement made it clear to me that it would be unnecessary for the committee to rethresh old straw, if I may use that term, by re-examining the areas relative to free trade that we had examined prior to submitting the committee's report on free trade in 1982, because the current Free Trade Agreement had many major add-ons, if I may call them that, not common to the types of free trade agreement we were considering six years earlier. Just to mention some of them, they include things such as energy, trade in services and financial services. This is the first time these have ever been attempted—

Senator van Roggen: They are all additions. Agriculture is now included, and it generally had not been the subject of free trade agreements in Europe, where the Common Agricultural Policy is, if anything, the antithesis of free trade. Then there are amendments to legislation relative to the Auto Pact, the dispute-settling mechanism and the constitutional question. So we had a lot of work we could do without going back over work the committee had previously done.

Of those add-ons or additional areas covered by the agreement, the committee began taking testimony relative to energy. The committee is continuing to do that, although I hope we will hear from our last witnesses relative to energy in the next week or two. If so, we will be able to prepare an interim report on that subject before proceeding to something else.

In the meantime, it was the feeling of the committee that it was timely to digress from the study of energy this spring because of the urgency of this matter and because we will soon be receiving legislation on the constitutional question and on the dispute-settling mechanism within the agreement. If I can refer to these as mini-studies within the study, the fourteenth report of the committee, which I have tabled today, examines the constitutional question. I will come back to that report in a moment, if I may.

The fifteenth report of the committee, which I have also just tabled, requests permission for the committee to travel and is relative to the dispute-settling mechanism. The committee feels that it could more adequately address this matter in Washington at less expense than it could by remaining in Ottawa. We need to hear from experts, particularly high-priced legal talent, based in Washington and elsewhere who will tell us of the present dispute-settling mechanism under American trade law and how it will be varied by the dispute-settling mechanism contained in this agreement. For that reason we are asking to go to Washington for one and a half days.

Returning to the fourteenth report, I will simply read a few paragraphs from its preamble:

In this, the first of several reports dealing with the Free Trade Agreement, the Committee examines the fundamental question as to whether the federal government has constitutional authority to enter into the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and to enact legislation necessary for its implementation, particularly insofar as it might affect provincial authority.

The Committee decided that the best way for it to approach these legal and constitutional issues was to take testimony from a panel of constitutional and international lawyers. To ensure that the issue was well aired, the Committee invited four expert witnesses from different regions of Canada and having different perspectives on the appropriate division of powers between federal and provincial levels of government to present their views jointly before the Committee, to respond to questions from Committee members and to debate differences of opinions between them . . .

The Committee also retained Professor Marilyn Pilkington of Osgoode Hall Law School, York University, to prepare a working paper, based on the testimony of the panel, as well as on subsequent testimony by Mr. Murray Smith of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, on other established legal authorities and on extensive discussion within the Committee.

Having received and reviewed during several sessions the working paper prepared by Professor Pilkington, the Committee decided to make it public as its Fourteenth Report . . . In a field where most legal writing is difficult for the layperson to penetrate and understand, this working paper is relatively brief and written in simple English. The Committee believes it can contribute to public awareness and understanding and that the Senate and the Canadian public would benefit from having access to it.

Part I of this working paper deals with the extent of federal power to enter into and implement international agreements. Part II reviews the extent of federal jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce. Part III examines the extent to which the Free Trade Agreement is within federal jurisdiction in relation to trade. Part IV assesses the implications of the Agreement for Canadian federalism. Part V considers whether it would be appropriate for the Federal Government to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada questions pertaining to the constitutional validity of the Free Trade Agreement and the legislation by which it is to be implemented. Part VI summarizes the paper.

These items are contained in a 25-page report prepared by Professor Pilkington.

I wish to avoid interpreting this working paper. As I have said, it is 25 pages in length, and it is, in effect, a summary. I would be in danger of taking legal nuances out of context if I attempted to summarize it. Therefore, I would recommend to you to read that comparatively short report.

I might add that at no time did the committee intend or attempt to substitute itself for the Supreme Court of Canada in delivering legal decisions or interpretations.

One item that I wish to address is the question of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. This was put to the panel and, as it says in the document, they were unanimous that it would be most difficult to frame a simple question that the Supreme Court could deal with. There are so many aspects to the Free Trade Agreement that there would be a number of questions based on circumstances that were not yet known, and that would be an impractical course to follow.

Apart from that comment, I do not think I should get into the document itself. The document should really be read as a whole, and not have parts of it taken out of context.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is some confusion in my mind as to the procedural status of the fourteenth report to which Senator van Roggen has referred. We know that a motion has been made to have the fifteenth report adopted now. I presume that in the case of the fourteenth report it is to be placed on the orders of the day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

When the opportunity is provided, I would like to say some words on the fourteenth report. In light of what Senator van Roggen has stated, it is important to underline even more forcibly that what is before us is a working paper, which has been prepared by legal counsel, based upon evidence received from a number of panel experts, and which has been enriched by reference to legal scholars and legal writings.

It is not in the normal sense a report of the committee. The committee is serving as a conduit to bring a working paper to the attention of the Senate and the Canadian public. For example, Senator van Roggen has referred to a conclusion in the working paper, which has arisen from testimony by experts, that it would be inappropriate to have a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not comment one way or the other on that observation in the working paper, as one would be obligated to do if it were a report in the normal sense.

I am not in any way attempting to belittle the value of the working paper, because it does have real value. I am attempting to establish its status, which is quite different from that of a report carrying the judgment of each committee member on each point in the report.

● (1410)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: That comment has been made before on many of the reports that we have had on bills which have carried opinions not entirely relevant to—

Senator Frith: In your judgment!

Senator Flynn: —the conclusions.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I apologize. I should have made it clear in my remarks that in preparing the tabling of documents the clerk of the committee asked me whether this report should be adopted by the Senate. I am not putting it forward as an appropriate report to be adopted; I am simply tabling it as a working paper.

Senator Frith: For consideration.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I think this point should be clarified further.

I agree with those who think that we should not be called upon to adopt this piece of paper, because the committee did not adopt it. The committee considered a variety of opinions on this subject from four different academics. As one might have expected, we got four different opinions. There has been an effort made to reconcile these to some extent in this document—perhaps with a reasonable degree of success—but we should not be called upon to adopt this document. What we might be called upon to do is to give it consideration. We can talk about it—there is no reason why we should not do that, because it is an interesting overview of the topic—but to go further than to have it considered by the Senate would be wrong.

There was a substantial difference of opinion in the committee as to the thrust that this working paper should take. Some of us felt it could be more positive than it turned out to be, but, obviously, we did not constitute the majority opinion of the committee. It is quite clear that this is not the considered judgment of the committee at all; it is a working paper.

I am not entirely sure what the status of a working paper is for the Senate, but I suppose there is nothing to prevent us from considering anything that we want to. I would not oppose this document's being placed before us for consideration, but I would oppose its being placed before us for adoption.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not sure that the confusion which the Leader of the Opposition spoke of has been cleared up—at least, not in my own mind. I have not followed the affairs of this committee as closely as I should have done, but I want to be clear as to what it is we are dealing with here.

Am I correct in stating that this is a paper prepared for the committee by a Professor Pilkington? It is not a narrative, a commentary or a summary by the committee. In fact, the committee has had nothing to do with this. This is something that has been prepared for the committee by Professor Pilkington, who was engaged by the committee for this purpose. Is that what the chairman is placing before the Senate?

Senator van Roggen: If the Leader of the Government in the Senate looks at the fourteenth report, on the second page it states:

Having received and reviewed during several sessions the working paper prepared by Professor Pilkington, the Committee decided to make it public as its Fourteenth Report.

It is clear there that what I am putting before you is not simply an unamended first draft that she came to the committee with.

Senator Murray: She has brought in her report and you, members of the committee, have worked on the report or have "amended it," to use your phrase, is that correct? You have amended her report or edited it in some way.

Senator van Roggen: Any staff member of any committee comes forward with draft material and takes views from the members of the committee; in other words, their recollection of the testimony and the questions put to the witness. As we also say, Professor Pilkington, in preparing this report, relied on the testimony of the panel and also of the other witness that we had and, as we also say somewhere, she took into consideration other established legal authorities. Therefore, it is obviously much more than simply the first rough draft that she placed before the committee.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: It is more than a staff document but less than a committee report. So who stands behind this document? Does Professor Pilkington stand behind it; does the committee stand behind it; or does anyone stand behind it? I do not want to be sticky about this—

Senator Frith: You are doing pretty well—

Senator Murray: —but I think the record should show just whose work this is.

Senator van Roggen: I think this document is a most useful work for senators and Canadians to be able to read. It deals with a difficult legal subject in comparatively simple language. The question of whether or not the committee stands behind it was dealt with in my remarks when I said that the committee does not wish to put itself in the position of giving a series of difficult constitutional legal opinions, which we are not qualified to give.

Senator Frith: It is a ward of the Children's Aid Society, let us say.

Senator Murray: Yes, I agree.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I can throw any further light on this matter, but perhaps I might be allowed to mention another point or two in respect of it. I am going to say that the chairman of the committee stands behind it. He is happy; he is a responsible person. I appreciate his views on the subject—

Senator Frith: Now the affiliation proceedings to find a new parent!

Senator Roblin: I appreciate his views on this subject, and, if someone has to become the father of this document, the chairman is going to be the one who takes responsibility in this respect and, knowing him, he will be quite happy to do so.

Senator van Roggen: Quite happy to do so, honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: I must say that the origin of the actual wording that we have before us is indeed strange, because it is not the unadulterated work of Professor Pilkington, working on the information that was placed before the committee or gathered from other sources. Her original document was substantially commented on by members of the committee and substantial changes were made in it which, in my opinion, in some respects altered the impact of the opinions that were set forth therein, so we must be quite careful about that.

The committee members had some input in editing this document, but they did not reach the sticking point of agreeing on what they had done. They agreed to disagree on that. Therefore, what we have before us is a document prepared by the committee staff, presided over by Professor Pilkington, extensively commented upon and amended in some important respects by the members of the committee, but not adopted by them as being their work or work for which they wish to assume any particular responsibility or on which they wish to take a position. So, it leaves the issues that are involved in these matters rather wide open.

Therefore, honourable senators, I think it would be allowable for me to say to the chairman of the committee that we would allow him to take the responsibility for what is being done.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have no complaint with the summary that Senator Roblin has given. I think he expressed the view that there was comment by members of the committee and, indeed, changes were made by the drafter in response to those comments. Senator Roblin went on to say—and I hope I captured his utterance properly—that at an earlier stage the working paper, as it came to be described, was more to his liking than it eventually ended up.

Senator Roblin: That is the trouble with being in the minority on a committee.

Senator MacEachen: However, I must say that if I were to give my own impression, the present draft is not as much to my liking as I would like. I think that is understandable for various reasons. If we consider this report later, I would like to go into a few points in commenting on the working paper.

● (1420)

Like the chairman, I would stand behind the document, provided I could take a long distance in my stance. Having said that, I think the working paper is very useful and raises a lot of interesting questions. I think it will provide each senator with an opportunity to reach conclusions on the question.

For myself, I did not feel, as a member of the committee, that I should be called upon to reach conclusions on highly technical and legal questions. That is why I, personally, advocated that it should become a working paper. All the views would be contained in it without obligating me, for example, to make what would be equivalent to a judicial finding on certain points or to say whether or not the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not have any particular expertise in that area, nor did I find from the conclusions of the witnesses anything that would assist me to make that judgment. That is why we have filed it in this way. I do not want to leave the chairman in isolation. I stand behind this document, provided we understand what it is.

Senator Roblin: Yes, but not too close!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must say that my curiosity is now piqued to the extent that I would like to obtain a copy of what Professor Pilkington submitted before the committee members got their hands on it.

Senator MacEachen: It has been shredded!

Senator Flynn: Is the motion for consideration or for adoption? I think that is the point that has been raised.

Senator van Roggen: I believe I made it clear a moment ago that I am tabling this only for consideration by the Senate and for the enlightenment of such members of the public as may wish to read it. It is not being tabled for adoption. It is the fourteenth report of the committee.

If I may, I would like to be quite clear that in respect of the fifteenth report, requesting authority to travel to Washington, I am asking, with leave, that it be adopted today.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your wish, honourable senators, that the fourteenth report of the committee be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and fourteenth report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your wish, honourable senators, that the fifteenth report of the committee be now adopted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and fifteenth report adopted.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT
NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS AND POSSIBLE MEDIATION—REQUEST FOR COPY OF NEW AGREEMENT—LOCATION OF QUOTAS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I refer to the delayed answer on the subject matter of the Canada-France fisheries and boundaries agreement which was given to me yesterday by Senator Phillips, the first sentence of which reads:

The agreement of January 1987 contained some time limits which have now passed.

I take it that is departmental language for a less blunt assertion that the agreement expired at the end of 1987.

The point I find difficulty with is contained in the next sentence, and I would like some clarification. The next sentence reads:

The mediation agreement which has recently been agreed to is designed to allow discussions on the substantive issues to resume so that we can achieve a resolution of the boundary dispute, as referred to in the earlier agreement.

I am put off by the use of the expression "substantive issues," which seems to imply that the boundary dispute is not a substantive issue. Perhaps the minister could try to clear this up for me. If there is now an agreement called the mediation agreement, can we have a copy of that agreement?

the Senate—I believe, last week—had been signed ad referendum by our representatives. Unless I am greatly mistaken, it has since been approved by the government; and, yes, I will undertake to see whether I can bring a copy of that agreement into the Senate.

The situation is as I described it last week. We have agreed to go to mediation on the question of fishing quotas, which would take effect once there has been agreement between our two countries on terms of reference for international adjudication of the boundary dispute.

Senator MacEachen: So, when the terms of reference on the boundary arbitration are agreed, the mediation on the quotas will commence—they will go together.

Senator Murray: I think it would be more accurate to say that, assuming that mediation has succeeded and quotas are agreed, we would agree to quotas once the terms of reference for the adjudication of the boundary dispute were settled.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government mentioned quotas. Are those quotas in the disputed zone or what is generally termed "Canadian waters," which, of course, included 2J&3KL?

I thought the answer might have been provided yesterday in the answers tabled by Senator Phillips, but I do not find that information.

Senator Murray: I recall that my honourable friend asked that question a week ago, not once but twice, and I have been trying to find an appropriate formulation for a reply. The formulation that has been suggested to me—I will give it to the honourable senator, for what it is worth—is "Canadian waters quota including the disputed zone."

Senator Frith: Do you stand behind that formulation?

Senator LeBlanc: Does the Leader of the Government want an evaluation of the value of the answer?

TRANSPORT

AIR—REPAIR CHECKS OF AIRCRAFT BY AIRLINES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which arises from a by-line in the Ottawa Citizen, the headline of which reads:

Airlines may get to do own repair checks.

If honourable senators are frequent flyers, as I am, to eastern Canada and the maritimes, they will have realized that they do not always get to travel on the newer planes, apart from the local Dash-7s and Dash-8s, which, I believe, are pretty safe. It worries me, and I am sure it worries many people who have to use the airlines, that the Department of Transport, according to this article, is prepared to allow airlines to conduct their own repair checks, because they need to save the revenues to operate their airlines.

• (1430)

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to say whether this article is factual or not?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have not seen the article to which my honourable friend refers. I do not know whether it is speculative, based on fact or whether there has been an announcement in that regard from the government. I do not know the basis of the article.

I have just been handed a copy of the article, but my friend cannot expect me to comment on it now. I will attempt to obtain a considered reply from my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

Senator Thériault: I accept that. I wish, and hope, that the Leader of the Government will try his utmost to obtain an answer as soon as possible—

Senator Flynn: Before you fly back home!

Senator Thériault: —because this has many people worried, including myself.

ABORTION

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—
OPPORTUNITY FOR FREE VOTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION—GOVERNMENT ACCOMMODATION WITH CHURCH LEADERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate recalls the January 28, 1988, decision of the Supreme Court of Canada calling upon the federal government and Parliament to act with respect to the introduction of legislation to protect the rights of the unborn.

In view of the fact that at a meeting of the provincial ministers of justice and the federal Minister of Justice held in the city of Saskatoon during the month of March no consensus was reached on this matter, and in view of the fact that the government said it would act promptly to deal with this vacuum—in fact, the Leader of the Government indicated that in this chamber—and as we expected legislation to come forward to deal with this important issue before Easter—and we have not seen any legislation—would the Leader of the Government be frank and explain this delay in government action to deal with this very important matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do recall the Supreme Court of Canada decision of January 1988 which held that section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada was in contravention of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As we indicated at that time, we believe that the appropriate response from the federal government is a legislative response. We are still considering what form that legislation should take.

It should not be difficult for the honourable senator, or anybody else, to divine the reasons for the delay. This is a matter involving a most complex area of public policy, touching as it does on private morality. We have the delicate task of attempting to bring in a legislative solution which, consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, can reconcile the right to security of a woman's person with the obvious interest of the state in protecting the unborn.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. In view of the division here on Parliament Hill among parliamentarians, and in view of the division throughout the country, and taking into account the possibility that the government may abandon legislation on its own initiative and present three different bills by three different government members covering the whole spectrum of the fetal rights issue, could the Leader of the Government tell us when these pieces of legislation will be before Parliament?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is not considering the alternative of having, as the honourable senator has put it, three different bills brought in by three different government members.

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if his answer means that the government will not seek to evade its responsibilities in this important matter by allowing a free vote?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister indicated during the last election campaign that if the matter came before Parliament there would be an opportunity for a free vote by members of Parliament.

Senator Stewart: This is a question of public policy; yet, the government intends to avoid taking a definitive stand on this most important question of public policy. Is that correct?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that would be jumping to conclusions. My honourable friend should consider some of the precedents in this regard and he will see that it is quite possible to have an opportunity for a free vote on the part of members of Parliament so that they will have an opportunity to express themselves according to their personal convictions and consciences. At the same time, there will be an opportunity for the government, in due course, to bring in a measure that, as a government, it will stand behind.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question on this issue. In view of this intolerable, protracted delay by the government to bring in legislation to protect the rights of the unborn, causing problems to the medical profession, to provincial health plans, to provincial health ministers regarding what to do with requests for abortions—last year over 60,000 potential Canadians were killed, and such killings are going on every day—can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why the government finds it so difficult to bring in legislation protecting the rights of the unborn?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer to that question must surely lie in the decision that the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered. My honourable friend and others may advocate that we go back to the situation that existed under section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada. That has been struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada.

My honourable friend may suggest that we go back to the situation that existed prior to 1969, when the Government of Canada brought in section 251. That, too, could not be done consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The honourable senator says that there has been an intolerable, protracted delay. What is his evidence for such a statement?

Senator Haidasz: Three and a half months.

Senator Murray: But what has happened in that period of time to justify his assertion that the delay has been intolerable?

Senator Haidasz: Because potential Canadians are being killed every day.

Senator Barootes: Bill C-85, Bill C-84—

Senator Murray: My honourable friend talks about problems for the medical profession and provincial health plans—

Senator Haidasz: And doctors and nurses.

Senator Murray: What has happened is that the therapeutic abortion committees are no longer operating in hospitals across the land.

Senator Haidasz: All that is intolerable.

Senator Murray: That may be intolerable to my honourable friend, but I can tell him that decisions on abortions are now being taken by women in consultation with their physicians, and that he has not the slightest evidence, as far as I have seen, that the medical profession is acting in anything but a perfectly responsible way in the circumstances.

Insofar as the Canada Health Act is concerned, there has been one test case. My honourable friend is aware of it. The Province of British Columbia at one point indicated that it would not provide funding for abortions except in certain circumstances, and that decision was found by the courts to be contrary to the Canada Health Act, and the Government of British Columbia has, since that time, corrected its policy and is governing itself accordingly. I think it is some exaggeration, then, to suggest that anarchy is loose in the land or that there are grave problems for the medical profession, for health ministers or for provincial health plans. We agree that a legislative response is called for under the circumstances, but we do not agree that that legislative response should be devised in undue haste.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary, the minister has just said in his answer that certain people in Canada involved in this matter are acting responsibly. Is it responsible for those people to take the lives of innocent victims—so many every day across Canada? Is that responsible action?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with great respect, I have not tried to quarrel with my honourable friend's sincerely held moral and religious convictions on this matter. What I am saying is that the practice of medicine in this country is the responsibility of the profession and of the provinces, and that by all accounts, and from all of the evidence that I am aware of, the profession and the provinces are acting with a complete sense of responsibility and in accordance with their standards and ethics.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary question. Has the federal government or its representatives met with a delegation of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops to discuss the matter of the protection of the rights of the unborn?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is in the affirmative. A delegation of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, headed by Archbishop Hayes of Halifax, has met with a group of ministers, consisting of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. We have heard their representations and have discussed the situation with them. On no account would they wish me or anyone in the government to say that they are thereby associated, necessarily, with whatever legislative solution we bring in.

Senator Haidasz: Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether the federal government has arrived at an accommodation with the representatives of the Catholic bishops and other church leaders on this matter?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the purpose of our meeting with their excellencies was not to seek an accommodation. It was to give them an opportunity to express their views on this and related subjects.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, if I heard the Leader of the Government in the Senate correctly, he said that this is an appropriate issue for a free vote. He mentioned that there are precedents for deciding such a matter in this way. My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: What matter decided by a free vote involved an issue of sufficiently great importance as to constitute a relevant precedent for a free vote in this instance?

Senator Murray: I think my honourable friend knows the answer to that question as well as I do. One precedent that I could put forward is capital punishment. I make the point simply to inform the honourable senator that one of the options we can consider is that of bringing a resolution to the house in order to get the sense of the house, and to proceed from there to present a bill to Parliament. No decision has been made in this respect, but that is one of the options under consideration.

Senator Stewart: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate even think of comparing the capital punishment question with the abortion question? I submit that on careful consideration he will be driven to the conclusion that these are not truly comparable.

Senator Flynn: Give notice of an inquiry!

Senator Roblin: Debate it!

Senator Stewart: I suggest to him that the abortion question is one on which a responsible government has to make up its collective mind and make its recommendation to the two houses of Parliament.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it must be obvious to my honourable friend, if only from the discussion we have had today, that it would be quite an imposition, in terms of party discipline, to ask members of Parliament to answer to the party whips on a matter of this kind. We must give the members some opportunity to express their personal preferences in this regard.

Senator Stewart: Is that pragmatic approach to be the basis on which the government is going to approach all important and divisive questions in the future?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will surely acknowledge that this is a matter that touches on people's innermost religious and moral convictions. My honourable friend shrugs his shoulders at that statement—so be it.

Senator Stewart: Certainly—that truth is so obvious that it doesn't need to be stated. The government in the election sought the responsibility of taking decisions on leading national questions. Now it is proposing to duck its responsibility.

Senator Murray: The government is proposing to give individual members of Parliament an opportunity to reflect their sincerely held personal views on a matter that touches very deeply on personal morality as well as public policy. In due course, as I have said, the government will have to bring in a bill and take its chances on it.

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—ROLE OF SENATE IN CONSIDERATION OF QUESTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same issue, if I may, when the Leader of the Government says that members of Parliament will be given an opportunity to express their personally held religious, moral and ethical views, as a first step, will that same opportunity be provided to senators?

Senator Phillips: Have you talked to Senator Olson lately?

Senator MacEachen: I am asking whether in the exploration which apparently will take place in giving the members of the House of Commons an opportunity to express their preferences prior to the government's taking a formal decision, will that exploration be undertaken in the Senate as well? Ultimately, it will be necessary for the Senate to pronounce upon this question, and, presumably, it will do so with precisely the same expression of personally held religious and ethical convictions.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as I have indicated, this is an option that the government has under consideration. We have not yet decided whether to proceed in precisely that way. I must say that no consideration has been given to what the role of the Senate might be in this matter, other than to deal with the bill when it passes the House of Commons. There is more than adequate opportunity for senators on either side of the house to bring in a motion, a notice of inquiry, or whatever, that will enable all honourable senators to state their opinions if they wish to do so. A similar situation arose in the case of capital punishment, but there did not seem to be any disposition here to deal with the matter until it came to us by way of legislation.

• (1450)

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT INCONSISTENCY—FORM OF PROTECTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary question, if I may. In congratulating the government on bringing forward legislation quickly to deal with the refugee problem and in response to the public demand to review capital punishment, could the Leader of the Government be frank with us and answer this question: Why is the government not consistent in acting with equal dispatch for the protection of fetal rights as they did with the matters of the refugee problem and capital punishment?

Senator Haidasz: I would like to ask a supplementary question. A few moments ago the minister intimated there may be legislation forthcoming. Are we to believe that this matter—the protection of the unborn—will be dealt with by an amendment to the Criminal Code or by a resolution to make explicit the protection-of-life principles in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, section 251 of the Criminal Code was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada. We have made no commitment as to whether our legislative response will be through the Criminal Code or in some other way.

I must say that the advice we are receiving is that it is very difficult to find a basis other than the criminal law for federal legislation in this field.

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—REPORT AND DRAFT LEGISLATION PREPARED FOR CANADIAN CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government or the Minister of Justice or the officials of his department are in possession of a report prepared by a Ms. Leddy for the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops dealing with the rights of the unborn?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have met Ms. Leddy. She was present with their excellencies when they came to call on us. I have various documents in my files, and I am sure my colleagues have various documents in their files. I cannot say for certain whether I have one signed by Ms. Leddy.

There are documents, including a draft bill, that have been prepared by a group called the Coalition for Life.

Senator Haidasz: Would the Leader of the Government table in the Senate this draft legislation proposed by Ms. Leddy or the Canadian Conference of Bishops, as well as a copy of her report?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what report the honourable senator is talking about. I can see if I have a copy of the draft bill in question that I can send to my friend. I suggest that he might get in touch with this organization and obtain copies from them so he can be sure of having all the appropriate and relevant documentation.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR 1988-89 CROP YEAR—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to complain about how an answer was given last week. I am not sure who is responsible, but perhaps it can be corrected for the future.

For several weeks I had been asking for the initial prices for wheat, oats and other cereal grains in western Canada. On April 27, 1988, the Honourable Orville H. Phillips answered the question by way of a delayed answer. I would like to quote from Hansard:

These are the press releases to be tabled today, as requested by the honourable senator.

Documents tabled.

Of course, copies of the press releases were sent to my office. However, anyone reading the record of this house does not know the prices that have been set.

For regular bread wheat, for example, the price has been increased from $110 per tonne f.o.b. Thunder Bay and Vancouver to $120 per tonne. The price of durum wheat has been increased from $110 per tonne f.o.b. Vancouver and Thunder Bay to $125 per tonne. I do not have the rest of the figures in my memory at this moment. I can bring the press release down and read it into the record so that people looking at Hansard will know what the figures are. However, perhaps Senator Phillips could undertake to read the rest of the figures into the record so that people reading it will know the prices.

The following are the initial payments per bushel and per tonne for wheat, oats, and barley, basis in-store Thunder Bay or Vancouver:

	$ per bushel	$ per tonne
No. 1 Canada Western
Red Spring wheat .....	3.27	120
No. 1 Canada Western
Amber Durum wheat .....	3.40	125
No. 1 Canada Western oats
(designated) .....	1.93	125
No. 3 Canada Western oats .....	1.39	90
No. 1 Canada Western barley .....	1.42	65
Special Select
Canada Western Six Row barley .....	2.72	125

Senator Olson: Thank you. I am sure there are many people who will appreciate that information.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—REQUEST FOR COPY OF CANADIAN EIGHT-POINT PROPOSAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government regarding the matter of acid rain. However, before I put my question I would like to draw to the attention of senators the section on acid rain in the document prepared in connection with the visit of the Prime Minister to Washington on April 27-28, 1988. I must commend the writers of the document for their frank and realistic appraisal of the situation which exists and the total lack of progress which has been made with the United States in dealing with the question of acid rain.

I would like to read a sentence from page 19 of the document:

Unfortunately, during the course of detailed discussions over the past 12 months, it has become evident that the United States is not prepared to negotiate an effective agreement with binding emission reduction targets and schedules.

I believe that that frank acknowledgement is a necessary step in attempting to get progress from, up to the present, a totally reluctant President of the United States.

I understand that flowing from the meeting of the President and the Prime Minister there was a decision that Secretary Shultz and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, would meet to discuss an eight-point Canadian proposal. I welcome the fact that a further effort will be made, but I would like to know whether or not the eight-point proposal has been made public. If not, would the government consider letting us have a copy of the eight points that will become the subject of discussion between Secretary Shultz and Mr. Clark?

Opposition did not state—that it is a new eight-point program. It is a summary of the Canadian position which contains eight major points.

President Reagan has instructed his Secretary of State to undertake discussions with Mr. Clark on the basis of those eight points.

Senator Frith: Are there also some minor points?

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that information. It would be convenient to have the summary of the Canadian position, if it can be made available.

Senator Murray: I will see if I can obtain that, honourable senators.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-89, to amend the Criminal Code (victims of crime).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill placed on the orders of the day for second reading on Tuesday next, May 10, 1988.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn is put I would like to ask the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government whether there is any point in sitting tomorrow, because the government business has been completed. All that is scheduled has been designated to come forward on Tuesday. The Leader of the Government will not be here tomorrow. So, I put the question as to whether it is necessary for the Senate to sit. However, perhaps I have not seen the full vision of the work for tomorrow.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, it is true that we have a lengthy scroll, but I find myself busy saying “stand” this afternoon.

The main reason for meeting tomorrow is the fact that we hope to receive two pieces of legislation which I would like to have introduced so that we can proceed with second reading on Tuesday.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX(See p. 3278)FOREIGN AFFAIRS*STUDY OF ELEMENTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND AGREED TEXTS—FOURTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

---

Wednesday, May 4, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on November 5, 1987 to examine and report upon elements of a Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States, tabled in the Senate on October 6, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-589), and texts subsequently agreed to, proceeded to that examination and now presents an interim report on Constitutional Jurisdiction pertaining to the Free Trade Agreement.

The decision of the federal government to negotiate and sign a Free Trade Agreement with the United States has generated a national debate both as to the advisability for Canada of entering a bilateral free trade agreement and the merits of the specific agreement that has been reached.

Until the enabling legislation has been submitted to Parliament for consideration making evident the changes in existing legislation proposed by the Government, the Committee decided that its time would be best spent examining certain basic issues as well as considering substantive provisions of the Agreement in some areas.

In this, the first of several reports dealing with the Free Trade Agreement, the Committee examines the fundamental question as to whether the federal government has constitutional authority to enter into the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and to enact legislation necessary for its implementation, particularly insofar as it might affect provincial authority.

The Committee decided that the best way for it to approach these legal and constitutional issues was to take testimony from a panel of constitutional and international lawyers. To ensure that the issue was well aired, the Committee invited four expert witnesses from different regions of Canada and having different perspectives on the appropriate division of powers between federal and provincial levels of government to present their views jointly before the Committee, to respond to questions from Committee members and to debate differences of opinions between them.

The four constitutional and international lawyers who appeared before the Committee on February 23, 1988, were:

Ivan Bernier, Professor, Faculty of Law, Director General
Quebec Center on International Relations, Laval University, Quebec

Scott Fairley, Gowling & Henderson, Barristers & Solicitors,
Adjunct Professor of Law, University of Ottawa

Gerald Morris, Professor Emeritus, Faculty of Law, University of Toronto

Andrew Petter, Associate Professor, Faculty of Law, University of Victoria

Although the panelists disagreed on a number of points, there was a substantial measure of consensus concerning the respective powers of the federal and provincial levels of government as they relate to the Free Trade Agreement.

The Committee also retained Professor Marilyn Pilkington of Osgoode Hall Law School, York University, to prepare a working paper, based on the testimony of the panel, as well as on subsequent testimony by Mr. Murray Smith of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, on other established legal authorities and on extensive discussion within the Committee.

Having received and reviewed during several sessions the working paper prepared by Professor Pilkington, the Committee decided to make it public as its Fourteenth Report. While the Committee is hesitant to pronounce on the legal opinions expressed in the working paper and thereby anticipate possible judgments by the Supreme Court of Canada, it considers that the issue of the competence of the federal government to sign and implement the Free Trade Agreement is of central importance. In a field where most legal writing is difficult for the layperson to penetrate and understand, this working paper is relatively brief and written in simple English. The Committee believes it can contribute to public awareness and understanding and that the Senate and the Canadian public would benefit from having access to it.

Part I of this working paper deals with the extent of federal power to enter into and implement international agreements. Part II reviews the extent of federal jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce. Part III examines the extent to which the Free Trade Agreement is within federal jurisdiction in relation to trade. Part IV assesses the implications of the Agreement for Canadian federalism. Part V considers whether it would be appropriate for the Federal Government to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada questions pertaining to the constitutional validity of the Free Trade Agreement and the legislation by which it is to be implemented. Part VI summarizes the paper.

WORKING PAPER

CONSTITUTIONAL JURISDICTION PERTAINING TO CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

I. Jurisdiction to enter into and implement international agreements

Entering into international agreements

The federal government's authority to enter into agreements with foreign states is not explicitly provided for in the Constitution Act, 1867, since the drafters apparently did not contemplate a Canadian role in foreign affairs independent of the British Empire. Canada's power to enter into international agreements derives, as Mr. Fairley and Professor Bernier stated, from the imperial Crown's delegation of prerogative powers over foreign affairs to the Governor General of Canada. Since the Governor General acts on the advice of the government of Canada, the authority to enter into international agreements rests with the executive branch of the federal government.

As Professor P.W. Hogg asserts in Constitutional Law of Canada, even without the delegation of powers to the Governor General, Canada's status as an independent nation implicitly carries with it the authority to enter into agreements with foreign states, and it is appropriate that this authority be exercised by the federal government, representing the national interest.

It was the unanimous view of the four witnesses who appeared before the Committee that the federal government's legal authority to enter into agreements* with foreign states extends to agreements that affect matters within provincial jurisdiction.

- * The witnesses used the terms "treaty" and "international agreement" interchangeably. A.E. Gotlieb, in Canadian Treaty Making (1968) stated (at p. 12) that, in international law, "treaty" is the "broad generic term which describes all binding international agreements between states", but it may also be used in a particular sense to indicate a "solemn type of commitment relating to important aspects of international affairs". He noted that "in whichever sense the term is used, treaties of all varieties or whatever name are always the same in one essential respect: to be a treaty, the instrument . . . must create legal obligations, binding under international law".

Mr. Gotlieb further noted (at p. 13) that the term "treaty" may have special significance within the constitutional law of a particular state. Thus, as explained in Treaties and Other International Agreements: the Role of the United States Senate (a Study Prepared for the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, by the Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, 1984 at pp. 71-77), under the United States Constitution, treaties must be ratified by a two-thirds majority of the Senate, whereas other international agreements are generally authorized by congressional legislation. Nonetheless, as this study states, U.S. treaties and congressional executive agreements have equal status under both international and domestic law.

In Canada, ratification is a prerogative act of the Governor General in Council: (Gotlieb at pp. 14-17) "There is no legal requirement for the legislature, the Parliament of Canada, to 'ratify' (in the internal sense) or approve any international agreement, whether it is termed a 'treaty' or called by any other title or name. . . . When a treaty comes into force, an international obligation to comply with the specific terms of the treaty is imposed upon Canada, but this does not, in itself, change the internal law of the country . . . [As] a matter of principle and practice the Government of Canada does seek the approval of Parliament for certain types of important treaties before ratification is authorized by the Governor-in-Council . . . . Where an agreement requires new legislation to put it into effect, the approval of Parliament is, of course, contained in the legislation adopted".

Mr. Gotlieb concludes, at p. 34, that "The solemnity of the form of an international agreement is not an invariable guide to the importance of the agreement. . . . In terms of Canadian practice, it is certainly the case that, in respect of any individual treaty, the nomenclature is not a guide to the significance of the treaty".

Professor Hogg arrives at the same conclusion: "The various names are of no legal significance; all agreements between states which are intended to be binding in international law, by whatever name they are called, are treaties which bind the states which are parties to them" (Constitutional Law of Canada, p. 241).

However, Professor Petter argued that, notwithstanding this legal power, the federal government is constrained by constitutional principle from unilaterally entering into international agreements which would unduly limit the exercise of provincial powers or subject provinces to retaliatory action. Unless all the provinces consent to an international agreement affecting provincial jurisdiction, he maintained, the federal government is obliged to negotiate inclusion of a "federal state clause", under which it agrees to perform those obligations of the agreement within federal jurisdiction but reserves to the provinces those matters within provincial jurisdiction.

Whether or not such a convention exists, there are de facto constraints on the federal government's authority to enter into international agreements. The power to enter into an agreement does not necessarily carry with it authority to implement that agreement. Since the federal government could be in breach of international obligations and subject to sanctions if it enters into an international agreement which it subsequently cannot implement, there are practical limits on its power to enter into international agreements.

Implementing international agreements

Some obligations undertaken in an international agreement can be implemented by federal executive action, but where an agreement involves a change in domestic law in Canada, legislation is required in order to give effect to it. Because legislative power is distributed between Parliament and the provincial legislatures, the issue to be determined is which level of government has authority to enact the necessary legislation.

The Constitution Act, 1867 recognized that it was appropriate for the federal government to implement Canadian obligations under imperial treaties and accordingly conferred on Parliament and the federal government authority to perform such obligations regardless of whether they were within federal or provincial jurisdiction:

section 132. The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all Powers necessary or proper for performing the Obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as Part of the British Empire, towards Foreign Countries, arising under Treaties between the Empire and such Foreign Countries.

The Constitution Act did not, however, provide for the implementation of international agreements entered into by Canada as an independent state, nor did the delegation of prerogative powers to the Governor General carry with it legislative authority to enact changes to domestic law which are required in order to implement the terms of an international agreement.

In the Labour Conventions case (1937), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (U.K.) held that section 132 did not authorize federal implementation of treaties other than imperial treaties. The Judicial Committee concluded that authority to legislate so as to implement treaties is divided between Parliament and the provincial legislatures in accordance with their respective jurisdictions.

Although, in Professor Petter's view, this approach is a sound reflection of the federalism principle, both Mr. Fairley and Professor Morris criticized the Judicial Committee's decision as unduly constraining Canada's authority to implement international obligations. Mr. Fairley stated that:

Essentially the approach of the Privy Council, which is maligned but still good law as we speak today, is that the Constitution is simply blind to the presence or absence of a treaty for purposes of saying whether one level of government or another had jurisdiction. That is a manifest constitutional deficiency for Canada.

If we are going to be a nation in any respect, we should be a nation in respect of other nations (15:13).

It has been argued that Canada's authority to implement international agreements could have been supported under the federal authority over peace, order and good government. As Professor P.W. Hogg explains in Constitutional Law of Canada Parliament's jurisdiction in relation to peace, order and good government may be invoked on three bases. First, it can be invoked on a permanent basis to deal with distinct and limited subject areas of national concern which can be regulated effectively only on a national basis. For instance, federal legislation in relation to aeronautics and, most recently, marine pollution has been upheld on this basis, but federal legislation in relation to inflation has not, on the grounds that it is a broad subject matter which, if conferred on Parliament, could interfere significantly with areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Second, the peace, order and good government power can be invoked on a temporary basis to justify federal interference with provincial jurisdiction as necessary to meet a situation of national emergency. The Anti-Inflation Act which regulated wages and prices within provincial jurisdiction was upheld on this basis.

Third, the peace, order and good government power may be invoked on a permanent basis to fill a gap in constitutional authority in those few cases where the Constitution deals with a subject matter but only in a partial way. In the Radio Reference (1932), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that such a gap was left by section 132 which provided for the implementation of imperial treaties but not Canada's own treaties, and that accordingly Parliament had jurisdiction pursuant to the peace, order and good government power to legislate the implementation of Canada's international agreements. This analysis was subsequently disapproved by the Judicial Committee in the Labour Conventions case.

As Professor Morris noted, there are now several dicta in the Supreme Court of Canada indicating a willingness to reconsider the Judicial Committee's reasoning in the Labour Conventions case. However, none of the witnesses before the Committee considered it likely that the Supreme Court of Canada would hold that Parliament has authority to legislate the implementation of all international agreements. Professor Petter commented that such agreements now extend to a full range of domestic policy matters such as education, health, labour and human rights. Accordingly, recognition of an unqualified federal power to implement international agreements would authorize unacceptable interference with matters within provincial jurisdiction. Nonetheless, as Professor Morris and Mr. Fairley asserted, there may be scope for a qualified federal power in relation to the implementation of agreements. The task is to develop a test which provides Parliament with appropriate scope to enter into and implement international agreements in the national interest without authorizing unwarranted interference with provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Fairley, in a paper presented to the Canadian Council on International Law, has recommended that federal jurisdiction to implement international agreements should be recognized but only where international interests are paramount. Professor W.N. Lederman recommended in Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas that Parliament should have jurisdiction to legislate for the implementation of international obligations in areas within provincial jurisdiction but only where those areas have achieved national dimensions and national importance. He suggested that the existence of a treaty might be evidence that the matter had attained a national dimension. Professor Petter disagreed:

I do not share the view of some that, because there is a treaty, that somehow gives the presumption, or strongly influences the conclusion, that this is a matter that falls under, say, the general trade power or under peace, order and good government. It seems to me that would, in a sense, "end-run" the very principle that the Labour Conventions case was intended to protect (15:9).

G.V. LaForest in an article written before he was appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, expressed concern about the vagueness of the test proposed by Professor Lederman (a concern which is shared by Professor Hogg), but agreed that it is likely that "the law will move in the general direction of affording the federal parliament more scope to implement international action". He concluded that the Court is more likely to expand specific heads of federal power which have international aspects, and rely on the residuary peace, order and good government clause to support federal regulation of matters within provincial jurisdiction which are necessarily incidental to an international agreement. In a paper recently delivered to the National Conference on Free Trade, Professor Dale Gibson concluded that:

Although the Supreme Court of Canada has not yet made a conclusive pronouncement on the matter, it would be reasonably safe to predict that when it does so it will opt for an approach, along the lines of those advocated by Lederman and LaForest, that will permit a pragmatic sharing of responsibilities between federal and provincial authorities on questions that straddle international boundaries. In my view, the test ultimately adopted will probably permit federal authorities to both enter and implement treaties having intra-provincial ramifications if the matter has a genuine and significant international dimension.

Accordingly, it is clear that Parliament can enact legislation to implement an international agreement where the legislation is within federal jurisdiction. Further, it is open to the Supreme Court of Canada to recognize a federal power to implement international agreements, even when they deal with matters within provincial jurisdiction; in light of comments by members of the Court expressing willingness to reconsider the Labour Convention case, it is possible that the Court will do so. At the least, as Professor Petter acknowledged, where the federal government has bona fide entered into an international agreement pertaining to the regulation of matters which are primarily within federal jurisdiction, this power to implement international agreements would provide additional support for ancillary provisions of the agreement which deal with matters within provincial jurisdiction.

Further, even where an international agreement deals substantially with matters ordinarily within provincial jurisdiction, the Court might recognize federal jurisdiction to legislate so as to implement the agreement where the pursuit of national objectives requires co-operative action with a foreign state and the importance of the national objectives outweighs any necessary impact on provincial powers. Such a test would preclude Parliament from legislating on matters within provincial jurisdiction merely because it had entered into an international agreement to do so, but it would enable Parliament to implement international agreements which are important to the national interest. In his testimony before the Committee, Professor Morris cautioned that, without the recognition of some federal power in relation to foreign affairs, Canada's federal system could become an instrument of weakness:

the argument that "Now we routinely deal with so many matters that are really within the provincial heads of jurisdiction, in terms of the conduct of foreign relations, that we have to be even more careful to sustain the provincial jurisdiction" is not the only argument that can be made. There is another way of viewing that situation --- and perhaps it is an indication to which we should give some attention --- which is that the world in general, including a good number of federal states, routinely seizes these topics as suitable for coordination at an international level. It is seen as essential that national states be able to deal with these matters and deal with them effectively, which means that they be brought into effect in internal law. ... It is well known that it was clearly understood that the constitution of West Germany was drafted in 1949 with the specific purpose of hamstringing that country so that it could never again be an effective power internationally. That is not a very happy category for Canada to fall into (15:20).

Nonetheless, Professor Morris was not confident that the Supreme Court of Canada would be prepared to recognize a federal power in relation to foreign affairs. Professor Bernier was clearly of the view that, with respect to the Free Trade Agreement:

it is not the general treaty-making power that is at stake, but the competence of Parliament to implement a treaty in a specific field, and [the courts] would judge on the basis of the field they are dealing with and will stick to that field (15:43).

II. Jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce

International versus intraprovincial trade

Section 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 confers on Parliament exclusive legislative authority in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce. Together with Parliament's authority in relation to taxation, public borrowing, banking, currency and interest, Parliament was evidently intended to have extensive powers to regulate trade, commerce and the economy generally. On the other hand, the provinces were given jurisdiction over property and civil rights, which included the regulation of contracts, through which trade is conducted. In order to provide scope for both the federal and the provincial jurisdiction, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council modified the federal powers. It upheld provincial jurisdiction in relation to intraprovincial trade and limited Parliament's jurisdiction to: (1) international trade; (2) interprovincial trade; and (3) general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion (Citizens' Insurance Co. v. Parsons, 1891).

The federal jurisdiction over trade and commerce operates not only as a source of federal power but also as a limit on provincial power. Thus, provincial legislation must regulate intraprovincial transactions only. To the extent that it regulates transactions in out-of-province products, even for the purpose of maintaining an intraprovincial marketing scheme, it is invalid. Even if the provincial legislation regulates only intraprovincial transactions, it may be invalid if it "aims at" interfering with interprovincial or international trade. (Manitoba Egg Reference, 1971; Central Canada Potash Co. v. Saskatchewan, 1978.)

By the same token, federal trade legislation must fasten only on interprovincial or international transactions, although in cases involving marketing of grain or oil, courts have upheld federal regulation of intraprovincial transactions, the regulation of which was necessarily incidental to an otherwise valid federal marketing plan. (Natural Products Marketing Reference, 1937; Murphy v. C.P.R., 1958; R. v. Klassen, 1959.)

Focusing on the nature of the transactions regulated and the purpose of the regulation, rather than its impact on trade, has not proved to be a satisfactory means of distinguishing between federal and provincial powers. Frequently, some of a regulated product is consumed locally, and some of it enters interprovincial or international trade. As a result, the jurisdiction to regulate the product is divided. At the stage of production, where the product is undifferentiated, it is frequently impossible to determine which level of government has regulatory power. Since conflicting regulations pertaining to a single product would be chaotic, the two levels of government have been compelled to enter into cooperative marketing schemes. In this way the dysfunctional distribution of authority can be circumvented. It remains to be seen whether the Supreme Court of Canada, which is becoming accustomed to applying a "purposive analysis" to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, will now take a more purposive or functional approach to the division of powers in relation to trade and commerce.

The federal trade and commerce power continues to be defined in accordance with the three categories delineated by the Judicial Committee. Accordingly, Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate international trade, exports and imports, as well as interprovincial trade. In addition, it appears that, in the service of a national regulatory policy, Parliament may regulate intraprovincial transactions which are necessarily incidental to the effectiveness of an international trade plan.

General regulation of trade

Mr. Fairley argued that in support of its power to implement the Free Trade Agreement, Parliament may also be able to rely on a newly-defined authority in relation to the third category of federal jurisdiction recognized by the Judicial Committee: "general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion". This category has until recently been ill-defined. Now, however, a member of the Supreme Court of Canada has suggested a series of tests for determining when the general power can appropriately be utilized, without unduly interfering with provincial jurisdiction over intraprovincial trade. Building on suggestions previously made by then Chief Justice Laskin, Mr. Justice Dickson (now Chief Justice) proposed that general federal trade regulation might be upheld where: (1) it is aimed at the economy as a single integrated national unit; (2) it could not be accomplished by the provinces acting separately or in combination; (3) it could not be effective unless all provinces were included; and (4) it is a regulatory scheme requiring administration by a regulatory agency.

Professor Bernier expressed some doubt as to whether Chief Justice Dickson's suggested tests would apply to an Agreement like the Free Trade Agreement, and preferred to consider the implementation of the Agreement pursuant to Parliament's international trade jurisdiction. Mr. Fairley, on the other hand, considered that the tests are both applicable to and satisfied by the Free Trade Agreement:

What happens if we apply these criteria to the leading features of the agreement which eventually will be before you, or at least the implementing legislation? The first instance is for Parliament to come up with a comprehensive regulatory and statutory framework. If that framework is tied together in a unified whole, as is the agreement, there must be a national regulatory scheme for free trade with the United States. Pursuant to that, there is also ongoing supervision pursuant to the institutional provisions built into the Free Trade Agreement. I refer to the chapters on the commission and the special panels for resolving countervailing and anti-dumping disputes. For the Free Trade Agreement to work, you are going to have a new bi-national bureaucracy between Canada and the United States to make that agreement a functional reality.

Dealing with the third item, we can certainly say that the focus of the agreement is trade in general. We are talking about a comprehensive free trade area, notwithstanding particular exceptions to the coverage of the agreement, such as the exemption for beer and certain other market sectors.

No one is going to suggest that the provinces jointly or severally could implement anything like the Free Trade Agreement --- nothing close.

There exists a very real danger that one or more recalcitrant province could jeopardize the entire scheme, as well as its successful operation in other parts of the country.

I suggest to you that there is an extremely persuasive fit between what is required for purposes of implementing the Free Trade Agreement and what the Chief Justice of Canada says is a reasonable approach to the general trade and commerce power (15:14-15).

Although two other members of the Court concurred with Chief Justice Dickson, the Court as such has not yet indicated its approval or disapproval of the tests he proposed. Should Chief Justice Dickson's formulation of the third category of federal jurisdiction over trade be approved by a majority of the Court, it could provide significant support for Parliament's jurisdiction to regulate the national economy as an integrated unit.

III. The Free Trade Agreement as Regulation of International Trade

The Free Trade Agreement relates primarily to international trade, in that it is intended to establish a "free-trade area" within the meaning of Article XXIV of the GATT in goods, services and investment between Canada and the United States (ch. 1). It provides for the removal of most direct barriers to trade, such as tariffs, export taxes, quotas and other restrictive border measures (ch. 4). It also prohibits discriminatory treatment of imported products (ch. 5), and, to a lesser extent, services (ch. 14) and investment (ch. 16); it prohibits the use of federal technical standards to create unnecessary obstacles to trade (ch. 6); and it prohibits the creation or use of a monopoly or state enterprise for the purposes of evading obligations under the Agreement (ch. 12).

The Free Trade Agreement does take into account some provincial and regional interests which would be affected by free trade and specifically excludes or preserves them:

- chapter 6, with respect to technical standards, exempts provinces from the obligation to alter technical standards and procedures which create unnecessary obstacles to trade;
- chapter 7, with respect to agriculture, preserves marketing plans, farm income stabilization and price support programs in some areas;
- chapter 12 incorporates the provisions of Article XX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), which preserve import and export controls as necessary to protect public morals or health and to ensure compliance with domestic laws not aimed at trade;
- chapter 12 also preserves controls on the export of logs, the export of unprocessed East Coast fish, and the internal sale and distribution of beer, while preserving the parties' rights pursuant to the GATT;
- chapter 13 excludes provincial governments from the provisions regulating government procurement;
- chapter 14, which provides for free trade in services, excludes transportation, basic telecommunications, doctors, dentists, lawyers, childcare and government-provided services (health, education and social services); this is, however, subject to chapter 15 which provides that professionals who are engaged in the trade of goods or services or in investment activities shall be temporarily granted entry to and issued an employment authorization by the other Party to the Agreement;
- chapter 16, which provides for free trade in investment, applies only to future changes in laws, and although it precludes requirements that investors use local goods or services, or achieve certain levels of domestic content, or export certain levels of product, it does not prohibit "negotiation of performance requirements attached to subsidies or government procurement";
- chapter 17, which covers financial services, does not apply to any provincial measure.

These qualifications preserve to the provinces much of the regulatory scope that would be affected by free trade. Nonetheless, concerns have been raised by some provincial authorities about the impact of the Free Trade Agreement on the scope of provincial regulatory authority, including the following specific concerns:

- ° provincial laws which require upgrading or processing of a natural resource in Canada prior to export may be subject to challenge as improper export restrictions;
- ° attempts to cut back production of a resource so as to raise the export price in the United States may be subject to challenge;
- ° consumer protection measures which restrict the right of non-residents to carry on some businesses in the province may be challenged unless it can be shown that the restrictions are no greater than necessary in order to protect consumers;
- ° the establishment of new public insurance schemes will be subject to compensation of privately owned companies which might be affected;
- ° public insurance plans may also be subject to challenge under the monopolies provisions;
- ° tax breaks, grants and other incentives for which only Canadian-owned businesses are eligible may be subject to challenge on the grounds that they constitute unjustifiable discrimination; and
- ° the United States may challenge and retaliate against any provincial measure that causes nullification or impairment of any benefit it reasonably expected to receive under the Agreement.

In assessing these concerns, it is important to note that the effect of international trade obligations on the exercise of provincial jurisdiction is not a new matter. Murray Smith, Director of the International Economics Program of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, told the Committee that the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and its associated codes contain a number of general provisions that affect matters within provincial jurisdiction, for example, provisions relating to national treatment, standards, and import and export controls. In the mid-1970s, for example, a tax levied by the Ontario government on the sale of non-North American automobiles was withdrawn after protests by the European Community and Japan that the tax violated GATT obligations. Similarly, in the early 1980s, a handling charge imposed by Ontario on foreign wines was withdrawn after protests from the European Community and the United States. Since wines, spirits and beer are subject to regulation by the GATT, and in light of the recent finding by a panel of GATT that Canada is in breach of its obligations because of the failure of provinces to observe the GATT requirements, it appears that, with respect to wines and spirits, the Free Trade Agreement may do little more than is already possible under the GATT,* and with respect to beer, which is specifically excluded from the Free Trade Agreement, the GATT provisions govern.

Accordingly, although the Free Trade Agreement goes beyond the GATT in some areas, both international trade agreements affect provincial interests. The establishment of a free trade area clearly has an impact on the provinces because it changes the context within which they may exercise their jurisdiction, but that does not necessarily amount to a reduction in the provinces' jurisdiction. Professor Petter argued that:

it would violate the autonomy and sovereignty of provincial governments to allow the federal government to expand its jurisdiction by unilaterally entering into a treaty. Federalism cannot allow a situation where one level of government, through unilateral action, can effectively displace the powers of another level of government (15:8).

While it is true that the federal government does not have the power to reduce unilaterally the jurisdiction of the provinces, it is not clear that the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement would have that effect. Professor Bernier and Mr. Fairley argued that the Free Trade Agreement asserts the jurisdiction of the federal government in relation to international trade. Since a valid federal law will prevail over a conflicting provincial law,

---

* In any event, as Mr. Fairley noted, the monopoly of the provinces in the sale of imported liquor is currently dependent upon the federal Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, which makes it an offence to import any liquor deemed by a province to be intoxicating except through a provincial government or its designated agency. Accordingly, it appears that there is a basis for asserting federal jurisdiction to regulate the importation of wine and distilled spirits and to prohibit discriminatory treatment of imported products.

the scope available for provincial action may be reduced. This effect, far from being unconstitutional, is provided for by sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In the words of Professor Bernier:

the primary focus of the Free Trade Agreement is international trade.

This being the case, the issue is the regulation of international trade, and whether it has an incidental and minor, or major and direct impact on provincial jurisdiction, the doctrine of federal paramountcy comes into play.

By virtue of the double aspect doctrine, provincial measures will be able to co-exist with federal measures, to the extent that the activities targeted by such legislative measures are also the focus of provincial activities, and provided they are not functionally incompatible with them. Should the opposite be true, federal measures take precedence (15:22).

Professor Petter questioned the applicability of the paramountcy doctrine as a basis for excluding the exercise of provincial jurisdiction:

It is one thing for the federal government to enact positive measures and for the doctrine of paramountcy then to prevent contradictory positive measures. It is a very different thing for the federal government to create an area of exclusive jurisdiction or no jurisdiction by saying to the provinces. "You cannot enact measures in this jurisdiction" (15:39).

Mr. Fairley disagreed with Professor Petter that implementation of the Free Trade Agreement would preclude the exercise of provincial jurisdiction:

I do not read the law in the way Professor Petter does . . . . There are lots of cases which talk about the province being able to positively regulate, absent federal prohibition, but if there is a conflict between the federal prohibition and the provincial regulation the provincial regulation then falls. . . .

In this case all that is necessary is for the federal government to occupy the field in the sense of setting up a minimum standard. For example, in relation to national treatment the federal legislation could simply say that anywhere in Canada the treatment of an important product governed by the agreement will be an MFN standard --- most favoured nation; I am using the GATT language which appears throughout the agreement. The result of that would be not necessarily uniformity and not necessarily a holus-bolus standard imposed on the provinces; all it would say is that the best deal accorded a particular product in any jurisdiction, be it federal or provincial, must be the deal you give to the commodity being regulated by the agreement --- in this case, any import from the United States. That would be a minimum standard which the federal legislation could implement, and any conflict(ing) ... provincial legislation would be ... inoperative ... (15:40-41).

In Professor Bernier's view, since Parliament has the right to legislate in relation to international trade, there is compelling support for Parliament's jurisdiction to implement the Free Trade Agreement:

What it really comes down to is this: "What is the true nature of the legislative measures adopted?" A free trade agreement such as the one proposed or currently under consideration seeks to impose restrictions or prohibit certain treatments. More specifically, I would say that the provisions concerning national treatment seek to eliminate all forms of discrimination against products, manufacturers or even Americans themselves. Thus, it is an essentially negative approach designed to do away with discrimination. I believe that such an approach would be viewed broadly by the courts as flowing from international trade (15:22-3).

Professor Bernier cautioned that a trade agreement could infringe provincial jurisdiction if it went beyond eliminating barriers to trade and specified how provincial jurisdiction is to be exercised:

If the agreement in question went further and sought to harmonize or develop joint policies in different sectors, which is not really the case or for that matter the objective, we could then ask ourselves if this constitutes in fact a more serious infringement of provincial jurisdiction (15:23).

... This is not to say that the federal government can take the place of the provincial government and regulate certain areas of activity or make executive decisions in its place. If we take, for example, provincial monopolies in the case of liquor and distilled spirits, the federal government could not decide how all of these liquor boards would operate without casting into question the very right of provinces to establish monopolies, despite the inevitable impact these have on trade, as shown in the Supreme Court ruling in the case of "Canadian Indemnity vs the Attorney General of British Columbia." At best, we can foresee that in the case of the federal Parliament exercising jurisdiction over international trade, guidelines will be put in place to identify the margin of manoeuvrability of provincial liquor board monopolies insofar as Canada's international obligations are concerned (15:24).

Much depends on the actual implementing legislation and the extent to which it assigns responsibility for the burdens of the Free Trade Agreement to the provinces or the federal government. For example, as Professor Petter argued, article 1605 requires that no American investment shall be nationalized or expropriated in Canada (and vice versa) except for a public purpose, in accordance with due process of law, on a non-discriminatory basis and upon payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation at fair market value. If the effect of this provision is to require that a new public insurance scheme, such as no-fault automobile insurance, can be established only if compensation is provided to American insurers for the loss of their investment in the province, then it appears that the Agreement imposes a limit on provincial jurisdiction. The limit is not simply that Americans must be given equal treatment. Rather, a particular type of treatment, namely compensation, is prescribed. This could prove to be a formidable obstacle to the exercise of provincial jurisdiction, unless the federal government is prepared to assume the burden. Until the implementation legislation is introduced, it is not possible to assess whether this and other issues will be addressed in a manner which satisfactorily protects provincial jurisdiction.

Professor Bernier noted that in the past means have been found to adjust the exercise of constitutional powers to the reality of Canadian federalism:

International competition requires adjustments that are sometimes difficult to make in virtually all countries. For the provinces to sidestep this adjustment process would be surprising, to say the least. But this in no way means that the essential division of powers in Canada must be altered. Much in the same way the unexpected increase in the provinces' authority over social matters was compensated for beginning in the fifties by federal activities carried out pursuant to a new or rediscovered spending authority, it is conceivable that the increase in federal responsibilities with regard to international trade will eventually be compensated for by a more active, ongoing participation by the provinces in the formulation of Canadian policy in this area (15:22).

He further suggested that this adjustment would be facilitated by federal-provincial cooperation and consultation:

Experience in the United States and the European Economic Community would seem to indicate that when regional concerns are given a real place in the formulation of central policies, the overall results are better. If that is the case, then any expansion of federal jurisdiction over foreign trade linked to the implementation of the Free-Trade Agreement with the United States should be accompanied by the introduction of a real mechanism for federal-provincial cooperation on implementation of the agreement (15:25).

The general conclusion of Professor Bernier and Mr. Fairley that legislation to implement the Free Trade Agreement would likely be within federal authority over international trade is broadly supported by other constitutional lawyers writing on this topic, namely Dean John Whyte, Professor R.E. Sullivan, and Professor Dale C. Gibson.

IV. Implications for Federalism

Professor Petter argued that the impact of the Free Trade Agreement on the jurisdiction of the provinces is so substantial that Parliament should not be able to use its jurisdiction in relation to treaties and international trade to implement it unilaterally:

... one level of government cannot operate in this country as a matter of constitutional principle and convention in a way that would have the effect of limiting the powers of other orders of government (15:26).

... I do not think that the problem with this agreement is that the federal government cannot enact treaty legislation or international trade legislation. I agree that that is very much what this agreement is about. The problem with this agreement is that it places upon the provinces an obligation not to take actions which have the effect of interfering with those obligations, and matters that fall well within provincial jurisdiction will have that effect (15:28).

In a paper presented to the National Conference on Free Trade, he elaborated on the argument he had put to the Committee:

The Agreement deals with important matters of provincial jurisdiction; it will subject provinces to an enforcement mechanism that is even more stringent than the one applying to the federal government; and it will produce significant changes in the nature of federal-provincial relations.

These changes will compromise the ability of provinces to pursue independent policies and thus to act as "laboratories" for political innovation and regulatory reform. Once the Agreement is in place, any provincial initiative that could be construed as violating its terms will attract scrutiny, pressure and possibly retaliation from both American and federal authorities.

Given this reality, it may seem surprising that the Agreement has generated only limited opposition from the provinces...

Why is this so? The answer seems to be that the premiers who support the Agreement are prepared to suppress their passion for provincial rights to pursue their love of laissez-faire economics.

It is conceivable that, to the extent it can be established that the legislation implementing the Free Trade Agreement would have very significant impact on the scope of provincial jurisdiction, a court could hold that the legislation violates basic federalism principles. In other constitutional contexts, courts have put limits on broad federal powers which had the potential to curtail provincial jurisdiction. The federal trade and commerce power itself was limited by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for this reason. Accordingly, in assessing the Free Trade legislation, a court may be faced with balancing the need for federal capacity to regulate international trade in the national interest against the need to protect provincial jurisdiction. In making this assessment, the court would presumably take into account the degree to which provincial powers are already, and are likely to continue to be, limited by various other international trading agreements, primarily the GATT.

Professor Petter expressed particular concern about the effect of Article 103 of the Free Trade Agreement, which requires that:

The parties to this Agreement shall ensure that all necessary measures are taken in order to give effect to its provisions, including their observance, except as otherwise provided in the Agreement, by state, provincial and local governments.

He argued before the Committee that this clause could oblige Parliament and the federal government to take action against provinces and their legislation, including using the spending power, the taxing power, the power to declare works and undertakings for the general advantage of Canada and the power to reserve and disallow provincial legislation.

I am sure that I do not have to tell those around this table that when you live in a federal state, in order for that federal state to function, you do not, as either a federal or a provincial government, take all necessary measures; indeed, I think the principle of federalism would cave in if the federal government were, at all times, to assert the the full extent of its authority. In some situations there is legal authority in the federal arena which is considered to be obsolete. For example, there is the disallowance power, even though it is still on the books. However, even within powers that are used --- and here I am thinking of the spending power; of taxing powers; of the declaratory power, which is the power to declare works and undertakings to be of national import --- the federal government does not, as a matter of course, use the full extent of those legal powers, nor should it. If it did, it would seriously jeopardize the ability of federalism to function and of the federal and provincial governments to get along in a cooperative situation. It is the principle of cooperative federalism, of give and take, which allows those powers to exist on the books, but which nevertheless allows federalism to function effectively by having the parties restrain themselves.

What this treaty does, it seems to me is to put a great deal of pressure on the federal government to play upon powers that it now has, but which heretofore it has --- and rightly in my view --- been very restrained in exercising. There is nothing in this agreement --- as there are in some other agreements, I understand --- concerning policy and the propriety of using powers. There is nothing here to say that the federal government must only use powers where it is proper in a policy sense. In fact, the federal government is obliged to ensure that all necessary measures are taken.

The other state with which we are involved in respect of this treaty, the United States, has a far more centralist view of federalism and a far less sympathetic view of the restrained use of central powers. It is very common in the United States for spending powers to be used to a much greater extent than in Canada to coerce states to pursue federal objectives; there is a far greater expectation that the federal government can generally involve itself in provincial matters. What I would argue that the treaty does, and the impact that it has on federal-provincial relations, is that it effectively brings to the federal-provincial bargaining table a third party in the form of the United States, a very powerful party with a lot of power to enforce the obligations in this agreement. That party is given the power to ensure, or to bring action against Ottawa if Ottawa fails to ensure, that all necessary measures are taken.

I do not wish to mislead the committee. The treaty does not require Ottawa to use those powers. It says that if Ottawa does not use all of its necessary powers, then Canada becomes subject to retaliatory action. What I am arguing is that the pressure that it puts upon Canada is a pressure that will move Canada in a far more centralistic direction; in a direction that is likely to result in far more federal intervention in provincial matters than we have seen to date (15:10-11).

Professor Bernier acknowledged that Article 103

... is, to all intents and purposes, the very opposite of a traditional federal clause. Rather than qualify the extent of the federal authority's obligations on the international level so as to take into account the division of powers, which constitutes an obligation of means, article 103 denies the impact of this division and imposes on the federal government the strict liability to perform (15:21).

By agreeing to Article 103, both the Canadian and American governments have undertaken to ensure that the Free Trade Agreement is observed or, alternatively, pay compensation or suffer retaliatory measures as provided in Chapter 18 of the Agreement.

The comparable obligation in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), Article XXIV:12, provides that:

Each contracting party shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of this Agreement by the regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

Although GATT Article XXIV:12 is worded less strongly than Article 103, Mr. Smith argued before the Committee that the findings of two recent GATT panels suggest that the GATT clause is being interpreted as requiring the federal government to pay compensation if it is unable to secure compliance with GATT obligations by provincial governments. Admittedly, there has been no authoritative interpretation of GATT Article XXIV:12. Mr. Frank Stone, of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, in a report prepared for the Committee, noted that prior to the mid-1970s member states infrequently turned to GATT's dispute settling mechanisms, preferring to resolve differences through bilateral negotiations; thus, only two GATT panels have considered federal responsibility for the actions of regional governments. Both complaints involved Canada.

The first panel examined a complaint in 1984 from South Africa about a differential sales tax levied by Ontario on South African gold coins. The panel found that the tax was discriminatory and thus in breach of the GATT rules on national treatment under Article III:2. According to Mr. Stone, the panel recommended that the Canadian government take such measures as were available to it to secure the necessary changes in the Ontario tax and further recommended that Canada compensate South Africa for loss of sales opportunities. Ontario removed the discriminatory tax, the two countries settled the issue, and the panel report was accordingly not presented for formal adoption by the GATT Council.

The second GATT panel considered a complaint by the European Economic Community about distribution and sale of alcoholic beverages by provincial agencies. As both Mr. Smith and Mr. Stone noted, the panel recently found that Canada is in breach of its obligations under the GATT because of the failure of provinces to comply with provisions governing the non-discriminatory sale of wine, beer and spirits. The panel apparently rejected arguments that the federal government had met its obligations under Article

XXIV:12 of the GATT and could not be held responsible for provincial non-compliance. Mr. Smith also noted that no other federal state intervened in support of the federal government's position.

Although GATT Article XXIV:12 has not yet been interpreted by the GATT Council, the reports of the two panels suggest that it may be interpreted as imposing obligations on the federal government much like those imposed by Article 103.

On the basis of these findings Mr. Smith concluded that the difference in wording between Article 103 of the Free Trade Agreement and Article XXIV of the GATT may be more a difference of form than of substance.

The commitment in Article 103 provides additional assurance that trade obligations will be honoured or their breach will be compensated. Neither side's non-compliance will be excused, as it possibly could be under the GATT, on the basis that it has taken "such reasonable measures as may be available to it". Mr. Fairley noted that "Parliament . . . will have to look at the prospect of (playing) hard ball when it comes to meeting the commitments that have been made" (15:16).

The significance of Article 103 will depend upon the extent to which implementation of the Free Trade Agreement is within federal jurisdiction. If implementation of any aspects of the Agreement is beyond the jurisdiction of Parliament, Article 103 still obliges the federal government to take all necessary measures to enforce provincial compliance, or expose Canada to retaliatory consequences. Faced with such a choice, the government would have to weigh the cost to federal-provincial relations of using extraordinary measures to enforce the Agreement against the cost of retaliatory measures by the United States pursuant to the Agreement. This is not a new choice: it has always been open to the federal government to exercise its extraordinary powers to force provincial compliance with trade agreements in the face of retaliatory measures. The actual danger, according to Professor Petter, is that there may now be more pressure on the federal government to do so.

On the other hand, if the necessary implementing legislation is within federal jurisdiction, then, since valid federal legislation is paramount over valid but conflicting provincial legislation, and since federal legislation applies to provincial governments, it would not be necessary to rely on extraordinary powers to enforce compliance with the terms of the Agreement.

Accordingly, the extent to which Article 103 poses a threat to provincial jurisdiction depends, first, on the constitutional validity of federal implementing legislation, second on the extent to which the federalism principle will continue to provide countervailing pressure against the exercise of federal extraordinary powers, third, on the extent to which provinces fail to comply with terms of the Agreement, and fourth, on the extent to which the federal government is prepared to bear the burden of provincial non-compliance by providing compensation or acquiescing in retaliation.

V. Referring the Constitutional Issue to the Supreme Court of Canada

Each of the witnesses before the Committee was asked whether the federal government should make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the Free Trade Agreement. The main advantage of a reference is that it may provide a means of settling constitutional jurisdiction to enact legislation before action is taken in reliance on it. If the constitutionality of legislation implementing the Free Trade Agreement were upheld, people could with greater confidence reorder their affairs in compliance with it. This could, in turn, enhance the effectiveness of the new arrangements. However, all four witnesses agreed that, when the Court is asked to make a ruling on the validity of legislation in the abstract, rather than in the context of disputes arising in specific fact situations, it may be hampered in reaching a sound decision. In Professor Bernier's view, the Court should avoid deciding the constitutional validity of the Free Trade Agreement in the abstract. Mr. Fairley added that ... once you have the legislation, and once it is in place, you do have concrete factual circumstances in which to resolve the constitutional question; whereas if you simply submit the question ... it is that much less predictable ... (15:47).

The Supreme Court of Canada itself has cautioned against referring abstract constitutional questions to the Court without adequate factual information, particularly in the area of trade (Manitoba Egg Reference, 1971).

Professor Petter noted other potential problems with using the reference procedure:

... you are likely to get a question that is framed in a way that is self-serving and an answer that is framed in a way that, to the judiciary, is self-serving in the sense that they will not want to go out on these limbs ... (15:47).

On the other hand, Professor Petter favoured a reference to the Court on the basis that it would force the federal Government to account for what he saw as its contradictory position of maintaining that the Agreement does not affect provincial powers, while also assuring the American government that it can bring the provinces into line.

In deciding whether to refer the constitutionality of the implementing legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada, the federal Government would have to consider whether questions can be appropriately framed to raise precise issues for the Court's consideration and also whether the reference could be supported by sufficient factual material to enable the Court to assess the likely impact of the legislation in the many areas in which it would operate. This would be a formidably complex task, since so many issues would have to be addressed. Moreover, if the Court considered that it did not have a sufficient basis on which to respond to any particular question, it might decline to do so (Ref. BNA Act and the Federal Senate, 1980).

Mr. Fairley made the point, that, since the federal government is confident that it has the jurisdiction to enter into and implement the Agreement, it should simply proceed with the implementing legislation and leave it to others to bring the constitutional issues before the courts if they choose to do so. It is, of course, open to provincial governments to refer the Agreement or its implementing legislation to Courts of Appeal, from which appeals could be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is also conceivable that private parties could commence actions in the superior courts of the provinces or in the Federal Court challenging the constitutionality of the Agreement or its implementing legislation. If such a reference is made or action commenced, the federal Government could then decide whether to expedite the process by referring the Agreement directly to the Supreme Court.

VI. Summary

No definitive conclusion concerning Parliament's jurisdiction to enact legislation to implement the Free Trade Agreement can be reached in the absence of the actual implementing legislation and detailed examination of it to determine its specific impacts on provincial policies.

Nonetheless, as a matter of preliminary assessment, there does appear to be support for federal jurisdiction to implement the Free Trade Agreement. Parliament has authority to legislate in relation to international trade --- and the Agreement is primarily concerned with international trade. It takes into account some provincial and regional interests which would be affected by free trade and specifically excludes or preserves them. The fact that the Agreement will have an impact on matters within provincial jurisdiction does not necessarily limit federal jurisdiction to implement the Agreement: the exercise of federal jurisdiction in relation to international trade may validly circumscribe the scope of provincial authority since a valid federal law will prevail over a conflicting provincial law. Federal legislation to implement the Free Trade Agreement would infringe provincial jurisdiction if it went beyond eliminating barriers to trade and specified how provincial jurisdiction is to be exercised.

If Chief Justice Dickson's formulation of federal jurisdiction in relation to "general regulation of trade throughout the Dominion" is adopted by a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, it could provide additional support for Parliament's jurisdiction to regulate the national economy as an integrated unit.

Further, there are indications in the case law and other authorities that the Supreme Court of Canada might recognize a federal power to implement international agreements which could operate either as an ancillary power, to provide additional support for implementing those provisions of an international agreement which incidentally affect matters within provincial jurisdiction, or, as an independent source of federal authority, where, for instance, the pursuit of national objectives requires co-operative action with a foreign state and the importance of the national objectives outweighs any necessary impact on provincial powers.

Concerns have been raised that Article 103 of the Free Trade Agreement, which requires the Parties "to ensure that all necessary measures are taken in order to give effect to its provisions, including their observance . . . by . . . state, provincial and local governments" goes beyond Article XXIV:12 of the GATT and may compel the federal government to use its extraordinary powers against the provinces. However, it has been argued that in practice the difference in the nature of the obligations under Article 103 and Article XXIV:12 may be slight. The Free Trade Agreement does not require that the federal government exercise its extraordinary powers, such as disallowance, to assure provincial compliance. Rather, as under GATT, non-compliance at the sub-national level may be remedied by compensation or met by retaliation. Article 103 poses a threat to provincial jurisdiction only to the extent, if any, to which implementation of the Agreement exceeds federal authority, and then only if the federalism principle will no longer provide sufficient countervailing pressure against Parliament's exercise of its extraordinary powers.

Even if a strong case can be made in support of Parliament's jurisdiction to enact legislation to implement the Free Trade Agreement, it must be recognized that, in other constitutional contexts, courts have put limits on broad federal powers which threaten to curtail substantially provincial jurisdiction. Accordingly, in assessing the Free Trade legislation, courts may be faced with balancing the need for federal capacity to regulate international trade in the national interest against the need to provide considerable scope to provincial jurisdiction. In making this assessment, the courts would presumably take into account the degree to which provincial powers are already, and are likely to continue to be, limited by various other international trading agreements, primarily the GATT.

At first glance it might seem useful to make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for an advisory opinion on the constitutional validity of the Free Trade Agreement (and the legislation which will be introduced to implement it) in the hope of settling its constitutional validity before action is taken in reliance on it. However, in deciding whether to refer the constitutionality of the implementing legislation to the Court, the federal Government would have to consider whether questions can be appropriately framed to raise precise issues for the Court's consideration and also whether the reference could be supported by sufficient factual material to enable the Court to assess the likely impact of the legislation in the many areas in which it would operate. This would be a formidably complex task, since so many issues would have to be addressed. Moreover, if the Court considered that it did not have a sufficient basis on which to respond to any particular question, it might decline to do so. Accordingly, a reference would not necessarily result in a definitive court ruling.

EMERGENCIES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may have leave to respond a little more fully than I felt I did the other day to Senator Stewart's questions after I moved the second reading of Bill C-77.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I will agree to that if the order remains standing in Senator Hicks' name. He is travelling with a committee this week, but will be back next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief. Senator Stewart's questions are recorded at pages 3258 and 3259 of the Hansard of April 28 and relate to the situation in the United Kingdom with respect to emergency legislation.

I tried to make two points in my remarks on emergency legislation in other countries, including the U.K. The first point was that, as a practical matter, because of past experience with our own War Measures Act, we do not really have access to federal emergency legislation to respond to anything less than a wartime situation or to an insurrection akin to a coup d'état. As such, we are at a distinct disadvantage compared to every other western industrialized country, including the U.K.

The second point I tried to make was that the substantive and procedural civil rights safeguards proposed in Bill C-77 are as good as or better than those in analogous emergencies legislation in the U.K., Germany, the United States or Australia.

In direct response to Senator Stewart's questions, let me turn briefly to my understanding of the current situation in the U.K.

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Stewart is correct in his assertion that the U.K. does not have on its statute books emergencies legislation analogous to the War Measures Act, and has not had any since the Second World War. Britain does have, however, on the shelf, as it were, a bill entitled Defence of the Realm Act, first passed in 1914, and the Emergency Powers Defence Act of 1939. Both acts were allowed to lapse at the end of hostilities after the Second World War. The government would have to bring forward these bills in response to a wartime situation or a pending declaration of war, and Parliament would have to approve them at that time. The Defence of the Realm Act and the Emergency Powers Defence Act, when in force, are analogous to our War Measures Act.

In addition, the British have in place emergencies legislation to allow a response to other types or "lesser" types of emergencies.

The principal statute dealing with peacetime emergencies is the Emergencies Powers Act, enacted in 1920 and substantially amended in 1964. Under this act, successive governments have drafted and revised comprehensive codes of regulations to deal with various types of emergencies under the act. Since 1964 the act has been invoked 12 times, each time in response to an industrial dispute.

• (1410)

The United Kingdom has had an unfortunate experience relating to domestic terrorism arising largely out of the Northern Ireland problem. In response, the British government revised and re-enacted in 1984 the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act and approved in 1978 the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act.

In addition, there are on the statute books what I would refer to as subsidiary acts giving the government power to respond to public order and, perhaps, other types of emergencies. These statutes include the Public Order Act of 1936 and the Reserve Forces Act of 1966.

Obviously, being a unitary state, the United Kingdom's approach to emergencies does not have to deal to the same extent as ours with the role and function of other levels of government. Furthermore, the problems faced by the U.K. in scope and nature, particularly the terrorist threat, are also quantitatively and qualitatively different from those of Canada in many respects.

Honourable senators, I did not want to get involved in a discourse about the British emergencies situation. I have sent to Senator Stewart some papers that I have accumulated on the subject and would be happy to provide copies to any other senator who is interested.

Having done so, I think I have said enough. I thank Senator Stewart for his question and his interest, and I hope he finds my response satisfactory.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the statement that Senator Kelly has made conforms to my understanding of the situation in the United Kingdom. As I indicated, the Defence of the Realm Act expired at the end of World War I and the Emergency Powers Defence Act, enacted in 1939, expired at the end of World War II. So they have nothing on their statute books that is comparable to the Canadian War Measures Act, which has been on our books since 1914, when it was passed in approximately ten minutes in the House of Commons.

There is one point in what Senator Kelly has said that is a little hazy. I am sure he can clear it up in one or two sentences. Senator Kelly says that the United Kingdom has the Defence of the Realm Act and the Emergency Powers Defence Act "on the shelf." What does that mean? Does it mean that they can be brought back simply by an Order in Council, or does it in fact mean that their copies of the old statute have expired and the matter would have to be brought back into Parliament as a bill and enacted de novo?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, the last part of Senator Stewart's statement is quite correct, they would have to be enacted anew. Perhaps the use of the words "on the shelf" was careless. What I meant to say was that the statutes are drafted. The time normally needed for drafting would in this case be saved. They could be brought forward in that form and passed, but they would have to be passed anew.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the urgency of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act in order to remove the restriction that requires a Canadian veteran who served overseas in World War II and who chose to take up residence outside Canada to return to Canada for 365 days in order to become eligible to receive the allowances payable under the Act and any other benefits available thereunder.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise in support of what Senator Marshall has said concerning the War Veterans Allowance Act. I am hoping that these war veterans who failed to return to Canada will be considered for War Veterans Allowance, although they have not spent 365 days on Canadian soil since the war.

Many of these veterans met a beautiful bride in England, Scotland or the Netherlands and decided to remain in her particular country of origin. It has been said, "If you meet a girl from hell, she'll take you back there again!" I think that is, more or less, what happened to some of our war veterans. They met their wives in those countries and decided to stay there. It seems a shame that having dedicated their lives to the cause of peace in the world so that the rest of us might live in freedom, now, simply because they have not returned to Canada, they have been penalized by not receiving the same benefits as those other Canadians who also served for the preservation of freedom in a democratic world.

I understand that there has been some easing of the restrictions imposed by this policy over the past several years, and it has now been provided that veterans must return to Canada from their country of residence for at least three months, but that they must be living in Canada on the 365th day in order to qualify for the War Veterans Allowance.

I also understand the problems that have arisen in the Department of Veterans Affairs and which have led to the decision not to make such people eligible. There could be veterans who are living just across the border in the United States, who would come here for one day, apply for the War Veterans Allowance, and then return to the United States. They put nothing into our economy, yet, they can take a lot out of our economy by being paid a pension from Canada for the remainder of their lives. Nevertheless, those people were prepared to give their lives to save our country and to preserve our freedom and democracy. Therefore, I think they should be given every consideration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: I would like to tell honourable senators that last week I had the privilege of going to Korea with the Korean veterans. Many Canadian volunteers served in what I call the Korean War, but which many people have called, in the past, a United Nations action, a policing action, or a peacekeeping action.

After seeing the area, the mountains, rivers, rice paddies, the geography and topography of the terrain on which our Canadian veterans served, let me tell honourable senators that it was not a policing or peacekeeping force in which they served; they served in a war. At that time our Canadian veterans were at war, and they were war heroes.

Together with the Honourable George Hees, I was honoured and pleased to represent the Senate of Canada in commemorating 35 years since the end of that conflict. I was even more pleased on that occasion, for the first time in the history of Canada, to present to those Korean veterans a pin commemorating the fact that they had served, as Canadians, in the Korean War. Those veterans have now received a Korean War pin from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Since the Korean conflict we have been trying to have the Department of National Defence present a medal to those Korean heroes, many of whom laid down their lives. In fact, 26,791 Canadians served in the Korean conflict, and another 7,000 Canadians served between the cease-fire and the end of 1955. The names of 516 Canadians are inscribed in the Canadian Book of Remembrance, which is displayed in the Memorial Chapel of these Parliament Buildings. The same 516 names appear in the official United Nations Book of Remembrance for Canada, and that book is enshrined in the National Monument for the United Nations Forces at the United Nations Memorial Cemetery in Pusan, Korea. There are, in fact, 378 Canadians buried in that cemetery, and a further 16 Canadians are commemorated on the Commonwealth Memorial to those who fell in war and have no known grave.

● (1420)

In Yokohama, in the British Commonwealth War Cemetery in Japan, there are 44 more Canadians buried. There are 93 Canadians buried in Canada from that same war, and there are five Canadians who are missing and presumed drowned: three lost overboard from HMCS Nootka, HMCS Cayuga and HMCS Athabasca, and two lost in the Gulf of Alaska when a Canadian Pacific Airlines flight from Vancouver to Tokyo crashed on July 21, 1951.

Honourable senators, there were veterans of the Korean War with us on that pilgrimage to commemorate this event, and there were tears in their eyes when they saw the markers for their comrades who were lost in that war. As I have said, that was, in fact, a war. It was no peacekeeping action. And we in Canada can be proud of our Canadian boys and girls who were there, whether in the Red Cross, in the nursing field, or in other forces.

Honourable senators, I was proud to be there in Korea representing the Senate and the Government of Canada, and proud that I was present when the first pins were presented to these veterans. These pins are now available to all veterans of the Korean War upon application to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. For the first time since that war, its veterans will have a lapel pin to show that they were prepared to lay down their lives in support of their country and in support of freedom in the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question. How many Canadian veterans are experiencing a financial problem because they are living abroad in the countries of their war brides?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I cannot give you an exact number. However, because of the age of the veterans from the First World War and the Second World War, and because their numbers are declining through death, the numbers would be in the hundreds rather than in the thousands. The cost will certainly amount to a few thousand dollars, or perhaps even $1 million. However, I certainly think our Canadian veterans are worth this financial support, because some of them are living in poverty in England today.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would also like to ask a question. I appreciate the report that Senator Bonnell has given us pertaining to his visit to Korea with the Honourable Senator Hays. I think it is a wonderful thing that we recognize the importance of what Canadian veterans have done at various places on the international scene, and in particular in Korea, which I have visited on a couple of occasions.

Have the widows of those who were killed in Korea been given any recognition? If a veteran dies, the widow is allowed to keep his medal, but what about the widows of those who were killed while serving in Korea?

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: I do not know the answer to that question. I am sure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has a strong and warm feeling in his heart for all veterans and their widows. He will look at that with a warm heart. I think that is a worthwhile question to put to him.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I regret that illness prevented my accompanying Senator Bonnell on his trip to Korea. I, too, have been there before. I have gone up to the DMZ. Senator Bonnell mentioned something that I did not quite understand.

As all honourable senators are aware, Canada sent a brigade to Korea and it became involved in hostilities. Are those who served in that brigade not entitled to wear a medal? Senator Bonnell mentioned that they will receive, or have received, pins. Do I understand that because this was not a war but a "peacekeeping mission," Canada's combatants cannot wear a medal indicating that they served in Korea?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I understand it, those brave soldiers who fought so courageously for Canada during the Korean War were never discharged. They were released. There was never any armistice signed. There was just an agreement between the officers of the North Korean and South Korean forces. Consequently, no medal was ever presented by the Department of National Defence.

The Korean War Veterans of Canada have asked for many years for a medal or some recognition that they fought on behalf of Canada in a war abroad, but no medal has ever been presented by this government or any other government.

Those veterans said that if no medal could be presented, some recognition should be made. As I understand it, a previous Minister of Veterans Affairs and a previous Minister of National Defence agreed that the Minister of Veterans Affairs would issue a pin. The current Minister of Veterans Affairs carried this to fruition and issued a pin. There is no medal available, but there is this pin.

I suggest to all veterans of that war that they make an application, either to the Korean War Veterans Association or to the Department of Veterans Affairs, for their pin. The pin contains a number, and that number will be registered.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Do I understand that, along with this pin, they will be entitled to wear a ribbon?

Senator Bonnell: They are not entitled to wear a ribbon or a medal; they are only entitled to wear a pin issued by the Department of Veterans Affairs, not the Department of National Defence.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I apologize for not being here at the beginning of Senator Bonnell's comments, so I do not know whether he mentioned the point I am about to raise.

I was very interested in what he had to say about the difficult battles that were fought in Korea in which Canadians were involved. I do not think there are any members of the Senate who were involved in those battles, but it should be noted that there is a gentleman in this chamber who was a member of the Canadian Armed Forces and who served in Korea, our distinguished Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. I am sure that the comments made by Senator Bonnell were listened to with particular interest by that distinguished gentleman, who now serves us in this chamber.

• (1430)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this inquiry—

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Could I ask a question of the honourable senator? I find myself in the same situation as that of Senator Molgat. I regret that I missed the beginning of this discussion, but I think I got the gist of your comments. Is it the intention, as well, that this pin, as you call it, in recognition for service in Korea, would also serve as a souvenir token to families of deceased veterans of the Korean conflict? I ask this because I have a personal, family interest in the matter.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I answered that question earlier for Senator Guay. I have no knowledge based on fact, but I am quite sure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who has a warm heart for veterans, will certainly look on that suggestion favourably. I will bring it to his attention. For that reason I want to move that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for further consideration.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, before we decide on that motion, I want to thank Senator Bonnell for his remarks and to pay tribute to Senator Marshall, who fought long and hard on this question. I wonder whether Senator Bonnell had an opportunity to meet with the representative from the U.K. when he testified before the Veterans Affairs Subcommittee some weeks ago. I had an opportunity to sit in on that committee meeting. This gentleman is a staunch and true Newfoundlander, who decided to live in England. The information we heard in committee was that it would cost approximately $2 million per year to provide benefits to those veterans who live under similar circumstances. Some of our older veterans are suffering terribly, living on paltry allowances from the government of the U.K.

I wonder whether Senator Bonnell would agree with me that in all of the years we have been here every Minister of Veterans Affairs has always been very conscientious, thoughtful, considerate and kind and has always planned to do something for these men and women who are now residing in the United Kingdom. But, despite the efforts of many people—and I do not include myself among them—nothing has ever been done. I remember that C.D. Howe got into trouble many years ago for asking, "What's a million?". Talking about $2 million today is really talking about a paltry sum, and that is all we need to look after good Canadian soldiers who, by their own wishes, decided to stay in the U.K. I do not understand why they should have to return to Canada and reside here all of the required time just to receive their allowances.

I just want to ask Senator Bonnell why it is that previous governments and the present government seem to find this such a difficult matter to handle. Don't get me wrong—I am not against foreign aid, and I think we should do everything we can in that regard, but I certainly do think we should look after our veterans, as well. I would like Senator Bonnell's views in that regard.

Senator Bonnell: To answer the first part of the question, honourable senators, no, I was not here for the committee meeting attended by that great Newfoundlander. I did, however, read the transcript of the proceedings of the committee. At that time I was in Korea with about 45 or 46 veterans of the Korean conflict. I can tell honourable senators that many of those veterans had tears in their eyes when they placed wreaths on the tombstones in Pusan and other places in commemoration of what took place 35 years ago.

As I said, I did read the evidence that was given at the committee meeting and I agree with the points made there. I can tell honourable senators, as well, that all of the Ministers of Veterans Affairs that I can remember had feeling and a soft spot in their hearts for the veterans. All of them have been pushing veterans legislation, and have done so since the Great War of 1914-18. But there has been one problem, honourable senators, and that is Treasury Board. Until we can persuade Treasury Board of the importance of this issue it will be difficult for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to do anything. That is why I think that if we bring this matter before the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee we can give the minister some support. Then, perhaps, we can persuade Treasury Board that there is a great need here for action.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that this inquiry be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I point out that Senator Marshall has two similar items on the order paper and that he has a plan of action mapped out. I am not aware whether that plan includes the referral of this inquiry to the Social Affairs Committee. I suggest that this be delayed until Senator Marshall returns. We can then find out what his wishes are.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 10, 1988, at 2 p.m.

REGULATORY SCRUTINY

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

THURSDAY, May 5, 1988

The Standing Joint Committee for Regulatory Scrutiny has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

(Report No. 43 - Public Service Employment)

1. Pursuant to its permanent order of reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and the general order of reference adopted by the Senate on November 27, 1986 and by the House of Commons on December 17, 1986, the Joint Committee draws the attention of both Houses to the Public Service Employment Regulations, C.R.C. 1978, c. 1337, as amended.

2. The provisions of these Regulations relating to appeals taken pursuant to the Public Service Employment Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-32, have been under consideration by your Committee since 1981. In the course of its examination, the Committee has corresponded extensively with the Public Service Commission and heard testimony from its representatives. Other interested parties have appeared before the Committee or made submissions, including the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Director General of the Appeals Directorate of the Commission.

Its examination of the Public Service Employment Regulations (the Regulations) and the evidence it has received lead the Committee to conclude that the appeal rights conferred on public service employees by the Public Service Employment Act (the Act) are compromised by the failure of the Public Service Commission (the Commission) to adopt appropriate regulations in relation to the matters dealt with in this Report.

3. Section 21 of the Act confers on public service employees the right to appeal against an appointment made, or which is proposed to be made, by closed competition (i.e. a competition restricted to public service employees) or without the holding of a competition. Under section 31 of the Act, a public service employee may also appeal against a recommendation made by the deputy head of a department to the Commission that the employee be released or demoted on the grounds that the employee is incompetent in performing the duties of his position or is incapable of performing those duties.

Appeals are heard by appeal boards appointed by the Commission to conduct an inquiry at which the person appealing and the deputy head concerned, or their representatives, are given an opportunity to be heard. On an appeal against a personnel selection process, a board may decide that the appointment under appeal be confirmed or revoked, or that a proposed appointment be made or not be made. In the case of appeals made pursuant to section 31 of the Act, the board may accept or reject the recommendation for release or demotion. While the legislation characterizes the function of an appeal board as being the conducting of an "inquiry", the Act requires the Public Service Commission to act in accordance with the decision of such a board.

Pursuant to the power granted by section 33 of the Act to make "such regulations as it considers necessary to carry out and give effect to [the] Act", the Commission has established the Public Service Employment Regulations. Sections 39 to 48 of the Regulations deal with the procedure for appeals brought under the Act; these provisions are appended to this Report. For the reasons which follow, your Committee has concluded that these Regulations lack the necessary procedural safeguards to ensure that the appeal process is consistent with the basic requirements of fairness and equity.

4. Disclosure of Information

The Regulations fail to provide for mandatory and full disclosure, to any unsuccessful candidate or his authorized representative, of all particulars relevant to the decision appealed against, including the selection board report on the candidate, the reasons for the decision and information on the successful candidate. At present, it is difficult for an appellant to properly prepare his case prior to his appearance before the appeal board. Moreover, unsuccessful candidates are often unable even to know whether or not an appeal should be made.

Full disclosure, for the most part, does take place at the appeal board inquiry. It is evident, however, that this approach fails to provide a sensible mechanism which will make the appellate system established in the Act truly workable. Not only is the information on which to base the appeal not always available to appellants prior to the appeal inquiry but, as a result, appellants often cannot adequately specify in an appeal notice the precise reasons for the appeal. In addition to allowing the appellant to properly prepare his case, full disclosure prior to the appeal inquiry would help define the issues to be dealt with by the appeal board, thereby making the process more efficient. Full disclosure may also reduce the number of appeals, since potential appellants, upon being fully informed of the case they must make, may conclude that they do not have grounds for appeal and proceed no further.

The Committee has on numerous occasions requested the Public Service Commission to remedy this situation by adopting additional regulations so as to better define the rights and duties of the parties to appeals taken under the Act. The evidence submitted to the Committee discloses a preference on the part of the Commission to manage this aspect of the appeal process through policy documents rather than through the adoption of regulations. In this respect, the Committee was referred to initiatives such as the policy document entitled "Disclosure of Information Following a Selection Action" (the Policy). This document, which was issued by the Commission on November 7, 1986, replaced Policy Bulletin 81-11 of September 1981. The Commission's decision to proceed by way of administrative guidelines rather than by regulation was explained as follows:

"... the Public Service Commission is concerned with ensuring procedural fairness in the appeals process while attempting to preserve an element of flexibility in the system. This is done to promote the interests of the various parties while at the same time preventing undue delays owing to the need to follow hard and fast procedures. It is for this reason, among others, that the Commission has chosen to avoid establishing elaborate procedural safeguards in the Regulations, preferring rather to provide such guarantees in policy guidelines which are by their nature more flexible."

Your Committee sees merit in the Public Service Commission's desire to maintain the efficiency and flexibility of the appeal process. Flexibility, however, should not be mistaken for administrative convenience. It is one thing for directives or policy documents to be used so as to explain or complete the application of regulations, but quite another for these to be used in substitution for regulations. Moreover, administrative guidelines such as are expressed in the Policy are not binding on staffing authorities or the Commission.

The Joint Committee recognizes that it is in the interest of the Public Service to retain an appeal procedure that is relatively informal and expeditious. On the other hand, these considerations must be balanced against the rights of participants in the appeal process. The decisions which the Act subjects to an appeal procedure are decisions that may have important economic and professional consequences for public employees, who have a right to expect that the essential elements of fairness will be respected and the merit principle upheld. The view of the Joint Committee is that the present regulations do not establish the minimum procedural safeguards necessary in the appeal process. To say that many of these matters are dealt with as part and parcel of a general policy fails to recognize the value of regulations. A policy directive may be changed at a moment's notice or it may be entirely ignored. A regulation must be adhered to. The Committee feels it is necessary that a number of rules governing the appeal process be secured in law so that all parties to the process are aware of their rights and duties.

The Policy expresses the Commission's position on the disclosure of information to candidates in a competition. It is complemented by a letter of July 10, 1984 from the Chairman of the Public Service Commission to all deputy ministers. In that letter, the Chairman noted that a pilot project on disclosure in appeals had shown "that when the parties to an appeal have participated in the disclosure process, there is a twenty per cent reduction in both the time taken for the hearing itself and for the handing down of a decision. Appeal board chairpersons also found that the parties come to a hearing with a more positive approach, thereby reducing the antagonism that may have been prevalent under the old procedure." Attached to the Chairman's letter was a summary of recommended disclosure procedures. It should be noted that the procedures suggested by the Chairman of the Commission apply where an appeal has been filed, whereas the procedures outlined in the Commission's Policy of November 7, 1986 apply prior to the filing of an appeal.

While the Committee recognizes the efforts made by the Commission to encourage disclosure, it feels that those efforts might better have been directed towards the establishment of a comprehensive set of legally binding rules. By their very nature, administrative documents such as those referred to above may be disregarded. For example, it appears that the procedures set out in the Chairman's letter of July 10, 1984 have sometimes been ignored by departments exercising delegated staffing authority. As explained by the Director General of the Appeals Directorate:

"Not all of the deputy ministers agreed that disclosure take place in that fashion, and ultimately the chairman had to agree that the procedure was merely a suggestion and not one that was mandatory or obligatory. The departments then decided not to abide by the suggestion, for their own reasons."

The Appeals Directorate has also taken what steps it could to ensure disclosure. Letters of convocation sent to the parties to an appeal now contain the following statement:

"The disclosure of selection process documents prior to the hearing date is strongly suggested. Should any dispute arise on this matter, the registrar can be contacted with a view to having the appeal board convene a hearing in order to resolve it".

Again, while the Joint Committee considers these initiatives as worthwhile, they are not and can not be a substitute for the adoption by the Commission of regulations spelling out the rules by which staffing authorities and public service employees are to govern themselves in this area. The adoption of clear and binding rules is necessary to increase the efficiency of the appeal process, to protect the rights of appellants and to insure that the merit principle is respected. Full disclosure of the information relevant to the selection process must also be available at an early stage. Subsection 45(1) provides that every appeal brought under section 21 of the Act "shall state the grounds on which the appeal is based". Unless unsuccessful candidates are given a legal right of access to the pertinent information, they can not be expected to meet this requirement. As was noted in the Report of the Special Committee on the Review of Personnel Management and the Merit Principle (the D'Avignon Report):

"This information is essential if the employee is to make a rational decision on whether to file an appeal... Our examination has revealed numerous examples of appeals lodged out of the candidate's sheer frustration over inability to obtain the information on which the selection board's decision was based."

It is the recommendation of the Joint Committee that the Regulations be amended so as to provide for mandatory disclosure to any unsuccessful candidate, upon request, of all particulars relevant to the decision. In our view any such amendments should expressly provide for the disclosure of:

- the screening board report and the selection board report on the unsuccessful candidate;
- information as to the candidate's status in the competition;
- reasons for which the candidate was not successful;
- such information on the successful candidate as may be relevant;
- personal files.

The Committee also wishes to underscore the fact that the Regulations contain no disclosure provisions in relation to section 31 appeals. (By virtue of subsection 45(1) of the Regulations, appeals brought under section 31 must also state the grounds on which the appeal is based.) Section 31 provides that a deputy head may recommend the demotion or release of a public service employee for incompetence or incapacity. Such an employee has a right of appeal to an appeal board established by the Public Service Commission. There is no requirement that the employee be given the reasons for the recommendation or access to the evidence on which it is based prior to the appeal hearing. While the problem is the same as that discussed in the context of appeals under section 21 of the Act, the consequences for an employee faced with demotion or release are particularly grave. Thus, it is further recommended that the Regulations provide for full and mandatory disclosure of the grounds upon which such a recommendation is based prior to the appeal process. Amendments to this effect were supported by both the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Director General of the Appeals Directorate of the Public Service Commission.

Finally, in order to ensure that the disclosure requirements are respected, it is recommended that the Regulations preclude the use, in an appeal under either section 21 or 31 of the Act, of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge or that has not been communicated to him.

5. Public Service Commission Opinions as a Prerequisite to Section 21(b) Appeals

Representations were also made to the Joint Committee specifically with respect to appeals under paragraph 21(b) of the Act. Pursuant to this provision, any public service employee may appeal against the appointment without competition of another person, but only after obtaining an opinion from the Commission that the unsuccessful candidate's "opportunity for advancement has been prejudicially affected". An appeal board cannot consider an appeal under paragraph 21(b) until such an opinion has been given by the Commission.

In testimony before the Committee, the Public Service Alliance of Canada noted that the Regulations do not prescribe a period of time within which the Commission must render its opinion, that they do not require the person challenging the appointment to be given an opportunity to be heard before the Commission reaches its opinion and that they do not require the Commission to give reasons for its opinion. For its part, the Commission stated that "in practice, the Commission always seeks the opinion or input of the person who wishes to have an opinion from the Commission and, in practice, the Commission always gives reasons for rendering their decision". As regards the failure of the present Regulations to require the Commission to render its opinion within a prescribed period of time, the Commission argues that:

"To establish a fixed time by which opinions must be rendered could work counter to a proper determination of the facts and the rendering of a just opinion. It should be pointed out that some cases involve multiple requesters who are in some instances in remote locations or outside the country."

In considering this matter, the Joint Committee is fully aware that it was Parliament which saw fit to make paragraph 21(b) appeals subject to the obtaining of the opinion of the Commission. It is also clear, however, that Parliament intended a public service employee whose opportunity to advance has been prejudicially affected by an appointment to have the right to an independent inquiry by an appeal board. In light of this, the Committee considers that the procedures followed by the Commission in reaching its opinion for the purposes of paragraph 21(b) must be such as to allow for the full exercise of the right conferred on unsuccessful applicants by that provision.

The Committee considers that the desirable course lies somewhere between the imposition of a strict time limit for the rendering of an opinion and the present situation, in which there is a total absence of any requirement of timeliness. It is recommended that the Regulations be amended to provide that the Commission must render its opinion within a fixed period of time. The Regulations could also provide that where the Commission will not be in a position to give its opinion within the prescribed time, it must notify the employee who requested the opinion of its inability to do so and set out, in a written notice, the time by which the Commission will give its opinion.

The Committee notes that it is the practice of the Commission to give employees, as well as management, an opportunity to be heard before giving an opinion, as well as to give reasons for its opinion. Indeed, it is difficult to see how this judgment could be made without the participation of those immediately concerned with the staffing decision. It is desirable that the practice followed by the Commission in this regard be entrenched in the Regulations. The Committee considers it inadvisable that the participation of the parties at this stage be overly formalized, and certainly does not envisage that any sort of formal hearing be required in this connection. The Regulations should, however, guarantee the right of employees to make representations to the Commission in relation to their claims.

As for the furnishing of reasons by the Commission for opinions given pursuant to paragraph 21(b) of the Act, the Joint Committee recommends that the existing practice of the Commission in this regard be reflected in the Regulations.

6. Notice of Hearing of Appeals

Section 47 of the Regulations was also criticized on the ground that it does not provide for adequate notice of an appeal hearing. An appeal board is required to give "at least 3 days notice" to the appellant and the department concerned "of the time and place fixed by [the appeal board] to conduct the inquiry". The Director General of the Appeals Directorate assured the Committee that, in practice, the notice period is never less than two and a half weeks. The Joint Committee recommends that a two week notice period be entrenched in the Regulations. It is noted that the Public Service Commission has indicated its agreement that "the notice period should be extended from the three days currently provided for", and has stated that this issue will be addressed in a review of the Public Service Employment Regulations.

7. Compelling the Attendance of Witnesses and the Furnishing of Documents.

As a result of its initial examination of the Regulations, the Joint Committee criticized the fact that they did not provide any means by which an appeal board may compel the attendance of witnesses and the furnishing of information and documents. The Commission subsequently pointed out that the regulation-making powers conferred by section 33 of the Public Service Employment Act did not permit it to adopt such regulations. Upon further consideration, the Committee agrees that the adoption of such provisions would require amendments to the Act. The Committee considers that it is not within its mandate to recommend such statutory changes but, short of doing so, it wishes to draw the issue to the attention of the Houses.

In this connection, the Joint Committee notes the testimony of the Director General of the Appeals Directorate:

"Obviously, a tribunal that is charged by Parliament to conduct inquiries, with a view to making decisions that are binding on the Commission, but is not in a position to compel the attendance of witnesses or documents, has part of its arm cut off. It seems to me that the statute should provide for the compellability of witnesses as opposed to the regulations."

The inadequacy of existing appeal board powers in this area is illustrated by an example brought to the Committee's attention concerning an appeal taken following a selection process. The Commission in this instance took the position that the appointment in question was not subject to the appeal rights granted by section 21 of the Act, and thus an appeal board should not have been established. The Commission refused to send a representative having knowledge of the facts and who could be cross-examined by the appellant's representative to the appeal hearing and, as a result, the appellant was forced to accept the evidence of the concerned department without that evidence ever having been formally submitted to the appeal board. The appeal was finally withdrawn. In his written decision, the Chairman of the Appeal Board noted that:

"The refusal by the Commission to appear at the hearing ... is inexcusable. In effect, it is a deliberate attempt to impede the conduct of an inquiry which is imposed by law. This kind of conduct can only serve to create suspicion and discredit the Public Service Commission in the eyes of those who resort to the appeals system for relief."

8. The principle of selection according to merit is a cornerstone of the legislation governing the Public Service of Canada. The merit principle is explicitly recognized in section 10 of the Act, which provides that:

"10. Appointments to or from within the Public Service shall be based on selection according to merit, as determined by the Commission, and shall be made by the Commission, at the request of the deputy head concerned, by competition or by such other process of personnel selection designed to establish the merit of candidates as the Commission considers is in the best interests of the Public Service."

The appeal process set out in section 21 of the Act is designed to ensure the observance of this principle. This is not to say, however, that an appellant has no personal interest in the outcome of an appeal. The recognition of the appellant's personal interest is reflected in the fact that the right to appeal against an appointment made without competition is only granted to those whose opportunity for advancement has been prejudicially affected by the appointment. The merit principle can thus be seen to serve both the general public interest and the interest of public service employees. Appeals made under section 31 of the Act against a recommendation for release or demotion can even more clearly be seen as a protection of the individual interest of employees.

The Commission has expressed the belief that its guidelines and policies, while not having the force of law, do uphold the merit principle, and has stated that "the Commission will not infringe the rights of employees in most processes where these are essential." It is the view of the Joint Committee, however, that the rights of appeal granted pursuant to section 21 and 31 of the Act are undermined by the failure of the Public Service Commission to adopt appropriate regulations providing the procedural safeguards discussed in this Report. The Committee would also emphasize that administrative simplicity and flexibility should not be allowed to override the protection of the interests of the individual by legally entrenched and legally enforceable means.

9. The Committee informs the Senate that it has requested the Government to table a comprehensive response to this Report in the House of Commons pursuant to the Standing Orders of that House.

QUESTION PERIOD

ABORTION

RIGHTS OF UNBORN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question bearing on an answer he gave on Wednesday, May 4, in reply to a question asked by Senator Haidasz. I quote the following sentence:

We have the delicate task of attempting to bring in a legislative solution which, consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, can reconcile the right to security of a woman's person with the obvious interest of the state in protecting the unborn.

The answer provided assigns no rights to the unborn. I ask the Leader of the Government whether that is the established position of the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators. I was trying, without having the Supreme Court judgment in front of me, to hew as closely as possible to the wording of the judgment. The wording seemed to me to constitute not an instruction but an admonition to legislators as to the factors that needed to be balanced in this matter.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that, honourable senators, but the Leader of the Government was enunciating government policy, and in that statement he clearly assigned rights to the security of the woman, with which we all agree, but assigned no rights whatsoever to the unborn.

I really raise the question to give the Leader of the Government an opportunity to remove an inference which can be drawn that the unborn are of relevance only because of the interest of the state—in other words, possibly a demographic interest—but innately the unborn do not possess rights which must be recognized.

I doubt whether the Leader of the Government wished to leave that impression, but I think it important that it be clarified so that it will be understood that the government does, indeed, attach rights to the unborn.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is raising not only a political issue but a constitutional issue here that has been, I believe, argued in the courts from time to time. The government has not addressed the kind of question that the honourable senator raises, except in the context of the judgment of the Supreme Court.

I remind honourable senators that their lordships, if I read them correctly, did not assert that a fetus has rights. All their lordships suggested in their decision is that there is a balance legislators must take into account between the woman's right to security of the person and the interest of society in protecting the unborn.

The court, unless I am very much mistaken, did not speak of the rights of the fetus, although some of the judgment spoke in terms of gestational development and the point at which the fetus becomes a person—

Senator Frith: And could have Charter protection.

Senator Murray: —and, I suppose, implicitly could have Charter rights, but the policy of the government is to bring in legislation that is consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler judgment and which is consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that the Leader of the Government is shielding himself behind the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. Unfortunately, I cannot ask the court; nor, for that matter, is their answer relevant at the moment. What is now at issue is the attitude of the Government of Canada. It is quite clear that the Leader of the Government cannot bring himself to say that the unborn have rights.

• (1410)

Senator Flynn: How do you define “unborn”?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition and other senators will have to be patient for a while longer. The government has undertaken to bring in a legislative response to the situation created by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler decision. He will then be able to draw his own inferences or conclusions from that response. I think it is premature of him to do so, or to ask me to outline in any definitive way the policy of the government in advance of that legislative response.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I must say that the Leader of the Government entered the terrain himself by telling us that it was the government's task “to bring in a legislative solution which . . . can reconcile the right to security of the woman's person with the obvious interest of the state in protecting the unborn.” That is a statement of government policy which was made last Wednesday by the Leader of the Government. Today he has refused again to say that the unborn have any rights whatsoever.

It was not I who used the expression “unborn”, it was the Leader of the Government, so it must mean something to him. In his view, the unborn are relevant in this context because of the interest of the state, not because of any human potential which they may have.

Senator Flynn: That would make an interesting speech.

Senator MacEachen: We don't need your help!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator heard me say earlier today, but it appears necessary that I repeat it, that the statement I made hewed as closely as I could, without having the document in front of me, to the language used by the Supreme Court of Canada in the majority decision of, I believe, January 28. He should ascribe no other significance to what I said. I indicated the other day, as my colleague, the Minister of Justice, indicated earlier, that the legislative response that we bring in will be consistent with that judgment and with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

ENERGY

HEAVY OILS—CONSTRUCTION OF UPGRADER AT LLOYDMINSTER, SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question on a different matter.

Senator Argue: Hear, hear! When's it going to rain?

Senator Olson: That is a good question, too. However, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he now has a reply to a question I asked some time ago. That question is: Is the federal government committed to underwriting a loan of more than $600 million to the Husky Oil Company to build an upgrader at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan? The Premier of Alberta seems to think that such is the case, that the Government of Alberta, the Government of Saskatchewan and the federal government are now firmly committed to providing this amount of money. The federal share is some $600 million plus. The only thing standing in the way of making all the arrangements for the project to go ahead is that Husky must find another private company that will assist with the approximately $300 million it would have to put up to move things ahead, announce the date of construction, and, as they say, turn the sod and get on with building it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can confirm that the federal government, together with the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, reached an agreement with Husky Oil Limited two weeks ago on the construction of the upgrader at Lloydminster.

The governments will provide low-interest loans for half the total project costs. Husky will seek new private equity for the balance. The project can proceed once private-sector participation is secured.

Senator Olson: Does the minister have those numbers with him to put them on the record?

Senator Murray: My information is that the total involved in the construction of the upgrader project will be $1.3 billion.

Senator Olson: I thank the leader for that information.

Hon. George van Roggen: The Leader of the Government in the Senate has just referred to the assistance taking the form of low-interest loans. That could mean 1 per cent below prime or no interest at all. Could he give us any idea of what was agreed to between the governments and the company as to what degree of interest assistance there will be?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have the information on those details at the moment. I will see what further information can be obtained.

Senator van Roggen: These "details" could run into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I was going to ask the same supplementary question as was just asked.

When the minister is obtaining that answer, perhaps he will come across a particular reference to a press report which says that the interest rate has been struck at 5 per cent.

Senator Murray: Thank you.

Senator Argue: When did the farmers ever get 5 per cent money? The answer is: Never.

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA— GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. H.A. Olson: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether or not the federal government is now committed to providing the same kind of financial underwriting for the proposed new tar sands processing plant at Fort McMurray?

SENATE REFORM

PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY OF PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my question is on a different subject.

Last week the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave an address at the inauguration of the Centre for Constitutional Studies and the National Conference on Senate Reform at the University of Alberta. In the course of his address he made some comments relative to Senate reform. He said:

For its part, the Government of Canada is convinced that the health and effectiveness of our national institutions, acting on behalf of all Canadians, require that the Senate become elected.

Further on in that speech, he said:

If the vitality of our democratic institutions is to be strengthened, the Senate should be elected. A second thing is also clear: We should ensure the Senate has the means to act effectively while preserving the accountability of the Government to the House of Commons within our system.

Honourable senators, the government has adopted the view that the Senate should be elected and effective.

At another point in his speech, he referred to the third E, when he said:

Alberta has long been a champion of the equality of the provinces.

[Senator Roggen.]

He, himself, stated that if the Senate is to become a vital national institution, we have to go about reforming it in the right way. Being more specific, he said:

we must respect the principle of the equality of the provinces—

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Is it now the view of the government that the Constitution should be amended to provide that each of the provinces will be represented equally in the Senate of Canada?

• (1420)

In discussing the principle of the equality of the provinces I was defending the change in the amending formula proposed by Meech Lake, under which it would not be possible to impose a version of a reformed Senate upon a province that disagreed.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would explain why it is important to respect the principle of the equality of the provinces when constitutional amendments are being made if it is proper to forget that principle when allotting representation in this body. If it is a good principle in one case, surely it can be defended as a good principle in the other case.

Senator Murray: I shall certainly pass on my friend's name to Premier Getty as a new convert to the concept of a three-E Senate. Senator Stewart is leaping to a number of conclusions, chief among which is that the federal government has precluded the possibility or, as he put it, forgotten about the proposition that each province should have the same number of senators. All I have told the Senate is that the federal government has not come to any definitive view on this matter. This is a matter that will have to be discussed in the coming months with the provinces.

Senator Stewart: I am not at all sure, honourable senators, that Premier Getty would be interested in my views. He would be interested in the views of the Government of Canada, stated as a matter of principle. It is stated as a matter of principle by a spokesman of the Government of Canada that we must respect the principle of the equality of the provinces. Surely that is the proposition which will encourage Premier Getty.

I ask the Leader of the Government if he did not make that assertion, together with his applause for Alberta's insistence on the equality of the provinces to imply support for equal provincial representation. Did he not put that statement together quite deliberately, intending to convey the impression—and indeed to mean—that there should be equality of the provinces in the Senate of Canada?

Senator Murray: There was also a reference in the same speech to increased or improved regional representation, and that is as far as I went in addressing the question of representation.

Speaking of applause, I should tell the honourable senator that two of our colleagues—Senator Frith and Senator Fairbairn—were present for my speech, and I distinctly saw them applaud.

Senator Stewart: I am sure, honourable senators, that any of us who attended would have felt obliged to applaud out of courtesy.

Senator Frith: You would be surprised how often I applaud out of politeness, but I will remember this lesson.

Senator Buckwold: Somebody had to applaud.

PROCESS TO BE ADOPTED—PUBLIC REPRESENTATION AND MEETINGS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it is quite clear that the process of reform of the Senate is now under way. The Leader of the Government in the Senate will be aware of how unhappy many Canadians are about the process that led up to the Meech Lake Accord, a process that took place largely behind closed doors and without consultation from the people of Canada.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate describe to us the process the government proposes to follow on this matter, especially in light of the comments attributed to him in the newspaper this weekend that Mr. Horsman from Alberta is to have the lead and that he will be following closely behind?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I reject the characterization that the honourable senator has made of the Meech Lake process. As I have said on many occasions here and elsewhere, the issues that were dealt with in the Meech Lake process were matters of public knowledge and public discussion for many years—some of them for decades—in this country. The five conditions that Quebec had set for its return to the constitutional fold were contained in no less a document than the Election Manifesto of the provincial Liberal Party of Quebec and were the source of considerable discussion and speculation. The only surprising thing in the minds of many people was that we succeeded in the process.

The question asked by the honourable senator concerns the process of Senate reform. First, it is true that Alberta, which has been the province most interested in a public way in the reform of the Senate, and the province which has a developed an official position on this matter, sanctioned by its Legislative Assembly, has been invited by the federal government to take the lead, to canvass the other provinces, to obtain reactions from the other provinces as to the Alberta proposal.

I would propose, on behalf of the federal government, to visit with the provinces a short time after Mr. Horsman has done so, and we would then compare notes and see whether there was a basis for understanding as between the federal government and the ten provinces. The culmination of this would be a First Ministers' conference on the Constitution, after Meech Lake had been ratified.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, it has not escaped anyone's notice that native people, members of what are referred to as multicultural communities, and women do not feel as if they were well represented in any of the previous rounds of constitutional talks, never mind the most immediate one. So, the process that the Leader of the Government has just outlined is one that continues to exclude people who this time have made very serious and lengthy representations in this chamber, to the provincial governments who would listen, and elsewhere about the problems of the process.

He will also recall Professor Al Johnson's proposal for a more satisfactory process, made in testimony in this chamber. Are we to understand from what the Leader of the Government has just told us that we are back to the exclusion of people's voices from constitutional reform?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Senate, in the past, has had a committee which held public hearings on the question of Senate reform. There is nothing to stop Parliament from holding hearings and obtaining the views on this matter of the various groups to which the honourable senator has referred. There is also nothing to stop provincial legislatures from doing the same thing. The parliamentary forum is surely the best forum for those kinds of representations to be made publicly.

Senator Marsden: The Leader of the Government says there is nothing to stop people. In his speech the other day he said:

The Government of Canada will actively encourage Parliament to assist in fostering public debate and understanding on Senate reform.

Do we take from that statement that the Leader of the Government believes that this chamber, for example, should open up another committee on Senate reform?

Senator Flynn: You could try it. Why not?

Senator Murray: I think it is a matter that should be considered, both by the members of this chamber and by the other place. It was because I did not want to define precisely what the Senate or the other chamber should do in this respect that I avoided any reference to a committee; but it would seem to me that parallel to the discussions that will be taking place among governments—the informal discussions for the present—it would be useful for the Parliament of Canada—and perhaps for provincial legislatures, if they wish—to receive representations from the public on this matter.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government referred to the hearings that have taken place here in the Senate and in the provincial legislatures. The point is that it seems clear that they took place after the agreement was reached, having been told that any amendments that they would make could not be considered, because the agreement would then not be an agreement. Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that under any new constitutional reform that would take place, in the unlikely event that the Meech Lake agreement is passed by the provincial legislatures, in the future the same process would take place? In other words, will the legislative committees and the committees of the Senate discuss what they have received after the premiers and Prime Minister meet in secret, or would the public involvement take place before that?

● (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend was a member of either this place or the other place when the amending formula of 1982 was passed, so he knows what the parliamentary procedure is as well as I do.

As I say, my friend knows what the amending formula is that was passed in 1982. The committee hearings that I was referring to earlier were the committee hearings held by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and I believe at one point there was a joint committee on the question of Senate reform. I believe that those committees had public hearings. In any case, there are a whole series of reports from this Parliament, going back at least ten years, on the subject of Senate reform, and I made the point that it might be a good idea for this house or the other house to consider a similar exercise now while discussions are proceeding informally amongst governments.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He referred to a basis for understanding as something that should develop; that the Attorney General of Alberta will take an initiative in this respect, and that in due course the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, as the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, will be involved in the development of that basis for understanding.

I would be very interested in knowing whether or not the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, sees that basis of understanding becoming public as it evolves. I hark back to Senator Marsden's first question, because I agree that this is something about which we have received a lot of complaints, and I share the view that it would be helpful to know the government's position with respect to this matter.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the discussions that are about to take place are informal, exploratory and private. I do not expect that they will be held in front of the television cameras, although, as the honourable senator knows, the parties to them are free to—and often do—speak publicly prior to and following those discussions.

Once the Meech Lake constitutional amendments are proclaimed, there will be a First Ministers' conference. It would be unconstitutional to hold that conference prior to the proclamation of Meech Lake. The first item on the agenda for that conference is the reform of the Senate. The purpose of these private, exploratory and informal talks is to ensure, insofar as it is possible, that that First Ministers' conference will succeed.

[Senator Stollery.]

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why the government would not hold those talks in public? As Senator Hays has reiterated, the basis of the majority of the complaints that we have received from Canadian citizens is the informal, off-the-record, secret nature of the discussions that were held previously. To most Canadian citizens that is the unsatisfactory part.

I am confident that what the Government of Canada is proposing is reasonable, both as a matter of public interest and public debate. It is not as though this is a matter of great economic consequence. Since it is a matter of constitutional reform, why not hold it in public?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friends opposite have celebrated—perhaps even elevated to mythology—the great kitchen compromise in which the 1982 constitutional arrangement was fashioned by the Attorneys General of Ontario and Saskatchewan and the Attorney General of Canada. I simply tell Senator Marsden that the Government of Canada is not taking any hard and fast proposal to the provinces at this time. We are approaching the provinces with a view to seeing whether or not there is a basis for agreement on this very important matter. However, the important discussions will take place—no doubt in front of the television cameras—at a meeting of First Ministers to be held once the Meech Lake constitutional amendments have been proclaimed.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—TABLING OF RESOLUTION—POSITION OF GOVERNMENTS OF NEW BRUNSWICK AND MANITOBA—"REUNIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL FAMILY"

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not wish to ask a question with respect to the Senate, except to say how pleased I am that the Leader of the Government is now on the side of an elected Senate. The sooner that can happen the better, as far as I am concerned, and we can all go to the hustings—

Senator Flynn: You certainly helped!

Senator MacEachen: If I have helped, as Senator Flynn has said, I think it is tremendous to have helped in creating an elected Senate.

However, my point in rising is to ask a question or two of the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the speech he made recently in Edmonton, which, unfortunately, I missed, but which I read with considerable interest, not only the portions relating to the Senate but also those portions dealing with Meech Lake. It is about that subject that I want to ask a few questions.

In that speech the minister stated that the Meech Lake Accord committed all First Ministers to tabling the Constitutional Resolution in their respective legislative bodies as soon as possible. When I read that sentence, I wondered whether the Government of Canada felt that any commitment now existed with respect to the Province of New Brunswick. In other words, I am wondering whether the Government of Canada feels that the Government of New Brunswick is committed in any way to tabling a resolution in the legislature.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that answer, but I wondered why, in the report on the progress of the Constitutional Resolution that he made in his Edmonton speech, he mentioned all the provinces except Manitoba and New Brunswick. I am wondering whether he left those two provinces out because they are the "bad boys" of Confederation—they have displeased the minister and he has therefore dropped them. Surely that is not part of the new, reunified constitutional family.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have information on the other eight provinces which, in this uncertain world, is as certain as it can be. That information is that it is the intention of the other governments to move to ratify the accord within the next little while. I have no such assurance from the Government of New Brunswick, as my honourable friend is aware.

Senator MacEachen: And also, I assume, no assurance from the Government of Manitoba that it will ratify the accord. The conspicuous absence of those two provinces was a notable element in the minister's speech, because it represents his own acknowledgement that there are two provinces that are not yet ready to move forward with the Meech Lake Accord.

● (1440)

The minister said that the Province of New Brunswick has made no commitment—and I would agree with that—and that the present premier was not party to the Meech Lake agreement and is, therefore, not bound by any commitment given by a former premier, particularly in the electoral circumstances which developed in New Brunswick subsequent to the Meech Lake Accord.

The minister made another curious statement in this speech which bothered me, and it is as follows:

Much of the present discussion overlooks the critical importance of what was achieved, the reunification of the constitutional family.

How can the Leader of the Government refer to "the reunification of the constitutional family" in view of the absence of one of the founding members of Confederation? It is not the reunification of the constitutional family, because we know one province has stood outside that process. I would urge the minister not to use these inaccurate expressions, even in an academic environment which permits loose statements.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator would know more about that than I, coming, as he does, from an academic environment.

Senator MacEachen: That was many years ago.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is accurate to speak of the reunification of the constitutional family. The 1982 constitutional exercise derogated from the powers of the National Assembly of the Province of Quebec without the consent of that province or that Assembly. At Meech Lake, ten provinces and the federal government agreed to rectify that historic and historically dangerous error.

I hope that the honourable senator will not rejoice prematurely in the undoing of Meech Lake. Meech Lake is alive and well and, as I have said on previous occasions, I expect a vast majority of the provinces will have ratified the Meech Lake Accord by summertime.

In any case, I commend to the honourable senator the example of the Right Honourable John Turner and the Honourable David Peterson who, on the weekend, took the broader Canadian view.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: I have observed that the minister, when he finds himself upon very thin ice, will resort to a form of political rhetoric which is identifiable to anyone like myself who has spent many years in the House of Commons and who has occasionally been obliged to do that, although not as frequently as the Leader of the Government.

The Leader of the Government quite rightly has referred to the reunification process involving the Province of Quebec, and that is accurate and acceptable, but I am insisting that the minister keep his terminology relevant and contemporaneous. The speech given on May 5 used the expression "the reunification of the constitutional family". When one province, the Province of New Brunswick, stands outside, it is not a reunified constitutional family.

Senator Flynn: It is not a final decision. You are using loose words yourself!

Senator MacEachen: The consent given by Premier Hatfield was withdrawn by the new Premier of New Brunswick—

Senator Flynn: No, it was not!

Senator MacEachen:—when he said that he would seek amendments to the present constitutional resolution.

Senator Flynn: That is something else!

Senator MacEachen: The Government of Canada has refused to even consider any amendments that the Premier of New Brunswick or the premiers of the other provinces might put forth. To talk about a reunified constitutional family in those circumstances is nothing but rhetoric.

Senator Flynn: You don't like it!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think it is important to place the facts on the record. It is not a matter of the present Government of New Brunswick having withdrawn its consent; the present Government of New Brunswick is going to do exactly what the previous Government of New Brunswick committed to do, which is to refer the constitutional accord to a committee of the legislature.

It is true that the present premier has expressed concerns that his predecessor did not have with regard to this accord. Nowhere has he said, as far as I am aware, that he is opposed to the accord. The accord will go to a committee of that legislature and we shall see what happens.

Again, the honourable the Leader of the Opposition is unfair in attributing to the Premier and Government of New Brunswick a hostility which I suggest is not there, but I can understand that it must have been very galling for him to have seen the commonality of purpose and the agreement between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of New Brunswick the other day on so many other important matters.

Senator MacEachen: What is galling is the inaccurate use of the English language by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: You have also done that!

Senator MacEachen: That is what is galling, and inflicting this inaccurate rhetoric on an audience is almost cruel and inhuman punishment, which, fortunately, I escaped.

Senator Flynn: You did that yourself!

Senator MacEachen: But the minister has said it is inaccurate to say that the present Government of New Brunswick has withdrawn its consent to the Meech Lake Accord. Let me ask him this question: Has the present Government of New Brunswick given its consent to the present Meech Lake Accord? Can he say it has? If he can, then I will stop asking the question.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows the answer as well as I do.

Senator MacEachen: No, I don't!

Senator Murray: The Premier of New Brunswick has expressed certain concerns. They may turn out to be, in time, insuperable, so far as he is concerned, but his commitment is, as his predecessor's was, to refer that accord to a committee of the legislature. I understand that is about to be done. That committee will likely hear from witnesses and, after doing so, no doubt it will prepare a report and submit it. Then we shall see where we are.

Senator MacEachen: Of course, and we shall see, as we see now, that the Government of New Brunswick has not given any consent—

Senator Flynn: That is different!

Senator MacEachen: The Premier of New Brunswick has stated on television more than once that he opposes the present Meech Lake resolution and will not accept it unless it is amended.

Senator Flynn: You used the word "withdrawn" falsely.

Senator MacEachen: To use the expression "the reunification of the constitutional family" in those circumstances is to engage in the sheerest form of fantasy.

Senator Murray: Tell that to your leader!

[Senator Murray.]

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

CONTENTS OF LEAKED DOCUMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to shift topics and draw to the attention of honourable senators a story made public this morning based on a leaked document dealing with native issues. I will not go through all of the items mentioned in the proposals or recommendations that are of extreme concern to native peoples, other than to indicate that they touch on the idea of fewer schools for native people, leaving day care, when it comes to Canada, off the reserves, curtailing funding for new native services, not renewing funding for the constitutional process which failed last March, and, also, the rather preposterous notion that legislation dealing with native issues should not be proceeded with in Parliament unless the native people can get agreement from opposition parties to a minimal use of parliamentary time.

These documents, as I said, have caused enormous concern in the native community. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would assure us that these documents do not represent government policy or, indeed, government philosophy on this issue that is so very important to Canadians.

• (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, no doubt the leaked documents have caused the kind of concern the honourable senator has described. I know, therefore, that she will take this opportunity to assure those groups, as I do, that government policy is made by cabinet, not by discussion papers prepared for officials. The best proof of the seriousness of the government's attitude toward native peoples is the fact that, far from cutting back on our expenditures, we have increased them by some 40 per cent in the past four years.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I welcome the comments of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. However, one would reflect that similar assurances were made a couple of years ago when the Nielsen task force documents, now referred to as the "buffalo jump," were made public. I am wondering if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can indicate whether the Prime Minister himself will be expressing to the native leadership of this country that the trend suggested in these documents is not part of his government's policy. I hope that he will make it completely clear, given the fact that tomorrow discussions, in which the leader himself may be involved, begin on the whole question of constitutional change and aboriginal self-government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the report that was made to the then Deputy Prime Minister four years ago did recommend budget cutbacks. As I have pointed out to the honourable senator, since that time expenditures by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have increased by some $900 million, more than 40 per cent. The budget for this year alone is up by some 10 per cent. I do not know what more needs to be said or done to assure people that the kind of speculative musings in the document to which the honourable senator refers form no basis at all for government policy. I am confident that the Prime Minister would say what I have just said on this matter insofar as the intentions of the government are concerned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—TABLING OF RESOLUTION— POSITION OF GOVERNMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I would like to return to the discussion between the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning New Brunswick. Is the Honourable Leader of the Government not aware of the speech made a couple of weeks ago in Toronto by the Honourable Frank McKenna in which he repeated what he has said in New Brunswick on numerous occasions, that, yes, he will present a resolution to the legislature, as Mr. Hatfield had agreed to do? However, at the same time he said that unless amendments are made to cover some of the deep concerns of New Brunswickers and others in the country, the Government of New Brunswick will not support the accord. Is the Leader of the Government not aware of this statement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have seen press reports quoting the Premier of New Brunswick on this matter. I have not seen the precise statement to which the honourable senator refers. Again, I say that it is the premier's intention, as I understand it, to refer the accord to a committee of his legislature. Once that is done, and the hearings have been held and the report completed, I presume we will have a definitive statement as to where New Brunswick stands on this matter.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I simply give the Leader of the Government the absolute assurance that Premier McKenna has stated that unless amendments are made to the accord, it will not be approved by his government.

Senator Balfour: Regardless of what the committee says?

Senator McElman: I said that his government would not give support.

Senator Frith: The opposition might win the day.

Senator McElman: I said his government would not give support unless amendments were made.

Senator Flynn: If the government has prejudged it, why send it to committee?

Senator Frith: Good point! Why did you send yours to a committee and refuse amendments in advance?

Senator Flynn: Then why are you criticizing when you know in advance what you are doing? I am amused by your collective mind. It does not work too well.

Senator MacEachen: We are amused by your face!

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—APPOINTMENTS TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA FROM QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR LIST OF AMENDMENTS ACCEPTABLE TO GOVERNMENT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have been puzzled by the statement of the Honourable Leader of the Government that this accord is a "seamless web." Presumably, one would have to understand that some inadmissible deals were struck, and the accord cannot be touched without these deals somehow being disturbed. Leaving aside for the moment the totally unacceptable practice of ten men meeting together and making these deals—

Senator Flynn: Question!

Senator Gigantès: —in total secrecy—

Senator MacEachen: Yes, "Mr. Speaker"?

Senator Flynn: You might speak to him. He will listen to you.

Senator Gigantès: —why is it that one particular amendment we suggested to break a possible deadlock in naming Supreme Court justices from Quebec would in any way disturb the other premiers? And why would Quebec not want to have a deadlock-breaking mechanism, unless it was thinking of having a deadlock at some time or another?

Senator Gigantès: One of the things that does not come under the seven-provinces-50-per-cent-of-the-population rule, presumably, would be anything to do with the Supreme Court and, presumably also, this deadlock-breaking mechanism. The Leader of the Government says that if you open the accord up to one amendment there will be other suggestions for amendments, some more acceptable and others less so. Would he be prepared to give us a list of some acceptable amendments on which we could be working?

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Gigantès: Why not, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: You are extremely naive.

Senator Murray: I can give the honourable senator a short list of one amendment that is unacceptable, and that is the kind of deadlock-breaking mechanism to which the honourable senator referred. That matter was considered and rejected.

Reference was made to the deadlock-breaking mechanism proposed in the Victoria formula of 1971, which was rejected by the vast majority of First Ministers during this exercise. They believe that the judiciary should not be put in the position of reproducing themselves, as the saying goes, and, further, that non-elected people should not be brought into this process of breaking a deadlock to appoint judges to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Gigantès: So, according to the Leader of the Government, we may find a situation in which a separatist government has been elected in Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Gigantès: One was elected before; it is now the Official Opposition. As many people know, oppositions do occasionally tend eventually to form a government. The Conservative Party did in 1984, after spending many years in the wilderness.

● (1500)

Senator Guay: They still are!

Senator Gigantès: A separatist government may come into power and propose that if two vacancies occur on the Supreme Court they be filled by Robert Lemieux, the lawyer who defended the FLQ terrorists, and, perhaps, Maître Yves Fortier, who did not defend any FLQ terrorists but whose views seem to be not very federalist. That is the list.

Senator Murray: Mr. Fortier?

Senator Flynn: They would not be as stupid as you would be yourself.

Senator Gigantès: What would we do in those circumstances?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator clearly has a very low opinion of people in public life in Quebec and of public opinion in Quebec. That is to be deplored.

Senator Gigantès: I am delighted to hear the very high opinion the Leader of the Government has of people in public life in Quebec. I would assure him that mine is not second to his.

The point is that there is an opposition in the National Assembly of Quebec which says that its purpose is to get out of a Canadian Confederation by any legal means at its disposal. They are not proposing armed insurrection, but this would be a legal means of making the work of the Confederation of Canada harder. This is not taking a poor view of the people of Quebec; this is following to its logical conclusion what the opposition in Quebec says it wants to do. Why should we not have a deadlock-breaking mechanism then?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is seeking to cover ground that we covered many times in committee and in the debate. The kind of course that he hypothesizes would be so manifestly against and contrary to the interests of the people of Quebec that no democratic government in Quebec could try it or get away with it.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Gigantès: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the separatist opposition in Quebec would consider separation to be against the interests of Quebec? Is that what he is implying?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows what I have said. He can read it tomorrow or the next day, if he finds the time. He is attempting to cover the same ground that we covered many times in committee and in debate here.

There is really nothing I can usefully add with any hope of enlightening him on this matter.

Senator Gigantès: I thank the Leader of the Government for confessing that there is not anything he can add to enlighten anybody, in effect, because this was a secret process, a seamless web which nobody must touch or look inside.

Senator Flynn: Blah, blah, blah!

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers to questions.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

DEBT AS GLOBAL PROBLEM—AGENDA ITEM

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on May 3, 1988, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding the Economic Summit, 1988—Debt as Global Problem—Agenda Item.

(The answer follows:)

There are not formal agenda items for the Summit, but rather matters that will be discussed. The subject of developing countries' debt will be discussed by the Leaders and finance ministers, with particular emphasis on "middle-income" and "poorest" nations. Naturally, the report of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee has been taken into consideration by the government as the Canadian position is being formulated leading up to the Summit.

RE-ENERGIZING OF DEBT STRATEGY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PROPOSAL

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised on that same date by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen regarding Re-energizing of Debt Strategy—Possible Canadian Proposal.

Since the onset of the debt crisis in 1982, the Canadian government has supported a cooperative international strategy for managing the financial problems of heavily indebted developing countries. The strategy has been applied on a case by case basis to a wide variety of countries, and has succeeded in gradually reducing the threat to the international financial system and in bringing needed economic reforms and a resumption of economic growth to some of the indebted countries. The strategy has evolved more or less continuously throughout this period, with the most recent development being the introduction of new financial innovations which succeed in reducing the absolute amount of a country's debt. Two such schemes have been implemented already—by Mexico and Bolivia—and more are apparently being studied by these and other countries. Canada supports such new and imaginative innovations, which are designed and implemented on a case by case, voluntary basis, and whose essential financial aspects are determined by market forces. We reject, as do other creditor and indeed debtor countries, the notion that some "magic wand" financial scheme can be devised which will rapidly eliminate the international debt problem, and we expect that this point of view will be endorsed at the Toronto Economic Summit.

BRAZIL—ROLE OF WORLD BANK—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is again in response to a question raised by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, on May 3, regarding Economic Summit, 1988—Brazil—Role of World Bank—Canadian Government Position.

World Bank guarantees of commercial bank loans to developing countries have been used on a few exceptionally rare occasions in the past. Canada has supported these actions, as they covered only a small part of the financing packages in question, but were nevertheless instrumental in completing the packages. Completing these financing deals in turn allowed the international community to proceed with its support for good economic reform programs by the debtor countries. While Canada would not favour widespread and indiscriminate use of these guarantees—which would involve transferring an unacceptable amount of risk from the banks to the governments—we are willing to contemplate their use on a highly selective, case by case basis when necessary to allow complex and ambitious economic adjustment and financing arrangements to proceed. It is in this light that the government would evaluate any proposed World Bank guarantee for a portion of the Brazilian package currently being negotiated, were it to be presented to the World Bank's Executive Board for a decision.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the fourth and final answer I have today is in response to a question asked on May 3, 1988, by the Honourable Joyce Fairbairn, regarding Agriculture—Western Canada—Drought Conditions—Government Assistance.

The federal government has had a federal working group on drought monitoring the situation in cooperation with the provinces since late February. In addition, there are federal-provincial drought committees established in each western province. A special Agriculture Canada task force has been working for several weeks now to assess conditions and look at the adequacy of our present programs. On Sunday, May 8, the Deputy Ministers of Agriculture met in Ottawa to discuss the extent and impact of low runoff and reduced rainfall. As a result, an Assistant Deputy Ministers' committee is being formed to work with the Agriculture Canada task force and provincial drought committees. They will advise ministers—both federal and provincial—on a daily basis.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration (PFRA) has programs in place to mitigate against water supply shortages. The PFRA will spend $7.2 million on its rural water development program this year. This will assist farmers by providing grants for the construction of dams, dugouts, wells and pipelines. In addition, grants are available for small communities and groups of farmers providing up to 50 per cent of the cost of water supplies. Provincial governments operate programs that supplement and enhance the PFRA program according to their specific needs.

Fortunately, there are other on-going programs, such as the federal-provincial crop insurance program, to provide farmers with financial protection in the event of serious crop losses. Federal contributions of $145 million to crop insurance programs in Western Canada allow producers to purchase insurance protection at less than 50 per cent of the total program cost. In 1987, in Western Canada, some 96,000 farmers purchased $2.2 billion of protection on 38 million acres and it is expected that more farmers will participate this year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, May 18, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Honourable senators, if leave is given, I am prepared to give a brief explanation.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I was going to ask the honourable senator to give the Senate an indication of why the committee must meet at 3:30 p.m. rather than at its scheduled time.

Senator Hicks: The answer, honourable senators, is that we have had great difficulty in arranging a time suitable to the Minister of National Defence to meet with the committee. We are now approaching the end of our hearings of the evidence of witnesses before the committee and, obviously, we feel it very important to hear the views of the Minister of National Defence. While we have tried to make other arrangements, it seems that this is the only time, unless we leave it until much later in June, that we can hear the Minister of National Defence. That is the reason I am asking for permission for the committee to meet at 3:30 p.m., a time at which the minister has indicated he can be with us on Wednesday, May 18, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ANIMAL PEDIGREE BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Martha P. Bielish moved the third reading of Bill C-67, respecting animal pedigree associations.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on third reading in the name of Senator Marchand.

Senator Bielish: Perhaps I can convey some information to Senator Frith. The bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, where Senator Marchand was in attendance. His questions were answered, and he was the senator who moved that the bill be reported without amendment.

Senator Frith: I appreciate that information. I will check with Senator Marchand that he is satisfied that third reading should go ahead. If he is, then the bill can be given third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, we seem to be introducing a new technique into the Senate. We cannot have third reading now unless a certain Liberal senator is present.

I draw your attention to the attendance in the Senate at the moment and suggest that this procedure may be rather restrictive in making legislative progress.

If Senator Marchand is interested in this bill, I point out that he knew it was coming up for third reading today. He attended the committee meeting and he should have been here today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am aware of the system that the government uses in having spokesmen for their bills, and I will certainly not lecture them on how they operate.

[Senator Hicks.]

We, however, also have spokesmen on our side, and if I have not checked with a particular senator and do not know what his position is when the matter comes up for second or third reading, then I stand the order in his name. That is the system. If other senators, including senators on our side, find that an undesirable practice, then they may want to lecture me, but, in the meantime, I would adjourn the debate in the name of Senator Marchand. In case this is considered to be a surprise, I point out that we intend to continue this system.

Senator Phillips: When is Senator Marchand expected to be in attendance? Did Senator Frith make every attempt to contact him?

Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator Phillips was busy talking to someone else when I explained the situation to Senator Bielish.

Senator Walker: Don't be too much of a smart aleck.

Senator Frith: Why did he ask the question if he was listening? I think we had better not get into a competition about smart aleckry.

I said to Senator Bielish that I would check with Senator Marchand. If he has no objection to proceeding with third reading, then we can deal with the matter tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marchand, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle moved the second reading of Bill C-89, to amend the Criminal Code (victims of crime).

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today, Bill C-89, is part of the comprehensive proposal of this government to address the concerns of those Canadians who are often the forgotten persons in our criminal justice system—the victims of crime.

Victims of crime have become a focal point of concern and priority for the criminal justice system. The legislative proposals presented in Bill C-89, which are now before this house, represent concrete measures sought by and on behalf of victims of crime.

The major effect of the proposed legislation, which will amend the Criminal Code, is to enhance the capacity of the criminal justice system to respond to the special circumstances of crime victims in a fair and sensitive manner. This bill introduces procedures which will cause less inconvenience to victims at all stages of the criminal justice process while protecting and safeguarding the rights of the accused. In addition, the proposed amendments recognize the entitlement of the victim to reparation by requiring the offender to make amends for the wrong suffered by the victim.

The proposals introduced in Bill C-89 respond to the long-standing concern of this government with respect to the ability of the criminal justice system to meet the special needs of crime victims in our society. First, this bill will create a victim fine surcharge to be imposed on those convicted or discharged of offences under the Criminal Code, Part III or Part IV of the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotic Control Act. Second, this bill will allow input by the victim through the use of victim impact statements at the time of sentencing. Third, this bill will allow the use of photographs and affidavit evidence to provide for the early and prompt return of recovered property to the victim and remove the need for the victim to testify as to ownership and value of property. Fourth, this bill will require the courts to consider restitution in all cases involving damage, loss or destruction of property and bodily harm, thereby removing the need for the victim to apply for restitution. Fifth, this bill will extend the discretionary and mandatory ban on the publication of the identity of victims and witnesses of sexual and extortion offences.

As I have said, honourable senators, one of the more important features of Bill C-89 is the creation of a victim fine surcharge scheme. This proposal further recognizes the entitlement of victims of crime to reparation and the need for offenders to make amends for the wrongs suffered by their victims.

The proposed amendment would require the court to impose a victim fine surcharge on those offenders convicted or discharged of offences under the Criminal Code, Part III or Part IV of the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotic Control Act. The surcharge would be ordered in addition to any other punishment imposed. The only time where a victim fine surcharge would not be imposed is where the offender could establish, to the satisfaction of the court, that undue hardship to the offender or the offender's dependants would result.

The purpose of the victim fine surcharge is to require the offender to provide redress not only for the harm done to the victim but to the community at large. The surcharge will assist offenders in the process of accepting responsibility for their crimes by requiring them to contribute to victim services within each province as part of the debt they owe society.

The victim fine surcharge will generate revenue to be applied by the provinces exclusively for the purpose of providing assistance to victims of crime. The work of the Task Force and the Working Group on Justice for Victims of Crime, the federal-provincial consultation process and various research projects have all highlighted the need for a stable source of funding for victim services.

Concerning victim impact statements, the legislative proposal in this bill, which will enable the court to consider a victim impact statement, will provide the victim an increased opportunity to have input at the time of sentencing to bring the impact of the crime to the attention of the court.

Victims have long expressed the view that there has been little opportunity for their views to be made known. The proposed amendment will satisfy the victim's desire to be heard.

The purpose of the victim impact statement is to provide a factual account of the impact of the crime on the victim. It summarizes in writing what the victim might otherwise have said at the sentencing hearing concerning the harm done or loss suffered as a result of the commission of the offence.

If there is any dispute as to the facts, the ordinary legal principles governing criminal proceedings apply. Any facts relied upon by the Crown and challenged by the accused must be established in accordance with the criminal standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. As the veracity of the statements made by the victim may be challenged, the victim may be subject to cross-examination under oath by defence counsel or questioning by the sentencing judge.

The victim impact statement is one of several factors to be considered by the sentencing judge at the time of hearing to arrive at an appropriate sentence. The judge should be entitled to the opportunity to hear all relevant information before imposing sentence, including the financial, social, psychological or physical harm suffered by the victim.

I would like now to deal with photographic evidence and proof of ownership. Honourable senators, which one of us has not been the victim or known the victim of a property offence? Victims of these offences, such as theft or breaking and entering, have often complained of further victimization by the criminal justice system. They have been required to bear a financial or emotional burden while their property remains under police control.

Consider, for example, the case of a senior citizen of limited income whose television, which serves as the sole source of household entertainment, has been stolen.

Under the present law, recovered stolen property is usually retained by police until no longer required. In limited cases, photographs have been used where it would be impractical to retain the exhibit—for example, where goods are perishable or cannot be stored. Otherwise, if the prosecutor satisfies the court that the property is required for the purposes of any investigation or trial or other proceedings, the property is detained.

● (1520)

In a case where there may be several adjournments, it could be months before the victim recovers his property. In the circumstances of the senior citizen, not only would that create a financial burden—for example, where a television must be rented as a temporary replacement—but the emotional burden suffered as a result of this secondary victimization would also be considerable.

The proposed amendment providing for the use of photographic evidence in lieu of the property itself will facilitate the prompt return of recovered property to the victim. In addition, by filing a certified photograph and an affidavit or solemn declaration establishing the continuity of the exhibit the photographer does not have to appear as a witness, nor does the person or peace officer who signed the affidavit, unless evidence to the contrary is presented.

Similarly, the proposed use of an affidavit or solemn declaration as proof of ownership and value of property may obviate the need to call the victim as a witness to the proceedings. At present the prosecutor has been required to call the victim to testify as to the ownership and value of the property of which the person has been deprived as a result of the particular offence. Attendance in court may also result in considerable financial and personal cost to the victim or witness.

I believe that these procedural changes will be of great benefit to those who have the misfortune to become victims of those property offences by avoiding any further victimization by the criminal justice system.

Regarding restitution, in its 1983 report the Federal-Provincial Task Force on Justice for Victims of Crime recommended that the restitution provisions of the Criminal Code be amended to require judges to consider restitution in all appropriate cases and to provide the opportunity for victims to make representation to the court regarding their ascertainable losses.

More recently, in its report released in February 1987, the Canadian Sentencing Commission recommended that an order of restitution should include consideration of the following: first, property damages incurred as a result of the crime, based on actual cost of repair or replacement value; second, medical and hospital costs incurred by the victim as a result of the crime; and, third, earnings lost by the victim before the date of sentencing as a result of the crime, including earnings lost while the victim was hospitalized or participating in the investigation or trial of the crime.

I am sure that honourable senators will agree that the enhanced restitution provisions proposed in Bill C-89 respond well to those recommendations.

By requiring the court to consider ordering restitution in all cases where such an order might be appropriate the proposed amendments remove the onus on the victim to apply for an order at the time of sentencing. In appropriate cases, the court may order restitution not only for loss of or damage to property but also for pecuniary damages incurred as a result of bodily injury, provided the losses are readily ascertainable.

The proposals also expand the concept of victim to include those who assist in the arrest or attempted arrest of the offender, thereby enabling the court to make the offender accountable for all harm caused during the commission of the offence.

In addition, the proposals now address cases where the offender may have offered stolen property as security for financial transactions, thereby providing restitution to persons who innocently lend money on the security of such property.

Bill C-89 has not only provided for the greater opportunity to consider restitution orders but it has also introduced a series of measures to ensure that such orders will be satisfied. They include: enabling the court to conduct an inquiry for the purpose of determining the amount of restitution and the ability of the offender to pay; providing that any moneys found on the offender at the time of arrest may be used to satisfy the restitution order; directing the court to give priority to orders of restitution over orders of forfeiture and fines; and presenting two methods of enforcement of restitution orders in default, one civil in nature and the other by way of criminal proceedings.

[Senator Bétiisle.]

I believe that the restitution provisions in Bill C-89 will increase the possibility that a victim will receive financial reparation for the harm and losses suffered as a result of the commission of a criminal offence.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, you will recall that Bill C-15, which came into force on January 1, 1988, enhanced the protection granted victims of sexual offences by allowing them to testify in the absence of the accused. This bill also extended the ban on disclosure of the identity of all witnesses under the age of eighteen years.

Bill C-89 will extend the scope of this ban. The provisions set forth in this bill will not only apply to victims of sexual offences but also to victims of extortion. It is clear that by the very nature of the crime of extortion, disclosure of the victim's identity constitutes the essence of the threat made by the accused. By extending the protection offered under the Criminal Code to these victims as well, it is less likely that they will suffer public embarrassment or be exposed to additional physical danger. Furthermore, it would also be an incentive for victims of extortion to report such offences to the police.

The ban on disclosure of identity in connection with these offences will also apply to all witnesses, irrespective of age. In the case of witnesses who have reached the age of majority, the ban on disclosure of identity is discretionary. However, it is compulsory when the victim or the witness who requests this protection is under the age of eighteen years.

These victims are vulnerable. Protecting their identity when necessary will encourage them to testify and will result in a larger number of offences being reported.

[English]

Honourable senators, the proposals outlined in Bill C-89 represent the commitment of the government to respond sensitively to the circumstances of victims of crime. It is a major step forward in recognizing the needs of crime victims and ensuring their fair treatment throughout the criminal justice process. I believe that victims are entitled to be shown that, indeed, they have not been forgotten.

I therefore urge you, honourable senators, to support this bill and allow for its timely passage.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate until Tuesday next, May 17. However, if any other honourable senator would like to speak to the bill in the meantime, I would be happy to defer to that honourable senator.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Bill C-102, an Act to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act, with amendment), presented on Thursday, May 5, 1988.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have the honour of moving the adoption of this report and I am ready to provide some clarification.

Honourable senators, the report concerns Bill C-102, a bill intended to clarify and simplify a number of procedures, as Senator Macquarrie explained on second reading, so that Parliament would not always be asked to intervene in order to adopt a number of amendments, often of an entirely secondary or technical nature, to the agreements in effect. That was the purpose of this bill.

The bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. In committee, where Senator Adams showed a particular interest in this bill, we were informed of a technical error, a straightforward printing error, in the bill as it now stands. We therefore adopted the report to which I referred earlier, suggesting that the Senate approve the bill with an amendment that would consist of substituting the date of May 11 for the date of April 11 which now appears in paragraph 1(c) on line 5 of page 2 of the bill. That is the extent of the proposed amendment.

I imagine that for once the other place will be grateful to the Senate for returning a bill with amendments.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

REGULATORY SCRUTINY

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Joint Committee for Regulatory Scrutiny (Report No. 43—Public Service Employment), presented on Thursday, May 5, 1988.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly about the ninth report of the Standing Joint Committee for Regulatory Scrutiny. The report is a lengthy one. However, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate what I think are some of the highlights. This report discusses and examines the Public Service Employment Regulations. Because of the evidence received on this matter the committee concluded that the appeal rights conferred on public service employees by the Public Service Employment Act are compromised by the failure on the part of the Public Service Commission to adopt appropriate regulations in relation to various matters, some of which I will touch upon this afternoon.

For example, the regulations fail to provide for a mandatory and full disclosure to any unsuccessful candidate, or his or her representative, of all of the particulars relevant to the decision appealed from.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sorry, I was making some notes. What statute are we talking about here?

Senator Nurgitz: We are talking about the Public Service Employment Regulations, which come under the Public Service Employment Act.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Nurgitz: I was commenting on the fact that there was no requirement, for example, to disclose to an unsuccessful candidate who might wish to appeal the reasons why a decision was made, or information with respect to the successful candidate, et cetera. At the present time it is difficult for an appellant to properly prepare his or her case prior to an appeal, because there are no such requirements to provide an appellant with this kind of information.

I might say to honourable senators that, for the most part, quite a bit of disclosure does take place. However, none of it is mandatory, and it is evident that such an approach fails to provide a sensible mechanism which will make the appellate system very workable. That is, anyone reviewing the system would say that it really is, in a written sense, quite inadequate.

The committee has, on numerous occasions, requested the Public Service Commission to remedy this situation, and before I conclude my remarks I will give a chronology of events going back to December 10, 1981, when this matter was first raised before the committee as it was then, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and the various steps that have been taken over these last eight years in an attempt to get some movement on this matter.

I want to mention several other shortfalls for which the regulations do not provide.

• (1540)

The fact is that the committee said that good intentions—and no one is imputing bad motives—are not good enough. The committee said that they cannot be a substitute for the adoption by the commission of proper regulations spelling out the rights of people in the system who strive to improve themselves.

Senator Frith: And the good intentions of the drafters are not grounds for appeal?

Senator Nurgitz: That is right.

Senator Tremblay: There are no bad ones!

Senator Nurgitz: And bad ones, indeed, not!

The committee emphasized the fact that the screening board report and the selection board report on the unsuccessful candidate is not disclosed. We got into the question of an unsuccessful candidate, for example, having the right to information that was used if something was said about that candidate that may not have been accurate. The information that is relied upon in the determination is never given to the candidate when that candidate becomes an appellant, and the reasons for which the candidate was not successful are not disclosed. Other information in the ordinary court process—where all facts are examined and are on the record—is, indeed, missing, if one looks at these regulations.

There are other aspects, such as the failure of the right to hear both sides. There have been situations where an appellant appeals with this inadequate information and the other side does not even respond. There is no requirement in that regard.

Honourable senators, I meant only to touch upon some of these matters to show the kinds of inadequate regulations that we have been seeking to get the Public Service Commission to act on.

In the defence of the commission—because this sounds as if this is all one-sided—it has come forward and it has discussed the guidelines and policies. While the commission says they do not have the force of law, its members believe they uphold certain principles. The commission makes the bold assertion—and I am quoting—“that the commission will not infringe the rights of employees in most processes where these are essential.”

I think honourable senators would agree that that is not good enough in 1988. The committee wanted to emphasize that administrative simplicity and flexibility—which is what they are aiming for—should not be allowed to override the protection or the interest of the individual by legally entrenched and legally enforceable means.

That, honourable senators, is the report in a nutshell. I commend it to all honourable senators. It is a matter of urging the Public Service Commission to enact regulations to correct this situation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, can the Honourable Senator Nurgitz confirm that all of these shortcomings relate to individual rights? This is not a matter of some regulation about tags on a crate of strawberries. In each case he mentioned, as I followed it, it involved rights of individuals, in particular the rights of public servants.

Senator Nurgitz: It involves the rights only of public servants or people wishing to become public servants.

I consider it to be a serious right. It is, in each instance, a right involving his or her employment, or lack thereof—

Senator Frith: And therefore their careers.

Senator Nurgitz: —and therefore their careers in many instances.

I indicated earlier, honourable senators, that I would give a short chronology of the events of this examination to demonstrate that this was not a hasty decision made after a quick examination of the existing guidelines.

On December 10, 1981, the committee first considered the Public Service Employment Regulations in connection with the appeal procedure. Let me be clear that that is all I am concerned with and all I have attempted to raise.

In March of 1982 witnesses appeared before the committee.

In May of 1983 the committee attempted, by writing to counsel for the Public Service Commission, to raise various concerns it had. As honourable senators are aware, we attempt to sort things out by correspondence between the committee's counsel and the Public Service Commission's counsel.

In March of 1985 an invitation was extended to the Public Service Commission and the Public Service Alliance of Canada to appear, and on May 16, 1985, officers of the commission and of the Public Service Alliance of Canada testified before the committee and each tabled briefs.

Approximately two years ago the committee became more serious, realizing there was an impasse between accepting what the Public Service Commission told the committee were satisfactory guidelines and policies that were very efficient in the handling of appeals and what the committee's view was of protecting people's rights, which brings us to the tabling of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND CROWN CORPORATIONS

SELECTION PROCESS FOR PROCUREMENT OF SERVICES AND TENDERING OF CONTRACTS—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On Inquiry No. 1:

By the Honourable Senator De Bané, P.C.:

5th November, 1986—That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need for the Federal Government and Crown Corporations to establish a system of procurement of goods and professional services and the tendering of contracts based not only on efficiency, but also on fairness, in order to enhance the economic development of all regions of Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator De Bané has asked me to request leave of the Senate to withdraw this inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS

OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN BEATRIX

OF THE NETHERLANDS

TO

BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1988

Her Majesty was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): Order, please. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Your Majesty, Your Royal Highness, chers collègues, Honourable Senators:

It is a great honour for me to welcome you here today. On behalf of the Canadian Government, please allow me again to extend, Your Majesty and Your Royal Highness, our warmest welcome to Canada and especially to Ottawa. May I say it in a special way. When you are here in the House of Commons, Your Majesty, and in Ottawa, you are back home.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: In a special sense I say, "Welcome home, bienvenue chez vous".

The relationships that exist between our two nations are in many ways unique. They are based first on immigration, which binds us together with family ties. Nearly a million Canadians pride themselves on their Dutch ancestry, and their contribution to Canada has been absolutely magnificent. There is the legacy of valour of the Second World War, during which our soldiers, our young men and women, fought for the freedom of your country.

I must pay special homage to the Members of Parliament, both past and present, who participated in the liberation of the Netherlands, including our very distinguished Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable George Hees, who is with us here. Your Majesty, today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1110)

Mr. Mulroney: He says, Your Majesty, that he entered the Canadian Forces as a boy of nine!

This afternoon, Your Majesty and Your Royal Highness will be inaugurating "The Sweetest Spring", an exhibition of art and artifacts at the Canadian War Museum. This exhibit, jointly mounted by the Canadian War Museum and the Royal Netherlands Army Museum, underlines our close ties and reinforces our common values.

[Translation]

Our nations cherish the same important ideals of peace, justice and freedom. The presence of your family in Ottawa during the dark days of World War II formed the basis for a direct affinity between members of your family and Canada, and for a deep affection between Canadians and you yourself.

[English]

I know, Your Majesty, that you have fond memories of Stornoway, where you resided temporarily in Ottawa. I also have fond memories of Stornoway, where I resided temporarily in Ottawa. In fact, Your Majesty, all Leaders of the Opposition in Canada have come to regard this gracious home as essentially a temporary residence.

The splendid Dutch tulips, now in bloom on Parliament Hill and throughout our capital, are an enduring legacy of your family's wartime stay in Canada. This generous gift from Queen Juliana to the people of Canada is a unique tribute and one which all Canadians value, particularly at this time of year. When Princess Margriet was born here, the colours of the Netherlands were raised above these Parliament Buildings, celebrating the unprecedented event of a member of a reigning European Royal Family being born on North American soil.

Today this rich heritage has produced a wealth of political, economic, social, and trade relationships.

[Translation]

Your visit to Canada reaffirms the importance of our relations with the European Economic Community, with Western Europe and especially with the Netherlands. The history and the future of Western Europe are closely linked with our history and our future. Together we have formed an association as fruitful as it is diversified, based on political, economic and cultural ties, an unshakeable faith in democracy and an ardent desire to preserve our freedom.

The Netherlands have played a fundamental role in the development of Western civilization. To Canadians, Your Majesty, your country has always been synonymous with social justice and respect for human rights.

[English]

I am pleased to note that our dialogue in this area has been active and fruitful. I would like to underline, Your Majesty, the fact that we share similar views on major international issues should come as a surprise to no one. Our countries are committed members of the international community with similar political, economic, and trade objectives. Most of all, Your Majesty, our countries and our peoples are friends—friends who share values and traditions, friends who espouse the same principles, and whose children dream the same dreams.

On behalf of the Government of the people of Canada, I welcome you to Canada and, through you, extend our warmest greetings to the people of the Netherlands.

Your Majesty, may I ask you at this special and affectionate moment of home-coming to speak now to the Parliament and to all of the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Her Majesty Queen Beatrix of the Netherlands: Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, our meeting with the Canadian Parliament is taking place in the year in which we are commemorating the Glorious Revolution of 1688, which placed Dutch Stadholder William III together with his wife, Mary Stuart II on the throne of England.

The Glorious Revolution stands as a landmark in the development of British parliamentary democracy. By virtue of the Bill of Rights then presented to William of Orange and his wife before they ascended the throne, Britain's Parliament regained its traditional significance. The Bill of Rights reasserted that the Sovereign could only rule with the consent of the representatives of his subjects. To many peoples in the seventeenth century that was a revolutionary principle; the people of the Netherlands, however, had adopted the principle a century earlier. The subsequent political development of both the United Kingdom and the British Commonwealth was conditioned by the principle of consent. In a few weeks, on the twentieth of July, the British House of Commons, the mother of all parliaments, will commemorate the events of 1688. It is pleasing to know that delegations from the Canadian and Netherlands parliaments will attend the ceremony.

In Canada in 1839 Lord Durham laid the foundations for a democratic form of government in his "Report on the Affairs of British North America". On the basis of the "responsible government" principle he entrusted the government of the colony to the colonists themselves. The policy of placing the responsibility for government with the people was thereby extended to Canada.

To our countries this form of responsibility has long ceased to be a matter of doubt or debate. In fact, we should now attach to the term "responsible government", the essence of the Durham report, a different, far deeper significance. Since then our dealings have become more international, our present more linked to the future. Besides to their own citizens, to whom governments are quite naturally answerable, they are therefore feeling increasingly answerable to those with whom we share the world and to generations as yet unborn. This is the new signification of "responsible government".

The peoples of countries such as Canada and the Netherlands are particularly conscious of their common destiny with the other inhabitants of our globe. National decisions are increasingly making themselves felt far beyond frontiers. Governments are also increasingly being confronted with tasks they can no longer perform alone.

An international task for Canada was implicit in the three basic principles, namely, Peace, order and Good Government, of the Constitution Act, 1867. The maintenance of "Order" is a function that a government could perform alone, but not the maintenance of "Peace". By definition, therefore, "Good Government" can imply nothing but to govern in collaboration with other countries.

Canadians have long been aware of the fact that their country is a member of a global community. It was this realization that led to Canada's willingness to make sacrifices in the great conflicts of this century. Canada made an impressive contribution to the victory of the Allies in World War I. She then played a prominent role as an active member of the League of Nations. Canadian participation in World War II was further evidence of her sense of international solidarity, which was of incalculable moment, particularly to the Netherlands. Much of Holland was liberated by Canadian soldiers, all of whom, exactly like their fathers, had crossed the Atlantic Ocean as volunteers to destroy a power and an ideology that posed a mortal threat to our common civilization. A few days ago, on the 4th and 5th of May, Holland gratefully commemorated the 1945 liberation and, as in every year, flowers were laid on the graves of members of the Canadian Forces who found their last resting place in our country.

• (1120)

After our common struggle in that war, our equally common conviction that democratic states should together safeguard their security found expression in new forms of co-operation among allies. Canada and the Netherlands have already been members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for 40 years. Both countries have from the outset regarded NATO as an organization that embraces more than mere common military defence. Article II of the treaty by which NATO was established speaks of the parties strengthening their free institutions, their democratic institutions, encouraging economic collaboration and creating a true Atlantic community. It is significant that this section was called "the Canadian Article".

A feeling of responsibility for the destiny of the world in general is also evident from the two countries' active participation in the work of the United Nations. An appeal to Canada for peace-keeping operations has never been in vain. Canada and the Netherlands are also co-members of many other international institutions. Not only do their representatives meet each other there, they often defend the same points of view. A noteworthy unanimity between two countries here bridges the difference that separates them. Countries like Canada and Holland can make a valuable contribution, especially internationally, in the form of ideas, initiatives and mediation. Backed by the confidence they have gradually managed to inspire in the world, the very countries that are not among the superpowers may thus play a sometimes disproportionately important role.

One of the main aims of our two countries is the global promotion of the international rule of law. This is where we touch the heart of our responsibility for relations in today's world, a world teeming with problems. I will name only one of them: the lagging behind of what we call the Third World, that extensive area in which equitable relations leave a great deal to be desired and where the international rule of law is least in evidence. The duty not to acquiesce in that lag in development is implicit in "responsible government". Canada and the Netherlands give high priority to aid for the Third World and to economic co-operation with Third World countries. Our two nations have for years done much in this area, both to alleviate poverty directly and to render assistance in the longer term, to help people to help themselves. It was no mere chance that the first compendious United Nations report on Third World problems was drawn up by a commission chaired by Lester Pearson.

But "responsible government" in the field of development co-operation may not stop at emergency aid and charity. Neither is the transfer of capital and know-how sufficient. The opening of our markets is, economically and psychologically, just as important. That is the only way in which we can make a real contribution toward growth in the countries themselves. Indeed, it is disturbing that some developed countries are again considering protectionist measures. Protectionism is ultimately bad for everyone, but the poor countries are the victims; they are the first and the worst affected. By giving in to the inclination to protect ourselves we cause multiple damage, we hamper economic growth and increase injustice in the world. An open economy is both a Canadian and a Dutch tradition. It is pre-eminently a tradition we may not abandon.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Lord Durham's compelling plea for "responsible government" alluded to responsibility towards citizens. The passage of time and social developments have given the term a new signification. As distances shrank and the interdependence of countries severally increased, we became ever more conscious of our responsibility towards all those who with us populate the world. This realization goes very deep in Canada and the Netherlands.

Moreover, the recent past has given the term "responsible government" a new dimension, our answerability for the future, the obligation to leave behind for our children a world fit to live in.

Fifteen years ago the Club of Rome in its first report gave an urgent warning. As we see it now, the warning was perhaps not urgent enough. Not only is our highly developed society threatened by a future shortage of raw materials, but the very level of development we have already reached holds treats to our well-being, to say nothing of the hazards that loom if the creation of further opulence goes on at the same hectic pace.

It is essential that environmental research conducive to the adoption of rational measures be stepped up and that the efficacy of such research be increased through international co-operation. Preventive intervention is imperative in view of the irreversibility of certain processes that harm the environment. It is true that the very technical knowledge that threatens our future will often enable us to redress the damage done, but we only really control technology if we employ it to prevent damage. Only the courage to take unpopular measures now will safeguard the future for coming generations. The requirement that the quality of the heritage we have received and that we in turn shall have to hand on to posterity may not be impaired is not yet universally realized. Essential, fundamental alterations in our pattern of behaviour are overdue. The close attention of parliament and environment-conscious citizens is a requisite, a stimulus and a guarantee of an effective policy in this area. Politicians and industrialists must join forces and find the answers.

Illustrative of Canada's attitude is that the major United Nations conference on the ozone layer was held in Montreal last year, and that now Canada is again busy preparing a conference on "controlled development" as a follow-up of the Brundtland report.

There have been a number of successes in environmental protection, both national and international. A bolder approach at global level that takes the interconnection of matters concerning food supplies, the generation of power, development aid and the environment into account, is however required. The parallel Canadian and Dutch views on these problems and the approach to them invite a greater common advance in international planning.

In a bilateral context, environmental technology is one of the important fields in which Canada and Holland exchange know-how and experience. A Memorandum of Understanding between our governments on the subject was signed yesterday; similar memoranda with the governments of Ontario and Quebec are to be concluded shortly.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, Members of the House and the Senate, since the first parliament was set up, the elected representatives have fulfilled the mandate entrusted to them by the people. In our times, parliamentarians have been given another, double mandate: one by those with whom we live on this globe and one by generations as yet unborn. The commitment to "responsible government", which cabinets and parliaments must honour has thereby been made much more onerous a task, and it demands courage to commit oneself wholly to this objective.

The term we must now have in mind is moreover far longer than the life of a parliament. The sense of responsibility for others and for the future is nevertheless deeply rooted in this legislative body. It was in this parliament, where I am your guest today, that political democracy was established in Canada in the 19th century. It is heartening to note that the members of today's assembly realize that they are now the guardians of a responsible democracy. Thank you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Your Majesty, Your Royal Highness, on behalf of the Senate I want to thank you most heartily for your remarks, which were a vivid testimony to the quality and vigour that characterize our bilateral relations, and to the importance of those relations.

Nor can I resist commenting on how very rare it is to receive within these walls the sovereign of a friendly and allied power who can point to a childhood spent, in part, in Canada's capital. It gives us, I think, an additional reason for our pleasure in welcoming you today to the Parliament of Canada. It is one of the distinguishing features of the links that bind our two countries. Our long tradition of working together to preserve the values that are dear to us reinforces the significance of the personal link, which has been extended in the most natural way by the many other family ties between Canada and the Netherlands.

[Translation]

Your profound statements come as no surprise to students of the political writings of your great philosopher, Spinoza. Your reign as we have seen, continues the admirable example of your predecessors who were mindful of the role Spinoza urged governing authorities to play when he stated, and this was in the seventeenth century, that the rights of the individual took precedence over the authority of the State. Need I recall in your presence his warning that the State that denied this principle would be mere power and be vanquished by power?

It is indeed very fitting to say in this Chamber that you have evoked the great humanist tradition that brought us the principle of intellectual freedom. We understand why Descartes, attracted by the tolerance and love of freedom of your people, spent twenty years in Holland, and why Pascal admired the dialectics of your philosophers. The tradition continues today, at a time when your thinkers have spearheaded the movement for religious reform throughout the world, taking the calculated risk of bringing about a moral crisis.

[English]

The friendship between our two countries is consolidated by the significant commercial exchanges between us. Renowned for their technological innovations and business sense, the Dutch are valued partners for dynamic, technologically advanced, and resource rich countries like Canada. Dutch investments in this country are already quite substantial and the possibility of more joint ventures and increased trade can only fortify our commercial relations.

Our cultural ties are also especially important for Canadians of Dutch origin who want to maintain their links with the Netherlands, but all Canadians cherish the spirit of friendship and co-operation which permeates our relations with your country. Our economic contacts, official visits, and the significant flow of tourists in both directions illustrate the wish of our citizens not only to retain our special ties, but also to nurture them for our mutual benefit.

Your Majesty, your visit to Canada will give you the opportunity to witness the vitality of our young country, but I have no doubt that the warmth of our feelings toward the Dutch nation will also become evident. I trust your trip will be a pleasant one and that it will provide you with more fond memories of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Your Majesty, Your Royal Highness—

[Translation]

Speaking on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons and of other honoured guests present in this Chamber, I wish to thank you for your most cordial speech. Canadians of Dutch descent have played a major role in many areas of Canadian society.

[English]

There have been people from your country, Your Majesty, in Canada from our earliest days. Their continuing presence explains why there is a certain resemblance between our two countries. We are convinced that this visit by Your Majesty and Your Royal Highness will help to reinforce those similarities and enable us to extend our co-operation along a number of promising avenues, taking as our starting point our already thriving relationship. Your profound appreciation of the need for international co-operation, especially in regard to our environment, has been most certainly noted in this Chamber today.

• (1140)

I would like to take this opportunity, presented by your presence within these walls, to ask you to convey the best wishes of the Canadian House of Commons to the people of your country and to assure them of our friendship. To you, Your Majesty, and Your Royal Highness, you will always be home in our country. God bless you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to announce that the House will convene at two o'clock this afternoon.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 11, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN M. MACDONALD

FELICITATIONS ON CONFERRING OF HONORARY DOCTORATE OF LAWS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, this past weekend I had the privilege and honour of attending the spring convocation of St. Francis Xavier University. Many of you here have attended convocations and graduations over the years and they have always been joyous occasions.

This convocation was so important, so happy and so joyous for me personally due to the fact that our colleague, the Honourable Senator John Michael Macdonald, received an honorary degree—Doctorate of Laws honoris causa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Muir: Our colleague, Senator John, as he is more familiarly known, or Dr. Macdonald now, was born in North Sydney. He attended St. Joseph's School and Sydney Academy, and later attended St. Francis Xavier University. He graduated with a Bachelor of Arts degree in 1928. Two years later he received his Master's degree.

Senator Macdonald: Make it short, Bob!

Senator Muir: Because he is such a quiet, humble, mild, brilliant individual intellectually, he does not like having complimentary things said about him, but I am going to say them whether he likes it or not.

Following graduation he was principal of Morrison School in Antigonish and served as president of the local branch of the Nova Scotia Teachers' Union. Senator Macdonald graduated from Dalhousie University Law School in 1934, and then joined the law firm of his father and older brother.

Active in community affairs, he was instrumental in establishing the North Sydney Credit Union in 1937, with assistance from the St. Francis Xavier Extension Department. He served as its first president until 1943, when he enlisted in the First Canadian Army Workshop-Ordnance and RCEME and served as a private—by his own choice—in the northwest Europe campaign throughout England, France, Belgium and Holland until 1945. Since the war he has been active in the Royal Canadian Legion, serving on the executive of Branch No. 19, North Sydney, from 1945 to 1961, and has been elected annually to the position of honorary president since 1961.

Upon his return from that conflict, Senator Macdonald continued his credit union involvement and was an unpaid legal adviser for the North Sydney Credit Union and other cooperative ventures. From 1946 to 1961 he served as solicitor for the Town of North Sydney. In 1956 he was elected to the provincial legislature, and for four years he chaired the Private and Local Bills Committee of that government. In June 1960, as you know, he was summoned to the Senate of Canada.

Senator Macdonald has been an active member of the Rotary Club for over 20 years. This man was involved in crippled children's clinics. There were many times he would say, "Bob, come on, get your car! We have to pick up a child," and that was in order to send the child to Halifax to have a deformed foot or arm looked after. This is the kind of man he is; he has always had time for people and for individuals.

On a personal note, I have known Senator John Macdonald for over 50 years. I see question marks over your heads and looks of consternation, because when you look at me you say, "How can a man so young have known Senator Macdonald for over 50 years?"

Senator Frith: Actually, I was not going to ask that.

Senator Muir: I knew you would not. In any event, it was my honour and privilege, as a very young man, to work in 1937 for the election of his father, the Honourable Joseph Macdonald, who served as a cabinet minister in the provincial government of Nova Scotia.

Over the years Senator Macdonald has been so good to so many people in many walks of life. Senator Macdonald has done what many of you in this chamber who are in the legal profession have done, namely, a lot of "thank-you" jobs in the legal field.

Now, on a more personal note, Senator Macdonald has been part of my political life. I have worked on his elections. In turn, he was always my campaign manager, my treasurer, my mentor, my father confessor. He was all of those things in eight consecutive elections, and due to his assistance we won them all. As many of you in this chamber have found out, Senator Macdonald has a wise head and a very steady hand; he is a stable individual who is ready to give wise counsel and share his wisdom with anyone and everyone.

As we all know, St. Francis Xavier University has a splendid reputation, not only in this country but in the broader world. Its international concerns and its world-famous cooperative movements have made it widely known. I think it fitting that a university so highly regarded should honour one of our colleagues who is so widely identified by his care for and devotion to community work. Senator John M. Macdonald has been granted a Doctor of Laws degree, honoris causa, as I have said. This is a merited honour, and in conferring such a doctorate on Senator Macdonald this prestigious university has, I think, also brought honour to itself. I am sure that we all join in congratulating my dear and good friend, Senator John M. Macdonald.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am the only member of this chamber who was a colleague of Senator John Macdonald in the Nova Scotia legislature. Although we sat on opposite sides of the house, we became good friends at that time. I am sure that all of you in this chamber realize that that was inevitable, because as he behaved then is exactly the way in which he has behaved in this chamber.

Senator John Macdonald made a great contribution not only to the island of Cape Breton and the province of Nova Scotia but latterly, since he has come to Ottawa, by his work in this chamber, to all the people of Canada. I congratulate him on having been made an honorary Doctor of Laws by St. Francis Xavier University and, as Senator Muir put it so well, I congratulate St. Francis Xavier University on their wisdom in choosing such a worthy recipient of the highest honour that a university can bestow on anyone. Congratulations, Senator Macdonald.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Muir and Senator Hicks for the nice things they have said about me and I would like to thank all of you for your applause. Perhaps I should add that as I listened to all of those nice things being said, I thought to myself that I had heard all of those things being said about other people, but it was always during their obituaries. So, honourable senators, I am glad to be in the position of hearing them while I am still here to enjoy them. I do thank you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE HONOURABLE SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD

TRIBUTE ON RETIREMENT AS HONORARY COLONEL OF NORTH SASKATCHEWAN REGIMENT

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to bring to your attention a very important event which occurred this past week in the great city of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and I bring with me today the evidence of that occasion, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. My great friend and yours, the Honourable Sidney Buckwold, was honoured once again in the city of Saskatoon upon his retirement after 16 years as Honorary Colonel of the North Saskatchewan Regiment.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: On the front page of this very distinguished and important daily newspaper is a picture of the colonel himself as he is reviewing his troops for the last time before he takes the last salute and puts away his baton. I might add that Sid Buckwold, our great senator from Saskatoon, has received many honours in his day, and I hope this is not the last of them. Senator Buckwold has been a distinguished scholar, a very successful businessman and, if I may say so, a distinguished statesman and politician.

Senator Steuart: And a good Liberal!

Senator Frith: That is a redundancy; they are all good!

Senator Barootes: In addition, he has been a militarist of great renown. I take this opportunity to draw this occasion to the attention of the Senate and to salute my friend, the Honourable Sidney Buckwold, as I know you would all wish to express your good wishes to him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, first, let me thank Senator Barootes. I can only say one thing: Senator Barootes, you win. I support Bill C-22!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: You are just kidding, I hope!

Senator Nurgitz: We knew it all along!

That the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1989.

QUESTION PERIOD*AGRICULTURE*WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which arises out of a very serious—and I think it has now reached the stage of being a state of emergency—drought situation in parts of western Canada. The question also arises partly because of the answer provided yesterday by Senator Phillips to a question asked by Senator Fairbairn on May 3.

I thank Senator Phillips for the answer that was given yesterday. The information given was only that the federal government was studying the situation, and there followed a list of a whole lot of programs that were all in place long before this government came to office, such as the Crop Insurance Program, and so on. Senator Phillips went on to say—and this is what is disturbing:

... an Assistant Deputy Ministers' committee is being formed to ... advise ministers—both federal and provincial—

I would like to ask the minister if the government is unaware that this is a very serious situation insofar as brood cow herds are concerned in much of western Canada. There has been some rain, of course, in Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan—

Senator Guay: In northern Manitoba.

Senator Olson:—but a very large part of Saskatchewan and almost all of Alberta have had no rain yet. We have heard of some programs announced by the provincial governments, but to date we have not heard of any participation in any program by the federal government.

I do not know how to impress upon the government that the matter is urgent and the situation constitutes a major problem.

When is the government going to take seriously the fact that those people need some help in order to save their cattle herds?

Secondly, the honourable senator seems to imply that existing programs—some of which, as he states, were brought in under a previous government—are inadequate to deal with a drought situation. That is not the point of view of either the federal government or, so far as I am aware, the provinces. We believe that a number of existing federal and provincial programs are indeed designed to address the risks of drought. They include crop insurance, assistance for rural water supplies through the PFRA, and prairie provincial programs and community pastures. Water supplies are assisted through a program called the Agri-Food Regional Development Sub-agreement in British Columbia. Within those programs it should be possible for the federal and provincial governments together to develop a joint response which will be equal to the situation described by Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to be careful not to be argumentative in this, because what I am looking for is help for those people and not to get into an argument with the Leader of the Government. But it is clear from what he has just said that he, at least—and I hope that is not true for the rest of his government—does not understand this situation.

The crop insurance program does absolutely nothing to save the cow herds that are now unable to graze on the range because there was no rain this spring and no snow during the winter. Another thing the government seems to fail to understand is that the emergency is now. This is not the time to start forming committees to look at the problem. Without being offensive in any way, could I ask the Leader of the Government when he believes the government is going to announce a program?

Farmers have been feeding their cattle since early last winter. They should have stopped feeding their cows during the first or second week of April, but they are still buying hay, and hay has nearly doubled in price over the past four weeks. Those cow herds are extremely important and are at risk today, not some time down the road. So when will the government make an announcement so that we do not have to have herd dispersal? Will it be on May 15 or June 1?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point the honourable senator is making. I must tell him that the record of this government—which is one of unprecedented assistance to western agriculture—is the best proof and the best indicator of the action that this government is capable of, and will indeed take in an effective way, to address the kinds of problems he has raised.

Senator Olson: I have acknowledged the help that this government has given to grain farmers and others because of the drought. They appreciated that and I appreciated that.

But if I am out on the Prairies in southern Alberta or in Saskatchewan—as a matter of fact, this does not only affect the southern part of the province; this affects the northern part of Alberta as well—trying to save the only livelihood those farmers have, which is the brood cow herd, and bearing in mind that this is a desperate situation, I am afraid that they will ask, “What have you done for me lately?” They need help now. I hope that the minister will relay that message to the Minister of Agriculture so that the government does not sit back at this late date, thinking it is discharging its responsibilities by forming committees. The farmers there need action now.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

RE-ENERGIZING OF DEBT STRATEGY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PROPOSAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Senate has been in such a laudatory mood today that I hesitate to be critical.

Senator Flynn: Really!

Senator MacEachen: I wish to refer to a delayed answer given yesterday on the subject of re-energizing the debt strategy. I am grateful to have that answer, and also the answer on the role of the World Bank, but I thought the last sentence of the answer, under the heading “Re-energizing of Debt Strategy—Possible Canadian Proposal”, trivializes the Senate and trivializes the Toronto Economic Summit. It reads as follows:

We reject, as do other creditor and indeed debtor countries, the notion that some “magic wand” financial scheme can be devised which will rapidly eliminate the international debt problem, and we expect that this point of view will be endorsed at the Toronto Economic Summit.

Senator Roblin: Whose statement is that?

Senator MacEachen: That is the last sentence in a delayed answer provided yesterday.

I want to make a point here and draw to the attention of those who prepare these answers that we do read them and that we expect them to make some sense. I do not think there is any senator who believes that there is “some ‘magic wand’ financial scheme [that] can be devised which will rapidly eliminate the international debt problem,” nor do I think that such a trivial observation should be put before the Toronto Economic Summit for endorsement. End of observation!

senators, if the honourable senator could give me the names of those who drafted that answer, as perhaps he could, I would draw this to their attention personally. In any case, I shall, with pleasure, draw his observations to the attention of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

PARLIAMENT

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT— TIMETABLE FOR INTRODUCTION OF ENABLING LEGISLATION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister recently stated that he wants the legislative program of the government to be adopted before he calls an election. Among the items he indicated that would have to be passed by Parliament was the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. Could the leader give this chamber an indication as to when the government will introduce such legislation so that we can get on with this matter?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That certainly sounds better than "in due course."

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "FINANCING THE FAMILY FARM TO THE YEAR 2000"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, entitled: "Financing the Family Farm to the year 2000", tabled in the Senate on Thursday, April 28, 1988.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the report tabled on April 28, 1988, by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, entitled: "Financing the Family Farm to the year 2000."

In beginning my remarks I would like to express sincere thanks to the many presenters to the committee, particularly those we were unable to thank in person, who sent written briefs to the committee in the form of letters or, in many cases, very thorough and well thought out memoranda. These were of invaluable assistance to the committee in drafting its report and in gaining a better understanding of the difficulties facing the agricultural sector. I would also like to thank all committee members for their attention and attendance at committee meetings, particularly the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Barootes, who, in many spirited exchanges with other members of the committee—in particular, Senator Olson—helped us better understand the problems facing Canadian agriculture. Of course, the help of the researchers and other staff of the committee is much appreciated.

In speaking to the report I will comment briefly on the actual report and recommendations. The recommendations speak for themselves, as does the report. However, I would like to take a few minutes to tie some of the recommendations together. I would like to give a better picture of what the committee has in mind in terms of dealing with the crisis in agriculture as a short-term problem, but, more importantly, dealing with the general problem of the future in terms of how we should plan long term to avoid some of the problems we find ourselves faced with today and to have in place policy initiatives that will assist us in doing that.

The recommendations dealing with the immediate problem are to reinforce the government's initiative in the form of the Special Canadian Grains Program. This program is needed to deal with the immediate problem that is a result of the trade war between the European Economic Community and the United States. We are not the first to apply these payments. These are payments to farmers in the cereal grain sector and oil seed sector in order primarily to assist them with the problems they find themselves faced with. There are similar programs that have been in place in Europe and the United States which pay farmers to produce commodities. These commodities are produced in great surplus, thus these surpluses come on to international markets and distort international trade. I do not see this program being a program such as that, but, rather, a program to protect Canadian farmers who find themselves suffering as a result of those programs in other countries.

The last thing I would like to comment on is the concept of decoupling. We did not have an opportunity to spend a great amount of time on this subject, but we did hear some evidence and we do have a comment. I will elaborate on that when we come to it and revert to the Special Canadian Grains Program in that context.

The other immediate assistance we recommend is an interest-relief scheme. This consists of the funding of a program—and it is conceivable that it may cost anywhere from $200 million to $400 million per year for several years—to assist farmers through the Farm Debt Review Board process and the Farm Credit Corporation by providing assistance to farmers in the form of reduced interest, or an interest holiday, or something of that nature, in situations where the lender is prepared to participate by restructuring a loan, extending time, or perhaps even reducing principal outstanding.

The report also reinforces the Canadian Rural Transition Program, which is an initiative of this government, and points out that the committee would like to see eligibility for that program finally determined by Farm Debt Review Boards, which are now in their second year of operation and which we believe have great potential. However, we do think that the workings of both the Farm Debt Review Boards and the Canadian Rural Transition Program should come before the appropriate committees of both the Senate and the House of Commons in the form of annual reports, expressing opinions on how well they are working. In the event that a committee of either house felt further review was necessary or change was necessary, there would be an opportunity through the committees to initiate that process. Those, then, are the matters of short-term policy response on which I wished to comment.

I would now like to spend some time on those matters which have long-term potential; that is, the potential to assist us with better long-term planning for the agricultural sector. These programs are twofold.

First, dealing with lenders, we propose that the Farm Credit Corporation assume a role more like that of the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation where they would have the power to insure loans. This is a means by which government policy could be implemented to ensure that lending institutions met minimum standards in terms of their ability to judge the quality of a farm loan. These lenders would include insurance companies, which have now essentially abandoned agricultural lending, as well as credit unions, cooperatives and government lenders such as FCC. This policy initiative would take the form of saying to those lenders: "We will make this insurance feature available to you, the lenders, if you satisfy us that you have on staff the appropriate number of people with the appropriate skills to properly assess farm loans."

Recently, what has been happening is that fewer and fewer lenders are prepared to participate in the farming market. In future this will create difficulty, because when the agricultural sector returns—and it will return as a buoyant area of our economy as surely as it became a depressed area of our economy—we will need sufficient farm lending capability to serve this sector's needs at that time. Therefore, a policy initiative designed to interest farm lenders, in the form of the existing financial intermediaries in the market, is much needed. We think it is much needed in the context of the government's being able to have a policy input which would ensure that they would be responsible farm lenders and that they would be properly staffed in terms of capacity to assess farm loans.

This initiative is prompted in part because of the many times we have heard the same complaint, namely: "I am a farmer in trouble, not simply because I borrowed money but because the bank or the lending institution was not responsible in making money available. In other words, they lent me money that I should not have had." Honourable senators, I must say that when this happens it does not excite much sympathy on my part. Nonetheless, there is some truth in that point of view. These people should, perhaps, not have been lent money, but they were. However, if we had more responsible and better farm lenders, we could avoid a lot of the problems we are experiencing today.

On the other side of the picture, many farmers who need credit are not able to assess properly how much credit they need. What is creating the difficulty in many cases is determining whether they should use credit and how much they should use. Also, this decision-making process on the part of the borrower would be greatly aided if they had the help of government programs that ensured that they had the ability to develop appropriate management information for the kinds of operations that they have.

One of the things that causes the industrial sector to be very efficient and to drive out small producers is that on a per unit basis they can develop good management information in terms of assessing markets for the goods they are producing and in terms of assessing cost of production. This is more difficult for farmers, because farmers are a diverse group of small producers relative to the total commodity—let us say, wheat—that is produced. This committee believes that there is room for a government initiative to assist farmers to overcome the high cost of developing that information on a per-unit-of-production basis with programs to assist them in selecting the appropriate type of assistance that will support them.

Therefore, honourable senators, the two things together are necessary: a policy initiative for lenders to ensure that they are more responsible and that they make better lending decisions; and an initiative for borrowers to make sure that they have good information on which to base credit-use decisions. It may also assist them with other decisions involving the economic modelling of their farm, or aid them in determining whether they should produce this commodity or that commodity. Assistance to the borrowers in that form would, over the long term, lead to a much better relationship between borrowers and lenders and would avoid some of the problems we are experiencing today. It would also make the agricultural sector more efficient than it is today.

It might be said that these things will happen in the normal course. It is true; they would, and they do. However, we must bring to bear on this whole subject the support that Canadian politicians of all parties have stated for the family farm.

To a degree, the family farm in the current economic environment, in my opinion, is somewhat artificial. We force owner-operator situations in the agricultural sector through various programs because we believe that a certain percentage of our population should live in rural Canada. We also believe in the kind of unit that exists today producing agricultural commodities. In fact, there is an interesting political flavour to it in terms of the power of a rural vote compared to an urban vote.

In any event, we believe in the family farm, and if we want to do justice to our belief and our support for the family farm we must be prepared, in my opinion, to develop policies of the nature I have tried to describe in reference to borrowers and lenders in order to ensure the survival and the economic health of the family farm.

Honourable senators, those are all the remarks I want to make in general about the recommendations. As I say, they speak for themselves.

I would like to dwell briefly on the concept of decoupling. The crisis in agriculture, as I said earlier, is most often blamed on the trade war in the cereal grains sector, and I have also described how that came about. There are a number of organizations which are beginning to discuss this crisis, and I would like to speak briefly about them. I mention, first, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the OECD. Canada is a member country of the OECD, and that organization, as of one year ago, May 1987, made a very large report to council wherein they prepared an economic model of the agricultural economies of member countries. They also made some recommendations. I believe it is primarily this initiative on the part of the OECD that has given rise to the numerous discussions around the word "decoupling."

For purposes of explanation, in its simplest terms, "decoupling" means that policies designed to assist the agricultural sector should not be commodity-specific; they should not be a payment to produce, but, rather, they should be a payment to assist agriculture. In this respect, I am going beyond the strict definition of "decoupling," but that will give you some idea of what it is about. It is a very complex idea and not well understood by many people—including me—and is the subject of much discussion. As I say, I believe its origins lie primarily in the OECD economic model.

The OECD makes predictions that if the member countries reduced support, which reduction distorts international trade through producer and consumer subsidies, there would not be very great harm to the sector. However, the key to it is that the various countries involved in these subsidization policies must withdraw those subsidies together, because if one is out of step with the other, that one will have an advantage and the whole system will not work.

The report of the OECD is very long. In fact, its summary is 100 pages long. I am, perhaps, not doing it justice by making these brief comments, but I wanted to mention its existence and to highlight its importance. I also point out that there has been an update of that report as of this month.

Another aspect of this ongoing initiative is evidenced by a conference sponsored by Agriculture Canada and put on by the Canadian Institute for Resource Law on Decoupling in February of this year, at which many papers were presented. No final declaration of that conference has been published, because the purpose of the conference was to air the issue, and not to determine finally what should be done.

● (1450)

Another example of this ongoing discussion was the World Food Conference to which the deputy chairman and I, as chairman of the committee, were invited. Unfortunately, the deputy chairman was unable to attend, but Senator Rossiter attended in his place. The conference took place on April 7 and 8 in Brussels. This topic was one of the primary points of discussion, and the discussion was expanded to include not only the problem of the trade war but the effect that the trade war is having on developing and under-developed countries. In a few words, the mischief that is occurring there is that because of very low commodity prices in international markets the agriculture of developing and under-developed countries is suffering. There is no incentive for them to develop their own agriculture when commodity prices are so low internationally. The next example of this ongoing discussion I would draw to the attention of senators is a declaration entitled "Reforming World Agricultural Trade", which was published last week. It represents work carried out by the Institute for Research on Public Policy, located in Canada, and the Institute for International Economics, located in the United States. This declaration or report represents a consensus statement of 29 agricultural and international trade experts drawn from 17 countries. I am sure that the work done by this particular group not only here in Canada but throughout the world will be of some considerable assistance in the ongoing debate on the difficulties we face in the agricultural sector.

The other important thing to mention in this context is the Economic Summit in Toronto next month. This forthcoming summit has and the two previous ones had on their agenda this particular topic. It is receiving attention at the Uruguay round of talks on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Canada, of course, has independent initiatives, through the Cairns Group, with other countries. We list these efforts under the heading "decoupling" in our report. Though we do not go into too much detail, we do indicate that perhaps this could be the topic of a possible future study by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or some other committee, in terms of tying together the themes that seem to be coming out of these various policy-development type initiatives. That is, we can no longer continue to subsidize and assist agriculture in the way we have traditionally done so because we are causing too many problems internationally. So we have to revise the manner in which we help agriculture.

I leave with honourable senators a couple of comments on what is going on in Canada. For instance, I am very concerned that, under the present government, clearly decoupled assistance to help with research and development is being reduced. We have seen a drop in the moneys made available by way of operating expenditures for agricultural research. In 1986-87 the amount available in constant dollars was $58 million. In 1984-85 the amount was $69.1 million. This trend is not desirable in that if we are going to help agriculture, this is the kind of assistance we should be considering and increasing. Another thing this government is doing that concerns me is imposing user fees, which involve in almost all cases reduced income to the farm sector. There are ways of helping the farm sector in this policy-development context that are not coupled to commodity production or are not commodity specific, and we should be emphasizing them. Farm credit is another area of clearly decoupled assistance. Thus, I think the government should give the recommendations of the committee serious consideration. That concludes the general comments I wanted to make.

I would like to return to one area of the report, that being the recommendation that further assistance be given to Canadian agriculture to develop better management information. I raise this point because matters have come to my attention recently through the press which tend to reinforce what it is the committee had in mind when it suggested that the government assist with management information. One such item is an article in The Manitoba Co-operator dated April 28, 1988, the very day we tabled our report. The article talks about a survey done by some post-graduate students of farmers who failed in the year 1985. They surveyed 67 of 162 farmers who went out of business that year. Some interesting statistics came to light. The average age of those who went out of business was 40 years. The average debt was $279,000. One of the people involved in the study is quoted in the article as saying:

—lenders did make mistakes but are not totally to blame for farmers going broke.

The lenders are the banks. The article goes on:

The banks admit they made mistakes and are sharing the blame... But farmers made mistakes relying on the lender. Both sides lost track of the downside and how to track risk.

Further on in the article one of the authors of the survey said:

—he was horrified by the poor financial records kept by the survey group. Thirty per cent were rated as severely limited in responding to record keeping.

—only one or two had good records.

Another example of how to keep good records and of how to provide support to assist farmers in developing good records, which are the basis of good management information, is the experience under the Ontario Red Meat Plan. They now have evidence which shows that those who weighed their cattle, as part of the program to assist farmers in developing management information, increased their productivity and efficiency by 6 to 10 per cent. There are many other examples of how good management will assist farmers. The last one I will mention is the 1986 Ontario Farm Management Analysis Project which studied hog operations. It found that the most efficient producers had annual profits $36,000 higher than the average for the group and $48,000 higher than the lower two-thirds of hog farms surveyed.

So we in the Agriculture Committee believe that this is an important initiative, and we hope that it will be pursued by the government. The government has not ignored this matter. The Government of Canada and the provinces, through their extension services, do help in this area. In fact, the Prime Minister, in his announcement last December, indicated that some $13 million would be made available to assist in this effort. We were very pleased to see that initiative, but there is much more that can be done to assist in the development of good management information.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to take a few minutes, first, to commend the committee, particularly the chairman and the deputy chairman, for taking the time and making the effort to put together this report. I know that a great deal of time and hard work were needed to attend all the committee meetings and to hear the witnesses. The committee travelled to various parts of Canada and to Washington to study this problem of the farm credit crisis, and the members are to be commended for their work. I think the committee has done an excellent job in many respects, and I am not sure that we could have—however long we might have studied this matter—come up with a set of recommendations that would solve all the problems inherent in this farm credit crisis.

Honourable senators, when we set out on this task, my main interest was to see if we could come up with an accurate reading of the magnitude of the problem. We had heard that 30 per cent or 35 per cent of farmers were in serious difficulty respecting the debt service charges they had to pay. We heard other figures from the Farm Credit Corporation. In talking to the chartered banks, yet another set of figures would be used in terms of who was near bankruptcy, who was in serious difficulty, and who only had too high a cost and could probably survive. I think the study carried out by this committee did, in fact, give us a better picture of how serious the problem was and the extent of its magnitude. The committee could have continued its study for months more, but I do not think there would be total agreement on how serious and how widespread the problem might be.

Honourable senators, one other thing came through loud and clear to me, and that is that there are a lot of good people, good farmers, out there who are caught and who got caught in the inflationary spiral from about 1977 or 1978 up until 1982 or 1983, or until the worldwide depression came along. Having made investments and having acquired capital assets, mostly in the form of land, but including equipment and other things, they are caught to the point where they simply cannot survive if they are going to be asked to pay all of the debt service charges that go with the inflated prices of the land they purchased at that time. For example, there are thousands of farmers with hundreds of thousands, or perhaps even millions, of acres that, today, are worth less than half what they paid for them. Those people have signed their names to a note and they are continuing to pay the interest charges.

Honourable senators, another thing came through—and I do not know what we can do about it, because it is terribly sad and unfair—and that is that some financial institutions have a rule that if you are behind in making payments, they do not reduce the interest rate. I know of some farmers who are still paying interest rates as high as 18 per cent because they were in arrears. Of course, 18 per cent was the rate of interest in those days, in 1981 or 1982, when they took out the loan. We should do something about that. I sincerely believe that the government ought to take some action in that respect, because not to do something guarantees that those people will go under. As I said, they are good farmers. Their husbandry and ability to look after the land and to make it produce is excellent. Surely, honourable senators, we either have the ingenuity or we can develop the capacity to deal with the credit requirements of those people, and not throw them out on the road allowance and really wreck their lives, because that is, in fact, the consequence of bankruptcy and turning a farmer off his land. What happens is that they go to town and live in poverty or on welfare, because in many cases, while they are good farmers, they do not have any skills to do anything else. I think we should really look into this and find some way of dealing with the problem.

Honourable senators, I am not suggesting that that will be easy. I know there are consequences of intervening. Some banks that would otherwise stay in the agriculture lending business may be driven off because of government restrictions which may mean that they cannot collect on certain assets. Although I was not old enough to be involved at the time, some members of my family went through that. In the late 1920s and early 1930s the banks withdrew their lending to agriculture across Canada. The old Farm Loan Board was set up about 50 years ago because nobody was making credit available to farmers. That was as a result of the experience they had had. As I say, I am only going by what I have heard from some people who were involved and from people who went before me.

Honourable senators, I predict that unless we can get this matter sorted out that situation will arise again. The banks will back off all lending to, for example, the cereal grain industry. I think they are in that situation now, in terms of the tobacco growers, because, as you know, that market has gone down and the prices are nowhere near what farmers enjoyed some time ago.

Honourable senators, I think the committee has done some good work to delineate the problem and I hope we can do something about it.

I suppose another lesson that most people indicated they had learned—unfortunately, every generation seems to have to learn that lesson—is that when you buy capital assets and you set the price or you come to an agreed price, if that is the right term, you should do it on the basis of the production and the revenue from that production so that you may be able to pay off or amortize the debt. Unfortunately, that is not what happened. What happened for several years was that people paid prices, for example, in 1978, if you like, because they figured prices were going to be higher in 1979 and still higher in 1980. They felt they should buy immediately because it would cost them more later on. Furthermore, what they did not realize, and what people in the western world could not have anticipated, was that there would be a tremendous increase in interest charges.

I believe we have to set up some kind of arrangement to save as many of those farmers as we possibly can. I think we should lean over backwards to make the effort. I also believe that we are going to be faced with further situations like this one. The grain farmers are the ones who are now in the worst difficulty, because in 1976, for example, farmers in southern Alberta received $6.40 a bushel for their durum wheat. Today the price is less than $3 a bushel. Can you tell me of any other industry that has had its revenue cut in half and its costs increased by more than 100 per cent and which has still been able to break even? I am sure you cannot.

Senator Frith: Or survive.

Senator Olson: Of course they are not going to survive unless we do something about it.

Honourable senators, I do not want to get into a discussion of the Free Trade Agreement, but there will be many more farmers in severe financial difficulty because of something over which they have absolutely no control. I could mention the people in the horticultural industry, for example, if and when we get to the situation where we have the trading arrangements that are in the so-called Free Trade Agreement with the United States.

• (1510)

Another group is the grape growers. They really believe that they will have to go out of business and find some alternative use for their land.

I do not wish to argue the Free Trade Agreement now, but I know that the farmers who are caught in that situation really wonder what they are going to do—and they had nothing to do with depressing the market.

The tobacco growers know very well that there is no other crop that comes anywhere near providing the amount of return per acre that was received from growing tobacco six, eight or ten years ago. Yet, they still have land payments to make that were based on that kind of revenue.

That situation will apply in the horticultural industry, and it will certainly apply in connection with the vineyards, which will have to be ploughed up because there is no satisfactory market for the grapes. I know of no other crop, and neither do they, that can be put on that land and which will provide anywhere near the same return that was received from supplying grapes to the Canadian wine industry.

Senator Hays referred to the banks and quoted from an article which indicated that the banks now share some of the blame for having lent so much money in those inflationary times. But the banks are not sharing in the cost of it, except in those cases where the whole operation goes into bankruptcy, when they too bear a loss. But for those farmers who are still trying to make their payments the banks are not reducing their interest charges, nor are they writing off any of the principal that is involved. So "Thanks a lot for sharing in the blame. How about sharing in the cost, too, if you accept part of the blame?" That is what I would say to some of the bankers.

Oh, my, they would back away from any write-downs. That has something to do with the bankers' bible: You never reduce the principal in a debt, no matter who it is. They told us that over and over again. They don't want any of that. You can reschedule and do all kinds of other things, but no write-downs.

Honourable senators, on land where someone has paid $800 per acre and its productivity warrants that it should be only $400 per acre—because that is all that it can support in terms of what it can produce—then I suggest it should go down to $400 if we want those farmers to either survive or be reasonably prosperous.

There has been no volunteering that I have heard from the financial industry to go that distance. We know what it has done to the Farm Credit Corporation. It is bankrupt, I guess, by all the usual accounting procedures. I think the government should get involved in this for reasons that I explained before, because a whole lot of people are going to be hurt—and I do not think it is a responsible thing to do, to throw those people in the trash can. We need to do things that will allow them to do what they are best able to do, particularly in the situation in which they find themselves, because it is not of their doing that they have been caught in this terrible situation.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments on the excellent submissions made by the committee, and particularly on the prudent and well thought out commentaries made by my chairman and by Senator Olson, whose advice in these matters is almost like looking back to Shakespearean and Cartesian logic. Those senators are experienced in the agricultural industry. The first honourable gentleman is not only a practitioner of law but he is also a very well known farmer and cattleman in Alberta; and the other honourable gentleman, of similar nature, commands the respect of everyone in the southeast corner, at least, of Alberta.

I agree, as we all agreed, that it was demonstrated to us in committee that this is a human and industrial tragedy that we are experiencing at the present time in the farming communities, particularly in the grain area—although Senator Olson mentioned also the grape farmers and also the tobacco farmers in the Simcoe County area.

Indeed, it is a tragedy. I am rather hard-hearted about this, but as I listened to the presentation of testimony I became aware that too many good, young, well educated, technically efficient and capable farmers were in terrible trouble and would, or could, be lost to this important Canadian industry unless something was done to alleviate the present situation. That is the group to whom we should show some dedication lest they be lost to the farming industry and, as was said, be driven into the cities, perhaps to come to grief—or occasionally to become president of Imperial Oil, or some such position, although that, of course, is a rarity!

It is those young, efficient, well educated farmers, who understand the situation, upon whom the industry should be dependent for the next 20 or 30 years for technological progress.

If we do not do something to help them—and as the rest of the population, who as members of an older age group, have, perhaps, paid off their farms over the years and are able to carry on—we shall have an increasingly older group left on the farms and there will be no one to succeed them. That would be a tragedy for this great industry, which at one time sustained not only Canada, as its leading industry—and perhaps even does so to this day—but sustained the world with food for many generations.

To analyze the situation in its ultimate, there is nothing wrong with Canada's grain farming industry today that $7 wheat would not cure.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: But we are not going to get $7 wheat; so we must look to other ways of solving this.

In the foreseeable future, from what I have seen and learned, we will not get to that wonderful day until the United States and the European Economic Community stop squabbling over who is going to subsidize their farmers the most to sell and export their wheat—and I do not see an immediate solution to that in the next year or two. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us, as citizens, if we want this industry to survive—and it is incumbent upon governments in general, and perhaps this government in particular—to do what we can to alleviate the present crisis situation. We have to do that in the short term while we are planning for the medium and longer term. We must do something for the immediate salvation of the industry before we can talk about any long-term economic prosperity for the industry.

There is no doubt, as was pointed out by Senator Olson and others concerning the economic factors, that there has been some intemperate borrowing and some stupid lending, all of it based on the man-made characteristic of greed—greed by the purchaser in the belief that the value of his land will continue to rise, and that the price of his product will also continue to rise; and greed on the part of the lender, particularly the private lender, based on the fact that the rising price of land will justify a larger loan and better earnings.

• (1520)

Then we fell into that dreadful situation—and I do not want to blame anyone, but I look at the chairs opposite—of 22 per cent interest rates and, at the same time, a drop in the price of grain from $6.50 for soft wheat to $3.00, and from $5.80 for hard wheat to $2.70. Where does that leave the system? You have wrecked the whole system; you have wrecked the system for the farmer growing the grain, and you have also wrecked the system for the lender, because he has no way of recovering on his loan because the equity the farmer has left in the land is no longer $800 an acre—which is the amount he borrowed, hoping it would go to $1000 or $1200 an acre—it is $300 or $400, which does not even cover the cost of the original loan. In other words, the asset is gone and the farmer is wiped out. So, we must do something about that.

We cannot do very much with the private lenders because, as was pointed out, there is still such a thing as contract law in this country, and all a bank can do is take the land over, with the land not worth as much as it was when the loan was made.

I have found in the past that bankers make very poor farmers and that they are unable to work the land as well as the farmers. So bankers are reluctant to seize the land. If they do, they beg the farmer to come back to work it. They become the landlords and lease the farms to the original owners. That is one of the solutions.

But for all the reasons that my honourable friends have outlined there is no doubt in my mind that we require and deserve a shakedown in the basic economy of our farms and farmland. That is coming; we cannot avoid that. But with that shakedown I pray that those good, young and efficient farmers of whom we spoke will somehow be offered the opportunity to remain on the land to make it productive and to be able to give us another generation of efficient farmers. That, I think, is going to be one of the mainstays.

Senator Hays spoke about MIS, Management Information Systems. We did have quite a discussion about that. I suppose that if you are one of those farmers of whom I spoke, a field husbandry graduate from the University of Alberta or the University of Saskatchewan, you would understand the use of all of these highly advanced information systems, but we also have many farmers who are not yet capable of utilizing these aspects of modern technology. I suppose I am hard-hearted enough to believe that if a person is investing his own money in an enterprise he should have the luxury of being able to go bankrupt on his own and because of his own mistakes, but when a person is borrowing money from a private lender, such as a bank, I do believe, as Senator Hays has pointed out, that it is incumbent upon the lender to satisfy himself that the borrower is competent enough to utilize the mortgage or the loan in such a way that not only can he repay the interest but he can repay the principal as well. That is good business for a bank. If the bank is not doing that, it should suffer.

But there is one area where that does not apply, and that is in the area of taxpayers' money being lent by an institution such as the Farm Credit Corporation. That is an institution of the government and is a lender, perhaps at times a lender of last resort, serving not only as a bank for farmers on a long-term basis but also to fulfil, perhaps, a social obligation of the government. The Farm Credit Corporation officials did not have the obligation put on them that before they lent Farmer Brown his money they should ensure that he had a management information system and was fully competent to utilize the loan of $200,000 or $300,000 of public moneys. That is not private money, but public money, taxpayers' money.

I say there is some virtue in the future where we can lay that cudgel on the Farm Credit Corporation so that when the Farm Credit Corporation is advancing these large sums of money to farmers—public money, taxpayers' money—that the officials of that corporation will have to say, "Look here, Joe, before we go ahead with this we want to satisfy ourselves that you have a system of management, a system of information, a retrieval of that information, to satisfy us, the FCC, a government agency, that we are, indeed, utilizing this money not only to your best advantage but to the best advantage of the institution, which is a government agency, and to the best advantage of the people of Canada, who are the ones who are in fact advancing the money."

I think there is some virtue in that, and it took some persuasion to bring me around to accept that somebody should be able to tell a businessman or a farmer that this kind of information capability must be proven before any money is lent. I still believe that when a person is using his or her own money in an investment, be it in a hat shop, a flower shop, a farm, or any other business, that person should have the luxury of being able to go bankrupt because of his or her own mistakes.

We tried to touch on this new word "decoupling." Every year or two in this country new words come along. We had the "global village" brought to our attention 30 or 40 years ago by Marshall McLuhan. We do get what become zip words of the day. The new word today in agriculture is "decoupling."

Senator Frith: What is it?

Senator Barootes: Since you looked quizzically at me, Senator Frith, I will say that I thought "decoupling" might have related to divorce among farm families, but that is not the case.

Senator Frith: My mind ran more along grammatical lines. Why not "uncoupling"?

Senator Barootes: You would rather have "uncoupling."

Senator Frith: Why "decoupling"?

Senator Barootes: Because there are two parts; they want to decouple—that is, divorce, if that is the word—the benefit being given by government programs from a specific commodity-related thing, and that is why it is "decoupling."

The idea is to advance moneys to a person who is growing, for example, mustard seed, which seems to be a favourite of Senator Olson's. The idea is to help mustard seed growers. If we gave $20 a bushel extra for mustard seed nobody would grow wheat, but we do not want to skew the marketplace and the productivity and the production levels of a certain commodity by a grains program or an assistance program that levers it towards the one product. We got into this a little, but not enough for us to be able to make a definitive statement, although the chairman of the committee has attended several important conferences and supplied the members of the committee with several pounds of material on this. But we will come around to this. I think this is something we must look at.

● (1530)

In the meantime, may I say that other than specific programs—particularly in hogs, eggs and milk, which are special programs that some people support and some people do not—our Special Grains Program this year was partially decoupled, because it allowed 12 various grains to be included in the grains program. The government did not tell the farmers they had to grow soft wheat or hard wheat or oats or barley or rye, but it included 12 grains. Therefore, there was no undue influence on the production management choices being made by the farmer. I think decoupling is of some help to the farmer, although there is not total decoupling.

On the other hand, one has to be careful that the farmers are not insulted by decoupling to the extent that you are handing out grants. I think they resent that. I do not think they like handouts. I know the American farmers told us they do not accept subsidies, although about 60 per cent of their revenue comes from the government. According to them, that is not a subsidy.

So we must look for ways of doing this without insulting the farmer. Perhaps special grains programs of this nature is one way; another way is acreage payments, but that also has shortcomings, as we found out a few years ago. We should look for solutions for decoupling and for assistance in the next few years that could be a salvation for the present and allow us to build on medium to long-term survival in the farms.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Barootes if he would agree with the interpretation of my attempt to have the mustard growers included in the program. The decoupling that he talks about is there, but we do not want the government to be uncoupled from the address of mustard growers when they issue the cheques for the acreage involved. While I do not agree with the conclusion of his arguments about decoupling, I think there is a validity to them.

On motion of Senator Fairbairn, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "Child Benefits—Proposal for a Guaranteed Family Supplement Scheme", tabled in the Senate on June 30, 1987.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I imagine you have been very anxious to hear what I have to say about this particular item which I have stood so many times in recent months. I will now try to respond to your expectations which, so far, you have expressed very discreetly. First of all, I would like to explain why the debate on this subject was postponed so many times.

When we tabled the report in June, the committee was not planning to start the debate immediately, for two reasons. First, at the time we were all under the impression that the Senate would adjourn as usual for the summer, which, as you know, did not happen. However, we thought that would be the case and that we could continue consideration of this matter in September or October.

The second reason was that when we examined Bill C-70 on family allowances, most of the witnesses we heard at the time mentioned the problems that Bill C-70 might raise within a much broader context.

With the consent of my committee colleagues, I asked them the following question: If the committee were to pursue its study of child benefits from a broader perspective, would you be interested in expressing your views before the committee? The reaction was unanimous: they would be most interested in discussing and examining a report on child benefits prepared by the committee with a more comprehensive approach.

After the report was tabled, I wrote to forty-eight groups and private citizens who had previously appeared before the committee, sending them a copy of the report and asking them to let us know what they thought about the report's recommendations, especially the proposal for a guaranteed family supplement scheme.

I must say, quite frankly, that by early October I had received only one reply. My conclusion was that we should at least send a reminder to the people to whom we had written so far. I wrote a second letter asking them to let me know whether they intended to respond to our recommendations. The response was not exactly overwhelming and we received exactly six replies.

Considering the time factor, I will dispense with reading all the names on the list. Among those who replied were the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Canadian Teachers Federation. I think it is not an exaggeration to say that the quality of the respondents compensated for the quantity.

Before speaking about their reactions to our report, I think that I should summarize very briefly for you the main points of the principal recommendations contained in them.

Essentially, the committee first proposed an objective that serves as a guiding principle, namely that the child benefit system be restructured so as to channel a larger share of child benefits to needier families. That was our fundamental objective or principle, if you prefer.

It then proposed that these funds be so channeled by increasing what is now called the tax credit. It proposed also that the new benefit be called the guaranteed family income supplement from now on. This term seems to us to correspond more closely to the reality of what the tax credit is: an amount of money given to families with an income below a certain level. Entitlement is determined from the tax returns of the families concerned.

In the last two years, we have even gone so far as to give advance payments in the fall, thus dividing the tax credit in two, one payment in the fall and another after the tax return is filed.

Senator Frith: Decoupling!

Senator Tremblay: It was still very important for the families involved because when they received their tax credit only in the spring, they used to go to finance or similar companies who bought tax credit from them in February, for example, at fairly high interest rates. A fall payment helped ease this problem.

All this was called a tax credit over the years because it had something to do with the income tax return, I suppose. In fact, it is a sort of supplement paid to families who need it based on their tax return, similar to the so-called old age pension supplements. Nevertheless, I point this out because many of those who wrote to us expressed concern about the way the tax credit is administered. It is all calculated based on the tax return, which adds nothing from the administrative point of view.

The expression "tax credit" does not really describe the reality of the situation. That is why we prefer to speak of a guaranteed family income supplement, along the same lines as the tax credit, that is oriented mainly to the least well-off families.

Having said that, which is mostly a matter of definition, the key point is that the guaranteed family income supplement for the neediest families will be even greater because it will combine a larger number of benefits now in place.

This is where different views were expressed in committee. Some members would have been prepared to include in the new supplement four of the current benefits corresponding to the equivalent of the tax credit, the child tax credit, the exemption for a married person—which of course applies in the case of a single-parent family—and the family allowances. Other members would have been prepared to put the total of these four benefits under what we call the guaranteed family income. Still other members would agree to the first three, meaning they would maintain the family allowance program as is.

That is the thrust of the report. Given the position taken by our committee, what was the reaction of the people who responded to the invitation I sent them and to which I referred a moment ago?

Here are two of them: that of National Council of Welfare Director Ken Battle, and that of the Canadian Teachers' Federation.

Here is Mr. Battle's reply of March this year to the letter I sent him last year. It is a very short quotation.

[English]

I did, in fact, read your report soon after you sent me a copy. I found it very enlightening and helpful in my own analysis of child benefits, and I hope that my two appearances before your committee contributed to your work in this important policy area.

In fact, I think we were, at least in part, influenced by his testimony.

Obviously a great deal of work went into the report on the part of your members and staff.

In other words, I have the feeling that, substantially, he does agree with the basic thrust of the report.

[Translation]

The Canadian Teachers Federation does not entirely agree with this view. Its position is summarized as follows, on the basis of a very detailed brief.

[English]

1. Universality must be ensured. All families, irrespective of income level, must continue to receive a basic level of assistance at least equal to an indexed family allowance . . .

2. Child benefits programs should provide greater advantage to poor families through income distribution from wealthier families and, in particular, from the business and corporate sector.

3. Child benefits programs should not be construed or evaluated separately from a universally-accessible, high-quality publicly-funded child care system.

4. The total amount of money spent by the federal government on established programs to benefit families and children must not be reduced.

[Translation]

That was, substantially, a summary of the position taken by the Canadian Teachers Federation. In fact, the text I just read was part of the federation's brief.

To be perfectly fair, I should add that the position taken by the Canadian Teachers Federation more or less reflects the views of the other intervenors who replied to our letter. On the whole, there is strong emphasis on the universality of family allowances, and on maintaining them in their present form. On the other hand, as indicated in the stand taken by the Canadian Teachers Federation, respondents indicated that at the same time, more should be done for poor families.

The question is, how to reconcile the two? How can we at the same time enhance child benefits so as to provide most and preferably all needy families with a basic level of assistance, while maintaining the universality of certain benefits, and do so without putting an undue burden on the community?

That is the dilemma we are facing, the fact that we have some difficult choices to make regarding the kind of society we want, a dilemma that the committee, I may point out, was unable to resolve, since opinions were divided between the two financing options available.

Despite all the uncertainty and hesitation about the financing of the proposed guaranteed family supplement scheme, I think we can say that the committee's report reflects a major concern and that is the need for restructuring child benefits with the emphasis on families whose incomes are below the poverty line. In this respect, I believe the report submitted by the committee makes a positive and worthwhile contribution.

We are particularly indebted to our colleagues, Senators Robertson and Marsden, who directed the work of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology responsible for drafting the report. My most cordial thanks!

I also wish to thank Maureen Baker and Marion Wrobel of the Research Branch at the Library of Parliament. Their co-operation, diligence and thorough research are largely responsible for the contents of the report and its recommendations, as I am sure you will realize when you read the report. In fact, the main part consists of a number of very precise analyses based on very reliable data.

In concluding, honourable senators, the document we are about to discuss is, I believe, a significant and valid contribution to the study of an issue that is important to society as a whole. However, it is only a first step, and as far as I am concerned, I hope that the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will go beyond this first step. After our dialogue in the days and weeks to come, I hope the committee will have an opportunity to continue its consideration of a subject of this particular significance and scope. There is a possibility, and it is certainly not unlikely, that it might be given this opportunity, considering the notice given by Senator Robertson this afternoon of a motion she will be presenting next Tuesday. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 17, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Phillips and I have discussed possible business for tomorrow. There is very little government business, because we have put a good deal of it over until the first of next week, so we will have plenty to do next week on the legislative front. There are no orders standing in the names of opposition senators to be spoken to tomorrow. Therefore, we support this motion.

I should add, perhaps on behalf of Senator Phillips but certainly for myself, that, of course, those committees that have scheduled meetings should hold them, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate will not be sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 17, 1988, at 2 p.m.

- (b) Strike out line 16 and substitute the following:

This amendment would provide that the decision to exclude a person from the refugee determination process would be made by the Minister personally, in view of the potential seriousness to the individual of the consequences of the exclusion. It is intended that the Minister will weigh those consequences with the degree of risk the person might pose to Canada.

This amendment would broaden the "transit" provision relating to safe country return and would provide that the mode of transportation used by a claimant to Canada would not be relevant to the question of whether or not the person was in transit through the country.

Part (a) of this amendment is consequential on amendment number 9 which would remove the requirement for leave to appeal in applications taken under section 18 of the Federal Court Act. Part (b) would increase the period of time that the execution of a removal order would be stayed from 24 to 72 hours. It would affect removal orders made as a result of a claim being found to be either ineligible or to lack a credible basis at the inquiry.

7. Page 31, clause 18: Add, immediately after line 11, the following:

"67.1 Subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, the Chairman, in consultation with the Deputy Chairman and Assistant Deputy Chairmen, (Convention Refugee Determination Division), may make regulations prescribing, for the purposes of paragraph 48.01 (1) (b), any country as a country that complies with Article 33 of the Convention either universally or with respect to persons of a specified class of persons, having regard to whether the country is a party to the Convention, the country's policies and practices with respect to Convention refugee claims, and the record of that country with regard to human rights."

This amendment would give the power to prescribe the safe country list to the Chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

"(13) If the Refugee Division determines that a claimant is not a Convention refugee, the Refugee Division may make a finding that there exist humanitarian or compassionate considerations in the claimant's case and may advise the Minister of that fact."

This amendment would permit the Refugee Division to identify for the Minister any case where the Refugee Division finds the existence of humanitarian or compassionate considerations.

This amendment would remove the requirement that leave be obtained for applications commenced under section 18 of the Federal Court Act.

This amendment would broaden the jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Appeal in relation to appeals from decisions of the Refugee Division. It would ensure that the merits of the refugee claim could be considered on appeal.
11. Page 55, clause 29: Strike out lines 15 to 27.

This amendment would remove from the Governor in Council the power to prescribe the safe country list.

This amendment would provide that members of the present Immigration Appeal Board would be appointed to the new Board for the unexpired period of their current terms. It would also recognize the principle of just compensation by removing the "no right to compensation" provision.

  - (c) Strike out lines 47 and 48 on page 59 and lines 1 to 9 on page 60.

PART II

Observations

The purpose of Bill C-55 is to reform the system by which claims made by individuals within Canada to be Convention refugees are assessed. There is general agreement among those knowledgeable and concerned with the issues that the current system for determining refugee claims is not adequate and, indeed, has virtually broken down. Devising a system to replace it, however, has led to much controversy and heated debate between the government as the proponent of the Bill and a broad spectrum of groups opposed to the general approach and the specific measures the Bill contains.

Church groups, refugee aid organizations, immigration lawyers, human rights organizations, constitutional law experts, law associations, officials currently deciding refugee claims, and private citizens have opposed Bill C-55. In examining the Bill, the Committee has heard both sides of the debate in great detail. We received over 200 briefs, heard personal testimony from 114 witnesses from every region of Canada, and held public hearings in Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver. Both the former and the current Minister addressed the Committee, as did departmental officials on several occasions.

Bill C-55 is a complex piece of legislation. Refugee determination is a complex problem and the competing views on how it should be handled are widely divergent. While a number of members of our Committee remain critical of the general approach of the Bill, we have concluded that the overall structure chosen by the government should be left intact, but that amendments are necessary to provide greater protection for claimants.

RETURN TO A SAFE COUNTRY

1. Safeguards

The major target of criticism from virtually all witnesses before the Committee was the "safe country" provision of Bill C-55. Witnesses criticized both the concept and the mechanism on many counts and argued that it could put genuine refugees at risk. We are particularly concerned that the provisions as they stand may violate the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Section 7 of the Charter provides that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty or security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. We are concerned that the minimal safeguards presently in the Bill relating to the safe country return might be fewer than the Charter requires.

As noted, the Committee searched for a means of addressing this concern without changing the basic structure of the system proposed in Bill C-55. We are aware that most of the witnesses we heard would prefer to have no screening at all. The Committee understands this view and is sympathetic to it, yet has concluded that our role should be to suggest safeguards that will improve the screen, not, in effect, design a new model. We accept that where people have received protection - and will continue to receive it - in another country, they may quite properly be requested to return there. Our amendments reflect the view, however, that great speed and impersonal treatment might not always be compatible with the rights guaranteed in the Charter.

The Committee's most fundamental objection to these provisions is that the Bill provides no formal mechanism to examine the fate of people to be returned to the safe third country. It is one thing to decide that certain countries are "safe" in the abstract, but quite another to decide that a particular person will actually be accepted by a country and not immediately sent elsewhere. When the decision to return a person to a safe country is being made, nothing less than the life, liberty and security of that person may be at stake. When the consequences of Canada's decisions are so serious, the Committee is reluctant to accept an approach which does not explicitly address this fundamental question.

We do not feel that it is satisfactory to look only at a particular country's record of compliance with Article 33 of the Convention, which is all that the Bill now requires. European countries, for example, may not return claimants to their country of origin but may have a very different opinion from Canada concerning which other countries may be "safe." Our Committee received considerable evidence of the practices of other countries and of the resulting dangers to individuals. Returning people to other countries, from where they might be sent onward to still other "safe" countries (so defined by that other country), and perhaps ultimately returned to the country where they fear persecution may, in our opinion, violate their right to security of the person guaranteed by the Charter. Where refoulement does occur, of course, the very essence and purpose of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees has also been violated.

The Committee has concluded that the safe country provisions as they appeared in the first reading version of the Bill contained the minimum protections essential for compliance with the Charter and our international obligations under the Convention. That version provided for return to a safe country only if the Refugee Division member and adjudicator at the inquiry were convinced that the claimant "would be allowed to return to that country, if removed from Canada, or has a right to have the claim determined therein."

The Committee is aware that the wording of those provisions was criticized in the past by people who felt that the words "allowed to return" might be read too narrowly. The Committee thinks that the wording should be modified to indicate that merely being allowed to arrive in the country is not a sufficient safeguard for claimants. We propose that the adjudicator and Refugee Division member should be satisfied that the safe country will be willing to receive the claimant. This formulation implies a degree of commitment on the part of the safe country that may have been lacking in the original wording. The right to have a claim determined in the safe country was also controversial because critics pointed to the fact that the "safe" country might merely process the claimant on to another "safe" country, thereby "determining" the claim. The Committee has attempted to overcome this defect in the former wording by specifying that the determination must be on the merits of the claim.

The result of these changes is that Canada should be assured that claimants returned under the safe country provisions will, in fact, be safe because they will only be returned to a country that is willing to receive them or in which they will be permitted to have their refugee claims decided on the merits. The danger that they would be put into orbit or sent to yet a further country would thus be minimized. These changes are found in amendment 3.

2. Transit

Bill C-55 provides that a claimant who was in a safe country solely for the purpose of joining a connecting flight to Canada shall not be considered as coming to Canada from that country and, therefore, could not be returned there. This is a very narrow transit rule. For example, if connecting flights to Canada left every two days from the safe country in question, a stopover of three days might mean that the claimant could be returned there. If this were the case, it might be unduly stringent.

The Committee is also concerned that because travel by air is mentioned specifically, by implication other forms of transit through a country would not be covered. For example, a Central American who had travelled overland through the United States would not be able to avoid being returned there even though he or she had been merely transiting the country.

The Committee has concluded that the transit rule should be broadened to cover all modes of transportation and to recognize that whether a person has been in transit through a safe country is a question that depends on the circumstances of the individual. Amendment 5 contains this change.

3. The List

The Committee is concerned about the fact that Bill C-55 provides for the safe country list to be drawn up by Cabinet. Witnesses pointed out that having the list formulated by Cabinet might bring refugee issues into the political arena. The presence of countries on, or their absence from, the list would involve official and public judgments by Canada on the conduct of those countries. This could influence the compilation of the list, particularly if sufficient regard is not given to refugee protection issues, which should be the most important criteria. We submit that the list should be made by those most expert in refugee matters, that is, the Chairman of the proposed Immigration and Refugee Board in consultation with the Deputy Chairman and the Assistant Deputy Chairmen of the Refugee Division. The Committee would expect, and strongly recommends, that those individuals would also consult with the Departments of External Affairs and Employment and Immigration, as well as representatives of church and other humanitarian groups, legal experts and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

The Committee has also noted that the criteria for the prescription of safe countries may be unduly limited. The clause enabling the safe country list to be prescribed provides that countries may be put on the list if they comply with Article 33 of the Convention "having regard to whether the country is a party to the Convention and the country's policies and practices with respect to Convention refugee claims." These considerations are important but the Committee would be reassured if one further requirement could be added.

We note that the original Bill contained the instruction that the Cabinet should also have regard to "the record of that country with respect to human rights." We propose that this protection be reinserted into the Bill. It should serve as a check against the inclusion of any country on the list whose protection of refugees may be adequate but whose general record of human rights gives us sufficient pause to be reluctant to return people there. Amendments 7 and 11 reflect these changes.

SINGLE CHANCE TO CLAIM

Many witnesses pointed out to the Committee the potentially serious consequences to claimants of what has been called the "single chance to claim" provision. Before any substantive evidence can be taken at an inquiry, the adjudicator must give the person involved an opportunity to indicate whether or not the person claims to be a Convention refugee. If the person does not claim then, he or she cannot do so at any later point. In cases where a claim is made, the Refugee Division member joins the inquiry. The Refugee Division member listens to the immigration part of the inquiry and then participates with the adjudicator in the refugee screening decisions.

Witnesses pointed out the stringency in requiring a person to claim immediately or lose the right. At this early point, the person may be too frightened or too upset to be able to respond. The claimant could have problems understanding either the question itself, or the implications of the question. Refugee aid groups pointed out that some claimants will initially fear any representatives of the state. Some may be uncertain about making a claim for fear that their statements may not be kept from their own governments.

The Committee agrees that the foregoing would be valid and understandable reasons for claimants to remain silent about their fear of being returned to the country of origin, even when explicitly asked. We note that the Executive Committee of the United Nations High Commissioner's Programme recommends that non-fulfillment of a formal requirement such as submitting an asylum request within a certain time limit should not lead to the request being excluded from consideration. The Committee thinks that the single chance to claim provision is very similar to a time limit.

There are a number of ways that this problem with Bill C-55 could be remedied. We have chosen to recommend that a claim may be made at a later point in the inquiry. If claimants could establish that the failure to claim resulted from a misunderstanding of the nature or consequences of the claim or from a well-founded fear for themselves or their families, then the adjudicator could allow the claim to be made. This provision would thus provide an important safety valve for claimants. Amendment 2 reflects this proposal.

COUNSEL

Bill C-55 recognizes that the opportunity to be represented by counsel is an essential ingredient of the principles of fundamental justice, yet the way in which these provisions are structured raises certain questions. Legal counsel will be provided at an inquiry for claimants, at the Minister's expense, if the person has no counsel or if, in the opinion of the adjudicator, the person's counsel is not ready or able to proceed. Witnesses argued that if inquiry dates are set virtually upon arrival in Canada, the practical effect of these provisions could be to deprive claimants of a reasonable opportunity to choose their own counsel or for the counsel that is chosen to prepare adequately for the inquiry. The Committee agrees that a reasonable period of time is necessary in order to comply with the requirements of fundamental justice. The principle that counsel must be given a reasonable opportunity to prepare a case is recognized daily in all our courts and tribunals and, in our view, proceedings relating to refugee claimants require no less. We propose this change in Amendment I.

Claimants who receive negative decisions at the screening stage should also be given a reasonable period of time in which to instruct counsel should they wish to make an application for judicial review. Bill C-55 would stay the execution of their removal orders for only 24 hours. The Committee proposes that the stay be increased to 72 hours. This recommendation is found in amendment 6.

APPEALS

Bill C-55 commendably provides for an appeal from decisions of the Refugee Division to the Federal Court of Appeal. Many witnesses argued, however, that the grounds for appeal are unduly narrow and that there should be greater scope for the court to examine the merits of a claim. They argued that strengthened appeal provisions are particularly important in view of the fact that the Refugee Division will be a decentralized body.

The Committee is aware that even with highly qualified decision-makers in the first instance, mistakes can still be made. In view of the significance of decisions relating to refugee status to the life, liberty and security of the individuals involved, the Committee recommends that the Federal Court should have the power to look more closely than the Bill presently permits at the particular facts of individual cases. Amendment 10 contains this change.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF NON-REFUGEE MATTERS

The Committee heard from a number of witnesses who pointed out that although the purpose of Bill C-55 is to institute a new refugee process, the Bill would also affect judicial review of some non-refugee immigration matters by the Federal Court. Their concerns arise from the provision in the Bill which would require leave to be obtained for an application commenced under section 18 of the Federal Court Act. Leave would have to be requested within 15 days after the applicant is notified of the decision.

Under the present law, no leave is required and there is no time limit for filing the application for judicial review under section 18. Witnesses pointed out that imposing a time limit would make negotiations with visa officers abroad difficult, if not impossible, and would likely result in a great number of pro forma applications being made solely to preserve the right of applicants to challenge a decision. They also stated that in relation to these kinds of cases there has been no evidence of abuse of any kind and that a provision requiring that leave be sought to commence an application, the effect of which would be to impede access to the courts, was therefore unnecessary. In amendment 9 the Committee recommends removal of these requirements.

EXCLUSION FROM THE REFUGEE PROCESS

Bill C-55 contains a provision identical to that found in Bill C-84 which excluded security risks, certain criminals, and war criminals from access to the refugee process. In its amendments to Bill C-84, the Committee was willing to automatically exclude war criminals and criminals who have been certified as a danger to the public in Canada, but recommended that the Minister make the exclusion decision personally for security risks.

By virtue of clause 35 of Bill C-55, the provisions in C-55 will supersede those in Bill C-84. Because the Committee continues to believe that its former amendment was worthwhile, it is necessary to make the identical amendment to Bill C-55. This recommendation is found in amendment 4.

HUMANITARIAN AND COMPASSIONATE REVIEW

The present system of refugee determination in Canada makes it possible, and provides sufficient time, to identify those people who, although they are not refugees under the narrow definition of the Convention, are nevertheless permitted to stay in Canada for humanitarian or compassionate reasons. Witnesses asserted that this might not be possible under the new system in Bill C-55.

The Committee thinks that any rigidity that may occur in the proposed system could be mitigated if the Refugee Division panel hearing the claim were able to identify these cases for the Minister. Its finding would amount to a recommendation that the person identified be considered for landing on humanitarian or compassionate grounds. The recommendation would not, of course, be binding but would ensure that the case would be specifically examined by immigration authorities and landing by Order-in-Council considered. Amendment 8 contains this proposal.

APPOINTMENTS TO THE NEW BOARD

Bill C-55 creates a new structure to decide refugee claims and immigration appeals - the Immigration and Refugee Board. There is a provision that the members appointed to the present Immigration Appeal Board will cease to hold office on the day in which the Bill comes into force. The Federal Court has recently decided that this provision creates a reasonable apprehension of bias. As a result, hearings before the Immigration Appeal Board have virtually ground to a halt, further compounding the backlogs and delays already present in the current system.

The Committee believes that this problem can be easily corrected. If the terms of office of current appointees to the Immigration Appeal Board were continued, no apprehension of bias would exist. The result would be that in the interim period between passage of Bill C-55 and its proclamation, the Board could continue to function and the problem of the ever-mounting backlog would not be needlessly exacerbated.

The Committee is aware that the Federal Court decision that has led to the current impasse at the Board has been appealed by the government. Even if that appeal should ultimately prove successful, however, the Committee feels that there is an important matter of principle at stake that would still require that this amendment be made. The principle is that the very reason for establishing quasi-judicial boards and tribunals is to vest important decisions with expert decision-makers independent of government control. In that manner, the necessary impartiality is achieved. For this reason, the Committee recommends in amendment 12(a) that the terms of current Immigration Appeal Board members continue under the new Board.

In addition to stipulating that members of the Board were to cease to hold office on the coming into force of Bill C-55, the Bill also contains a provision stating that no person appointed as a member of the Immigration Appeal Board or the Refugee Status Advisory Committee would have any right to claim or receive any compensation, damages, indemnity or other relief for the loss or abolition of his or her office. The Governor in Council would be entitled, however, to provide such relief in its discretion.

The Committee thinks that it is much to be preferred in principle to provide just compensation for individuals who, having undertaken to provide services in reliance on stated terms, find at a later date that their services are no longer required. This would seem to be the equitable way to treat incumbent members and also reflects a principle that is firmly established in our law. Amendment 12(c) recommends that the "no right to compensation" provision be removed, thus restoring whatever legal rights these individuals would ordinarily possess.

TRANSPORTATION PROVISIONS

There is one further matter which the Committee wishes to address. Representatives of tourist facilities and transportation companies in the Windsor area informed us that the provisions in Bill C-55 relating to the duty on transportation companies to ensure that their passengers arrive with the required documents could make it virtually impossible to carry on their businesses.

It sometimes happens that legislation phrased in general terms and targeted to specific problems will have unintended or unexpected effects. Sometimes an exemption can be placed in a Bill to meet the objections; in other cases, for a variety of reasons, no exemptions are possible. In the latter situation, the parties involved must rely on the reasonableness and common sense of those enforcing the law. The Committee believes that the issues raised by the witnesses from Windsor fall into this category. We have been reassured by the words of both the former and the current Ministers that a sensible approach will be taken. The former Minister gave assurances that where companies with good records continue their current practices, he foresaw no need to institute procedure for the document screening prior to embarkation envisaged in the Bill. This approach recognizes that different situations require different compliance procedures. The Committee endorses this approach.

Each of the foregoing proposed amendments has been supported by at least a majority of the Committee.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 17, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 17, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTY-SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that the Senate apply to its unrepresented employees the same level of benefits that have already been given by mandate to its represented employees, such as, but not limited to, overtime, meal allowances and family-related leave.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THIRTY-EIGHTH TO FIFTY-SECOND REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the committee's thirty-eighth to fifty-second reports approving supplementary budgets of the following committees:

- 38th Agriculture and Forestry;
- 39th Agriculture and Forestry;
- 40th Banking, Trade and Commerce;
- 41st Banking, Trade and Commerce;
- 42nd Energy and Natural Resources;
- 43rd Energy and Natural Resources;
- 44th Fisheries;
- 45th Foreign Affairs;
- 46th National Defence;

- 47th National Finance;
- 48th Official Languages;
- 49th Regulatory Scrutiny;
- 50th Standing Rules and Orders;
- 51st Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord;
- 52nd Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

(For text of reports, see Appendix "A", p. 3411.)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, these are reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. They deal with the budgets of various standing and other long-standing committees and are presented in accordance with our relevant practice. Some committee budgets are considered "supplementary" budgets, because the orders of reference upon which they are based have already been passed by the Senate. Other reports are from committees for which the authority has not been given. In these cases our practice provides that where there is a special reference any order involving the spending of money must not pass before senators have an opportunity to see what is involved financially.

So, for the "supplementary" budgets, the authority has already been given and these reports constitute the approval of the Internal Economy Committee as to the amounts required. Those reports that require a new authority for the expenditure of money will be spoken to by the chairman of each particular committee, the budgets required, as approved by the Internal Economy Committee, will be tabled and senators will know the cost when asked to support the special authority.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these reports be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, reports placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure whether the report I am about to table was included among the reports Senator Frith just mentioned.

In any case, since he suggested that his own series of reports be considered at the next sitting, and since I intend to make a similar suggestion, I think that to avoid any misunderstanding I will simply present the fourteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, respecting power to incur special expenses. I think the connection with what Senator Frith just said is obvious. I therefore present this fourteenth report.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 3415.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Tremblay, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

PREVENTIVE HEALTH CARE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, pursuant to section 2:07 of the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, I have the honour to present the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Preventive Health Care respecting the power to incur special expenses.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "C", p. 3417.)

On motion of Senator Argue, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 17, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee has considered the question of printing the texts of Orders of the Day, which are called and postponed from day to day, in the body of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

While your Committee agrees that these texts should be printed in the Orders of the Day, it considers that it is not necessary to print them in the body of the Minutes of the Proceedings.

Your Committee therefore recommends that the texts of Orders of the Day that are called and postponed not be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, but that the Minutes simply indicate that the Order number was called and postponed.

Your Committee also recommends that the Index to the Journals of the Senate record only the page number of those items that are proceeded with, and not record them when they are postponed.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-NINTH CONFERENCE, GUATEMALA CITY,
GUATEMALA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 24, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-ninth Conference of the Inter-parliamentary Union held at Guatemala City, Guatemala, from April 11 to 16, 1988.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Henry D. Hicks, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit at three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, 22nd June, 1988, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted I will give a brief explanation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: Some honourable senators may recall that I secured similar permission for the same committee to sit tomorrow afternoon, May 18, at 3.30 o'clock. I explained then that the reason was because of the difficulty of finding a time suitable to the Minister of National Defence and the committee.

The Minister of National Defence has advised us only within the last 24 hours that he cannot meet with us tomorrow afternoon, has submitted us a number of days and has asked us to confirm one of them as early as possible. We have agreed with his office that Wednesday, June 22, 1988, at 3.30 o'clock, would be a suitable time. Hence, so that we may try "to tie the minister down," if I may use a somewhat vulgar expression, I am asking for this permission at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—NOTICE OF MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER TO AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, May 19, 1988, I will move:

That the subject matter of the potentially disastrous drought in Western Canada be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry

- to assess the magnitude and intensity of the damage;
- to invite witnesses to the committee hearings; and
- to report, with recommendations to the Federal Government, for assisting people adversely affected, especially farmers and ranchers.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret the absence of Senator Murray from the chamber this afternoon, but I understand he will be with us tomorrow. I will take as notice any questions that honourable senators wish to ask.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, it is not a matter of giving notice, because notice has been given about the series of questions I had asked the Leader of the Government concerning what the federal government intends to do to be helpful in this disastrous drought situation. I simply say to the house leader today that I hope that the Leader of the Government will be here in the chamber tomorrow, prepared to give answers to my questions so that the people who are facing this disaster from drought will know what the federal government intends to do about it.

I should say that there are some things that the federal government can do, and soon, such as providing transportation assistance in moving feed, in the form of hay or fodder, into those areas where the grass has not grown enough this year to feed the livestock, which would, under normal circumstances, have been out on the range 60 days or so ago. I hope that this step can be taken very soon, because there are price movements that would quickly stabilize if the cattle producers knew that they could buy hay within a range of, say, 300 or 400 miles and that that hay would be available to them at essentially the same price as the hay that is within 40 or 50 miles of where this livestock is located.

It would therefore be very helpful to the cattle producers if we could get some answers to my questions tomorrow.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCHOLARSHIPS—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I believe it was four weeks ago today that I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate for details concerning a program of scholarships for undergraduate students in Canadian universities. I understand that that information has been made available in another forum, and I am wondering if perhaps tomorrow the minister could give all of the information that is available on this subject to this house. I think we should have information as to the scholarship program, but what is perhaps of greater importance is information concerning how the constitutional delicacies of dealing with education are being dealt with. I think that would be helpful to the house.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will try to get the information for the honourable senator.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eileen Rossiter moved the third reading of Bill C-118, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-74, respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health.

She said: Honourable senators, today I have the privilege of moving second reading of a bill that will make legislative history. The Canadian Environmental Protection Bill is the most comprehensive environmental legislation ever to come before the Parliament of Canada. This legislation protects the Canadian environment and the health and well-being of Canadian citizens. It offers the nation state-of-the-art environmental protection—protection for us and for our children to the year 2000 and beyond.

● (1420)

Bill C-74 is timely. The Canadian environment is no longer pristine. Arctic haze hangs over the vast tundra regions and acid rain is killing our lakes and threatening our forests. Industrial pollution has spoiled our major rivers and is impairing water quality. Unenlightened agricultural practices are depleting and eroding valuable farmlands, and wildlife is in retreat as vital habitats are destroyed.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Bill has been developed specifically to address the litany of problems now facing our nation's diverse environment. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act is the centre-piece of this government's commitment to vigorous and effective environmental protection. Around it are positioned effective legislation such as the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, an act designed to prevent another Mississauga rail disaster, and the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, which has already introduced world-class standards on emissions from cars, trucks and buses to reduce such pollutants as hydrocarbons and nitrogen oxides. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act makes it clear that environmental protection is not solely the prerogative of the Minister of the Environment. All members of cabinet are expected to recognize and incorporate environmental values and environmental quality considerations into their decision-making and policy development. Witness the identification by Transport Canada of environmental officers for all airports across the country. Witness as well the decision by the Canadian International Development Agency to ensure that environmental factors are recognized in funding projects. Environmental protection is a priority of this government. We have acted on this priority and we will continue to act on this priority.

Bill C-74 is landmark legislation containing over 140 clauses. Not only does it incorporate the principal environmental protection authorities currently vested in the Minister of the Environment but the bill also adds controls on new substances, and defines strict penalties for those who ignore them. The Environmental Contaminants Act, the Clean Air Act, the Ocean Dumping Control Act, the nutrient provisions of the Canada Water Act and section 6(2) of the Department of the Environment Act have all been integrated into Bill C-74. Existing regulations under these acts will be automatically incorporated into the new act on the day of proclamation. These range from controls on mercury emissions and phosphorous content in detergents, to PCBs and lead additives in gasoline. New regulations will be developed under the act to address toxic substances. The first of these will deal with controlling those substances now depleting the ozone layer.

Honourable senators, I am aware of four concerns raised in the House of Commons about this bill. The first relates to the need to establish and implement national, uniform environmental standards. I agree and am pleased to see that national standards are indeed at the very hub of the proposed legislation. Clauses 34 and 61 of the bill give the federal government the clear authority to make regulations, to prescribe standards—national standards that will apply from sea to sea and that will be enforced. The standards will explicitly state the time frames and effective dates for compliance. The bill includes hefty penalties for those who disregard these standards. Enforcement will be carried out across the country by the investigations offices to be set up by Environment Canada.

To maximize the enforcement of environmental regulations, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act forges a renewed federal-provincial partnership based on the concept of equivalency. This issue raised concerns in the house, concerns I do not share. Equivalency is meant to be a vehicle of cooperation to cut costs and efficiently protect the environment. The concept is basic to the existing constitutional realities of shared jurisdiction in environmental protection measures. The multiplicity of environmental problems now afflicting our nation make it imperative that governments pool their resources toward the common good—environmental protection—and avoid costly duplication of effort. It allows the federal government to capitalize on provincial effort and provincial initiative. Equivalency gives the federal government the option to recognize individual provincial standards in those cases where the standards are as strict as, or stricter than, the national standards developed under the proposed act.

Unfortunately, there exists a degree of misunderstanding about the precise nature of the equivalency agreements to be negotiated with the provinces. I would like to emphasize that equivalency agreements with the provinces are not automatic. Nor do they constitute blanket arrangements. Rather, they relate to specific regulations.

Five criteria have been spelled out by the Minister of the Environment for assessing equivalency. These criteria are as follows:

1. The provincial or territorial standards must be at least equal to the national standards under the proposed act;
2. Measurement and test procedures must be comparable;
3. Penalties, fines and prison sentences, have to be comparable;
4. Citizens must have the same rights of appeal and petition at the provincial level as they do at the federal level, and,
5. Enforcement of the regulation in question must be fair and consistent in line with the principles of the proposed act's enforcement and compliance policy.

Only when these criteria are met will a federal-provincial equivalency agreement be established. I might add that there will be one agreement per province per regulation. If that is not enough, the proposed act has some built-in safeguards. First, equivalency agreements are not fixed in stone. If an individual jurisdiction fails to adhere to the letter and the spirit of the agreement, the agreement will be cancelled with six months' notice. Federal inspectors will then be on the job to ensure full compliance with all regulations under the federal act.

To ensure this the government has doubled the enforcement staff at Environment Canada investigating pollution controls. Some 50 person-years and over $5 million will be devoted exclusively to enforcing regulations under Bill C-74 when it is passed.

A second built-in safeguard is offered in clause 35. The federal government will be able to enact regulations, if required, to address emergency situations or instances where the six-month notice period for cancelling an equivalency agreement could cause harm to the environment or to human health.

Perhaps concerns about equivalency agreements are rooted in past practices, when previous governments gave environmental protection measures low priority. That is no longer the case. For the Canadian public, and this government, a safe and healthy environment is one of our most pressing concerns. The public will not tolerate disregard for the law, nor will it tolerate non-enforcement. The public expects governments to act, and to act decisively, to stop polluters. This government has responded and will continue to respond to that expectation. Bill C-74 provides all Canadians with a mechanism to judge the government's performance. Bill C-74 requires the government to report annually both in terms of its own activities in enforcing the act and with respect to provincial activities under the equivalency agreements.

The third concern raised in the House of Commons suggested that the bill did not go far enough. Here again, I disagree. Bill C-74 provides a comprehensive regulatory regime to control toxic contamination. The Canadian Environmental Protection Bill adopts, for the first time at the federal level, an ecosystem approach to environmental protection—an approach that tackles pollution problems on land, in water, and through all layers of the atmosphere. Organic and inorganic substances, emissions, effluents, wastes and the products of biotechnology are dealt with effectively. Under the proposed act, toxic substances are managed throughout their life cycle—from manufacturing, to transport, distribution, storage and use, through to their ultimate safe disposal as wastes. Regulations to control a substance can be issued for any or all of the stages in its life cycle. Canadians will now have the protection they have been demanding—protection from toxic contamination and protection from incidents like leaks, spills or explosions.

To come to terms with the thousands of chemical substances already in the marketplace, the federal government has assembled a blue ribbon panel of experts to identify the 50 substances which most need to be assessed for their impact on water, wildlife, soil and air, as well as on human health. Each assessment will provide the government with the data necessary to determine the best means for controlling the substance in question.

The legislative tools for control are varied—from an outright ban, through regulatory restrictions, to guidelines and codes of practice on handling and disposal. The assessments will allow for an effective tailor-made environmental protection response on a substance-by-substance basis. The panel is scheduled to present this priority substances list to the minister at the end of this month. This list, and government assessments of the substances included on it, will be made public. Canadians—individuals and corporations—will be made aware of government decisions on regulatory action and will be invited to comment on those decisions.

• (1430)

For the first time, new substances not in use in Canada at the time the act is proclaimed will be assessed prior to their introduction or use. In other words, this government will be preventive in its approach rather than remedial. This government is committed to acting before tragedies occur rather than after, when often it is too late. The notification system prescribed under the bill requires industry to submit vital data on the substance proposed for introduction to the Canadian marketplace. With this information, the government can evaluate the health and environmental impacts of the substance and then define any necessary controls.

Under the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill, for the first time federal government operations are subject to the same rules as the private sector for controlling toxic substances. In addition, the bill gives Environment Canada the authority to regulate emissions and effluents, as well as waste handling and disposal practices of all federal departments, boards, agencies and crown corporations. New regulations controlling laboratory wastes from federal establishments will be finalized as early as this summer. The federal government can, must and will be exemplary in its actions.

Finally, there has been much discussion about an environmental bill of rights. Increased citizens' rights are built into the very fabric of the new legislation. Citizens are being encouraged to exercise their rights to participate in the administration and enforcement of the legislation. For example, once it is proclaimed, citizens can request that a substance be added to the Priority Substances List for assessment and possible control, found in clause 12. They can object to regulatory decisions by requesting that a board of review be established and they can make presentations before such boards, which are defined in clause 49. Any two Canadians can petition the Minister of the Environment to investigate an alleged infraction, which is found in clause 108. This unprecedented vigilance by the citizenry of Canada in the ongoing administration of the legislation is the direct outgrowth of this government's willingness to consult broadly in the development of this new legislation.

Bill C-74 is, itself, the product of extensive public consultations involving the three levels of government, industry, labour, the university community and citizens' groups. This bill represents a truly national effort—an effort that gives all Canadians the right to an equal level of protection from the threats posed by toxic substances.

A law is only as good as the will to enforce it, and the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill will be enforced rigously. An Enforcement and Compliance Policy is being finalized in consultation with industry and public interest groups. The policy clearly spells out this government's intention to ensure compliance with the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill and all of its regulations.

The government will promote compliance through information, education and training, technology development and technology transfer programs. This government will continue to develop environmental quality guidelines and objectives and codes of practice to help commercial enterprises and government agencies attain nationally regulated standards. A program of inspections, complemented by spot checks, will be put in place to verify compliance with the new act and its regulations.

Warnings, tickets and injunctions can be issued and prosecution in the courts pursued. Those found guilty could be subject to heavy fines and jail sentences of up to five years. Corporate officers will be personally liable to ensure that actions of their company respect the requirements of the legislation. That is found in clause 122.

Canada's international environmental commitments are fulfilled under the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill. Sustainable development, as outlined by the World Commission on Environment and Development—the Brundtland commission—is woven right into the fabric of this bill. This concept of sustainable development recognizes that economic development and environmental protection must go hand in hand, that our natural resources must be farmed and not mined, that our economy, present and future, is dependent on continued availability of clean water, healthy forests and unpolluted air.

The Priority Substances List is Canada's contribution to an international program being developed by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. The program will coordinate the analysis of existing chemicals by the different countries of the world with the results being shared internationally. The first regulations under the bill, controls on chlorofluorocarbons, or CFCs, fulfil Canada's commitment under the 1987 Montreal protocol on ozone depletion in the upper atmosphere. Honourable senators will know that Canada's leadership was instrumental in the conclusion of this unprecedented integrational accord.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I believe that the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill is worth our serious consideration and approval. Rarely has there been a piece of legislation with as many authors as Bill C-74. Consultation on the bill was extensive—the review of toxics legislation in Canada began over five years ago. The Canadian Environmental Protection Bill was preceded by the draft Environmental Protection Act put out in December 1986 for public comment. Substantial changes were made to that draft before its release as Bill C-74 in June 1987. In the legislative committee in the House of Commons over 144 amendments were accepted. In report stage in the House a further five amendments were incorporated. Everyone who has claimed a stake in environmental protection has helped in the formulation of this bill. As a result, I urge this chamber to review the Canadian Environmental Protection Bill with speed and to pass it accordingly.

I should advise honourable senators that once this motion has been debated I shall move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask Senator Robertson whether she has settled with anyone the reference of the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, since environmental affairs are under the mandate of, I believe, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Senator Robertson: I had checked with the whip—who is not present this afternoon—and that is the answer I was given. It does not make any difference to me which committee the bill is referred to. I suggest that it be referred to the appropriate committee, but it certainly should be referred to a committee for further discussion.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Kenny, debate adjourned.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-113, to promote the development and diversification of the economy of Western Canada, to establish the Department of Western Economic Diversification and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, the legislation before us today for second reading, Bill C-113, establishes in law the Department of Western Economic Diversification and constitutes a new approach to western economic development.

The fundamental purpose of this bill is to promote development and diversification and to advance the interests of western Canada in national economic policy and program development and implementation.

In essence, the bill is about how the federal government can better serve western Canadians and promote their interests. Through this legislation the cornerstone is laid for an innovative approach to regional economic development, a regionally-based organization, not an Ottawa-based organization.

The new department and deputy minister will be located in the city of Edmonton, with regional offices located in Vancouver, Saskatoon and Winnipeg. Each regional office will be headed by an assistant deputy minister. The department's senior officials will, accordingly, work in the west and be exposed to the pulse of the west daily. Western Canadians will be able to turn to the Department of Western Economic Diversification for assistance and, at the same time, have direct input into government from within their own provinces on a day-to-day basis.

The offices will assist western businesses and western businessmen by pathfinding and problem solving so that westerners can benefit from federal services and assistance with a minimum of red tape.

● (1440)

Pathfinding is a priority. So often businesses do not have the time to investigate thoroughly all the avenues of federal financial support for which they might qualify. The Department of Western Economic Diversification will help businesses do just this. Westerners with ideas will be brought together with the most appropriate federal means of assistance to help reach their goals. Hand in hand with pathfinding is the advocacy role performed by the Ottawa liaison office. The west has long needed such an advocate in Ottawa. Bill C-113 empowers the minister and the Department of Western Economic Diversification with the authority to play a leading and guiding role in creating federal policies and programs for the west and in making existing policies and programs more beneficial in their impact on the west.

The department will also have the mandate to consult and cooperate on an on-going basis with the provinces, business, labour, and other public and private organizations concerned with the west's economic future. The bill gives the department the power to formulate plans and integrate strategies and, where appropriate, to oversee or implement them. The advocacy powers outlined in the bill will do much to counter the centralizing inclination of federal departments and ensure that they are aware of western concerns.

This government recognizes that small and medium-sized enterprises offer great potential for achieving economic diversification. The new department, as set out in the bill, will be giving special attention to how best to achieve that potential. The legislation does not limit the department to such enterprises. If larger firms or associations can further diversification, the department will have the authority to support their initiatives as well.

The legislation makes provision for the department to offer different types of financial assistance. Assistance packages can be tailor-made to suit a project. The Western Diversification Fund is a flexible and innovative financial tool. To further ensure the fund's flexibility and impact several operating principles have been adopted.

First, assistance will be directed at projects that expand or diversify the western economy; by this I mean projects leading to new products, new markets, new technologies, import substitution and new long-term jobs, not routine business activities such as take-overs and relocations.

Second, assistance provided by western diversification will be in the form of "top up" or "last dollar." As I mentioned before, all other forms of assistance will be thoroughly investigated beforehand, including a company's own share of the dollars.

Third, there will be different types of assistance. Bill C-113 extends the types of financial assistance that can be offered from contributions and grants to include loan guarantees, credit and loan insurance. A most important guiding principle is the eligibility of all economic sectors, including the service and resource sectors.

Finally, projects like research and development and marketing will be encouraged because of their potential to develop the business infrastructure of the west, thereby enhancing the competitiveness of many western companies.

I would like to turn now to some of the initial responses and successes achieved by western diversification in its short history. Following the announcement of the western diversification initiative last August, the public in the west proved more than eager to participate. To date western diversification has responded to more than 54,000 telephone inquiries, about 4,200 visits to its offices, and over 2,800 written proposals. In addition, 313 projects worth more than $300 million have been approved for funding.

Examples of these include: $5 million to the Potash Institute of Canada to diversify its market opportunities in Asia and to strengthen its research and education capabilities; $7.5 million towards the setting up of an $18 million world class cold climate engineering research facility in Edmonton—about 35 small and medium-sized firms belonging to the institute and dozens of other companies will benefit from this project; and $9.45 million to the B.C. shake and shingle industry towards the establishment of a market development program. More than 120 small and medium-size producers will benefit from this initiative.

Additionally, western diversification is assisting individual businesses which offer potential for achieving economic diversification. A Moose Jaw stitchery company will acquire computerized embroidery equipment, which is the first of its kind in Canada. The company will thus be able to triple its production. A Manitoba company is developing an aquaculture facility to raise pan-sized Arctic char and rainbow trout. An Alberta company will now be able to take advantage of a change in building codes to develop a national marketing strategy for an energy-saving furnace damper.

What the concept of diversification is proving is that men and women in western Canada have an abundance of ideas and the talent and dedication to ensure that the diversification of their economy becomes a reality. Bill C-113 ensures a new approach to western regional development on the part of the federal government. Westerners now have greater control over their economic destiny through a new department designed by and created for western Canadians. As a western Canadian, I am proud of this historic bill, and I encourage honourable senators to give it their support.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to say a word or two about this bill. I agree with Senator Nurgitz that its provisions for the diversification of the western Canada economy are needed very badly. Having said that, and having read the minister's speech in the House the other day—which was essentially the same as Senator Nurgitz' speech here, and we expect that—I have to say that it is the most unabashed audacity that I have ever seen that this government can plagiarize, without blushing, the programs that were in place before, and can do so as if these programs were unique—a term Senator Nurgitz used a number of times—as if they were something new. I suppose we are going to call this Conservative policy now. If that helps to bring about things that have been at a standstill for the past three years, then I want to applaud it. These things certainly need to be done. But I will return to that in a moment.

Honourable senators, diversification of the economy in western Canada is extremely important for at least two or three reasons. First, we know that some segments of agriculture, particularly the cereals and grain production sector, are in the midst of a serious depression at the moment. I suppose the reason most often cited for this is the subsidy war between the United States and the European Economic Community. I think, however, that we must look behind that and ask ourselves this question: Why are they engaged in this war? It is because both sides seem to believe they have a few extra tonnes of cereal grain, or more than can be absorbed in the world market at a reasonable price, so they are cutting each other's prices by increasing the subsidy over and over again. But, honourable senators, I think we need to understand what is happening in agriculture, especially in cereal grain production, and that is what might be the greatest revolution in modern history in terms of this production. I say that because there are areas of the world that are now producing large quantities of cereal grains, especially wheat, which did not produce it only a few years ago. In that period Canada had a large and stable market for wheat. We sold great quantities of it to Europe and to other parts of the world. More recently we have sold wheat to Asia, especially Japan. That market appears to be reducing year after year because other areas of the world are able to be competitive.

I know that technology for producing wheat in Canada, the United States and, in particular, Europe, has improved a great deal in the last 20 years or more. It has also been applied in other parts of the world, and the production from those parts of the world is coming on to the market, although some areas are slower than others.

The one area that I would like to mention is that vast part of Africa between the tropical forests and the southern fringes of the Sahara Desert. There has been a great deal of talk about the problems that are being encountered in Ethiopia, the Sudan and two or three other countries in Africa because of drought. Honourable senators, in 1962 I spent quite a few weeks there with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. It was clear to me, and to a number of other Canadians who were on that tour, that there was a vast area between the desert and the tropical forest where great quantities of wheat could be produced if technology that was already known to farmers in North America—both Canada and the United States—were applied. We speculated on how long it might take for that technology to be applied in that part of the world. Of course, political difficulties between countries, tribes and people of different views who were trying to take over governments were preventing the farmers from growing much greater quantities of cereal grains. That is also the major problem today in attempting to feed the people in that area who are starving. It is not because of the inability of the land to produce, if technology that is already known were applied.

There is a civil war in progress in the northern part of Ethiopia that makes it impossible to move supplies in, and makes it even more difficult to produce the grains and other food that they need.

The main reason I am mentioning this is because this revolution in agriculture may affect western Canada for a very long time. We may be in a situation where our costs are higher than in Africa or Asia or other parts of the world, and the fairly stable international market for the grain produced in western Canada may not come back as soon as we think it will. Therefore, the need for diversification of the economy of western Canada becomes even more important.

If we look around Canada today we see other crops for which, in the past, there has been a long and stable market, which has now disappeared. I suppose the tobacco industry is the most outstanding example. Those farmers are having a very difficult time adjusting to the cultivation of other crops that produce anywhere near the amount of dollars per acre, what with the debt and other costs involved to maintain that land.

The southern half of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba is primarily involved in the production of cereal grains, mostly wheat, but there is some barley, corn and oats. If our capability to grow cereals for export is matched by growers in other parts of the world, then we will have to find other crops to grow in order for our farmers to make use of that land. If the Free Trade Agreement is ratified, it may be that some of the horticultural producers who are farming in the northern part of the North American continent will have to give way to production in the United States, where, because it is farther south, it is less costly to produce horticultural crops such as tomatoes, cucumbers, lettuce, celery, and whatever.

So I think this gives a great deal of validity to the contention by the government that there needs to be diversification in western Canada's economy because of the potential shift in the market for our traditional crops.

Let us now look at what is probably the next largest sector in the western economy, and that is energy: gas and oil. We can hope that there will be a demand for oil at around $20 U.S. per barrel. That price seems to be what most oil companies believe is necessary for them to run a viable industry. They do not claim that they need $30 or $35 per barrel, where it was at the peak. They have demonstrated that they shut down their operation if it goes below $15 U.S. per barrel. I think it is generally agreed that $20 U.S. per barrel would be considered as representing stable marketing conditions. If you remember that there are perhaps 10 million or 12 million barrels per day of production that is shut-in in the Middle East, mostly among the OPEC countries—production that was, in fact, on stream not very long ago—then you begin to wonder whether or not there will be any stability. Some international oil companies believe we are in for at least ten years of depressed oil prices simply because of that potential to produce 10 million or 12 million barrels per day more than is now being produced. Remember, that is approximately 25 per cent of what is in the international market at the present time.

So I suggest to you that we need diversification in that sector also. We hope that there will be an ongoing expansion in gas and oil—in hydrocarbons generally. A few years ago no one would have believed that the production in the North Sea carried on by Norway and the United Kingdom, or the production in Indochina, was possible. There was a time, of course, when we had high hopes that there would be significantly increased production from the Beaufort Sea, off the east coast and other places.

If, for any reason, some of this potential production—this shut-in production—is turned on to depress the price below what is a reasonable return to keep people employed in western Canada, we should prepare the economy in western Canada for diversification so we would not be so heavily dependent upon it.

Honourable senators, there are other areas such as timber and potash. I have mentioned these two sectors because they are by far the most important to Alberta. Perhaps it is fair to say they are also the most important to Saskatchewan and Manitoba, if you look at agriculture and energy together. So there is no doubt in my mind that we should be doing a great deal in this respect.

● (1500)

Up to this point I do not think that Senator Nurgitz is in any way in disagreement. I can see by his shaking his head in the right direction that he agrees that we do not have a disagreement. But then we get to the bill.

Honourable senators, the bill is fairly straightforward. It says that we will set up a new department of the government. If you read only the bill you could be fairly satisfied that that is what they were going to do. But then we read the speech made by the minister explaining what is in the bill, and that is where we have difficulty.

First, it is inaccurate, because it says in two or three places that this bill demonstrates the commitment to the regional development in the west, and it demonstrates the government's approach that is unique for these purposes.

A federal coordinating officer was set up in each one of the provinces. The government was not setting up another department, so they put in another layer. Other than that, its objectives were exactly the same as what was stated as the preamble, and so on, to the bill.

The minister goes on to say—and I am reading from page 13274 of the Debates of the other place—that:

It is not an Ottawa-imposed approach to the economic development of the West.

I think Senator Nurgitz mentioned that again today.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes.

Senator Olson: Good; I am glad.

[Senator Olson.]

That is exactly what we had to say about the federal coordinating officers, namely, that they should be out in places like Winnipeg, Edmonton and Halifax, or wherever, so that there would be some input from the region and they would be influenced by the people they were around, and to coordinate the efforts of all of the federal departments that were there. Every one of them has branch offices there—especially in these major centres.

I have another quotation. He states:

When we look at the areas that are important, to mention some, agriculture, forestry, transport, science and technology . . . and departments together and to examine the programs and the policies in relation to the economic development potential in western Canada.

That is a nice description of what the purpose is all about. I do not think one word is different, but I will have to check to see if that wording is exactly the way we described the function and activity of the federal coordinating officers when they were sent out in early 1981.

I guess we have agreed that it is not unique or new, then. Senator Nurgitz indicates that that does not matter.

Senator Nurgitz: No.

Senator Olson: Why couldn't you give us a line for having done this? There is no acknowledgement at all that it was there before.

We then get to what I think is a difficult part. On page 13275, the minister, in his speech, says this:

This is not an entitlement program. If we take a look at previous experiences, entitlement was part of it. This program is not entitlement; it is managed with flexibility and creativity.

An Hon. Senator: Ho, ho!

Senator Olson: Yes; I hear someone say, "Ho, ho!" That is what I say, too. This opens the door for the kind of political patronage where the minister has—

An Hon. Senator: Flexibility!

Senator Olson: —flexibility to accept and reject.

Senator Corbin: They call it "discretion"!

Senator Olson: Oh, they call it "discretion."

As Senator Nurgitz pointed out, 262 have already been approved. We have to look at these carefully, but I think this "flexibility" and "creativity" will do it.

Why isn't there some entitlement? When we make a law and a rule on a program, are Canadians not entitled to know whether they qualify or not, if they meet the conditions? Why does he make the point that it is not an entitlement program? If it is a program paid for by the people of Canada and authorized by the Parliament of Canada, why is there no entitlement? Is not everyone entitled to apply? Are they not entitled to have their application considered favourably as well as anyone else?

Senator Nurgitz: Considered.

Senator Olson: But he says, "This is not an entitlement program." There is no qualification that it will be "managed with flexibility." No one needs to expect that they have it coming as a citizen of Canada. They can apply for a program; they will get it if the minister approves. That is all.

Honourable senators, that is not a good way to start up a program. I hope that Canadians would have an entitlement to it, and I hope that it does not deteriorate into a political pork barrel under this government. The only hope that we would have then is to change governments so that the other guys could clean up the mess. There is the potential that that could happen.

I should say at this point that I have a great deal of respect for the deputy minister who has been nominated—I think he is in place now—Bruce Rawson. I know about that, because we hired him to be the federal coordinating officer in Edmonton in 1981 when we set up those offices to do exactly what Bill C-113 is seeking to do.

Honourable senators, there is a great deal—I have at least three or four more pages—of the minister's speech marked here where I could make some pertinent comments.

If you are going to heckle, I wish you would speak loudly enough so that I can hear you.

Senator Nurgitz: Sorry, I just thought that we could read it ourselves.

Senator Olson: But I am not sure that you have read it yourself, that is the problem.

Senator Nurgitz: I have not.

Senator Olson: You admit that you have not read it. It is a fairly good speech, but you have to read it with a kind of jaundiced eye and with some experience of what has gone on before, before you can really understand it. Perhaps you would like me to explain that to you.

Senator Frith: Unjaundiced eyes, that is your problem!

Senator Doody: They have to be jaundiced!

Senator Olson: That will come at another time, and perhaps it will happen in committee. I think we should get on with it.

The western Canadian economy needs diversification, and I hope that it will achieve all of the things that are said in there. I am glad to see this government committed to it. We started down that road some time ago, but have had a three and one-half year interruption while they halted the programs that were under way and redesigned them—I suppose they waited long enough to make people think that it was on a Conservative instead of a Liberal initiative. However, I wish them well. I hope that the benefits to western Canadians come out at least as well as has been indicated in some of the explanatory remarks.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, I had not intended to participate in this debate, and I apologize if I cause things to go awry for a moment. I want to take one or two minutes to address this bill. It shows that in these matters we have not learned anything in 20 years.

● (1510)

Twenty years ago we had an organization of government based on a series of line departments such as Agriculture or Energy or Industry. We also had a few infrastructure departments such as Transport or Canada Post or Public Works, and we had a very few coordinating departments such as the Department of Finance or the Department of External Affairs.

Then we discovered regional development. That was born out of a great necessity. Confederation was not as sensitive to those things as people felt it should be. Therefore, the obvious solution was to create a department to deal with it. If there is one lesson that comes out of the creation of a department for regional development, it is that regional development is not a line function but a staff function, and that when regional development is cast as a line department—as this pretends to be—it gets into the hair of Agriculture or Energy or Industry or whatever other line departments there may be. The example that we had in spades occurred about five or six years ago when Volkswagen, as I recall, or one of the other foreign automobile companies, was negotiating with two or three federal government departments at the same time, without any of the government departments concerned coming clean with one another about what was going on. It was from that kind of experience that the ministries of state were born and that we began to move to establishing these FEDC officers my friend opposite was referring to. For a while under that system it seemed as though we were making progress, but now we come back to this monstrosity.

Honourable senators, this is a most peculiar piece of departmental legislation. Usually departmental legislation sets out the minister's duties, objectives and powers in terms of the management of public servants and of the resources of the department. However, there is none of that here. What this department does essentially is to throw money at problems. I suppose that is also a well-worn tradition. However, I think we must now be very careful, because the warnings we have heard about waste and about patronage are very well founded indeed. When a department exists for the purpose of throwing money at problems, these are the sorts of things that can develop very quickly.

This department fairly reeks of that sort of function. If you look at its powers, duties and functions you will see: "The Minister shall guide and promote... the Minister shall lead and co-ordinate... the Minister shall formulate plans and integrate strategies... the Minister shall oversee... the Minister shall plan, direct, manage... the Minister shall plan, direct and manage [again]... the Minister shall initiate, implement, sponsor, promote and co-ordinate..." That is what the minister is going to do.

The real purpose of this kind of legislation is to package propaganda. You have a group of words such as "western diversification" which suggests thoroughly desirable, laudable ends, and one tends to assume that by throwing money at these problems, and by putting in the name "western diversification" here, there and everywhere, people in the west will get the message, even though they do not get the benefits.

Then, in order to accommodate to something of an anti-Ottawa bias, you locate this federal head office, ministerial function somewhere in the region to be served. Therefore, Edmonton becomes the headquarters for Alberta, but it also becomes the headquarters for the western diversification interests of British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Manitoba. In the fullness of time, this will develop into something resembling a third level of government. We now have the federal level of government, we have the provincial level of government, and then we have institutions such as this one which sort of fit in between.

I suggest to you, honourable senators, that this sort of proposal is founded on sloppy thinking. Moreover, I do not believe that it will work.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I would like to offer Senator Pitfield some encouragement. We are lighting candles, and I can understand his depression. He has probably presided over more programs that have not worked than anyone else in this chamber. It would take a legion of acronyms to mention the number of programs that we have seen that have not worked. I suppose, tomorrow, when we get to the ACOA, there will be a number of people who will have some legitimate concerns about its effectiveness or whether it will be just another program.

However, I would like to ask Senator Pitfield a question. I heard a reference to coordinating departments, which, I assume, were central agencies. Then I heard him say something about a line department versus a staff department. I wonder if Senator Pitfield could give me an example of what he meant when he used the word "staff." It puzzled me.

Senator Pitfield: Yes. Essentially, the staff departments would be the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Finance, the old Department of Trade and Commerce in its commercial-policy role. Those were essentially staff departments, and the same can be said of the Privy Council Office, insofar as the cabinet was concerned—and I could go on. Their job was to coordinate other departments such as the line departments, the infrastructure departments, and so forth.

Senator MacDonald: How would you define the MSERDs and that type of department?

Senator Pitfield: I would define them as an effort to cope with the failures that you have alluded to and that I am sure you intend to build further upon. The MSERDs, or the Ministries of State, were coordinating departments that were set up to try to build some consistency and to develop some program measures—which are missing from this legislation—with regard to the plethora of programs that had been developed by line departments, coordinating departments, and so on and so forth. It was a step forward; perhaps not much of a step, but it was certainly better than what existed previously. For one reason or another the MSERDs and others were abandoned as departments, although their functions were all transferred to the Department of Finance, the Treasury Board and the Privy Council Office. What we are doing here is not going back to MSERD; what we are doing here is going back to the very earliest days of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

• (1520)

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Pitfield: We shall see if it works.

Senator MacDonald: I suppose my question should be addressed to Senator Olson, because he brought the matter up. Great though our respect might be for the public servant to whom the honourable senator referred, Mr. Bruce Rawson, is the honourable senator suggesting that the "FEDCs," as they are called, were capable enough, and that it was not necessary to enact an agency such as this, that experience has shown that the FEDCs alone could sufficiently coordinate all these activities?

Senator Olson: No, I did not at all. I do not know if "objecting" is the right word, but someone was using words such as "unique" and phrases such as "it is the first time it has been tried." The minister's speech is laced with this kind of talk. In fact, what we are talking about here is not unique, and it is not the first time it has been tried. Almost all the objectives in this bill, although the new agency will become a department, were stated before.

As to Bruce Rawson, I think I said that we hired him. However, he was in the federal government long before I came along. He was one of the FEDC officers.

Senator MacDonald: I am looking for the examples or the names of the things tried before. The honourable senator used such terms as "this is old hat" and "this is old stuff," as Senator MacEachen would say. What are these things that worked so well that we are now emulating?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is another speech entirely. I would be very happy to give it, if you want me to.

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Olson: It would take a full speech to list these things, if the honourable senator wants me to answer what has already been said by Mr. McKnight and by Senator Nurgitz, who introduced the bill in the Senate. It will take me a couple of minutes to go through my files, but I can find all the objectives we set out and all the great things we were going to do for, for example, Nova Scotia industries. We carried out a great deal of what we intended to do, not only in Nova Scotia but throughout the country.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, for the sake of general amity, might I suggest to Senator Olson that he not take away from our poor friend, Senator Finlay MacDonald, the illusion that they have had some original thinking?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Nurgitz speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments. I want to mention to Senator Olson that the Western Diversification Department is not just about money, as he has indicated. Actually, I was all set to muster all the sincerity and emotion I could to thank him for so many of these ideas and for his approval of this program, until I heard Senator Pitfield's intervention and the concerns he expressed. What I suggest, so that we can determine whether there is a great deal of light or a great deal of darkness, as Senator Pitfield has said, is that we refer the bill to the National Finance Committee. Therefore, I move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twentieth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on May 11, 1988.

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the adoption of the report.

She said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, I presented Bill C-55 on behalf of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Wednesday last. As chairman of that committee, I should like to express my gratitude to the hardworking and sometimes long-suffering members of that committee from both sides of the chamber. Examining this long, complex and often controversial bill in a comprehensive manner required dedication and a significant commitment of time and energy from the members of the committee. The committee heard over 114 witnesses. It travelled to Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver. We did our homework in lengthy, private sessions and we emerged relatively unscathed with a report that achieved, I believe, a high degree of consensus.

Before getting into the details of the report, I should first like to explain the general approach taken by the committee. Many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee urged the committee to perform a radical restructuring of the bill. For example, they argued for the complete elimination of the screening stage, which is the primary stage in the procedure being proposed. To support their proposals they presented legal and humanitarian reasons which a number of us on the committee felt were compelling. Personally, I am sympathetic to those views, and I regret the obvious disappointment with certain aspects of our report as expressed by very conscientious witnesses who appeared before us. The committee, however, felt that it was not our role to perform major surgery that would have the effect of changing fundamentally the very basis of the new procedures for refugee determination. To do that would have meant rewriting this very complex piece of legislation with its many interdependent parts, or, if we really felt strongly about it, simply rejecting the bill. I do not think that any of us felt that strongly, because we were assured that, in spite of the many perceived flaws in the bill, there were some very good aspects to it.

We did not feel, in spite of our considerable misgivings regarding the screening process contemplated, that we should try to substitute our views for declared government policy.

All members of the committee did agree, however, on the necessity for amendments to key areas of the bill. We concluded that the principles of fundamental justice required certain changes, and we hope you will find those both constructive and restrained. At the same time, I sincerely believe that our proposed amendments will lead to an appreciably fairer law and one that will better withstand the legal challenges that may follow the passage of Bill C-55.

As to the contents of our report, we tackled first that area which we, and virtually all our witnesses, thought most needed amendment: the "safe country" provisions of the bill. The "safe country" concept is part of the screening mechanism designed to control access to the refugee process. We saw the need for safeguards so that claimants would not be put at risk if they were removed to these so-called "safe countries." We also saw the need for clarification regarding claimants who had been merely transiting through a country.

While accepting the need for a "safe country" list, we agreed that cabinet was not the best body to be in charge of it. We concluded, instead, that the chairman of the proposed Immigration and Refugee Board, with the advice and assistance of experts in refugee matters, both governmental and non-governmental, would be in a better position to devise the list. Newspaper reports of yesterday and today, whether totally accurate or not, remind us that there may be a potential danger to individual refugee claimants if foreign policy considerations are allowed to affect the refugee determination process. For that reason I would argue that cabinet should not be the body to formulate the list, although obviously Canada's foreign policy and international commitments must have some significance and influence. Refugees are not immigrants, and decisions regarding their rights to claim status should not be determined by anything other than the well defined refugee criteria of which the committee was made aware.

Senator Hébert will be addressing the "safe country" amendments in detail, so there is no reason for me to say more on this point. However, I do want to stress that I believe these amendments are at the heart of our report and represent the minimum requirements of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The committee was also concerned about a provision in the bill that, to us, seemed unduly stringent. This was the part of the bill that required that refugee claimants be asked right at the beginning of their immigration inquiry whether or not they wished to make a claim. If they did not speak up then, they lost their chance. We were convinced by our witnesses, who had had actual experience with refugees, that there could be a number of very understandable reasons why genuine refugees might not make a claim at that first opportunity. Fear might make them silent. Because of their experiences with governments and military officials in their homelands they might not yet feel able to trust Canadian authorities. Whatever their individual reasons, we felt that the people who might lose their right to claim at this early point would likely be those in most need of Canada's protection.

Our solution was to recommend a safety valve so that claimants, who could later satisfy the presiding officer that the reasons for not speaking up initially were valid, could still have their claims heard. We feel that this procedure will be fairer to refugee claimants, yet will not impede the process in the vast majority of cases.

The committee was also concerned about some aspects of the provisions of the bill that provide for duty counsel to be made available for claimants in certain circumstances. Naturally, we approve the general principle and we recognize that Canada's approach is unique in this regard. However, some of the details of the provisions seemed open to the interpretation that claimants might have little opportunity to choose their own counsel, or, having chosen someone, their counsel might be deprived of a reasonable opportunity to prepare for the hearing. Members of the committee were concerned that this was unfair to claimants and their counsel and was quite possibly a violation of the charter.

Our solution was to require simply that a reasonable time be given for a claimant to choose and instruct his or her own counsel before duty counsel could be appointed on his or her behalf. I believe that the test of reasonableness is in itself most reasonable.

The committee also agreed with those witnesses who suggested that there should be a wider jurisdiction for the Federal Court on appeals of decisions of the Refugee Division. Our proposed amendments give the court more scope to look at factual aspects of refugee cases. Moreover, on the subject of courts, we agreed with practising lawyers that there appears to be no reason to restrict judicial review in non-refugee immigration matters; so we recommended that this provision be removed.

Two further matters in the report merit brief mention. We are aware that the international definition of "refugee" is quite narrow, and that under the present system consideration is often given to other humanitarian or compassionate aspects that may be present in some cases. We wish this identification of deserving cases to continue and have therefore recommended that the Refugee Division of the proposed board be given the jurisdiction to recommend to the minister that, on these grounds, a person be considered for landing.

[Senator Neiman.]

Finally, as honourable senators may know, the work of the present Immigration Appeal Board has been adversely affected by the fact that Bill C-55 contains a provision causing all members of the board to cease to hold office when the bill becomes law. We have recommended that the apprehension of bias caused by this provision be remedied by continuing the terms of the present members.

If I may be allowed a personal comment, if the rumours that are surfacing again prove accurate—rumours of the government's declaring a general amnesty or some new fast-track procedures for dealing with the thousands of refugee claims now pending, then, in order to deal with those claims fairly and expeditiously, the government will need all the experienced personnel available to it as well as the new people it will be adding.

We have also recommended removal of a provision that would have denied just compensation to anyone losing his or her position because of the passage of Bill C-55. We believe the government should set an example of fairness and equity in this regard.

I hope the committee's recommendations with regard to Bill C-55 will commend themselves to you all.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, to participate in serious deliberations on bills like C-84 and, more recently, C-55, was no ordinary experience. I am sure that at some time every member of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was moved by the testimony we heard. We all tried to work together in a spirit of co-operation and conciliation, which did not prevent the occasional emotional remark or statement that came straight from the heart.

What was so special about the deliberations of this committee? Certainly not the enormous complexity of the legal problems raised by C-55, which were the delight of our lawyer colleagues and the despair of the rest! Not the economic aspects of this legislation, which are nevertheless very substantial.

• (1540)

We soon realized that we were not talking about law, economics or politics, but about human beings whose life or liberty was at risk, and that our country had the power to admit (read: to save) or to turn back (in other words, sentence to poverty, torture and even death).

For instance, when we discussed the right of every individual to choose a lawyer when claiming refugee status in Canada, we could not help seeing in our mind's eye the unfortunate Salvadoran who just managed to escape the violence in his own country and without money, papers or help, travelled through Guatemala, Mexico and the United States, illegally. Imagine the terror of this human being, as he walks thousands of kilometers through the back streets of cities. Finally he arrives exhausted and desperate at the border of this vast cold country, El Canadá, whose reputation for hospitality and compassion had reached his far-off village, harassed by guerilla warfare.

When we discussed the clauses of Bill C-55 that created the controversial concept of "safe countries" to which Canada would have to return a bona fide refugee, if that is where he came from, or even if he had just been there in transit, we still saw our Salvadoran. We knew that coming from the United States, a democratic country, a friendly country, we would be hard-pressed not to qualify as a safe country, we knew he would probably be sent back to the terrors of El Salvador. Because this tiny totalitarian country, where violence is the order of the day, is an ally of the United States, our beloved neighbours admit less than 3 per cent of Salvadoran refugees. But if the United States cannot be considered a safe country, what other country on this planet would deserve a place on the list drawn up by cabinet according to C-55? France? The defender of human rights that just re-elected a socialist president? Not so, explained a witness, an eminent lawyer whose client, an Iranian refugee, was in danger of being deported to Iran by la Douce France, whose negotiations with that terrible regime were an excuse for every kind of concession. But Denmark, at least, would be a safe country, full of compassion for the persecuted of this earth. Recently, however, Denmark, which has the excuse of being a small and over-populated country, has become one of the least hospitable democracies. It has almost closed its borders to refugees.

Canada doesn't have the same excuses as Denmark. We have a vast country that grew and prospered thanks to its traditional open-door policy, a country that would not exist otherwise, since all Canadians are descended from immigrants or refugees, including our native brothers who probably came from Asia. Our demographic experts agree that without a substantial increase in immigration this country will not be able to maintain its standard of living, let alone raise it; nor will it be able to sustain our aging population.

Restricting the entry of bona fide or even economic refugees while attracting rich or highly qualified immigrants would be shortsighted. The men and women who built this country were neither rich nor skilled. Recently, I was reading a biography of my great-great-grand-uncle, Curé Nicolas de Tolentin Hébert, a pioneer who opened the Lac-Saint-Jean area to colonization in the 1830s. For some time he was vicar of the Cathedral in Quebec City, and he described the warm welcome Irish immigrants were given by the French-Canadians we now call Quebecers, which I interpret to include my colleagues Rizzuto, Cogger, de Bané, Watt and the rest! My great-great-grand-uncle described the extreme poverty of these immigrants who fled a miserable life in Ireland, the Bangladesh of the time. These refugees had to be clothed and cared for and fed, and they paid us back in kind by founding families named Doyle, Graham, Flynn, Kirby and so many others—

Thank God, the French Canadians of the 1830s were neither selfish nor racist and, although they were politically subject to an English colonial regime of a good sort, they opened their homes and their hearts to these poor Irish people whom today, no doubt, we would call "false refugees."

In a world that is about to become a global village, where everyone will be responsible for his neighbour, unless the world resigns itself to going down in chaos, I wonder what my country would have become if Bill C-55 had been enacted unamended in the last century. And many Quebecers and Canadians are also wondering.

The other day, at a Quebec Liberal caucus meeting in Room 307, a small room in the West Block, I had fun counting the members present according to their ethnic origin. There were then seven "pure dyed-in-the-wool" French Canadians—although I am sure that several must have had some Indian or Irish or Scottish or English blood, you never know! I also counted three Jews, two Italians, one Irishman, one Inuit and one Greek; that is, the majority of the Quebec caucus was not ethnically "pure." That would make the former Minister of Immigration, who boasted one day on the French CBC that he represented an "ethnically pure" Quebec riding that had not been "disturbed by immigration", shudder.

Although pestered by the ultra-nationalist factions that are still active, Quebecers well know that their future, like the future of other Canadians, no longer depends on the "revenge of the cradle," despite the bonuses the Quebec government has just announced for "good breeders." They well know that Parisians (who speak such elegant French!) have no desire to come and settle what is left to us of Voltaire's "acres of snow" and that the Quebecers of tomorrow will have dark skin and slanted eyes, that they will speak French with a Cambodian accent or that they will learn it with an energy born of despair, like the unfortunate Turks whom the government continues to expel to Turkey, the Ireland of our day, in a haphazard way, one by one, to prolong the pleasure.

That being said, honourable senators, I admit, as does everyone, that our Immigration Act has not been working for a long time, I would even say for over four years; that is, serious deficiencies were already obvious at the end of the previous administration. Like everyone, I note that unscrupulous people have abused the system and taken advantage of these shortcomings to mock the spirit of our Immigration Act and that some false refugees, from Portugal and Brazil, for example, were in reality only over-zealous immigrants.

It thus became necessary for the government to submit legislation to put an end to the abuses, while still respecting the Charter of Rights and our international commitments and without endangering our reputation as an open and generous country. Alas, Bills C-84 and C-55 respect none of these. That is why the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had to conduct a thorough study, hear more than a hundred witnesses and propose amendments to soften the many harsh aspects of these two bad bills, while still respecting the objectives they claimed to serve.

To complete the statement by the chairperson of the committee, the Honourable Senator Neiman, my colleague and friend the Honourable Senator Grafstein will explain to you how and why the committee decided to propose twelve amendments to Bill C-55. For my part, I shall only speak to you about one of them, namely the one on the curious notion of "safe country" to which we could with a clear conscience send back genuine refugees.

● (1540)

[English]

The "safe country" provisions provoked the most concern and comment from the witnesses who appeared before our committee. Indeed, I am hard pressed to remember an issue that has aroused such feelings of consternation among people knowledgeable on the issues. Not only did I find the critics of Bill C-55 knowledgeable, but they were the people directly involved in, and dedicated to, the cause of helping refugees. When they spoke, we listened carefully.

For the benefit of fellow senators who did not have the privilege of studying Bill C-55 in committee I will describe briefly the "safe country" provisions and the rationale behind them.

As most people are aware, in recent years Canada has seen a fairly significant number of people arrive claiming to be refugees. Many of these people were genuine refugees; their claims were accepted and they are now part of the fabric of Canadian life. Of course, quite a few who came here were not genuine refugees, but that is another problem and has to do with another part of the bill entirely.

● (1550)

If the number of claimants coming to Canada had remained small, the government might have been willing to continue the policy of accepting all claimants whose claims proved genuine. I personally strongly favour such a course. I would like everyone to be able to come to Canada. But the government made a policy decision that if people who feared persecution in their own country had been in another country that was already protecting them before they came to Canada, we could quite legitimately ask them to return there. After all, to ask for refugee status is to ask for protection. Those claimants who do not require protection, the reasoning went, need not be given the right to make a refugee claim.

Bill C-55 attempted to translate that policy decision into law by means of a list—the "safe country" list. Cabinet was to decide which countries were "safe," and if claimants came from one of those countries they would automatically be returned there. Like many policies that may look reasonable on paper, this "safe country" approach seemed to the members of the committee to give rise to significant problems when we started to examine it closely. I almost said, "when we started to read the fine print," but one of our problems with this bill was that there was little "fine print" on this particular topic. There was nothing in the bill to answer our questions: How will we know that the person will be permitted to return to the safe country? How will we know whether or not the person will be allowed to stay there? Could it happen that the person could be unceremoniously sent on to yet another country, which might, in turn, accept the person or might not?

Too many questions; too few answers—that was the dilemma faced by the committee. If senators have had an opportunity to read our report they will know that we decided, after much discussion, to amend the bill to try to overcome these deficiencies. I believe we have succeeded, and I shall explain our reasoning.

The starting point for the committee was the original wording of the bill as first tabled over a year ago. That version stated that a claimant could not be returned to a safe country unless he or she "would be allowed to return to that country, if removed from Canada, or has a right to have the claim determined therein." That was the government's own view of what protections were necessary, yet those words were removed before the bill reached this place. We, as a committee, took that original wording, improved upon it or clarified it in two respects, and re-inserted it in the bill.

Our first modification was to the words "allowed to return." Did that mean that the person might only be allowed to step off the plane? Did it imply any commitment on the part of the safe country to deal with the person in a manner that Canadians would consider to be fair? We on the committee were not sure. We wondered why the test found elsewhere in the Immigration Act was not used here, too. That other test refers to a country to which a person is to be removed as being "willing to receive that person." That wording seemed to us to imply the degree of commitment that we were looking for. Should refugee claimants—people who claim to fear persecution—receive less protection than others who have no such fear? We thought not, so we inserted a requirement in the bill that claimants would not be returned to a safe country unless that country were willing to receive them.

Our second modification to the original wording was to the original requirement that claimants be allowed to return or have the claim determined in the safe country. We wondered if "determining" a claim might amount to as little as the other country's deciding that the person was not eligible to enter its refugee determination process and sending the person elsewhere. We were sure that the government could not have intended this result, so we clarified the bill so that the determination must be on the merits of the claim.

Those two changes, I feel, should reassure those people who were rightly concerned that the bill as it stood had the potential to send refugee claimants to an uncertain destination or an uncertain fate. We were urged by most of our witnesses to go much further than that. I, myself, as I said earlier, would have preferred more substantial amendments. But some compromises were necessary, and I am convinced that the amendments we have devised are eminently sensible and should be acceptable to the government. After all, they are based on the government's own original approach.

The committee made another amendment to the bill that will affect how the "safe country" process will actually work. The bill provided that a claimant who was in a country solely for the purpose of joining a connecting flight could not be returned there. This, of course, is only fair to countries with international airports that serve as transfer points. But surely this provision is much too narrow. What about our Salvadoran who travels through the United States over land in order to reach Canada? What about a claimant who stays a few days in a country? That is longer than the time needed to make a connecting flight, but surely not enough time to justify sending the person back there on the grounds that the person had actually received protection there.

When he appeared before the committee, the former minister responsible for this bill told us, in effect, that our concerns were justified. He stated:

It is our intention to not penalize or to not hold responsible a country where an individual was in transit.

The minister continued:

... obviously, a transit period in an airport could last a couple of hours but ... a bus trip from the Mexican or Guatemalan border could take three days. This might be something that the committee may want to take a further look at.

We decided to follow the minister's suggestion. Our solution was to modify the transit provision so that, by implication, it refers to all modes of transportation and will be applied according to the individual's particular circumstances. We did this by requiring that a claimant who was in a safe country for the purpose of travelling through it would not be considered as coming to Canada from that country. Here again, our committee feels that we have clarified the intent of the bill in a way that the government can accept.

Our final amendment to these provisions is perhaps more controversial, but we hope that the government will understand and accept our reasoning. At issue is the question of who should draw up the list of safe countries. Bill C-55 would have cabinet responsible for this task. Why cabinet would want to add this onerous task to the multitude of things it already has to attend to is something that I, personally, never understood, but that is what it chose to do.

The committee disagreed with this choice. We felt that cabinet should not be involved in or identified with a list which, in effect, involves judgments on the conduct of nations in their treatment of refugees. Far better, we thought, to entrust this task to those both expert in refugee matters and removed from political pressures. We chose the chairman of the proposed Immigration and Refugee Board in consultation with the top officials of the Refugee Division. I think we made a good choice.

In conclusion, I wish to repeat how reasonable I feel the committee has been in its approach to the "safe country" policy. To those who urged the committee to take a much more radical approach I can only say that compromise is the way of the world, although I may not like it personally. Of course, compromise that would endanger human lives is never acceptable. But I am convinced that our amendments will protect lives, not endanger them, and I hope that all honourable senators will agree.

[Translation]

I trust that my honourable friends will vote as one for the twelve amendments proposed by their committee. Personally, I feel they are rather weak. They are far from meeting all the concerns expressed by the most serious and credible witnesses we have heard. At least, they make a little more acceptable a bill which the Interchurch Committee on Refugees felt was totally unacceptable. These representatives of almost every church denomination in Canada concluded their brief by quoting the uncompromising verdict by Dean William Angus, of Osgoode Hall Law School:

● (1600)

[English]

It seems to me that there are so many deficiencies, as I see them, in the present legislation, that rather than try to amend this bill in bits and pieces, it would be preferable to have another quick run at it!

[Translation]

Several committee members, including myself, share this opinion and have made an honest effort to reach the incredible compromise which each of these amendments represents. We can only hope that most of the members in the other place will appreciate this effort and accept the few amendments we have made both to Bill C-84 and Bill C-55, so that these measures which were considered most urgent a year ago may finally become law.

[English]

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, Bill C-55 is a bill to amend the Immigration Act of 1976. As other senators have pointed out, this is no ordinary bill. The idea and the policy set forth in this bill connect to the very heart of the Canadian idea. People are our nation's heartbeat. Canada is a nation of minorities. I am proud to represent Metropolitan Toronto, which has been made rich by the diversity of its citizens who come from every walk of life and every nation in the world. One-third of every household in Metropolitan Toronto speaks a first language other than French and English. Precisely because of the diversity of our national population Canada has become an uncommon commonwealth with unlimited possibilities. This bill addresses directly the path towards those possibilities.

Government is for people. In government resides the power that the peoples' representatives possess to guide our nation's growth, civility and prosperity. If one studies closely the indexes of great biographies and histories, the decisive role of immigration trends, population patterns, refugee flows, while playing an overwhelming part in the growth of civilizations, is rarely measured or taken into the calculus of the rise and fall of civilizations.

Yet, Toynbee, that great student of civilizations, has demonstrated, and has reminded us, that the progress of civilization depends precisely on these particular immigration trends—on alien flows. So today we have an opportunity—a unique opportunity—to address these profound issues within Bill C-55, which, as I have said, is an act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976.

We are not dealing with abstract policies. We are not dealing with abstractions. We are dealing with reality. The difference between people and power is the difference between reality and abstraction. Refugees are not abstractions. They live in a "no-man's land," ripped from their roots, displaced from their language, disconnected from their culture, seeking only to explore the human potential for themselves and their families.

Honourable senators, is this not the basis of St. Augustine's dialectical text, entitled The City of God, when he preached that man has the freedom to choose between man's needs and man's desires? Is it not incumbent upon us, as senators, to focus on man's needs and only to fulfill genuine human desires? This is not a Utopian dream; this is not kismet; this is not Valhalla. This is a realistic goal of politics.

We have been admonished by the biblical prophets and saints—in both the Old and New Testaments—that our treatment of strangers is the test of our own civility. However, it is just not on a moral plane alone that one should examine Bill C-55. We should examine this bill on a practical plane of economic reality. Theories of economic growth have clearly demonstrated that technological progress most often occurs at the point where diverse cultures converge, where diverse cultures clash. So, in a strange way, by absorbing refugees from different cultures into this land of limitless opportunity we have a unique opportunity to accelerate in a humane and efficient fashion the explosive growth of our technological innovations, which can only modernize our society and improve the economic prospects for everyone who resides in our land.

This bill deals not with the dregs of society; it deals with the dreams of our future.

Honourable senators, may I dwell briefly on the duties placed upon the Senate, suspended, as we are, in our current state between reform, on the one hand, and public credibility, on the other? To me, our duties remain clear. While we remain guardians of our past, we have a duty to be vanguards of our future. How can we more manifestly justify our role as legislators than to examine carefully the door to our nation's future, the open-door policy to the growth of our population? Some say, "Let's slam that door." Others say, "Let's put up a screen door that allows only the wealthy to filter through." Still others say, "Let's open the door only a crack, be super selective. Let's discriminate on questions of race or religion or colour of skin."

Again, the great Toynbee demonstrated in his works on civilizations, in his Study of History, that each civilization, no matter how grand or how great, was only able to achieve its potential because of a liberal and generous policy towards aliens, based on an open-door policy towards strangers. Honourable senators, in this bill we find another important principle deeply embedded in this very complex legislation.

How, we ask ourselves, should we determine our global future? Are we to be arbitrary or, rather, are we to live under the rule of law? If Canada enters into an international convention as a small non-militaristic peace-loving nation, we demonstrate our national belief and our national commitment to the rule of law. We fulfill the spirit and letter of that law, because Canada believes in the rule of law. And we believe, as Canadians, that the best way for peace and harmony to be injected into the globe is by the rule of law.

Therefore, having passed the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is it not our duty as legislators to ensure that all legislation meets the contours of the Charter? Is this not the best way to foster the rule of law in Canada? When we pass legislation, we must also ensure that it meets our international obligations, which are also based on the rule of law. Only then can we expect our strong global voice to be respected. Only then can we avoid the trap of hypocrisy by preaching to others about the rule of law, while failing to fulfill the rule when it comes to our own domestic legislation.

Hence, honourable senators, our Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, in its very careful report—and, as Senator Hébert pointed out, with very modest amendments—spent over half a year doing what we were supposed to be doing—giving this bill careful, sober second thought. We read over 200 briefs. Over 114 witnesses gave evidence from every stratum of society and from every region of the nation. The overwhelming evidence supports our proposed amendments. Perhaps some will say we did not go far enough, but Canadians will support our amendments. I recommend to all honourable senators to support our amendments, because they conform to Canadian values and to the Canadian rule of law that we have fought for and which all senators, I think, believe in. So we are modest in our amendments, but we have a profound belief in the philosophy we are trying to project in these amendments.

Bill C-55, as we found it, is a complex piece of legislation. Refugee determination is complex. There are competing administrative models about how best to ensure fairness and effectiveness in the refugee determination process. While many of us remain critical of the general structure of the bill, we concluded that the structure chosen by the government should, as the report suggests, be left intact. But our amendments must be added to provide greater protection for refugee claimants. These amendments meet our commitment to uphold the Charter in its respect for the safety of the individual and to uphold Canada's commitment to the rule of law at home and abroad.

The major amendment, as Senator Hébert so brilliantly set out, deals with the concept of "safe country return." Senators are concerned that genuine refugees coming from a safe country, that we reject, should not be put at risk. We have a responsibility to those people who come to our shores. Thus, we would violate the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, since, under section 7, you will recall that no person should be deprived of "his life, liberty or security, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

So, honourable senators, we on the committee remain concerned that the minimum safeguards in Bill C-55 relating to safe country return are fewer and lower than the minimum standards required by the Charter. Hence, we propose mechanisms to ensure that claimants who are rejected are returned to a safe haven that is not safe in the abstract but is safe in reality. This, we believe, is our duty under the Charter and under article 33 of the International Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees.

Other amendments, honourable senators, are equally modest, yet vital. These will give the minister and his officials the opportunity to correct processes and errors in the complex procedures under the bill where a genuine refugee might miss his only chance to claim. Therefore, we have inserted a safety valve. We have amended the bill to guarantee that refugees have the reasonable right to be represented by counsel on a reasonable basis. This is already well established Canadian law. We have amended the appeal procedure, because we are dealing with the security, life and liberty of the individual, so as to give a reasonable opportunity to appeal. This is also good, standard, existing Canadian law—no changes there. We have amended the provision to afford the minister an opportunity to identify those cases that require humanitarian or compassionate review. This is another safety valve that we have placed in the hands of the minister.

Finally, there is an important and vital issue camouflaged in this bill, and that deals with the role of quasi-judicial officers. We have amended the bill to maintain the impartiality of quasi-judicial appointees by protecting their security of tenure. Only when our judicial officers are secure can they be perceived by the public to have true independence. Canadians can only be satisfied with an independent refugee process if there is impartiality displayed by the judicial officers—both in reality and in appearance.

Honourable senators, I commend all of our colleagues who worked so assiduously on the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee with respect to these amendments—the chair, the deputy chair and the staff—they worked long and hard. Senators from all sides developed a wide consensus on these amendments. As Senator Hébert pointed out, this was done in a non-partisan, creative, optimistic and helpful fashion. All senators share the values in this bill, although some may disagree on some particular points.

Honourable senators, I believe that it was St. Francis of Assisi who said that there is no such thing as love of the human race, there is only love of a person. There are profound moral, theological, natural laws and legal principles hidden in the womb of this bill. The questions we must ask ourselves are these: Should we be mean spirited or generous? Are we as a nation to be compassionate or closed-minded? Are we to treat people as people or as abstractions? If these choices were to be put to the Canadian people, I believe—and I believe most senators would agree—that they would answer with the highest of spirits rather than the lowest of impulses.

History can be our guide. There are two models of civilization that we can examine briefly. The treatment of aliens in these two societies went to the very heartbeat of these two civilizations. One was the city of Athens; the other the city of Sparta. Athens was an open city; Sparta was a closed city. Athens freely absorbed refugees and aliens who came to its gates. Sparta swept aliens away from its gates and locked its doors. Athens developed a diverse, blossoming and flourishing culture; Sparta developed a singular culture. Athens became a society of ideas and freedom; Sparta became a society of regimentation and conformity. Athens' values flourished and survive to the present day. These values and ideas formed the roots of our own liberal democracy. Athens exists today, after 2000 years. Sparta degenerated and withered away. Sparta died. Unfortunately, the ideas of Sparta, the ideas of totalitarianism, survived. The seeds of the master race developed from the ideas of Sparta, while the ideas of Athens elevated the human race, and allowed successive generations to aspire to the highest aspirations of mankind.

Yevgeny Yevtuschenko, the greatest of modern Russian poets, burst on the scene over a decade ago and wrote a magnificent poem about the choices that each generation must make between the "City of Yes" and the "City of No." This choice is now ours in this bill.

Honourable senators, I commend to you and to the minister these modest amendments in the hope that she will understand that they represent a modest attempt to deal with major issues in a fair, open-minded fashion. The choice is now hers; the choice is now ours.

If I might return for a moment to Arnold Toynbee, in his work The Study of History he described the rise and fall of civilizations. He pointed out that civilizations do not depend on fixed cycles, statistics, determinism or fate. Rather, he wrote, "civilizations' rise depends on the spirit, the spark of creative power alive within us . . . if we have the grace to kindle the flame . . . then the stars in their courses cannot defeat our efforts . . ."

Canada's future depends on a grand flow of refugees. We can keep our rendez-vous with history. We can achieve our destiny. The twentieth century, as Laurier once said, can belong to Canada. I respectfully submit that we should support the amendments and reach our destiny.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I trust no one else will be speaking with respect to the committee report.

In concluding, I, too, wish to join my colleagues in congratulating the chairman of the committee on her very judicious and fair handling of a difficult and, I might say, sometimes touchy subject matter. I also commend all other members of the committee for their dedication and hard work over a long period of time. I might say that everyone showed great patience.

• (1620)

I would like to point out that the report itself indicates that each and every one of the recommendations and amendments had the support of the majority of the members of the committee. In fact, in many instances there was unanimity on points, but, rather than getting into discussions about that, Senator Murray has asked me to indicate that he would be most anxious to have the matter go forward as quickly as possible by the adoption of the report and third reading of the bill in order that the minister can receive this report and give as careful consideration as she can to the matter so that we might hear back without delay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by Honourable Senator Petten, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few brief remarks on Bill C-55 relating to the preamble to the Immigration Act. This is a matter that goes back a number of years. For instance, on page 7883 of the House of Commons Debates of July 21, 1977, Mr. Brewin (Greenwood) proposed an amendment to the preamble of the Immigration Act of 1976 to have the word "multicultural" inserted.

The preamble reads:

(b) ... to enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal and bilingual character of Canada;

Mr. Brewin proposed the following amendment which would have amended the preamble to read:

... to enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal, bilingual and multicultural character of Canada.

This amendment was supported by both the NDP and the Conservative official opposition. However, it was not adopted.

When the predecessor to the present bill, which, coincidentally, was also numbered Bill C-55, came before the Senate in March 1986, I reminded honourable senators of this particular amendment. Senator Barootes, who sponsored that bill at that time, gave an undertaking to speak to the minister of the day, the Honourable Walter McLean. Mr. McLean subsequently wrote a letter to Senator Barootes giving a commitment that, when a new set of amendments was made to the Immigration Act, it would include an amendment to the preamble to the act.

Unfortunately, the present Bill C-55 does not contain that amendment. I therefore propose that an amendment be made to the preamble to the Immigration Act, 1976. I have copies here in both English and French. That amendment would read as follows:

That clause 2 be amended by striking out line 38 and substituting therefor the following:

[Senator Nurgitz.]

2.(1) Paragraph 3(b) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(b) to enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal, bilingual and multicultural character of Canada;

(2) Paragraph 3(f) of the said Act is—

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, if I may say so, and I say this most specifically to the Speaker with respect to a ruling, what Senator Bosa is proposing to do is to amend paragraph 3(b) of the Immigration Act, and it is not as though Bill C-55 deals with the preamble. The preamble has been untouched by the amendments proposed in Bill C-55, and I am suggesting, with respect, that this amendment is out of order in that it is not within our jurisdiction to deal with something that is not before us.

Senator Bosa: Does the honourable senator at least support the spirit of the amendment, since it is in harmony with section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Senator Nurgitz: I am all in favour of all kinds of spirits, honourable senators, but, as someone just remarked, the spirit is not moving me now; nor is there the jurisdiction in this chamber to deal under Bill C-55 with that matter now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking for myself, I am very willing to support the spirit of the amendment put forward by Senator Bosa. However, I am compelled to agree with Senator Nurgitz that it is beyond the scope of this bill and is therefore out of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this proposed amendment is out of order?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed, on division.

EMERGENCIES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I apologize to Senator Kelly for having been unavoidably absent from this chamber on other Senate business when he moved his motion for second reading of this bill and spoke to it on April 28 and again on May 5 of this year. Senator Kelly gave a very full description of the bill and laid its rationale before this chamber in an excellent and expert manner.

I have read Senator Kelly's speeches carefully. I have also read the bill carefully, both in the form in which it was passed in the other place and in the form of the bill when it was introduced in the other place on June 26, 1987. The first observation that one would make, of course, is that the some 50 amendments the other place accepted to the original bill have considerably improved it and made it, in my view, a much more acceptable piece of legislation than it would have been had it come to us unamended or as it was introduced into the other chamber in June 1987.

For example, amendments were made to subclause 12(2)—and similar amendments were made to other similar clauses—which had the effect of changing the wording of the discretion of the Governor in Council. “If in the opinion of the Governor in Council” was changed throughout the bill, but first in clause 12(2) to “if the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds”. That amendment puts the Governor in Council's discretion on a sounder basis, and makes it easier for me, at least, to accept the wording.

Also, I can accept the amendments with regard to the penalties imposed throughout the bill. As honourable senators know, the bill deals with four kinds of emergency. The first four parts of the bill deal with these four emergencies almost as a separate and self-sustaining piece of legislation. For example, let us look at paragraph 8(1)(j), which has to do with emergencies relating to public welfare. The other emergencies are public order, penultimately, international emergencies and, finally, war emergencies. Originally the penalty was set at a maximum of $5,000 with regard to these emergencies. The pertinent clauses have been changed to $500 for a summary conviction and $5,000 on indictment. I think these amendments improve the bill.

Part V of the bill deals with compensation. The compensation provided for in this bill is much better than, if it existed at all, that under the previous War Measures Act, and it has been further improved by the amendments to the bill.

Finally, Part VI of the bill deals with parliamentary supervision. The bill as it was in its original form has been substantially improved in this area. Even so, they have not dealt with the situation which might arise if any of these categories of emergency were declared when Parliament was not sitting or if Parliament happened to be dissolved at the critical moment when an emergency was declared. This is something that the committee of this house to which the bill, I presume, will be referred should inquire into as witnesses and the minister appear before it.

Nevertheless, I have to say in general terms that I wonder whether such absolute delegation of the authority of Parliament to the Governor in Council is necessary. It seems to me that the extent of the delegation is very great and virtually unlimited under Part IV, though perhaps one can make a better case for war emergencies than one could do for some of the other categories of emergencies I have just enumerated. Also, I am sure that some honourable senators will have observed that the delegation to the Governor in Council comes awfully close to enabling the authorities to effect changes in the legislative power of the provinces. I suppose the attempt to justify this provision will be supported by the emergency clause and the “peace, order and good government” section of our Constitution. I think that this provision needs to be looked at a little more carefully as well. I wonder whether the so-called parliamentary supervision is really sufficient.

It also appears to me that paragraph 30(2)(b), which deals with censorship, is rather peculiar. This paragraph enunciates a certain restriction on censorship in the case of international emergencies only. There is no mention of any restriction on the power of the Governor in Council in relation to censorship in the other parts of the bill which deal with public welfare emergencies, public order emergencies and war emergencies. I can see why, perhaps, we should not interfere at all with the discretion of the Governor in Council in relation to war emergencies, but why mention a restriction in relation to international emergencies, and make no mention of a restriction in relation to public welfare and public order emergencies? Again, perhaps the committee to which the bill is referred might give some attention to this point.

Also, had I been in the chamber when Senator Kelly made his speech I would have asked him for an explanation of the rather different periods of time after which a declaration of emergency expires. In the case of public welfare emergencies, subclause 7(2) fixes the period at 90 days, which remained unchanged from the original version of the bill. In respect to public order emergencies, which is dealt with in subclause 18(2), the limit on the duration of the emergency in the original legislation was 60 days. Mind you, there are provisions in the act which allow for these periods to be extended by going through the appropriate formalities. In the original bill, public order emergencies could last for 60 days, unless extended, but it was reduced to 30 days in the bill that was given final reading in the other place. The original period of time with regard to international emergencies, dealt with in subclause 29(2), was 120 days, but it was reduced to 60 days in this bill. Finally, with regard to war emergency declarations, the emergency can last for 120 days, as stipulated in subclause 39(2), and remained unchanged. I would like to hear Senator Kelly, in closing the debate, give us some explanation of the rationale behind those different periods of time. It seems to me that they make the legislation unnecessarily complicated, and that perhaps it might not have been necessary to combine what almost amounts to four different pieces of legislation in one bill if we could have dealt with these and some other matters on bases that were more or less similar.

The next point I would like to make observations about is the question of consultation with the provinces. Indeed, it may be that I have dealt in too much detail with matters that could be better taken up when the bill goes to committee, but on the general point of the consultation with provincial authorities required by several clauses of the bill in relation to each category of emergency, it seems to me to be very cumbersome. I acknowledge that Senator Kelly made reference to this point and indicated his reservations about it in the speech he made on the occasion of second reading, but I guess I am even more concerned than he is. It seems to me that the kind of consultation with the provinces required under this bill might render the declaration of an emergency so cumbersome as to delay it beyond the time when emergency action might really be required. This is particularly so with respect to the war emergency provisions, where consultation with all provincial authorities has to take place. I do not think that the federal government ought to give up its powers in this respect to the provinces. Granted, the federal authorities can declare war, but unless every province agrees, after consultation, the question of bringing the war emergency powers into action would, in my view, be doubtful or could easily be the subject of litigation and controversy.

• (1640)

There are other portions of this bill that also need to be carefully examined. On the whole, however, I acknowledge that it is an improvement on the War Measures Act and that, when taken in conjunction with Bill C-76, which we have already passed and which has received Royal Assent, it will improve the situation somewhat in relation to war emergencies.

I wish the bill could have been a little more simple and straightforward, but perhaps it could not be. I, for one, will be most interested to hear what the Minister of National Defence has to say when he comes before a committee of this chamber—which, I understand, he is willing to do—and speaks about this bill.

With these remarks, I commend the bill to the attention of honourable senators on the clear understanding, of course, that we shall examine it in relation to the points I have raised, and I am sure some others which honourable senators will want to raise, in the committee to which the bill may be referred.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Hicks.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall not take up too much of your time. There is just one point I should like to discuss right now although I agree with Senator Hicks that this bill raises a number of questions.

I speak from my experience during the second world war, as a lawyer for the Prices and Trade Commission, when I was responsible for enforcing numerous regulations issued under the War Measures Act. The scope of these regulations was very broad indeed.

Senator Hicks referred to censorship. As soon as war had been declared, censorship was introduced. Speeches could not be broadcast on radio without prior censorship. I remember one experience I had during the provincial election campaign in 1939. We had used a small transmitter in a remote riding to broadcast speeches within a radius of several miles. The RCMP intervened, but finally dropped the charges.

We remember the internment camps. We have talked about the Japanese, but we also had Camilien Houde who was interned and spent three and half years in prison. I remember the rationing of sugar, meat, liquor and gasoline. If you bought gasoline without coupons, you were liable to a fine which, under this legislation, would be a maximum of five years' imprisonment or a maximum fine of $5,000.

I remember the terms of the Order in Council under which the government and administrators delegated by the government issued orders of all kinds on every possible subject.

I wonder whether under clause 40, the Governor in Council could adopt exactly the same regulations and impose the same restrictions we had during the second world war. It reads as follows:

40. (1) While a declaration of a war emergency is in effect, the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

These terms are very general indeed. I don't see any restrictions here, except that the Governor in Council must believe there are reasonable grounds and that the decision is necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

Subsection 2 deals with the penalties I mentioned earlier.

(a) on summary conviction, of a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding six months or both that fine and imprisonment, or

(b) on indictment, of a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or imprisonment not exceeding five years or both that fine and imprisonment

I wonder to what extent these powers, which to me seem absolutely unrestricted and are the same as those conferred under the War Measures Act, are limited, first of all, by the existence of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and, second, by the provisions we find in the preamble to the bill, especially where it mentions "special temporary measures that may not be appropriate in normal times".

Is it suggested that the Charter does or does not apply in any case? It says that it does, but why the reference to "measures that may not be appropriate in normal times"?

The preamble goes on to say:

AND WHEREAS the Governor in Council, in taking such special temporary measures, would be subject to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights and must have regard to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, particularly with respect to those fundamental rights that are not to be limited or abridged even in a national emergency;

So to what extent do this preamble and the existence of the Charter restrict the powers conferred under clause 40? I am not referring to other instances for the time being because they tend to be more specific.

In the case of the existing War Measures Act, I had the same questions, and I would appreciate it if Senator Kelly could get a response to my queries.

Section 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, might apply when interpreting the radical measures provided under clause 40 of the bill. Section 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, says:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Does the meaning of these words change in wartime? Does this section no longer apply to the same extent, once the Governor in Council has declared a state of war?

I think this is a very interesting question. Considering the experience we had during the last world war I wonder whether the government would really have the same powers under this legislation as it did before, or whether those powers would be restricted by the provisions I have just mentioned.

On motion of Senator Côtteau, for Senator Stewart (Antigonish—Guysborough), debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "Child Benefits—Proposal for a Guaranteed Family Supplement Scheme", tabled in the Senate on 30th June, 1987.—
(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on Wednesday last Senator Tremblay, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, described the committee's report entitled: "Child Benefits—Proposal for a Guaranteed Family Supplement Scheme". He also described in some detail the reaction to the report. The response, as honourable senators have heard, was not abundant. There was little enthusiasm for our proposal for a guaranteed family income supplement. That is, on the one hand, not surprising, because, among other complications, there is a great attachment in this country to universal benefits with tax-back plans, which are at least in question in the committee's report. On the other hand, the problem of child poverty in Canada remains, and the committee does not propose to drop it.

As the National Council of Welfare, in its recent report "Poverty Profile 1988", has demonstrated in even more definitive detail than we were able to demonstrate in our report, the scale of the problem of children living in poverty in Canada is great indeed.

In this country we have tended to think of ourselves as living without the extremes of the rich and the poor. If this were ever true, it is certainly not true now. Too many Canadian children are being raised in poverty. Poverty, of course, does not mean dying of hunger, as it does in Ethiopia; it does not mean living in rags, as in the barrios of the cities of South America; it does not mean begging with a deliberately mutilated body, as one sees outside the Red Fort of New Delhi. In Canada it does mean going to school without food, not being able to learn properly, dropping out, often functionally illiterate, and being under-employed or unemployed in adult life. It means not having children's teeth fixed; it means not getting, in general, into the opportunity structure of Canadian life.

Poverty is not what parents seek, nor is poverty necessarily the result of alcoholism, incompetence or neglect, although it may be. We are not talking about children who have been abandoned by their parents or who live lives of crime or streetlife, although both circumstances make poverty likely and make those livelihoods more likely. We are talking about many families with both parents working hard, but who work for low wages or who work without any security of employment, either because of their training, or lack of training, or because in some parts of this country it is difficult to find steady work.

But we are talking, above all, about families with one parent who is on low wages. Single parent families now comprise the largest group of families living in poverty in this country. So the subcommittee took as its problem the question: If you wanted to solve the problem of children living in poverty in Canada, how would you do so? The proposals which honourable senators have seen in the report emerged precisely from that question.

Senator Robertson led in this investigation, and later this afternoon will propose further study on this matter. She gave notice of such a motion last week.

I urge all honourable senators to support this motion and to encourage the subcommittee and the committee in its further investigation of what remains one of the central problems in Canadian society today.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would not wish to prevent any of our colleagues from taking part in the debate on this report. Personally, I would be prepared to end it now, in view of what Senator Marsden has just told us and of what I alluded to last week—namely, the motion that Senator Robertson is to present to us shortly. Indeed, this motion continues in the same vein as Senator Marsden on the main focus of the report we submitted—that is, dealing with the problems of children living in poverty.

If everyone agrees, I would simply conclude the debate on the report at this point, presuming that the discussion will now deal rather with the motion presented by Senator Robertson, who wishes to pursue the discussion but to focus it on one of the report's main conclusions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this debate is considered closed.

CHILDHOOD POVERTY AND ADULT SOCIAL PROBLEMS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY RELATIONSHIP—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 11, 1988, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the relationship between childhood poverty and certain significant and costly social problems that manifest themselves in adult life, and on measures which might better alleviate such problems; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1989.

She said:

Honourable senators, in the time I have this afternoon I want to mention briefly the report on child benefits that my colleagues, Senator Tremblay and Senator Marsden, have spoken on already today. Senator Tremblay spent considerable time explaining some of the details of that report, and Senator Marsden this afternoon referred to one of our major concerns.

● (1700)

The report was a most interesting document to prepare. As senators may or may not know, it took some 18 months to prepare it. It was rather a long study and at times it was frustrating. However, the end result, I believe, reflected quite accurately the feelings of the committee. Some of us are concerned that this committee report, like so many others, will sit around on a shelf and collect dust. The primary concern with which the committee members were continually seized as we studied these issues revolved around children living in poverty. We were nervous that our concern about such children would be swept aside, as so often happens to reports that have been presented from various bodies to governments over the years. So I would like to spend my time this afternoon speaking to that concern and what some of us would like to do about it.

The problem has been identified by our committee members as a national disgrace. It has existed for a very long time. We find it hard to accept that poverty is always with us. Surely, in a country with all of the riches of Canada, we could come up with better solutions. The research analysts identified for the committee that 20 per cent of our children are living in poverty. I notice that since that report was tabled Statistics Canada has come up with a revised figure of 17.5 per cent. Regardless of whether our statistics are correct or whether the Statistics Canada people are correct, either 20 per cent or 17.5 per cent represents many children.

I am sure honourable senators are aware of some of the risks facing children who live in poverty. In 1980 the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science published a much acclaimed report entitled "Child at Risk". However, despite the efforts of this chamber and other governments, the problem really has not changed substantially. We have hardly made a dent in the armour that keeps so many of our young children in poverty, generation after generation. Some members of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology felt strongly that more work was required to develop fully the recommendations of the "Child at Risk" report, because techniques in research have changed considerably. We believe that we can relate child poverty in a definitive manner to adult behaviour. It is a challenge about which the research staff is enthusiastic as, certainly, are the members of our committee. I believe it is essential that we as a governing body continue to examine the research that is presented to us.

Research in the social sciences is much different from other scientific research, and that is true for many reasons. Unlike banking or finance, it is inexact in its measurements. Changes in society are not as easy to spot as changes in technological fields. The bits and pieces of research done on a single problem often do not come together as easily as do parts of research in other fields. Most importantly, the work done becomes outdated very quickly. That is so because social change happens so fast and is difficult to see. The excellent report of 1980 is now somewhat outdated and the recommendations have to be taken farther along the pathway of research as it has developed since that time. The recommendations were excellent, but methodologies are determining other conclusions now, and these are some of the areas that your committee wants to get at. Until recently, we could not say with any scientific certainty, for example, that a link existed between child poverty and adverse social behaviour in adults. Some have suspected that a linkage existed between the two. The most recent research conducted by the Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services has developed a model that, when combined with other pieces of research, will enable us to establish the following: First, it will determine the extent to which child poverty is the common denominator for a variety of adverse social behaviour patterns in adults. Second, it will give us an estimate of the amount it costs society in today's dollars, and in future dollars, to continue to live with the present state of poverty. Third, it will help us fill in the gaps where research has not yet been done so that we can determine the linkages between child poverty and adverse social behaviour in adults. Progress in social services research makes it possible for us to do this. These linkages can now be established and measured. With a refined model we can see what is the true cost of living in poverty as a child expressly as it relates to adverse social behaviour in adults. We shall be able to say with some certainty what will be the cost in the 1990s of mental disorders, poor physical health, criminal behaviour or a myriad other adverse behavioural problems. We can relate that figure to the money we spend now to try to alleviate the problem of children in poverty. We shall be able to determine the percentage of adults with certain behavioural problems and trace them back to their origins to see what the determinant factor is. That is rather exciting in terms of social research these days.

I think it is important to examine what it means to be poor and to discuss the possible linkages I have been referring to. Statistics Canada will tell us that families spending 58.5 per cent of their income on food, clothing and shelter are poor, or, more euphemistically put, are "low income families." David Ross, in his research for the Ontario government, has suggested that a more accurate picture is gained when money spent on health care, household furnishings and operations is added to that list. If we make that addition, that leaves the family with about 9 per cent of its gross income to spend on items for personal care, recreation, support systems and education.

Perhaps it would be easier to understand if I were to break it down. A family of four that earns $21,663 before taxes per year is on the poverty line. In real terms, this means the family has about $37 per week before taxes to spend on non-essentials for day-to-day life. This is the cut-off for low income earners. Indeed, most situations are much, much worse than this. The yearly income of $21,000 is relatively high for many parts of the country. If we think of those families dependent upon food banks or the number of our Canadian citizens who have difficulty in putting a roof over their heads, then it is a serious problem, indeed. Sixty-eight per cent of all children are being raised by single mothers—68 per cent—and as many as one-fifth of our children are living or have lived in poverty.

There is sufficient research to prove that being poor as a child means that one will have a higher incidence of poor physical and mental health, behavioural disorders and poor educational performance. Chances are higher that such a child will be judged delinquent, and, if so judged, then there is a greater likelihood that he will spend some time in a correctional institution.

● (1710)

Further to this, there is evidence to suggest that you have a greater than average chance of suffering from unemployment, child abuse, family violence, suicide, prostitution, adult crime, school dropouts—you name it. There has been enough initial research done in these areas now to provide us with direct linkages, although the measurements of relationships of percentages have not been made. I know that is something the committee wants to get its teeth into.

Health and Welfare Canada statistics are the most accurate of all the research. They found that being poor means you have a lower life expectancy than most other Canadians. In real terms, this means that poor men can expect to have their lives cut short by 6.3 years. Low-income people have fewer years of disability-free life. On average, men with low incomes enjoy 14.3 fewer years of healthy, active life than their higher-income counterparts.

Lower-income groups have a higher risk of dying from all major causes than their upper-income neighbours. Dr. Irving Rootman of Health and Welfare Canada found that there is a 50 per cent greater chance of dying from all major causes in any given year if you are poor. This means that children living in poverty have a 50 per cent greater chance of having a parent who is disabled, sick or dead, a factor found by the study "Child at Risk" to be very detrimental to the development of children.

Low-income status for a child's family was found to have a relationship with psychiatric disorders and poor school performance. Again, we shall have to delve into and develop the exact relationship. If a child is from a poor family, chances are 1.7 times higher that he will have a psychiatric disorder. If a child has some type of conduct disorder—stealing, destroying things, being mean to others—chances are 2.1 times higher that he is from a poor family, and poor school performance is 1.8 times more likely from children living in poverty.

Putting the personal suffering aside, in monetary terms, these negative consequences of child poverty are all tremendous burdens on our social programs and on our society in general. If people are sick longer and more frequently, then it becomes a burden not only on our Medicare system but also on disability payments, on unemployment insurance payments, and a host of other government-assistance programs. In other words, honourable senators, it becomes expensive for society not to deal with the problem of poverty at its roots. Many indicators seem to point to the conclusion that the roots of so many problems lie in child poverty.

As a caring society, we must be truly alarmed at the latest evidence to suggest that there is a difference in the effects of poverty on the working poor and those who find themselves on social welfare support systems. This is probably one of the more interesting results of Dave Ross' recent findings. If you take the children of parents on social welfare and children of the working poor whose income is the same, the ability of the children from social welfare families to perform well in life is considerably lessened compared with the same children from a home at the same income level of the working poor. That is quite a startling correlation that Mr. Ross has made. I am sure that the committee will be most anxious to delve farther into this rather startling revelation.

The school dropout rate for welfare poor as compared with the working poor is 6.4 per cent higher. It is clear that being poor is a strong determinant for dropping out of school, and now we see that being on welfare only serves to compound the problem. Given that education is directly linked to employment status, we create a self-fulfilling prophecy for the child in poverty.

The Senate, in its document entitled "Child at Risk", concluded that low-rental complexes of subsidized housing lead to a concentration of multi-problem families. These ghettos for the poor create an atmosphere which can easily involve children with a peer group on the streets that indulges in anti-social behaviour and criminal acts.

We must stop and ask ourselves, as legislators: What have we done to a whole class of people? What additional cost in suffering in the early childhood years do we add to adult life as a result of those very difficult formative years?

Having said all this, I recognize that it is not exciting or very high profile for governments to spend large sums of money on a problem when the results will not be measured for at least another generation. However, some of us feel very strongly that it is imperative that the measurements be made. Once we are able—and I am positive that we will be able—to make these measurements, then it will be much easier for governments to respond, because they will have a whole picture. Governments, at any level, have never had that whole picture before.

I believe that as our economy continues to grow and expand and we move closer to creating full employment in our society, we will have a very positive method to help reduce poverty.

I know, and I agree, that employment is one of the leverages for reducing poverty. However, full employment does not recognize that there are a large number of unemployable citizens, who, for a variety of reasons, will never find work. The structurally unemployed is what we are talking about, and they will continue to present us with problems of poverty and the homeless despite the level of growth achieved in the economy.

The project proposed is ambitious, because social sciences and social policy are inexact fields. As I mentioned before, we cannot see the changes as easily as we can in the technological area. As an example, I give you the home telephone of 1988. It can call forward, put people on hold, give you instant access to two lines, give you touch-of-the-button speedcall convenience, and, indeed, probably make coffee in the morning if you play with it long enough. We can see and touch the changes in technology over the past five years, and we keep up with them. Bell Canada adds microwires to your phone in the expectation that scientific technology will advance, and they want to be ready. They never place themselves in a position of playing catch-up.

Again, social changes are hard to identify, and it is not easy to see minute changes in the numbers of working poor or the homeless until the problem reaches very difficult proportions. Perhaps some of the blame for this lies in the decreasing amounts of money available for social research at all levels of government, but I shall save that debate for another day.

[Senator Robertson,]

Social sciences and social services research becomes outdated quickly, as I have already mentioned. I am in agreement with our researchers at the Library of Parliament when I say that information that is more than 12 years old is outdated.

I believe it is important to examine the situation in non-clinical terms, to examine what we have done in real terms and what realities the situation holds. Programs such as those that provide low-income children with a healthy breakfast at school help with the immediate problem, but do not erase the stigma associated with being poor or the higher incidences of brutal family violence or the lack of a stimulant for academic achievement from home. Children who find themselves in poor families are denied simple educational tools such as the morning paper. However, when the choice is milk or the paper, the outcome is obvious.

How can we expect to keep poor children in, and interested in, school with no immediate role model and improper resources to deal with the stress associated with public education? As they reach their teens, when the gap between the poor and the middle class becomes more obvious, the outside trappings of clothes and good grooming are not the only dividers. I suppose in our day—and I relate my age to very many of you in this chamber—the average middle-class family had a set of home encyclopedias. Today it is a home computer. How can two grade 8 students be expected to perform at the same level when one has all the resources of this decade at his or her disposal and the other is trying to manage on a single decent meal a day?

Honourable senators, all governments in society have always been interested in the elimination of poverty. The tools that we have to deal with the problem have been inadequate. Without the proper research, without the proper information, our efforts will continue to be a catch-up effort that most often addresses the systems of poverty, and not the root causes. There are a multiplicity of problems that children of low-income families suffer from.

My good friend, Senator Marsden, referred to some of those: overcrowding, parental delinquency, poor schooling, lack of a proper emotional support system, and all too often physical and mental abuse. If we can help to eliminate just part of these, the effects for the child and for society will be far reaching.

● (1720)

Research in the past has been reluctant to identify poverty as a stand-alone reason for social abnormalities in adults. What we hope to achieve, honourable senators, through an intensive and cautious study, is some bottom-line answers such as: How many school dropouts spent their formative years in poverty? Or, how many adults who have emotional disorders were poor as children? How many prostitutes? How many dropouts, unemployed or those with criminal behaviour? How many of those spent their early and formative years—the very early years—in poverty? What type of poverty tree has emerged? How hard is it to break the bonds of poverty?

It is interesting, an informal study done recently by the Moncton Headstart Program showed an example of two parents on social welfare. From those two parents they created 32 additional people who are now dependent on social assistance. That is a story that we know is repeated over and over in many areas of our country.

As children, many of us grew up in environments that now might be described as poor. However, we overcame the poverty of the 1930s and of rural Canada. We did not have the same type of social pressures on us that we find on the children today. We did not have the television to point out in minute detail exactly what we were missing in a have-not environment.

The findings in "Child at Risk" show that children learn their values from the television, as it is such an efficient teaching tool. What they learn is material success, and crime tends to result when children learn values but not clear means to achieve them. The distinction between the lower and middle classes were not as obvious as they are now. The opportunities that existed in the 1950s are no longer available, as resource-based industries continue to close at an alarming rate. As the problems continue to escalate, then the magnitude of the escapes we use continues to grow as well.

Drugs and alcohol certainly are not new problems, but their widespread use borders on a national crisis. How does this impact on the poor children? We cannot turn back the clock on society, and, indeed, we would not want to. We must instead address our energies to solving the problems that now exist and to coping as best we can with an ever-changing world.

I urge all senators to support the committee as we seek your assistance in the beginning of our work. With today's research facilities we can more clearly show the cost to society of a variety of factors. It will become easier then for governments to fully recognize and appreciate the financial drain that we inflict upon ourselves by allowing children to live in poverty.

The cost of maintaining children in poverty is small compared with the dollars that we must spend to mop up the effects of living in poverty as a child. It is the intent of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee to develop accurately these relationships and cost them out in future dollars.

I am most encouraged by the enthusiasm of our research staff and the Library of Parliament. Their conviction that this can be done is contagious. This is not a project that can be done quickly, honourable senators. What I propose is a long-term project that is essential if governments are to be able to address the problem adequately.

I look forward to your support for this important initiative.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, Senator Robertson's arguments in support of her motion convinced me that it was urgent to get down to work as soon as possible. In view of Senator Marsden's support for this proposal, if no other senators wish to speak and add to all of Senator Robertson's so well structured arguments, I propose that we act on her motion and refer it immediately to the committee concerned.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask Senator Robertson a procedural question.

I notice that your motion does not ask for any power to travel, or anything like that. I know that that is quite consistent with our practices—so I am not suggesting that there is anything faulty in it in any way—but is it your feeling that the committee can do a good deal of its work without travel or expenditure of much in way of funds?

Senator Robertson: I am glad you asked that question. I seem to have overlooked that because of the hour, and I probably should not have done that.

It is the general feeling in talking with our researchers that the usual kind of travel that a committee would do will not be important in this particular work, because we know about the problems, and there is enough done on the problems of poverty. The work is intended to piece together the research that exists now—the research that is recent enough and is still valid—to fill in the blanks. Most of the work will be done by the research staff, with the supervision of the committee.

At some time, if we find that we need additional funds, the chairman of the committee will come to Internal Economy, or whatever the process is there, to identify that requirement. But, in the beginning, I do not see any immediate expenses for travelling and that sort of thing.

In fact, two or three of us have stated that if the research staff suggests to us that we need additional research staff, we would be willing to go to Internal Economy and use the $40,000 that has been identified to transfer that for engaging support staff for this research.

The work is mostly research oriented. The research people will have to find out what is accurate in that which has been done; what is just emerging research; and what has to be drawn up where more work has to be done to fill in the pieces in between. We also intend to work closely with leaders in the social sciences field, the David Rosses of the world, and people who work on a regular basis with the development of social research.

Those of us who have been the instigators of this discussed it. It will depend on how much our own research people can do. But for travelling and those sorts of attendant expenses we feel that we have enough money in our budget to accommodate it. If we do go outside, then we shall make a determination as to whether we go to the $40,000 that we each have or come to the Internal Economy Committee, or whatever the routine is. I am not quite familiar with the path of proper procedure, but we would follow whatever the appropriate path is. I hope that answers your question.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Robertson. First, may I commend her for this initiative and say that I am sure this follow-up study to "Child at Risk" will gladden the heart of our former colleague, Senator McGrand.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator McElman: You will have one person who will be following with close attention.

As we all know, child abuse and its effect in later adult life is not restricted to those who live in poverty. Is it the intention that the study will be restricted to poverty, without reference to the other aspects of deprivation that affect children—abuse and other undesirable factors?

Senator Robertson: Thank you for your question.

First, let me say that there are a number of us—Senator David and Senator Marsden—in the committee who are equally responsible for trying to put this study forward. I am just the lead-off spokesman. I know that Senator David will be speaking to this matter, as will Senator Marsden.

• (1730)

Specifically in response to your question, senator, let me try to explain it this way: Abused children are found living not only in poverty. I think we are all aware of that. The intention of this study is to determine accurately what percentage of abused children either live in poverty or have parents who lived in poverty. We do not know whether that percentage will be 40 per cent or 60 per cent. However, nowadays there are methodologies available whereby we can actually determine those percentages, and those methodologies were not available to researchers ten years ago.

Therefore, in every category we shall be looking at the percentages. For instance, with respect to prostitutes, what percentage of those women now involved in prostitution lived in extreme poverty as children; what percentage of those other groups I have mentioned of people suffering from other forms of abnormal social behaviour had their roots in poverty?

In all of those areas we have been discussing, we know that there is a broader spectrum that we want to target with respect to the impact of living in poverty. Then the next step is to put a dollar sign on each of those percentages. I might explain it in a very simple way. At the end of this work we shall illustrate our findings by using the wheel, the simplest form of graphic expression. In the centre of the wheel we shall put the percentage of children living in poverty—whether it be 17.5 per cent or 20 per cent. Then, on the circumference of the wheel we shall put all of these different types of abnormal social behaviour, such as dropping out of school, unemployment, prostitution, unhealthy mental attitudes, criminal behaviour, and a number of other items. Then, by relating the centre of the wheel—namely, the percentage of children living in poverty—to the subjects on the circumference of the wheel, we shall be able to identify the percentage of children who lived in poverty who later suffered from these various social disorders.

Then comes the task of costing out, because, as all governments have discovered when they struggled with this problem, what we spend on children living in poverty is a small percentage of the whole. What we spend on all of these other abnormal disorders and behaviour are costs that must also be factored in. I hope that helps the honourable senator somewhat.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a Message has been received from the House of Commons, which reads as follows:

House of Commons
Canada

Tuesday, May 17, 1988

ORDERED,—

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House disagrees with both amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, because this House believes that the amendments contradict the principles of the Bill which will provide new rights for creators and a new board to adjudicate between the interests of creators and users of copyright material.

More Specifically:

Amendment 1 deletes the new exhibition right, to the detriment of visual artists who should be compensated for the exhibition of their works.

Amendment 2 delays the coming into force of sections giving the Copyright Board jurisdiction over the collective administration of copyright, to the detriment of both users and creators of copyright material, for whom the Board would be an adjudicative tribunal operating to ensure that royalties to be paid will be equitable.

ATTEST

ROBERT MARLEAU
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this Message be taken into consideration?

Some Hon. Senators: Now.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I move:

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Explain!

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, I think the motion speaks for itself. The only thing that I might add is that on Friday of this week the new National Gallery will be opened and I think it would be appropriate that we should honour the occasion by passing this legislation.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is Senator Sinclair adjourning it to the next sitting or to any specific date?

Senator Sinclair: I suggest next week.

Some Hon. Senators: The next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Sinclair: The next sitting.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us today—and more particularly if he can tell the actual producers in Western Canada—whether or not a program is being developed that will be of assistance to them in the present emergency.

Senator Olson: I invite the leader to do that.

Senator Murray: Agriculture Canada, through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration, has been monitoring drought conditions in Western Canada on an ongoing basis. PFRA, which operates 86 community pastures, reports that forage growth has been slow as a result of dry conditions and cool temperatures. Grazing is not expected to be delayed longer than one to three weeks in most areas, although there are some pockets where it is more severe. Hay and other feed supplies are still good and most producers are able to delay pasturing with no difficulty.

The first and most immediate concern for livestock is the lack of drinking water. PFRA and the provinces have been working to develop new and expand existing water supplies in cooperation with producers. PFRA provides both technical and financial assistance up to one-third the project cost for individuals and up to 50 per cent for groups of farmers and municipalities to resolve water supply problems. PFRA's proposed budget for rural water development facilities is approximately $7.2 million for 1988-1989. In addition, they provide extensive technical assistance in planning and developing these supplies.

If dry conditions continue, there will be significant shortages of hay and pasture. The drought committees in each province, in cooperation with the Agriculture Canada Working Group on Drought, continue to monitor the situation and report to federal and provincial ministers. Each province offers a forage listing service as an aid to farmers locating suitable hay and pasture.

Through the Crop Insurance Program forage and livestock producers have the opportunity of purchasing financial protection against the possibility of reduced feed supplies. In the event of a continued drought and crop insurance claim payments, farmers can use these funds to assist in defraying the cost of purchasing feed and/or moving feed and livestock.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the review of the situation. I am aware that a long-range water development program is available through PFRA and provincial groups. However, that is not what farmers need. They need some immediate relief to feed cattle in areas where the grass has not grown at all this spring, not at all. I suppose what the leader just read is the complete report so far from the Minister of Agriculture. I want the leader to know that people in the area who are familiar with the situation were well aware that the efforts referred to were going on, but there has been no announcement as to what kind of relief program this government, in cooperation with provincial governments, is going to put in place.

Honourable senators, I am not talking about an expensive program. The price of hay is beginning to rise very rapidly. A transportation subsidy program such as the ones that were put in place in the past by more than one government would stabilize the price of hay and give the cattle producer a much wider choice on where to buy it, which keeps costs from escalating and prevents local gouging. The program would not cost a lot of money. I think perhaps up to $10 million would pay for it. That is why I do not understand the paralysis of this government in getting on with announcing the program. I certainly hope that the minister and whoever is in the field looking at this situation are not saying, as the leader just said, "If the drought continues, there will be some kind of program." I want the Leader of the Government to know that this is an emergency now, today, May 18. Thousands of cattle are being moved by truck already, and hay is being hauled in large quantities.

• (1410)

It seems to me to be unconscionable that a government would demonstrate the kind of paralysis that this government is demonstrating by saying that there is no emergency now. I want to inform the Leader of the Government in the Senate that an emergency does exist right now, and I hope he will convey that assessment of people on the ground to the Minister of Agriculture and whoever else will be involved in setting up the program.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point Senator Olson is making, but, with great respect, I must observe that he is debating the reply that I brought on behalf of the minister and of the government. That is his right, but I suggest, however, that he should do so in a more organized and effective fashion by bringing in a notice of inquiry and then making his speech on this matter. I would undertake at that time that either I or one of my colleagues will speak on behalf of the government in such a debate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I gave such notice of motion yesterday, and I intend to proceed with that because I think we need a program and that this government needs some guidance and recommendations. However, that is a longer range approach. I hope that we do not have to rely on that motion to provide recommendations to the government for some immediate relief. In terms of a longer term program, I do intend to move my motion.

Can the minister give us some undertaking now that the government will look at this with urgency in light of the existing emergency situation?

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I trust I have indicated that exactly that is being done by the federal government in cooperation with the provinces and the industry. The honourable senator should not be under any illusions on that score.

I am suggesting to him that if he has further representations to make he should make them in a debate and I will see that that they are conveyed to the minister, and, indeed, I will undertake to have a spokesman for the government reply on our behalf.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I spent the last couple of hours on the telephone checking with people on the ground in the area of Canada that is being affected. Will the minister give an undertaking to carry a message to the minister to the effect that he really should get some people out there to look at the real world?

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that asked by Senator Olson.

I ask the minister to consider the fact that if something is not done in this emergency situation producers may liquidate their herds and that the loss of breeding stock would disrupt the beef economy of those producers for a long time to come. The urgency is to do something to assure those people that there is some support so that they will maintain their herds which are essential to the well-being of the prairie economy in the years ahead. There are precedents for those kinds of programs.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again I appreciate the points being made by the honourable senator, but I do want to assure him that the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers in this government from western Canada are in close, daily touch with this situation.

Senator Argue: Can the minister say whether there will be an announcement at an early date as to what action this government is going to take?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, just a few minutes ago I reported from the Minister of Agriculture as to what the situation is, what the attitude of his department is, and what activity is taking place as between the federal and the provincial governments. When there is something further to report, I will not hesitate to bring a report into the Senate.

Senator Olson: Like tomorrow?

Senator Argue: That kind of poor report generates the question.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

RE-ENERGIZING OF DEBT STRATEGY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PROPOSAL—INTERPRETATION OF DELAYED ANSWER—REQUEST FOR MORE SPECIFIC ANSWER

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On May 10 Senator Phillips, on behalf of the government, tabled a delayed answer in response to a question by Senator MacEachen concerning the position the government might be taking at the Economic Summit, relative to Third World debt.

The answer from the government, which I quote, reads as follows:

Since the onset of the debt crisis in 1982, the Canadian government has supported a cooperative international strategy for managing the financial problems of heavily indebted developing countries. The strategy has been applied on a case by case basis to a wide variety of countries, and has succeeded in gradually reducing the threat to the international financial system and in bringing needed economic reforms and a resumption of economic growth to some of the indebted countries. The strategy has evolved more or less continuously throughout this period, with the most recent development being the introduction of new financial innovations which succeed in reducing the absolute amount of a country's debt. Two such schemes have been implemented already—by Mexico and Bolivia—and more are apparently being studied by these and other countries. Canada supports such new and imaginative innovations, which are designed and implemented on a case by case, voluntary basis, and whose essential financial aspects are determined by market forces.

Honourable senators, to that point the answer is a pure description of what is commonly known as the Baker plan, which most people presently concede, including, I think, the Minister of Finance, needs to be superseded by more active measures.

The answer goes on to state:

We reject, as do other creditor and indeed debtor countries, the notion that some "magic wand" financial scheme can be devised which will rapidly eliminate the international debt problem—

Nothing that I could find in the question posed justified such an insulting reference to the intelligence of those in this chamber, particularly those senators who served, as did the Leader of the Government, on the committee that studied this subject at some length recently. Why the government thought it necessary to impute to us the idea that we thought there was some "magic wand" that would cure this problem, I do not know. However, that is not the subject of my question.

The answer is banal in the extreme and is patronizing in the extreme. Even the briefing notes given to a recent delegation of this Parliament going to Europe dealt with many more innovative steps that the government was considering in this area, including four, by my count, that could be attributed, in part, to the report of my committee in this matter.

The Minister of Finance, in the text of a speech given on April 24, and which was circulated in the dossier that arrived at my desk relative to the forthcoming summit, addressing himself to Third World debt—which he acknowledged was still of urgent importance—stated:

There is widespread recognition that the problem facing the poorest countries can only be addressed through increased amounts of concessional financing. More must be done on that score. We believe that rescheduling commercial credits at interest rates that are below prevailing market rates represents an important new channel for assistance.

He went on in that same speech to deal with the need to address, through GATT, trade matters so that these countries can export their products to developed countries. I need only mention the massive provisioning of Canadian banks, to say nothing of our forgiveness of all sovereign debt in Africa for which I commend the government.

The Globe and Mail of this morning, May 18, has a very—

Senator Doody: Question!

Senator van Roggen: I have a question in exactly one minute.

The Globe and Mail this morning, in a lead editorial—which might enlighten some honourable senators if they were to read it—goes on at length to describe the numerous suggestions being posed by different countries and institutions, including Canadian institutions, to help resolve this debt problem, which is getting worse, not better. One paragraph of that editorial states:

Canada's Bank of Nova Scotia has made a similar proposal, First Interstate Bancorp. of Los Angeles another, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce yet another. But all of them run up against the over-principled opposition of the Reagan administration to anything that smacks of "interference" in markets. And all of them look to the G-7 summit to bring the wisdom of other leading capitalist states to bear on Ronald Reagan's myopia.

My question to the minister is: Are we to take the answer that was tabled here on May 10 to mean that we stand four-square with "Ronald Reagan's myopia" in doing nothing but parroting the old Baker plan? Would the government leader go back to the department and ask for something other than this rather patronizing piece of pabulum that we received on May 10? Indeed, would he ask for a statement of the specific things Canada is hoping to take to the summit by way of suggestions that would help alleviate this problem?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACQUIRED IMMUNE DEFICIENCY SYNDROME—EDUCATION, RESEARCH AND TREATMENT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, earlier this week, at an international conference on AIDS, delegates deplored the meagre financial assistance given by the federal government for education only—a mere $750,000—to assist in the education, research and treatment of the victims of AIDS. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is his government's intention to increase financial aid in these three areas.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators will be aware that the National AIDS Program was established in 1983. In May 1986 the present Minister of National Health and Welfare announced a $39 million five-year national program to address the AIDS issue. The program comprises the following elements: research on all aspects of AIDS; public and professional education through a contract with the Canadian Public Health Association; support for community-based AIDS organizations throughout the country, and an enhancement of diagnostic capability in order to detect the presence of the AIDS virus in regions throughout the country.

In July of 1987 the federal centre for AIDS was established in order to coordinate all activities undertaken by the Canadian government for the control and management of AIDS. I am aware from media reports of criticisms of government policy at the conference to which my friend referred. When there are further announcements to be made, they will be made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I will inform the Senate of them.

COMPLIANCE ORDER FOR DRUGS OTHER THAN AZT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. According to the latest statistics, approximately 1,761 active cases of AIDS presently exist in Canada. Some of these suffering Canadians are now facing death and are asking the government to approve quickly drugs other than AZT so that they can try them in an effort to save their lives. Is it the intention of the government to expedite matters and to issue a compliance order for the use of drugs other than AZT for the treatment of AIDS?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I think I brought in a reply to that question, or to a similar question, some time ago. I shall ask for an up-to-date report from my colleague, Mr. Epp, and I shall bring that report in as soon as possible.

Senator Haidasz: I have another supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate make representations to his government to bring in legislation similar to that in the United States, called the Orphan Drug Act, which assists pharmaceutical companies in conducting research and producing more rare drugs for the treatment of AIDS?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall convey my friend's representations to my colleague, Mr. Epp.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

CHILD-CARE FACILITIES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all delighted to know that the new National Gallery of Canada will be opening this week. It will be an attraction for Canadians and visitors from abroad and a great national institution.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would tell us whether this new, important national facility will have a child-care centre where young children can be left while visitors view the exhibits.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

STATUS OF AND STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO CANADIAN TRADE AMBASSADOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Charles McElman: I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is Mr. Simon Reisman currently on the payroll of the Government of Canada as trade ambassador?

Senator Haidasz: And his salary.

Senator McElman: I am not interested in his salary, honourable senators.

When you inquire, would you take into account his recent activities? If he is still on the payroll, perhaps his pay might be deducted for the particular day I am concerned about.

While speaking to the Saint John's Board of Trade, he put aside the role of trade ambassador and entered the field of politics. I do not know if he was becoming a prospective candidate.

Senator Murray: On what side?

Senator McElman: In any event, I draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government one or two of Mr. Reisman's comments. While speaking about the Free Trade Agreement, he suggested that the Senate might try to block it. Up to this point I have not heard that from anyone.

Senator Flynn: He is referring to your side of the house.

Senator McElman: Of course not. Like you, I respect the role of Parliament. Mr. Reisman said:

If the Senate were to try . . . to deny the will of the Canadian people, expressed in the elected representatives in the Parliament, of course it puts the Senate at risk.

He goes on at great length to make references to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, which I will not deal with at this time.

He then goes on and makes a more intelligent statement. He says:

I shouldn't be trying to speak for the political people . . .

However, he does, and he says:

I think the prime minister intends to put this agreement through the Parliament of Canada expeditiously and then go to the people.

My advice is get the agreement in place and then go to the people.

I ask the Leader of the Government if he considers statements of this kind to be part of the role of a trade ambassador?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall have to inquire to see what Mr. Reisman's present status is. With regard to his comments about the Senate and the danger of the Senate's blocking the will of the elected representatives of the people, that does not seem to me to be an excessive comment but, rather, a statement of the obvious.

• (1430)

Senator McElman: From the honourable senator I accept that as an appropriate comment by him. I am simply saying that I do not accept it as an appropriate comment from Ambassador Reisman—if he is still an ambassador.

THE CABINET

STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Charles McElman: Moving to another subject—

Senator Flynn: Good!

Senator Sinclair: He is embarrassed!

Senator McElman: Senator Flynn, when I finish with this one, I do not think you will say, "Good."

Senator Flynn: I'm an optimist!

Senator McElman: I am about to return you to your usual role of being a pessimist.

Senator Frith: "Pest" or "pessimist"?

Senator McElman: Choose your own word.

On May 11, 1988, the Toronto Star reported under the cut line "Stand on guard for our culture says 'lost intellectual' Masse." I have a couple of quotations from that article.

First, it is stated in the article, after a two-hour interview, that "closest friends of the Prime Minister have always said privately that Mr. Masse looks down his nose at Mulroney's intellect."

Senator MacEachen: Oh!

Senator Argue: He has a long way to look!

Senator McElman: Are you listening, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: Yes. I was just saying, "What do you think he thinks of us?"

Senator Steuart: He likes you; he's just not crazy about that other fellow!

Senator McElman: From Mr. Masse's pinnacle, I suspect that he does not think much of us.

I have another quotation from Mr. Masse. He states:

I admit. I feel alone.

Senator Argue: Intellectually!

Senator McElman: He goes on to say:

I'm an intellectual lost in a world of pragmatists.

He then moves to policy, and he says:

My point in the cultural sector is that the problem isn't a lack of money—

What we have is a lack of policy.

That is a statement made by a minister in the cabinet. He says, "What we have is a lack of policy." There are some delightful quotations in this article. I will just read one more.

Senator Frith: More, more!

Senator Flynn: We have all afternoon; go ahead!

Senator McElman: I know you are enjoying it!

[Senator McElman.]

Senator Frith: You even have permission from Senator Flynn!

Senator Flynn: I am enjoying it even more than you are.

Senator McElman: That, I question.

He goes on to say:

My background is my background. It's a background—

Senator Frith: Give us a moment to digest that. That is a profound statement. That is a heavy, intellectual comment. It is a little deep for us.

Senator McElman:

—learning about systems, learning about histories, learning about civilizations and literature and art... that makes me different from the others—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator McElman:

—because I think about the why of things.

My question to the Honourable Leader of the Government is: Why don't the Leader of the Government and his colleagues release this man from the Philistine mob so that he may soar, perhaps to the heights of Mount Olympus, where he could deal with his intellectual equals, the gods?

Senator Argue: What about Marc Lalonde?

Senator Murray: —of the need for day care, and so on.

I shall make some inquiries on this matter. While I am looking for Simon Reisman, I shall also look for Marcel Masse and Monique Bégin at or near Mount Olympus.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I hope this is not an announcement on the part of the government leader that he is not feeling well and that he will depart this vale of tears for the heights of that mountain in Greece!

Senator Flynn: You have come down a long way yourself!

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONTROL OF EDUCATION—IMPACT OF MASTER TUITION AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer other than the one that Senator Murray read a few minutes ago. It is in answer to a question asked by Senator Marchand on May 3, 1988, dealing with Indian Affairs—Control of Education—Impact of Master Tuition Agreement—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

Historically, the federal government has accepted financial responsibility for on-reserve Indian students attending schools on and off reserve. For such students attending provincial schools, the federal government reimburses the per student costs incurred by provincial authorities, subject to agreed upon terms.

Under the Master Tuition Agreement, the federal government meets its financial obligations resulting from the provision of provincial education services to such Indian students. The newly signed Agreement continues this basic arrangement but allows local agreements between bands and school districts to be developed in meeting the federal responsibility.

The Department was not able to fully obtain the Indian position (of using only local agreements between bands and school districts) in its negotiations with the province. This resulted from the fact that provincial legislation did not allow school districts to enter into tuition agreements. An agreement with the province was therefore required in order to make local level agreements possible. In addition, not all bands wanted a local agreement or wanted to negotiate a local agreement at the same time. There would have been a considerable delay in meeting the federal responsibility of paying the education costs if it was to wait for putting in place local level agreements.

Although using local agreements is a major departure from the province's existing practice and requires change to the province's fiscal framework of education, the province agreed to make local agreements possible. This may be regarded as a most significant step toward Indian control of Indian education and a watershed which provides the direction for future developments in Indian education in British Columbia.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCHOLARSHIPS—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS—FURTHER ANSWER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Senator Stewart asked a question yesterday concerning a scholarship program for undergraduate students in Canadian universities. He referred to previous questions he had asked on March 30 last, to which I had responded on April 19.

I have some further notes which I will read into the record at this point. They are in French.

[Translation]

The purpose of the program is to identify and reward talented young Canadians who are interested in pursuing studies and a career in science and engineering, so as to help Canada better meet the challenges posed by international competition.

The federal Government has jurisdiction to act in this field by virtue of its general spending power. Parliament will be asked to approve the required funds at the appropriate time.

The provinces also support this initiative announced by the Prime Minister on January 13. They are particularly pleased with the built-in program goal of awarding at least 50 per cent of these scholarships to women in order to assure them of fair representation in scientific disciplines in future.

This is not a program designed and delivered unilaterally by the federal Government. The provinces (in particular, the Science and Technology and the Education ministers) are consulted at each step in the development of the future program. This is part of a broader framework of federal-provincial consultation on the future of post-secondary education in Canada, which included the Forum on Post-secondary Education in the fall of 1987 and which continues on a regular basis with meetings of the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada (CMEC) and the Secretary of State and other federal ministers, depending on the issues under discussion.

All the details of the selection process and the program development procedures were stated in an announcement by the Minister responsible, the Hon. F. Oberle, in a press release issued on March 28.

[English]

I have a copy somewhere of the press release put out by my colleague, Mr. Oberle, on that date. I can send a copy of it to Senator Stewart.

EMERGENCIES BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish—Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, this is one of the most important bills introduced by the government in the present Parliament. It is a bill which demands close examination by the Senate. I turned up the pages of the House of Commons Debates for 1914, when the War Measures Act was enacted, and I found that the second reading is recorded in nine Hansard lines. Then, at the committee and third reading stage, it took exactly 31 Hansard lines. Honourable senators, I think we must find time and space to give this bill a more thorough consideration.

As Senator Hicks stated in his most helpful address yesterday, and as Senator Kelly had stated earlier, the bill seeks to anticipate four different kinds of emergency situations; four situations in which the normal processes of parliamentary government would be set aside. The first of these is a public welfare emergency such as a drought; the second is a public order emergency; the third is an international emergency; and the fourth category is a war emergency.

The bill is extraordinary in at least three ways: First, it delegates to the Governor in Council legislative powers that are normally retained jealously by Parliament itself. Second, it authorizes the Governor in Council to legislate on matters that normally come within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Third, it authorizes massive interventions in Canadian society—interventions touching and even controlling people's lives and liberties, people's property and the operation of the economy. Talk about government intervention in the market! This bill authorizes intervention in the market of a kind that we have not seen in any other piece of legislation since at least 1945. This is massive intervention in society and in the market.

I have reviewed Senator Kelly's address given on April 28, 1988. In that address he commended the massive delegation of power to the Governor in Council which would be effected by this bill. I could not help thinking back to the days when the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker used to denounce government by order in council. In those days that was one of the great Liberal vices. However, now it seems that delegation of legislative power has become a good thing.

It is true that the bill makes elaborate provision for supervision by Parliament of the use of the powers delegated to the Governor in Council. However, so great is the shift of actual power—as distinct from supervisory power—from Parliament to the executive government in the case of international emergencies or war emergencies that we must ask ourselves what need there would be for Parliament itself to meet and to act—that is, what need aside from the performance of its supervisory role.

I do not argue at this time that the bill should not be enacted in its present form. That is not the case I wish to make. My submission is much more modest. It is that we need to know far more than we have been told so far about the meaning of the bill and about the implications of the bill.

Just what are the powers that the government is asking Parliament to delegate? For each of the four types of emergency the Governor in Council would be able to arm itself with emergency powers by a declaration of emergency. In the case of a war emergency, the bill states—and I quote from clause 38(1):

When the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, that a war emergency exists and necessitates the taking of special temporary measures for dealing with the emergency, the Governor in Council, after such consultation as is required by section 44, may, by proclamation, so declare.

[Senator Stewart.]

The provision for a declaration in each of the other three types of emergency is exactly the same, except for minor variations concerning consultation with provincial governments.

Notice, honourable senators, that in all four instances the essential requirement is strictly subjective. That requirement is the belief of the Governor in Council, the belief of the ministers. There must be prima facie grounds for that belief, but it is on the Governor in Council—not on any court—that Parliament is being asked to confer the power to declare an emergency.

Similarly, when we turn to the orders or regulations that would be possible under the proposed statute, we are told that the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes are necessary or advisable. In the case of a public welfare emergency such as a great drought, those orders or regulations may deal with ten matters, including the requisition, use or disposition of property, and the direction of persons to perform essential services.

Honourable senators, since this is really a new provision not paralleled in the War Measures Act, we must ask just what kind of emergency is contemplated that would go beyond the capacity or the authority of a provincial government. I am not suggesting that one cannot envision such circumstances, but I think that before Parliament delegates authority to deal with a situation, the kind of situation that the government has in mind ought to be described.

What situations have arisen in the past that show that this extensive delegation of power is desirable or advisable? What does the government have in mind? In what instances in the past has the government found itself legally incompetent to do what ought to have been done?

In the case of a public order emergency, the Governor in Council is to be empowered to make extraordinary new laws dealing with five matters. Those matters include the prohibition of any public assembly that may reasonably be expected to lead to a breach of the peace, travel to any specified area or the use of specified property. Honourable senators, why are such extraordinary powers needed in Canada? We are not now talking about a welfare emergency; we are talking about a public order emergency. What kind of threat to peace, order and good government—or to law and order, to use a more conventional expression—is anticipated here? What does the government have in mind? What situations have arisen in the past that would suggest that this kind of power is required for the future?

● (1450)

An international emergency is defined as:

—an emergency involving Canada and one or more other countries that arises from acts of intimidation or coercion or the real or imminent use of serious force or violence and that is so serious as to be a national emergency.

The orders or regulations to be made by the ministers in such a situation may deal with 12 matters, including the appropriation and control of property, the control of any industry or service, the control of travel, and the appropriation of money without normal parliamentary authority. This is an extraordinary request by the government for parliamentary power.

Honourable senators will have noticed that in the case of the three aforementioned types of emergency the Governor in Council would be limited to specific matters, matters such as property, travel, performance of essential services, and the like. However, in the case of war emergencies, there is no specification. In other words, there is no limitation. The bill simply and starkly provides for a wholesale delegation. Clause 40(1) reads:

While a declaration of a war emergency is in effect, the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

A war emergency is defined as:

—war or other armed conflict, real or imminent, involving Canada or any of its allies that is so serious as to be a national emergency.

The War Measures Act, which is the act supplanted by this far more comprehensive bill, provides for war or insurrection. This bill makes provision for three other lower level types of emergency. The government is asking for delegated power for three new types of emergency. It is asking for emergency powers over Canadians in three new types of situations. We need a full explanation of the need for these new powers.

Now I would like to focus the attention of honourable senators on the provisions for war emergencies. Here the government contends that it is replacing the bad, old War Measures Act with a fine new statute. I ask: In what way would the power of the Governor in Council to make orders and regulations under this proposed statute be less, or more moderate, than the powers under the War Measures Act? The War Measures Act states:

The Governor in Council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the Governor General in Council extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated,—

And the act goes on to set out a list of enumerated heads. In contrast, this bill is wonderfully succinct. I have already quoted its operative provision with regard to war emergencies. It says that "the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency." It is very economical in its language. There seems to be no difference whatsoever in the scope or plenitude of delegation when it is believed by the government that war is real or to be expected. Senator Flynn was absolutely right in his remarks on this point yesterday.

We must know what powers it is that the government is seeking from Parliament. I would like to put forward some questions concerning specific powers. I do not propose that this is an exhaustive list; certainly it is not. I have picked out a few questions, most of which deal with important powers. Perhaps one of my questions would be dismissed in the other place as trivial.

The first question is: Could the provisions of other acts of Parliament be altered by orders in council made under this bill? Clause 4 of the bill states in part:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed or applied so as to confer on the Governor in Council the power to make orders or regulations.

(a) altering the provisions of this Act; or—

What about orders or regulations altering the provisions of other acts?

We must remind ourselves that there is jurisprudence relative to the alteration of the provisions of acts of Parliament by order in council. In 1918 the Supreme Court of Canada, in a famous case, found that exemptions from military service established by Parliament itself in the Military Service Act, 1917 had been legally altered by order in council. Exemptions had been reduced by an order in council made under the War Measures Act. It was argued in that case that the enumeration of the several specific heads on which orders might be made had the effect of limiting the power delegated by Parliament to the Governor in Council by the general words; however, that contention was dismissed. The Chief Justice of Canada said in the ruling:

It was also urged, at the argument, that the powers conferred by section 6 were not intended to authorize the Governor in Council to legislate inconsistently with any existing statute, and particularly not so as to take away a right (the right of exemption) acquired under a statute. Here, again, Mr. Newcombe's answer appears to be conclusive. There is no difference between statute law and common law, and consequently if effect is given to that point the government would be denied any power to amend the law as a war measure, no matter how urgent or necessary that might be for public safety. Such an interpretation seems absurd and impossible. It seems to me obvious that Parliament intended, as the language used implies, to clothe the executive with the widest powers in time of danger. Taken literally, the language of the section contains unlimited powers.

He was speaking there of the War Measures Act.

• (1500)

The question I am asking is: How do the powers that would be delegated in clause 40 differ from the powers given to the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act? There seems to be no difference, except that here the delegation is accomplished in more economical language.

Then I ask another question: Could orders or regulations under the Emergencies Act now proposed be used to introduce conscription and to send conscripted personnel overseas? This could be done under the comparable provisions of the War Measures Act. I remind honourable senators that in 1940 the Mackenzie King government had Parliament enact the National Resources Mobilization Act which prohibited sending conscripted persons overseas. Then in the spring of 1942, after a plebiscite, the government of the day undertook to remove that prohibition in what came to be called, rather awkwardly, the "National Resources Mobilization Act Amendment Act." One of the members of the King government, Mr. Cardin, from the province of Quebec, resigned from that government because he did not accept this as good public policy. In a letter to Mr. Cardin the Prime Minister stated:

As you are aware, the government might have proceeded in this matter by order in council under the War Measures Act. Having regard, however, to its responsibility to parliament, the government has felt that such action as is necessary to bring existing legislation into conformity with the will of the people expressed in the vote on the plebiscite should be taken, not by order in council under the War Measures Act, but by act of parliament.

In other words, Mr. King was saying we could have gone the order-in-council route—we could have used the delegated power—but we preferred not to. Mr. King liked to pat himself on the back for being a great lover of Parliament.

Honourable senators, in a speech delivered later Mr. King made a very important interpretation of the War Measures Act and, therefore, by implication, to the extent that this bill parallels the War Measures Act, of the present bill itself. He said:

Up to the present, I have said nothing of the powers which, under the War Measures Act, the governor in council already possesses. Under that act, as interpreted by judicial decision and by the legal advisers of the government, the governor in council has authority, notwithstanding section 3, to send men enlisted under the National Resources Mobilization Act to points outside the boundaries of Canada and the territorial waters thereof. In other words, if, to-day, in the opinion of the government, the war situation demanded the dispatch overseas of men already called up under compulsion for military service, the government has the necessary legal power to order their dispatch.

In other words, Mr. King is reporting that according to the advice that had been given to the government of that day by the law officers of the Crown, under the War Measures Act, they could have conscripted men and they could have sent them overseas even though there might have been on the statute books a prohibition. Indeed, the War Measures Act was used in November 1944 for the latter purpose.

My question is: How different would the legal situation be if the bill now before us were law? That is a question I think we must have answered. It is not good enough to say that it is a question that is not relevant at this time. If we pass this bill, will we be delegating to the Governor in Council the capacity to conscript people into the armed forces and to send them outside Canada?

Third, what provision does the bill make for dealing with insurrection, real or imminent? When Senator Kelly moved second reading on April 28, he referred to the 1970 incident. He said:

... I think the best that can be said of the events in 1970 is that when the government went to the cupboard, the only thing available was the War Measures Act, a very blunt instrument designed, as its name suggests, for war-time use.

The implication of Senator Kelly's comment is that this bill will put something additional, something better, something more suitable in the cupboard. Well, where is that something? One immediately looks at the provisions with regard to a public order emergency; yet they seem to be inadequate for the kind of situation to which Senator Kelly is referring. Perhaps there is something in the bill—but if there is, I have not been able to find it—which would be appropriate to the kind of situation to which he referred.

Fourth, could an order be made ordering the internment of Canadian citizens during an emergency? The relevant provision in the bill, clause 4(b), states:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed or applied so as to confer on the Governor in Council the power to make orders or regulations...

(b) providing for the detention, imprisonment or internment of Canadian citizens or permanent residents as defined in the Immigration Act, 1976 on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

What about other grounds? Camilien Houde would not have been protected by any of those prohibitions when he was detained during World War II.

Senator Flynn: It is the same as we have in the Charter. Why do they repeat it?

Senator Stewart: I am sorry, I do not understand the point.

Senator Frith: He is asking the same question as you, which is: Why do they repeat the language?

Senator Stewart: There is a point that we should notice here. Under the Canadian Bill of Rights, a person detained would have access to the remedy of habeas corpus. That was used during the Second World War, or at least its use was anticipated by Mr. St. Laurent who was the Minister of Justice. What would have happened if there had been access to a writ of habeas corpus in the case of the Russian spies who were held incommunicado in 1946? I am referring to the Gouzenko incident. Mr. St. Laurent said that a writ of habeas corpus would not have helped those who were detained. They would have obtained their writ, but the government would have displayed an order for their detention and that would have satisfied the court that they were legally detained. So the writ of habeas corpus does not mean a detained person is going to get a trial on the merits.

● (1510)

Fifth, what, if any, legal obstacle would there be in the law of Canada, constitutional or otherwise, to the imposition of new taxes by order in council during a war emergency?

This possibility was canvassed in 1939. There seems to have been a view that that could be done under the War Measures Act. If the powers in the Emergencies Bill are comparable, if they are parallel to those in the War Measures Act insofar as war emergencies are concerned, I ask the question: Could the executive government proceed to levy new taxes on Canadian corporations, for example, without parliamentary action?

Those are some of the major questions that I think we have to raise here. They were not raised in the other place.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Stewart: I have another question which is peculiarly a Senate question. Provision is made in clause 61(1) for the tabling of orders and regulations made pursuant to the act. However, clause 61(2) makes provision for the review of secret orders or regulations. In other words, what is anticipated is that most orders and regulations would be tabled and made public in Parliament; however, some orders and regulations might be held back. That, incidentally, was done in the case of the order in council that permitted the holding of the spies incommunicado in 1946. There is a cautionary provision, however; there is to be a Parliamentary Review Panel. That panel is to be "a committee of both Houses of Parliament."

Then we are told, in clause 62(2):

The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in the House of Commons.

My question is: Does this mean that if emergency orders were made by the present Progressive Conservative government, the presence of one Progressive Conservative senator would be sufficient to constitute a joint committee? Or if on some future date orders in council were made by a Liberal government or an NDP government that the presence of one Liberal senator, or, if it happened to be an NDP government, one NDP senator—if one can imagine that—would be sufficient? There appears to be no provision for participation of senators from both sides of this house on the Parliamentary Review Committee. I think that is probably an oversight, which could be corrected easily with unanimous support in this house.

Honourable senators, I am not arguing that this bill should not be passed in its present form insofar as its major components are concerned; what I am saying is that we have to do better than they did in 1914. There are very important questions concerning taxation, conscription, the expenditure of public money and other matters to which we have to have clear and unequivocal answers from persons in positions to give clear and unequivocal answers. This is a measure that we have to take seriously. The country will applaud us if senators on both sides of the chamber do thorough work on this proposed measure.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: First of all, I want to thank Senator Hicks, Senator Flynn and, of course, Senator Stewart for their interventions. This is indeed an important bill. I cannot help but agree totally with many of the comments Senator Stewart has made. There are serious questions that need answers. I am tempted to try to offer my own comments on the questions, but I think they would fall short of what is needed here. I think it is important to see that this bill moves to committee as soon as possible, where the minister, representatives of the Department of Justice and other appropriate witnesses can respond to these very sensitive and important questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

MOTION FOR REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I move that Bill C-77 be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, that the bill be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, having listened to Senator Stewart, I think we should consider the appropriateness of having this bill referred to a Committee of the Whole. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the motion of reference so that I may have an opportunity to discuss this with my colleagues and also with the leadership on the other side.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottreau, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Frith moved the adjournment of the debate on the motion to refer the bill to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.

Senator Hicks: Yes. That is all Senator Frith did.

Senator Frith: What motion was put?

Senator Flynn: I do not know.

Senator Frith: The motion I moved, Your Honour, was that the debate on Senator Kelly's motion to refer the bill to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence be adjourned.

Senator Hicks: Yes, and that does not interfere with the motion for second reading.

Senator Frith: The motion for second reading has been adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bélisle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-89, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (victims of crime).—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I am happy to speak today to Bill C-89 and to know that the measures for the protection of and assistance to victims of crime will soon become legislative reality. As Senator Bélisle pointed out last week when he introduced this bill on second reading, victims have too often been the forgotten persons in the criminal justice system. They have been used, abused and/or ignored. So measures to protect them are long overdue.

● (1520)

Senator Bélisle has summarized very carefully what those measures are, so I need not repeat them. I think it is safe to say that we, and the public generally, will support their broad intent.

In going through the proceedings of the legislative committee of the other place, it was clear that the sympathy of its members was fully engaged in promoting and strengthening the rights of and protection for victims. Those objectives are laudable in themselves and are worthy of our consideration and support, but there are other factors which must be weighed with equal care. Those factors involve principles which are fundamental to our entire criminal justice system: open and public trials; freedom of the press; the right of the accused not to be convicted of an offence unless he or she is given a fair trial in accordance with age-old precepts, which include the right of the accused to be given a reasonable opportunity to test every element of the Crown's case; and the right to be sentenced, even if duly convicted, according to principles of sentencing that reflect the concerns of all members of society and which are applied fairly and evenly.

We must respond to the needs of victims without unduly impinging upon any of these basic principles and without sacrificing the rights of the accused. This may require a very delicate balancing of interests. The bill contains several different measures designed to move that balance closer to the legitimate needs and interests of victims of crime. These measures give rise to a number of legal and constitutional issues that, I suggest, have not been given a close enough examination to this point.

I am thinking of such proposed measures as the extension of the discretionary and mandatory bans on publication of the names of complainants and witnesses. Bill C-89 extends publication bans to three more offences. At present all of the offences to which such bans apply are sexual offences. The bill adds one more sexual offence and two offences that are not of this character—extortion and criminal interest rate.

Senator Bélisle has offered what appear to be valid reasons for extending non-publication provisions to non-sexual offences, although the Supreme Court of Canada has declared, in the case of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia et al. v. MacIntyre, which dealt with loan-sharking, that the:

... sensibilities of an adult person, whether he or she is the accused or a witness, is not a valid basis for limiting the publication of criminal proceedings.

Therefore, the question we must ask ourselves is whether we are prepared to see a gradual erosion of the principle of open trials through the piece-by-piece addition to these provisions of new offences.

As my honourable friend noted, the provisions will make the non-publication ban mandatory when the victim is under the age of 18 years. It would also be mandatory when the complainant, whether over or under the age of 18 years, or the prosecutor asks for it. However, the Chief Justice of Ontario, in the case of The Canadian Newspapers Co. Ltd. v. Attorney General for Canada, has stated that:

Openness of the courts is essential for the maintenance of public confidence in the administration of justice . . .

The Appeal Court also found any mandatory ban to be unconstitutional as an infringement of the rights guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I should add that an appeal of this finding was heard by the Supreme Court of Canada on March 2 of this year, so we may have a final statement on this matter before the Senate completes its examination of Bill C-89.

There are good reasons for including in the bill provisions to permit photographic evidence to be used in many more ways, but I believe that some of the procedures to implement its use require more detailed study.

Other sections of the bill may also require more consideration. For instance, sections 445.1 and 446 of the Criminal Code already contain detailed provisions concerning detention and return of property, so the new amendments to them should be examined in order to understand why additional measures may be necessary and justifiable.

The provisions for the use of affidavits as to ownership and value of property also present particular problems. The question of the value of stolen property may be an extremely critical one. The maximum jail sentence for theft of property worth more than $1,000 is ten years, but if the property is not worth more than $1,000, the maximum jail term is two years. The adequacy of an affidavit as a substitute for testimony at trial by the owner, and the requirements for the statements to be included in that affidavit, may be crucial questions.

The broadening of the court's power to order offenders to make restitution to victims is a welcome amendment, but the manner in which the application of these provisions is expressed may give rise to unintended consequences, including possible unconstitutional invasions of provincial jurisdictions.

The use of victim impact statements has been the subject of criticism and concern in some quarters, including judicial pronouncements. Nonetheless, we support the measures in this bill that are designed to give the victim a voice when it is time to consider the sentence. We must be certain, however, that they will be subject to controls that will ensure that they do not introduce elements prejudicial to the proper application of sentencing principles.

Each of these provisions that I have mentioned briefly invites a number of questions. Since I expect that Bill C-89 will be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, I think it is preferable to raise them in that forum. It is my hope that the committee will be able to report back with reassurances, or, in the alternative, recommendations for amendments that would allay any concerns that may be raised.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

He said: Honourable senators, last month I had the honour to move and to open and close the debate in this chamber on the resolution for constitutional amendment based upon the Meech Lake Accord of 1987. Some weeks from now I expect to introduce into this place Bill C-72, containing the first amendments to be proposed to the Official Languages Act since that important piece of legislation was passed by Parliament in 1969.

● (1530)

Before this session ends I hope to bring into this place the legislation implementing the Free Trade Agreement signed between Canada and the United States.

These, honourable senators, are nation-building measures. Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, is in the same category. It is a nation-building measure.

I want to say at the outset that the regional development policy—the attack on regional disparities—is as vital a part of this government's concept of national unity and national reconciliation as anything we have been discussing in Parliament during this session. I say that this is a new agency, a new effort, and a new concept in regional policy. I say that not to denigrate past efforts in this field.

As I pointed out last month in discussing the Meech Lake resolution, regional needs were recognized in our Constitution as far back as the B.N.A. Act of 1867. They were recognized in our parliamentary institutions and in a very early form of equalization. What we might regard as the modern commitment to regional policy and regional development goes back more than 30 years. Equalization, and the right to equalization payments, is now entrenched in our Constitution as a result of the 1982 exercise. Equalization payments have made it possible for the poorer provinces to offer to their citizens standards of provincial services that are reasonably comparable to those in the richer provinces of the country.

Over the past 30 years, with a good deal of help from the federal treasury, an infrastructure has been built throughout the Atlantic region—ports, airports, highways, industrial parks, and so forth. Even the various programs of business and industrial incentives that have been frequently criticized have not been without their positive result in creating and maintaining businesses and industries in that region that, in all likelihood, would not otherwise have located there.

Over the years we have had a series of federal agencies and departments—the Atlantic Development Board, the Atlantic Development Agency, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion—and we have had various instruments of federal-provincial cooperation in regional economic development, the two most recent such instruments being the General Development Agreements and the ERDAs—the Economic Regional Development Agreements.

The present government enriched considerably the regional development effort in its first two years in office. Certainly the ERDA system was enriched. Incentive tax credits were brought in. The Atlantic Enterprise Program was introduced, featuring, as it does, loan insurance and provision for interest rate buy-downs. The Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit was brought in. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was created. Yet, two years into the mandate of this government, dissatisfaction with federal regional development programs was still pronounced in the Atlantic region, dissatisfaction that persisted, notwithstanding the enrichment of the regional development effort and notwithstanding the improvements in the old programs and the introduction of new programs under the present government.

This dissatisfaction expressed itself in relation to national programs which, in the view of many people in the Atlantic provinces, failed to take account of regional needs and circumstances. It was dissatisfaction expressed with regional programs which seemed always to be formulated outside the region and to be not sufficiently sensitive to the region. There was dissatisfaction with regional programs which, the private sector told us, were strangling through bureaucracy and red tape. We heard all the horror stories of bureaucratic ladders that had to be ascended by applicants for government assistance, leading from the local communities to regional offices to committees of senior officials and assistant deputy ministers in Ottawa. We heard the horror stories of the 30-page application forms that had to be filled out, and all the rest of it. Much of this forms part of the speech by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the course of a Throne Speech debate in the other place at the beginning of the present session.

It was, however, I believe, the dismantling of DREE and the creation of DRIE by the previous government that had a profoundly negative symbolic and psychological effect on the region. This was regarded by many people in the Atlantic region as a blow, because it seemed to confirm some of their worst suspicions about the inconstancy of the federal government's commitment to eliminate regional disparity.

The creation of DRIE out of the remnants of the old Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and out of what was left of DREE was intended—or so it seemed—to blur the important distinctions between industrial policy, concerned as it was with the industrial heartland of Canada, and regional policy, which had been concerned largely with eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. People in the Atlantic regions saw in the disappearance of DREE and its absorption into the industrial policy preoccupations of DRIE the downgrading of regional policy as a national priority.

So DRIE was badly received in the Atlantic region from the beginning. It was regarded as over-centralized and bureaucratized. Frankly, it was never accepted as being dedicated to regional development. In its operations it seemed to many people to lack efficiency and drive and the humanity that is necessary for a regional agency.

The present government had to consider what to do about this situation. One option, I suppose, would have been to try to recreate DREE, to unscramble the omelet, as it were. But that is a very complex undertaking. Those of us who saw the person-hours and the effort that went into creating DRIE and effecting the absorption of some of the old Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce functions into the Department of External Affairs are not anxious to see the whole machinery of government preoccupied for another three or four years in trying to undo what has been done in order to recreate DREE.

[Senator Murray.]

There was, I suppose, the option of creating another central bureaucracy, but given the mood and the attitude of the private sector and the provincial governments in the Atlantic region, that was, to put it mildly, not politically advisable.

• (1540)

The government sought recommendations from a number of sources, but to coordinate his effort and to do his own investigations we called on Professor Donald Savoie, the President and Director General of the Institut développement canadiens de recherche sur le développement régionale at the Université de Moncton. We also enlisted the services of Mr. Dalton Camp, senior adviser to the federal cabinet, who throughout his public and political career had shown a special interest and concern about national policies as they affect regional disparities.

Extensive and intensive consultations were held in the Atlantic region with provincial governments, various public institutions and the private sector.

The result of this has been the creation of an agency that builds on the experience of past achievements and failures. It is an Atlantic regional agency, which is effectively a department of the national government, with its own minister, deputy minister and bureaucracy, who have their place in national policy making and in national decision making.

Unlike other government departments, however, it is headquartered not here but in the region, in Moncton. Decisions are made in the region. There is a private and public sector advisory board drawn from the region. This agency has a decentralized autonomy, authority, flexibility and resources unprecedented in any other government department to carry out its mandate in and for the Atlantic region.

I want to emphasize that the closest consultation has been had with the provincial premiers and the private sector in designing this agency, in appointing the members of the board, and in developing the programs which we have been, and will be, bringing into effect under the sponsorship of the agency.

On June 6 last, when the Prime Minister announced the creation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, we were given responsibility for the existing business incentive programs as they operated in the Atlantic provinces: the IRDP, the Atlantic Enterprise Program, Enterprise Cape Breton, and the Small Business Loans Act as it applied in the Atlantic region. We were told to simplify the process, cut the red tape and tailor and adapt these programs to the needs of the private sector in the Atlantic region.

We were also given responsibility for the ERDAs in the Atlantic region. We were given a mandate to coordinate economic development activities of the federal government in the Atlantic region. We were given a mandate to act in an advocacy role for the region in the development of national policies. On top of this, we were given $1.05 billion over a five-year period, in addition to ongoing regional development expenditures, so that we could develop new programs to encourage entrepreneurship and assist small and medium-sized businesses in the Atlantic region.

Last June we set about simplifying the incentive programs to make them more accessible, more responsive and more prompt to respond to the needs of the private sector. I delegated authority to the region and the local offices for these programs. At the present time only projects with eligible costs of more than $5 million come routinely to my desk. More than 90 per cent of all the applications for assistance are now decided in the region. This has meant a vastly increased take-up by the private sector of these incentive programs and an enormously improved turnaround time in dealing with these applications.

Last February 15 I announced a consolidation of the two major incentive programs then in place, increased assistance available to business and to a wider range of business and business-related activities.

Up to that point the two major programs in place were the IRDP, which offered grants, but to a limited range of businesses—almost exclusively in the manufacturing sector—and the Atlantic Enterprise Program, which supported a wider range of businesses, but offered only loan insurance and interest rate buy-downs.

Since February 15, ACOA, through its action program, offers grants and contributions, loan insurance and interest rate buy-downs to the widest ever range of business and business-related activities.

Assistance is available to business now for capital costs, expansions and modernizations, new product expansion, capital costs for innovation, studies and technical assistance, and even for hiring personnel to implement the marketing program for businesses in the Atlantic region. Now eligible for assistance are not only commercial enterprises but non-commercial organizations and associations, municipalities and their agencies, and universities and local development associations that offer specialized services to the small and medium-sized businesses in the Atlantic region.

What we have done and what we are doing with this action program is enlisting, as far as we can, all the energies and the talents that are available to us, whether they are in the educational system, local government or in the business community, to encourage entrepreneurship and to develop small and medium-sized businesses in the Atlantic region.

In little more than two months, from the time of the announcement on February 15 until April 29, ACOA has approved 337 applications and contributions of almost $42 million—that is in little more than two months. That brings the total since last June to some 1,146 applications approved, with contributions of $161 million, to make possible business investment in the region of $528 million.

I would like to take 20 seconds now to express my appreciation to the staff of the agency, and in particular to the president designate, Mr. Don McPhail, for the tremendous work they have done over the past year or so in handling the enormously increased number of applications that have come into this agency and in effecting the tremendously improved turnaround that has been possible. It is largely due to their dedication and to the extraordinary effort and extra hours of work that they have put in that the reputation and the credibility of the agency in doing what it has set out to do has remained not only intact but has been the subject in recent months of commendation from provincial governments and from many people in the private sector alike. I do want to congratulate and thank the members of our staff for their cooperation in this respect.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, this bill writes into law the unique authority and flexibility of this Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I referred earlier to the coordinating role that is given to the minister and the agency in respect of the economic development activities of the federal government in the region. This coordinating role is backed up by a provision which gives the minister the ability to co-finance national programs of other departments and agencies in order to increase their impact in Atlantic Canada, or to work out special provisions that are unique to Atlantic Canada and would be a pre-condition of such co-financing.

The bill would also give the minister the authority to designate areas where exceptional circumstances provide opportunities for locally based improvements in productive employment. A further provision gives the minister the authority to make regulations within that particular area which would differ from the regulations in force elsewhere in the region. This power to designate areas of special opportunity rather complements the minister's authority under the Special Areas Act, which also comes under my jurisdiction now so far as the Atlantic region is concerned. It complements the minister's authority to designate areas needing efforts because of the exceptional inadequacy of opportunities for productive employment.

Honourable senators, I recognize that we will be going through the bill in more detail when it goes to committee. However, clause 13 outlines the numerous incentive programs—loans, guarantees, loan insurance, interest rate buy-downs, grants and contributions—that will be available to business and business-related activity through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that generally the regulation-making authority under this bill for adding to the programs that are listed in the bill and for establishing criteria will be in the hands of the minister, and not of the Governor in Council—just an added flexibility that is given to the agency and its minister to tailor programs to the needs of the region.

Let me say a word about Part II of this bill, which establishes the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. The purpose of the organization is to promote and assist the financing and development of industry on the Island of Cape Breton in order to provide employment outside the coal mining industry and to broaden the base of the economy of the island. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will do this on its own and in conjunction with others, whether individuals, governments or government agencies, either federal or provincial. This part of Bill C-103 addresses the special needs of Cape Breton, and the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be linked directly to ACOA through the president and the minister of ACOA. However, it will have its own slate of officers and staff and a head office in Sydney, under a vice president of operations. Under this bill, the corporation will carry forward the mandate of the industrial development division of DEVCO—the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Accordingly, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will have broad powers to make loans or grants to, invest in, purchase, lease or promote enterprises based in Cape Breton. ECBC will work closely with Enterprise Cape Breton, an agency created in July of 1985 which has had an impressive record of achievement in Cape Breton.

Honourable senators, the government does not pretend—and never has pretended—that this agency is some kind of panacea for the Atlantic region.

Senator Frith: Or magic wand!

Senator Murray: It is not about miracles; it is not a magic wand; it is not a “quick fix” for the economic problems of the Atlantic region. ACOA is focused more on opportunity than on disparity. That is to say, we are focused on the longer-term improvements that we want to make in the economy of the Atlantic provinces. Over time, and with the growing credibility of the agency in the region, I expect that this agency will become a key agent of economic change in the Atlantic region. Also, I believe that in our emphasis on developing an entrepreneurial climate and, in some parts of the region, an entrepreneurial culture that has been missing for many years, and by encouraging small and medium-sized business, we are on the right track. The other day I saw some statistics which pointed out that in Canada in the period from 1978 to 1985 1.2 million jobs had been created in this country; 86 per cent of those jobs are in firms with fewer than 50 employees; 7 per cent of them in firms with between 51 and 100 employees and only 7 per cent of those new jobs in large companies. In the same set of statistics, I observed that 60 per cent of all private-sector employment is now in firms with fewer than 100 employees.

Honourable senators, in establishing the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, with its emphasis on small and medium-sized business, I believe we are on the right track. It may be, for a change, that the Atlantic region is on top of and ahead of national and international trends. In any case, this agency represents a fundamentally new direction for regional economic development policy. It represents this government's commitment to policies that are tailored to the specific regions of the country. It had its companion legislation debated here yesterday at second reading in the establishment of the Department of Western Economic Diversification.

Honourable senators, there is strong support throughout the Atlantic region for this concept. There is a good relationship that has developed between the agency and the premiers of Atlantic Canada, the private sector and amongst people generally in that region. I ask Parliament to give its support to this agency, to pass this bill in order to give us the legislative means to get on with the job of regional development in Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the adoption of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Bill C-102, An Act to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act, with one amendment), presented in the Senate on 5th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake)).

• (1600)

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I support Bill C-102. These amendments are necessary and deserve the support of the Senate. However, I want to speak on one or two problems arising from the original act, the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act. For two years I was involved as a senior negotiator for the Government of Canada in these negotiations. At that time I tried, but failed, to get the two problems I will speak about today included, and thereby solved, in the final settlement act. These were two of the reasons I stepped aside as chief negotiator. A clash with Mr. Bob DeLury, the chief negotiator for Inuvialuit, was the other major reason that I stepped down.

The first clause that I failed to have included in the final settlement act concerned the right and the responsibility of the Government of Canada to audit and check on the spending of the huge sums of money being handed over to the Inuvialuit. I was concerned then that their chief negotiator, Mr. Robert DeLury, was setting up such a complicated series of corporations that it would ensure his continued control of the Committee of Original Peoples Entitlement, or COPE, as the organization for handling the western Arctic claim is now known. Everything that has happened since that time has reinforced my suspicions. I have received numerous complaints from individual Inuvialuits living in the western Arctic that these funds are being mishandled, and that the ordinary people who are supposed to be helped by the settlement have received little or no benefit and do not really know what is going on.

About a year or so ago, the CBC program “The Fifth Estate” did a program on the COPE settlement which showed that huge sums of money had been badly invested and that money had been wasted on high-priced consultants from southern Canada. As well, it was pointed out that there had been an apparent conflict of interest in the investing of some of these funds. One example was cited, and I am told that there are many more. It concerns the hiring of consultants who recommended the purchase of shares in companies that were owned by the same consultants. These purchases were made and money was invested either in the Bahama Islands or elsewhere in the Caribbean Islands for which no explanation has evidently ever been made. None of these charges—and there are many more—has been properly answered.

As a result, I wrote to the Honourable Bill McKnight, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, asking him to carry out an investigation. He refused. In fairness, I should say I also asked the Honourable John Munro, who was the minister in the previous government, to do the same thing, and he also failed to act. The reason given by both ministers was to the effect that this money belonged to the Inuvialuit and the government had no right to interfere in their internal affairs. I point out that the amount involved is over $150 million. The number of Inuvialuit concerned is about 2,500. In fact, it amounts to about $60,000 for every man, woman and child. Invested at 10 per cent, each individual could receive about $6,000 per year in perpetuity. I realize that that is not the way the money was intended to be spent. The Inuvialuit wanted to build something that would carry on and give their people independent living from now on.

In any event, I reject the excuse that the government could not, or should not, interfere. The mandate under which the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development operates, among other things, gives them the responsibility to help and support the aboriginal people of Canada. I have observed over the years that the same department has moved in on many Indian bands to audit the handling of money entrusted to them. On occasion, charges have been laid for the mishandling of funds. So why not do the same thing in the case of the Inuvialuit of the western Arctic?

It was, in fact, a Liberal government that produced the legislation, and it failed to follow up on complaints. However, I cannot understand why the Conservative government is following the same course. If this money is dissipated—and there is a great deal of evidence that this is happening—there will be an outcry as to why it was allowed to happen, and the government of that day will have to deal with it and will have to support these people, whether they like it or not. If an investigation is carried out and everything is being properly handled, no harm will have been done and the questions and suspicions will have been laid to rest. Such an investigation was just concluded in British Columbia, and the people accused of mishandling Indian bands funds, who were native people, were cleared and exonerated. The present minister has received complaints from northern residents, and I urge the government leader in the Senate to impress on him the urgency of carrying out an investigation into the operations of COPE and its handling of these huge sums of money entrusted to it on behalf of the Inuvialuit people.

Honourable senators, the other point I want to raise has to do with the control of the reindeer herd now owned by William Nasogaluak, an Inuvialuit and former mayor of Tuktoyaktuk. The original herd was purchased from Alaska by Canada many years ago. It changed hands once or twice and finally was purchased by Mr. Nasogaluak. The Government of Canada also gave him grazing rights on the Tuktoyaktuk Peninsula. I do not know if there was anything in writing at the time, but at the time of the granting of these rights the land was Crown-owned and such things as native settlements were a long way off. I do not think anyone really expected that the land would be anything but crown land in perpetuity.

However, the rights to graze this herd were bought by Mr. Nasogaluak. They were implicit and they should not have been taken away from him—literally expropriated. The former Liberal government had promised to ensure that Mr. Nasogaluak would be given the right to carry on those grazing rights with his herd of some 15,000 reindeer a short time before the last election was called. The promise was never carried out. The same problem was passed on to Mr. McKnight and the present government, and they have failed to resolve it. The government has had four years to right this wrong and have not solved this problem yet. In the meantime, Mr. DeLury and COPE are pressuring William Nasogaluak to sell the herd to them for far less than half its real value. He cannot graze that herd or slaughter the 4,000 or 5,000 reindeer per year he usually slaughters to sell all over the world because they have brought an injunction against him. So the value of his herd is deteriorating. He has no income. Nor do the many people in that area to whom he provided jobs. In fact, Mr. Nasogaluak was one of the great success stories of that part of the North. He is being denied simple justice and treated in a disgraceful manner. Again, I urge the government to take action to right these two wrongs.

When this bill was considered in the other place, members of all parties spoke in favour of it. Let me point out that they were all in favour of the Inuvialuit and all in favour of aboriginal rights, but most of them were not prepared to stand up for the rights of ordinary Inuvialuits who are hunters, trappers and fishermen, but not part of the insider circle that controls COPE and the settlement funds. In fairness, there is one exception, and that is Mr. Nickerson, the Conservative member for Western Arctic. He has pressed Mr. McKnight to take action on both these matters and to make sure that the owner of the reindeer herd is given a fair price. The minister pointed out that he was encouraging negotiations between COPE and Mr. Nasogaluak. He asked them to submit to binding arbitration. Mr. Nasogaluak agreed, but COPE refused. The reason that COPE refused is that they have had their eye on this reindeer herd since long before the settlement was ever made, and they know that they have everything to gain and nothing to lose. All they have to do is out-wait this poor individual and they will get the reindeer herd, or what is left of it, for nothing. I still think that Mr. McKnight has the responsibility to step in and protect this gentleman's right.

The minister has a great deal of power. For example, he could have refused to introduce this bill unless COPE agreed to fair negotiations. He has a tremendous amount of power when he wants to use it. He may not have the legal power to force them to binding arbitration, because perhaps that went when we in this house and the members of the other House passed the original settlement act.

Honourable senators, this is an ongoing situation. There will always be changes being made to that act. This will not be the last change, and I hope that before he proposes any other changes to this act he will step in and make sure this problem is settled. Mr. McKnight and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have a responsibility to the Inuit people. They cannot and should not wash their hands of either of these serious problems.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Steuart who, while not living in the territories, is obviously very familiar with this situation.

Honourable senators, two or three weeks ago, along with a couple of delegates from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I attended a committee meeting chaired by Senator Tremblay. At that time there was discussion of the money being allocated to this organization and reference was made to the fact that over the last four or five years there has been no information as to how much money has been allocated to the Inuvialuit in settlement of their land claims. As Senator Steuart says, we do not know how many of the 2,500 Inuvialuit benefited from this.

At that time COPE was really concerned about the settlement, because activity in oil and gas exploration was going on in the Beaufort Sea and the Mackenzie Delta. There was a general feeling by the people that if they did not reach a settlement at that time, then they would lose in terms of the activity that was going on with the resultant loss of jobs for people in the community.

The concern of Senator Steuart and myself is that that money should be spent in the proper way, which is to create jobs for those living in the community. As Senator Steuart has said, some of the money has been invested outside of Canada, which leaves us with the question of how much of the settlement was invested in the activity going on in the Mackenzie Delta.

It also leads to the concern as to how much money was devoted to those with reindeer herds. The cultivation of reindeer herds does have some long-term ramifications in that the production of oil and gas in the North may have a limited life span, but protected reindeer herds can, in the future, mean economic stability for those living in the North. Unlike caribou, reindeer can be herded and reasonably domesticated.

Like Senator Steuart, I was glad to have an opportunity to discuss this bill in committee. It is the feeling of the committee that the company should be audited every year, as is any other organization. There is provision for $150 million over 15 years, and there should be some guarantee to those living in the community that the money will be allocated to be used for projects which will benefit the people of the Mackenzie Delta. As it is now, it may be that the money will benefit only those in the organization. Three weeks ago I visited Victoria Island, and the residents of that island, particularly the older people who have lived off the land all of their lives, were looking forward to a settlement so that they could enjoy some of the money before they die. I do not know what the policy of COPE is regarding those with known land claims.

As Senator Steuart has said, unlike other business people, there is a feeling in this respect that if they run out of money they will get more from the government next year. That is not the attitude in a private organization. We, here in Ottawa, have a responsibility in terms of how that money is spent, because we have a responsibility to protect the native people. We must ensure that the money is spent on the people in the northern communities.

I hope the minister is concerned about the money to be allocated to the Inuvialuit in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak to this report, I should like to say a few words.

Senator MacDonald: What does COPE stand for?

Senator Steuart: Committee of Original Peoples Entitlement.

Senator Tremblay: Thank you for the answer. I am not sure I could have given that answer to my colleague.

Senator Steuart: He was aiming the question at me.

Senator Tremblay: It is quite easy for me to admit that my colleague is much more knowledgeable on the subject matter of this bill and of the act itself than I am.

● (1620)

In any event, speaking on the report, I have not heard any indication that the report should not be adopted. Senator Adams attended the committee meetings and had an opportunity to ask questions of the witnesses from the department, and we have heard today the comments of Senator Steuart as they relate to the problems in the act itself. The substance of the bill which is before the committee is not about the totality of the act, and the matters that have been raised are technical ones and relate to reducing the necessity of having to address Parliament, as such, for settling problems more in the nature of procedural problems than of substance. But we have a contribution to make as a Senate, and we have found that there is a technical error, a typing error, so to speak, in the bill. The wrong date is indicated in clause 1(c). The date mentioned is April 11, 1987. The correct date is May 11, 1987. The report does amend the bill on that specific point. That being said, I move that the report be adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is a provision that permits the Clerk of the Parliaments, who is the Clerk of the Senate, to make such corrections without the Senate amending the bill and having it returned to the other place with a message in that regard. I cannot cite that provision, but I think we should obtain the opinion of parliamentary counsel as to whether, first, this is appropriate, and whether my recollection is correct—that is, that there is the power to make such a correction.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think it would be faster if we went the other route.

Senator Frith: I pass! In any event, I draw that to the attention of honourable senators, and in particular to the chairman of the committee. Obviously, we are prepared to cooperate with the government in this regard.

Senator Tremblay: Do I understand that Senator Frith is referring to a sort of omnibus bill which—

Senator Frith: No, it is not that; I am referring to another provision that allows certain types of errors to be corrected by the Clerk of the Parliaments. This seems to be the classic case. That provision allows the Clerk of the Parliaments to correct wrong dates or wrong numbers rather than having the Senate make a formal amendment, sending the bill back with a message, having it placed on the Order Paper in the House of Commons, having it attended to by the House of Commons—with their concurrence, and so forth—and then referring it back to the Senate. As I understand it, the Clerk of the Parliaments, who is also the Clerk of the Senate, can make corrections of that kind on his own judgment, but based on the obvious need for such a correction.

I think it is worth waiting a day so that we can look into this.

Senator Tremblay: If I am correct, we were informed of that technical error by the officials in the department. It is important to them that the correction be made. We understood that they had gone to the lawyers in the Department of Justice and asked them if they could make the correction. They were not told in so many words, but it was the implicit understanding that they could ask us, the Senate, to propose an amendment to correct that error. They have gone through the process and have reached the conclusion this has to be done by way of an amendment.

I have nothing else to add by way of clarification.

Senator Frith: I have a great deal of respect for the expertise—and I mean this sincerely—of the lawyers in the Department of Justice, but sometimes they do not know what is available in Parliament as distinct from what is in the statutes. I suggest that we take at least a day to consider this matter. I suggest that we have this looked into, have a report made, and if the bill can be corrected in this manner, we can do that tomorrow; if we cannot do that, we will then send it back to the House of Commons.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Frith what advantage he sees in not accepting what the Senate committee—composed of a very prestigious group of people—has recommended and, rather, having this corrected by one of the clerks of the chamber?

As I recall what I have read about Sir John A. Macdonald, he thought one of the important functions of the second chamber was to revise and improve legislation which came from the lower House, and this, it seems to me, is exactly what the committee is doing. Why say, “Oh, we won’t do it that way; we will turn it over a clerk.”? That seems fascinating, but I cannot see it as being very helpful.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understood that the provision is there for exactly this kind of situation. Perhaps what Senator Macquarrie is saying is that we should get rid of this provision because there is no case in which we should exercise this particular power. The reason I raise this is that I believe it was created for exactly this kind of situation, where it is merely a matter of a comma, a number, or something of that kind, and this avoids the Senate and the House of Commons going through the mechanism both houses must go through for more serious amendments.

If Senator Macquarrie and Sir John A. Macdonald both think that this provision ought not to exist at all, then I am inclined not to fight against it. But I am suggesting that we have a look at this for one day. However, this is a government problem and it can do what it likes with it.

Senator Doody: I do not think it is a problem; I think we will be putting it on for third reading tomorrow anyway.

Senator Frith: But I should like something to be done in the meantime.

Senator Doody: We will look into this in the meantime, and if that is the way we go, that is the way we go. It is just a matter of going through the normal procedure.

Senator Tremblay: So, do I understand that we will give the bill third reading tomorrow?

Senator Doody: One way or the other.

Senator Frith: Somehow it never works out when I try to be helpful!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if the technocrats have finished speaking, I should like to ask Senator Tremblay a question.

Senator Steuart’s speech left quite a strong impression with me. He outlined certain problems at the administrative level, and I would have expected Senator Tremblay to react to the comments made by Senator Steuart and, indeed, Senator Adams. Is it Senator Tremblay’s intention, if he does not address those comments today, to do so at third reading stage?

I ask that because it appears to me the concerns expressed by Senators Steuart and Adams are left hanging in the air over our heads. Is anyone going to do anything about these specific problems?

Senator Tremblay: I did not understand that they had in mind amendments or modifications to the bill which is before us. I understood that they raised problems relating to the act, not to the amendment to the act. I do not see any necessity to give specific answers to the questions they have raised, because they are beside or beyond the substance of Bill C-102.

I do not question that there are problems such as they have raised, but those problems relate to the act as a whole, not to Bill C-102. We would have to add many clauses to Bill C-102 to solve the kinds of problems they have raised. Senators Steuart and Adams can correct me if I am wrong, but I did not think they had proposed amendments to solve the problems they raised.

● (1630)

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, have we adopted the report at this stage?

An Hon. Senator: Not yet.

Senator Corbin: Am I in a position to adjourn the debate?

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Corbin: Then I so move.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-83, An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I understand that at least one other senator is ready to speak on this motion. I would be more than happy to yield to any senator wishing to do so today.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) had told me he would yield to anyone interested in debating this bill. When I think about the difficulties which Senator Frith just experienced when trying to solve a problem, I wonder if I might not find myself in the same predicament.

In any case this bill relates exclusively to the internal economy of the House of Commons, notwithstanding the fact that the statute amended or to be amended by this bill is entitled the Senate and House of Commons Act.

In fact, the bill completely ignores the Senate, and that is where the main problem lies. The reluctance it has engendered can be seen in the fact that the Senate has not done anything about it since Senator McElman spoke to the bill last February 11.

The lack of cooperation mentioned by Senator McElman may not be due to ill will because it was found that similar problems had occurred in the past, even when the Liberal Party held the majority in both houses and there was no such systematic confrontation as we have witnessed more often since 1984.

I would lay the initial blame on the British North America Act, Section 53, which I will quote to set the record straight:

Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

[Senator Tremblay.]

As explained previously, the purpose of the bill is to provide remuneration for members of the House of Commons who have special responsibilities, and these are mainly chairmen of committees. What we have is a money bill that necessarily originates from the House of Commons.

Human nature being what it is, we tend to look after our own affairs first, ignoring the impact this may have on others. Applying this principle to the remuneration of parliamentarians, I would say that natural egotism, together with the existence of Section 53 and the fact that any discussion of remuneration of parliamentarians tends to be a very discreet process, tends to create the kind of situation we now have with this bill. No advance consultation and quick action, which is what the House of Commons did in this case.

The initiative, of course, lies with the House of Commons in all these matters. I suggest that the answer is to find a formula that would correct the deficiencies in Bill C-83 and prevent similar situations from recurring. And how should Bill C-83 be corrected? Perhaps by amending the more excessive provisions pointed out by Senator McElman, or by adding provisions it lacks, such as additional remuneration for members of the Senate with special responsibilities. I am thinking of the absurd situation where this bill provides that the joint chairman of a joint committee who is a member of the House of Commons receives remuneration, while there is no reference to the other joint chairman who is a senator and does exactly the same work and has the same responsibilities. How can we remedy this? How can we provide for communication with the House of Commons? I think there should always be advance consultation. How could this be arranged? I think that is a question we have to consider.

Of course, if the question is put for second reading at this stage, it is likely many senators will vote against the bill. To avoid confrontation between the two chambers on a matter where there is no problem between the parties, since this is a matter that concerns Parliament generally, I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

As far as I know, this procedure would not have the effect of killing the bill. Of course, that would be the case if the committee did not submit a favourable report. However, if the committee submits its report and finds a remedy for the two problems that I pointed out, namely the bill itself and future procedures for bills that affect the interests of both chambers, the bill is likely to pass. Debate will be resumed on second reading, and we can then consider amendments or any other remedies the committee may recommend.

I move that the bill be not now read a second time and that its subject matter be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has anticipated a procedural problem. Such a motion has the reputation of being a blocking motion or one that kills a bill. He has pointed out that he does not think that is so. I do not wish to raise a procedural point, except to say that I want to adjourn the debate on his motion to consider that, because I know it is not his intention to kill the bill.

● (1640)

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on that motion.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I would like to pose a question to Senator Flynn before that motion is put.

I agree totally with Senator Flynn that matters of a financial nature in such a bill have to originate from the House of Commons. However, suggestions were made for necessary amendments to the bill that require no expenditure of funds. Senator Flynn has not mentioned those amendments. Is he in support of them?

Senator Flynn: I certainly would be in agreement with those amendments that I think Senator McElman has in mind. The problem is that we cannot attach any amount to those amendments that he has in mind.

Senator McElman: Senator Flynn, I believe you have misunderstood. There are some proposals that I made earlier in the debate with no dollars attached to them. They were cleaning up some of the anomalies currently in the legislation, but do not require the allocation of funds. I wonder, Senator Flynn, if you have perhaps given some thought to those?

Senator Flynn: I am certainly in favour of correcting the bill by way of amendments that are within our competence. There is no doubt about that. For instance, I had in mind that we could return the bill with amendments, leaving blank the amount of remuneration that we want. Of course, there is the possibility that someone will say that that is outside the scope of the bill; but we could do that just the same and see what happens.

Depending on the consideration given by the committee, there might be a system of communications that would enable the other place to initiate a correction by way of another bill that could be sent to us in due course, to take care of the problems we want to resolve, and in the meantime we would consider this bill further. I do not want to go into the details of that here, because it would be up to the committee to find a way of solving the problems of this bill and future bills of the same nature.

Senator McElman: May I suggest to Senator Flynn that his memory is shorter than it should be. When he suggests that we may expect another bill which would resolve the problems, surely he remembers the pension situation?

Senator Flynn: I certainly agree with Senator McElman on that point.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I would like to ask Senator Flynn whether he also wants the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to deal with the retroactive application of legislation. Does he believe that the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration should also consider this or is it only for the members of the other place?

Senator Flynn: I impose no limit on the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. All aspects of the Bill and the overall problem should be considered by the committee.

Something else that could be considered would be to establish a joint committee for this purpose. I remember that some years ago a bill on public service pensions was referred to a special joint committee, thereby avoiding this problem of lack of prior communication between the two houses.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CHILDHOOD POVERTY AND ADULT SOCIAL PROBLEMS

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY RELATIONSHIP

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the relationship between childhood poverty and certain significant and costly social programs that manifest themselves in adult life, and on measures which might better alleviate such problems; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1989.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise in support of the motion to authorize the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to study the relationship between childhood poverty and certain significant and costly social problems. I suggest that this would be a larger and more comprehensive study than one would think by reading the motion put before the Senate.

We have to think about the word "childhood" and what it means. Some years ago Senator McGrand did a study called "Child at Risk". When a motion was put before the Senate to study children at risk, we had to confine the study to almost the early years of childhood; otherwise, the study would have taken many years to carry out.

When we talk about childhood in this motion, do we mean early childhood? Do we mean children up to 18 years of age? Do we mean children who are receiving family allowances? Do we mean children who are under the care of their parents? What do we mean by the word "childhood"?

Moreover, before we get too involved in this study, perhaps we should consider what is meant by the word "poverty" and its causes and effects. Some time ago Senator Croll did a study on poverty in Canada that dealt with poverty in all age groups. When we clarify that word, it is essential that the choice we make is not only one based on technical convenience but is also a statement of our attitude toward the unemployed, the underemployed, the disabled, the elderly, and other classes of people with low incomes or no incomes.

● (1650)

Definitions of "poverty" range from the simplistic definition of "lack of income" to comprehensive definitions which include social and economic exclusion and general lack of power. Various concepts of poverty include some or all of the following: first, subsistence, where concern is with the minimum income necessary to maintain health and working capacity; second, "inequality," where society is seen as a series of stratified layers and poverty is defined by how the bottom layers fare relative to the rest of society; and, third, "externality," where the social consequences of poverty for the rest of society comprise the area of concern rather than the needs of the poor. The "externality" dimension of poverty is exemplified by the Economic Council of Canada.

"Poverty" has been defined by the Economic Council of Canada as "insufficient access to certain goods, services and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living."

This is a relative definition in the sense that it relates poverty to a minimum standard of living. It recognizes that people are considered poor if their standard of living is significantly below that enjoyed by most people in the society. A relative standard of living is a more realistic measure of poverty and is minimum subsistence.

Poverty is always relative to a given time and place. The differences between Canadian and Asian poverty do not make the former any more tolerable. The poor in Canada are judged, and judge themselves, relative to the general situation in their own country at any given time. They are not comforted or helped by reminders of their apparent affluence compared with the living standards of Asiatic or Latin American poor. Furthermore, the Canadian poverty levels of 1961, 1971 and 1981 are not the same, because the general standard of living has continued to rise over the past 30 years. What we define as "poverty" must change constantly in relation to general living standards. In this sense, poverty's definition can never be precise.

John Kenneth Galbraith described poverty as follows:

People are poverty-stricken when their income, even if adequate for survival, falls markedly below that of the community. Then they cannot have what the larger community regards as the minimum necessary for decency; and they cannot wholly escape, therefore, the judgment of the larger community that they are indigent.

An even more comprehensive definition of poverty based on consideration of inequality would define poverty as a lack of "command over resources over time." Resources are taken to include not only money income and assets but also political power, individual self-respect and opportunity.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Another definition of poverty according to income data can be used to define poverty in either an absolute or a relative sense. One method is to define poverty in terms of the income needed to sustain some minimum or subsistence level of physical health and capacity for work. The income requirements to provide adequate food, clothing and housing for a family of a given size are used to establish a poverty level. This method defines poverty in terms of an absolute "minimum needs" standard, and therefore is not concerned with relative inequality. Statistics Canada's definition of poverty is based, for example, on the following statement:

A basic assumption for the main set of estimates was that any family or individual spending more than 70% of total income on food, clothing and shelter was in a low-income situation and likely to be suffering from poverty.

Nevertheless, most people think of poverty—and the poor suffer poverty—as income deficiency resulting in material deprivation. The latter concept of poverty as low income, while in itself insufficient, is nonetheless necessary both for the measurement of poverty and for the development of programs to eliminate it.

Poverty is one of the greatest social problems of Canada today. Unless we act now in a meaningful way, about five million Canadian children will be looking forward to a bleak and bitter struggle for survival in the 1990s and into the twenty-first century. These children are suffering today at a time when we are arguing about our social welfare system and the richness of our country. The poor of today know they are poor, and they are helpless victims of social welfare systems that do not begin to look after their needs to give them a basic standard of living.

It has been said that no nation can achieve true greatness if it lacks the courage and determination to undertake the surgery necessary to remove the cancer of poverty from its body politic. Governments talk about helping the poor, but in each case, with all their budgets and welfare programs, they seem to be taxing the poor more, and the poor are getting poorer, the rich are getting richer, and five million Canadian children are living below the poverty line.

I believe a thorough study of this problem should be undertaken. The poor can no longer wait. They need immediate action, and they need it now! The present welfare system does not seem to meet the needs of the poor, and each and every time the government finds itself in need of money it seems to tax the poor more, including putting a sales tax on food.

Some people have said that the poor are always with us. I believe that with a proper social welfare program, and with opportunities for education and training for those in need, better housing and job opportunities, and maybe a guaranteed income to all, a great deal can be done to remove this cancer.

There is another myth voiced by some that the poor pay relatively less in taxes than others. While they may pay less in total income tax than others because their income is less, the proportion of their income which they pay in income taxes and other forms of taxation is actually greater than the proportion of taxes paid out by people who are well off.

So, honourable senators, while I think the idea of the motion is good, I wonder if the terms of reference are clear and if the committee really knows what it has in its mind. So far as I am concerned, I hope it will take into consideration the poor and the children of this country in order to give them an opportunity for the twenty-first century; and I hope it comes forward with a guaranteed income for everyone.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTY-SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the thirty-seventh report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (benefits for unrepresented employees), presented on Tuesday, May 17, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (budget for the child care study), presented to the Senate on May 17, 1988.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, do I need the Senate's permission to move adoption of the fourteenth report of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee or may I move it directly? This report was presented to the Senate yesterday.

Now, this report is along the same lines as the proposals just made by Senator Frith, except that it comes under the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, it is just a matter of moving the motion because the budget has been tabled and senators have had the opportunity to examine it. We can therefore move adoption of the report.

Senator Tremblay: Very well. So, honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Do you agree, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PREVENTIVE HEALTH CARE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Committee on Preventive Health Care, presented on Tuesday, May 17, 1988.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented on Tuesday, May 17, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words on this matter now, although it is not necessary that we proceed with a vote on it today. In the last few minutes some material has been distributed to you. You may be wondering what this document is that has suddenly appeared on your desks—

Senator Doody: That is what this mystery package is!

Senator Molgat: —so I thought I should explain what it is that the committee is proposing. The Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of March 16 of this year will give honourable senators an example of what we might accomplish if we adopt the report proposed by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Honourable senators, if you go through the first few pages of the document I have had distributed to you, you will see the items that would be struck out and would not have to appear in the front part of our daily proceedings. Using this example from March 16, you will see that ten pages of material would be condensed to four pages.

If you now turn to the next section, you will see what the identical Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, No. 126, would look like if we followed the proposal. For example, say an item was not adopted but was simply stood—and, as you know, many items are stood each day; instead of writing out the full text, we would simply show there that that item had been postponed until the next sitting of the Senate. By following this proposal I think we would save substantially in printing costs.

However, honourable senators, the item would still appear on the Orders of the Day; so there would be no problem for any senator to determine what a given item number consisted of; it would simply be a case of turning to the Orders of the Day and it would be printed therein.

However, where we would have the saving is in the front portion of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, where the report of the proceedings of the previous day appears. So much for the votes and proceedings.

Then, honourable senators, if you look further into the document before you to the section marked "Appendix", you will see there a proposed format for the index to the Journals. On the left-hand page you will see what our Journals staff must now do with respect to the index for the bound volume produced at the end of the session. At the moment, they must put in all of those page numbers, even though nothing at all has happened on most of those occasions. Our proposal is to eliminate that procedure and substitute what is indicated on the right-hand side as the proposed format. We would simply list again the same items, and list the times or pages where the debate actually took place. The other page numbers, where the items were not debated but were in fact stood, we would not list. So again, honourable senators, you will see that there would be a substantial saving in the printing of those pages.

Moreover, in addition to that, there would be a substantial saving in terms of the work of the staff, who now have to go through the procedure of tabulating all the numbers every day and then, at the end of the session, must do a very extensive proof-reading job to ensure that, indeed, all of those pages are correct.

Therefore, honourable senators, our recommendation is to follow this new procedure in order to reap the benefits from both the standpoint of the printing savings and the standpoint of the staff.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the urgency of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act in order to remove the restriction that requires a Canadian veteran who served overseas in World War II and who chose to take up residence outside Canada to return to Canada for 365 days in order to become eligible to receive the allowances payable under the Act and any other benefits available thereunder.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, this was an inquiry to which Senator Bonnell responded. The subject matter is very similar to that contained in Order No. 33 on the order paper. In fact, Order No. 33 takes into account everything that is included in Order No. 30, and does it in more detail and more in line with the regulations.

This afternoon I discussed this matter with Senator Bonnell and he agreed that we might withdraw Order No. 30. I notice that he is not in the chamber at the moment, although he was here a few moments ago, but if you are willing to take my word, that matter could now be withdrawn.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is in order to delete this item, since Senator Phillips and Senator Marshall talked to Senator Bonnell about it and he has no objection.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): So Senator Marshall is asking for leave to withdraw Order No. 30.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be; and

That, within 120 days after the adoption of this resolution, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should consider the advisability of tabling in the Senate the response of the government to this recommendation.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I shall try to be as brief as possible. When the proceedings of this chamber were interrupted on April 28, I was dealing with the inequities of the War Veterans Allowance Act as they affect Canadian veterans who chose to remain overseas after fighting for their country. I was discussing the inconsistencies of the responses of governments to the many representations made by the Canada-United Kingdom Veterans Association. I would like to put on record a brief description of that association. It is the only constituted organization of Canadian veterans in the United Kingdom with branches wherever there are considerable numbers of ex-servicemen. It was organized in July 1948 at the instigation of the Canadian government and various separate veterans' associations when it was thought desirable to amalgamate for the general welfare of all concerned. Branches can be found in Aldershot, Brighton, Brussels, Croydon, Eastbourne, Guildford, Hastings, London, Redhill, Southampton and Worthing, with additional branches being organized in other parts of the country.

I received a letter from the welfare officer at Macdonald House, 1 Grosvenor Square, London, who looks after the Canadian veterans who remained overseas. This letter will give honourable senators an idea of what these veterans are earning. It is addressed to me and it is dated March 1, 1988. It reads in part:

As you are aware, the British system of retirement pension is based upon the number of contributions paid during working life . . . the basic individual weekly pension is at present £39.50.

If you multiply that by the current rate of exchange, which is approximately $2.23 or $2.30, it is probably less than $100. The letter goes on:

This pension commences at age 65 for men and 60 for women when the individual ceases to be employed and if married, will be added to by a further £23.75, making a total married couples pension of £63.25.

Listen to this next sentence. It reads:

If they happen to be over eighty, it is raised by the grand sum of 25 pence!! It is of course quite possible that many of our veterans did not pay enough contributions to enable them to qualify for the full basic retirement pension, nor do they have enough years of residency in Canada to enable them to claim Old Age Security.

I hope this puts into perspective what these people are earning. If they qualified for the War Veterans Allowance, they would be earning $1,136, less what they are getting in England, and they would be able to live a decent life by receiving what is, in fact, Canada's commitment to them in 1917. Because of an anomaly in the act, however, these people, who are aged and infirm, must return to Canada, spend a year here, and then return to England to get those benefits, and they simply cannot do that.

When I began my discourse on the anomalies in the act on April 28, I was about to refer to an appearance by the Minister of Veterans Affairs before the House of Commons committee. One of the MPs present posed the question on the residence rule, to which the minister replied:

I very much sympathise with those veterans overseas and especially for the ones who are most needy.

It would however, be difficult to relax the one-year residency requirement for those who reside overseas given the recent pressures to expand war veterans allowances for our veterans resident in Canada.

I take it that he means that there are two different classes of veterans. There are those who went overseas and fought various battles with the intent to do everything possible for Canada and remained there and those who remained in Canada. Because of the pressure Canadian veterans in Canada are able to put on the minister, they are higher on the priority scale than those who decided, of their own free will, to stay in England, the U.S. or elsewhere.

Honourable senators, I say that one has nothing to do with the other, except in the numbers of people involved, and they are justified in their request. With the greatest respect, the answer is entirely irrelevant. The government is saying that those veterans who remain in Canada are more deserving than those who fought for many years for Canada and remained overseas, which was their right. If it was not their right, then there is something wrong with our Charter. I have no hesitation in supporting the Canada-service-only provision put forward by the Royal Canadian Legion. In fact, I have spoken in support of it in this chamber. However, I wonder about the humane treatment of Canadians, regardless of where they live.

It says in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that every citizen of Canada has the right to "enter, remain in and leave Canada", unless they are the subject of one of our international extradition agreements. The Charter also says that every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability. However, at the same time, the Charter's equality guarantees do not rule out laws or programs designed to favour individuals or groups who may be at a disadvantage in society, such as programs of equal employment opportunities for women, native people or visible minorities. The Constitution makes it clear that equality is not a right to be acquired but a state that exists. It ensures that individuals are entitled to full equality under the law, not just in the laws themselves but in the administration of the law as well. It says nothing about where a Canadian lives. If I read it properly, that Canadian can live in Canada or elsewhere.

Another question was asked of the minister at the same hearing about the worn-out excuse of trying to get a reciprocal agreement with the United Kingdom. It has always been under consideration, but now it is getting too late to do anything. I have here a newspaper article from a Newfoundland paper which may illustrate how we look after our people with our various laws and regulations in this regard. The article is entitled "Canadian Citizens from Germany will get pension improvements." So our enemy during World War II, against whom our Canadian servicemen fought, is recognizing Canadians who lived and worked in that country and yet the United Kingdom does not. The article reads in part:

Canadian citizens who are originally from and worked in the Federal Republic of Germany will get more money in social security pensions because of a new agreement between Canada and Germany.

The agreement, which was signed in May of this year, will come into effect in the spring of 1988.

"The revised agreement will bring to many, not all, Canadians who are receiving German social security pensions improved benefits," said Guenter K. Sann, the Honorable Consul to Canada for West Germany.

I have received a copy of the agreement from the Department of Health and Welfare. I am sure that this must be very upsetting for those Canadian citizens in the United Kingdom who fought for Britain, their mother country. Britain will not enter into a reciprocal agreement to look after our veterans as we do theirs, and other Allied veterans, by allowing them to qualify for the War Veterans Allowance if they have lived in this country for ten years. The minister appeared before the House of Commons Committee on Veterans Affairs and at that time the same answer was given by the deputy minister, which was that we are trying to enter into a reciprocal agreement with the U.K. Honourable senators, I believe we will never see that, because they will never get to that stage, regardless of what we say.

● (1720)

The Agreement on Social Security between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany states:

Under German law, implementing arrangements are subject to ratification by the Parliament of the Federal Republic of Germany, together with the Agreement. For

[Senator Marshall.]

Canada, an implementing arrangement derives its legal standing from this Article and needs only to be signed by the Canadian competent authority in order to take effect.

The governments of Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany will notify each other when the requirement of the respective laws have been met to enable the implementing arrangement to take effect. The arrangement will have the same period of duration as the agreement.

Honourable senators, I would be glad to furnish this agreement to the minister if he wishes to go over and talk to Mrs. Thatcher. However, nothing will be done if they make excuses year after year.

I mentioned in my speech on March 1 that there are many inconsistencies in what the Minister of Veterans Affairs is saying. I know, and everyone knows, what an esteemed man George Hees is. Everybody knows he has done more for veterans, as far as legislation is concerned, than has anyone before him. He has introduced and implemented many good measures which we and veterans have been waiting for for many years. However, there are some inconsistencies.

On November 22, 1984, in a letter to the Canada-U.K. veterans, he said:

... you can rest assured that both I and the officials of my department are giving serious consideration to relaxing this requirement even further and will be doing so ... if it is at all possible bearing in mind the current economic state.

The economic state has never been better, at least that is what I hear every day. I do not see why we cannot come through for these few hundred veterans. Perhaps I am exaggerating and there may be a few thousand. They are deserving; it is their right to receive War Veterans Allowance; and they should not be overburdened with the outdated and outmoded section of the act which requires them to return to Canada.

On September 10, 1984, the minister said:

I cannot see a strong case being made to extend the income maintenance provisions of Canada's social assistance, of which WVA is a part, to individuals who elected to remain in another country at the end of the war or who now reside in another country and want to apply for a Canadian benefit such as WVA.

There are no plans at the present time to amend WVA with respect to the eligibility requirement for veterans residing abroad.

Honourable senators, it is my understanding that once, when he was in the U.K., the minister said, "The need to go back to Canada is nonsense. After all—if they were able to go back the money would be provided." Honourable senators, it would have to be provided if they were able to come back, but they cannot because they are too sick. They are too aged and they are too infirm to return.

Honourable senators, I should like to quote an article from the The Sunday Sun of March 6, 1988, written by Major General Bruce Legge, a friend of veterans, and a friend of the militia, the reserves and the army.

Senator Frith: And a classmate of mine at Osgoode. I mention that at the end because that is the least of his distinctions!

Senator Marshall: Mr. Legge wrote:

The only test for war veterans' allowance should be whether . . .

He then refers to the two veterans—

. . . served in action in the Canadian army. The limitation of present residence in Canada is a spurious one. The requirement of making the application in Canada could be overcome in two ways: Legally, Canada's diplomatic missions abroad are housed on Canadian soil and an application made at Canada House in London should be acceptable.

I do not know how far-fetched that is, but why should we not implement that?

Senator Frith: I would call it "close fetched."

Senator Marshall: He goes on to say:

If that were not so, then the solution would be to fly these veterans on a Canadian Air Force flight which weekly connects Trenton and Gatwick.

Since we now have in Canada a minister of national defence, Perrin Beatty, who is the equal of the greatest of Canadian ministers of defence of the past, and since we have in George Hees the very epitome of the perfect minister of veterans affairs, I am certain that the problem . . . can be solved.

Perhaps your publicity is all that will be required to overcome this cruelty. The Canadian people would certainly want war veterans' allowance to be paid to all Canadian veterans who fought in Canada's wars, regardless of where they now live.

Honourable senators, everyone says that it should be given, but no one does anything about it.

To the credit of the Canadian government, they are sending over $100,000 every year to look after 260 veterans whose plight has been brought to our attention by the Canada-U.K. veterans. Honourable senators, that only amounts to $16 per month per veteran. Along with the less than $100 that they receive, it is still not enough money, and many of them are suffering.

Many veterans overseas might have qualified for disability pensions. One case comes to mind of a widow in poverty. Her husband had died after having served two and half years as a prisoner of war, which entitled him—and he never received it—to the equal of 25 per cent of a disability pension. When he died his wife was entitled to half of that. He would have been entitled to $424.40, so she would have been entitled to something over $200. That would have helped her.

Honourable senators will remember Mr. Percy Mercer and members of the Legion appearing before the committee. They were surprised to find out what was going on, and as a result of our meeting they are working on a number of cases. I spoke to Percy Mercer this morning and he tells me he is sending over 70-odd cases. Honourable senators, perhaps those people would have received disability pensions which would have allowed them to live in comfort. Some were high-ranking officers and some were heroes. I know Canada does not want to leave Canadians in that state of distress, regardless of where they live. We send foreign aid in the millions to all foreign countries which are in need. I do not want to be too melodramatic, but I feel, honourable senators, that we can do no less for our veterans before it is too late.

Canada can wipe out by just one stroke of the pen the provision that veterans have to return to Canada for 365 days. These elderly people have to come to Canada, spend money staying here for shelter and food, when they would rather spend their few remaining years at home with their wives and families.

Honourable senators, I ask you to support this motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I do not wish to take much time, but, as Senator Marshall is aware, I happen to know something about this problem.

I am in complete agreement with the statements that he has made and with the action that he is taking to urge the government to reconsider the question of amending the legislation that would so easily and so urgently help this rather small group of Canadian veterans who served their country and who, for various reasons, have chosen to live outside Canada, most of them in the United Kingdom. They are denied the benefits which they should have, and it is even more ironic that if they could come to Canada and spend a year here, they could then qualify and go back to the United Kingdom. It seems ridiculous that we should deny these people what I consider to be their rights and then say, "If you come to Canada, although you have no other reason for doing so, and spend a year, then you will get your entitlement. Then you can go back and continue to live in England, France, Germany or wherever it may be."

I hope that if this motion is passed it will be brought to the attention of the authorities concerned. I agree with Senator Marshall that the present Minister of Veterans Affairs is one of those people in the line of good Ministers of Veterans Affairs we have had in Canada. I hope that some attention will be given to the views not only of Senator Marshall but of the Senate of Canada in relation to this matter.

• (1730)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a word or two to add to this debate. This may seem to be quite outside of the scope of the motion, but I want to say for the record that many important events happen in the Senate late in the day and that we hear good speeches late in the day, as we have heard today.

Every time I come up against the horrors of war, as I often do in movies, books and other sources of information, I feel that we do not do enough for our veterans. I am glad to have heard the interventions of both Senator Hicks and Senator Marshall. I think we should support this motion.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I tended to agree with most of the comments made by Senator Marshall and most of the comments made by Senator Hicks, but I have to take some exception to Senator Marshall's reference to the current Minister of Veterans Affairs doing more for veterans in Canada than any previous Minister of Veterans Affairs. I do not agree with that. The current Minister of Veterans Affairs is well respected across Canada, as Senator Marshall has stated, and we all love him and think he is a great fellow. He has done some great things, but a previous Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Daniel J. MacDonald from Prince Edward Island, did many things for veterans. I can list what he did for widows, such as the widows' pension and the Aging Veterans Program, which finally came into full effect this year. The Honourable George Hees changed the name to VIP, but that program was put in place by a former government and a former minister.

That is beside the point. What my colleague Senator Marshall said about veterans is all true. What he is trying to do is worthwhile, and I should like to add more support to his motion; therefore, I move the adjournment of this debate until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MATTERS OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL SIGNIFICANCE— INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On Inquiry No. 4:

By the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to matters of federal and provincial significance, with particular reference to the province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Gerald Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that this inquiry be withdrawn. I actually put this on the order paper as the subject of a maiden speech. Being so influenced by the benefits accruing to the country from the Meech Lake Accord, I spoke during that debate. I am happy to inform honourable senators that I am no longer a maiden!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the adoption of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Bill C-102, An Act to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act, with one amendment), presented in the Senate on 5th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, yesterday I adjourned the debate on the consideration of the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology because I felt that Senator Tremblay's response to the remarks of Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake) and Senator Adams fell somewhat short of the mark. Honourable senators, I apologize if I speak off the cuff today, but I was very busy attending Senate committee proceedings this morning and I did not have time to gather all my thoughts. I believe I can express my concern in a few words.

You will recall that yesterday Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake) referred to real, serious and enduring problems concerning the funds and the way they are spent or invested. He referred as well to a reindeer herd owned by William Nasogaluak, an Inuvialuit and former mayor of Tuktoyaktuk.

In a nutshell, that is what Senators Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake) and Adams wanted to draw to the attention of the Senate. They did say they were in favour of the bill. They had no intention of delaying passage, nor do they intend to ask that the bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for further consideration. I have no such intention either. But the only thing Senators Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake) and Adams are seeking is a commitment from the government, and particularly from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. McKnight, that they will indeed consider the two serious issues which have been raised.

I thought Senator Tremblay would at least undertake to draw the matter to the attention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but all he said in his remarks was that this problem has precious little to do with the amendment to Bill C-102 as such. That is when I thought a moment of reflection might be welcome, that perhaps a slight delay would give Senator Tremblay an opportunity to see whether he might—on behalf of his party or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—undertake to have the minister look into the two problems which have been raised.

I think it was wise on the part of Senator Steuart (Prince Albert—Duck Lake) and Senator Adams to bring to the attention of the government these two serious problems.

At what level should these problems be dealt with? I do not know. I am certainly not an expert in this area, and even less in accounting. The fact is, there are problems and serious ones at that. We want to advise you of these problems now, because we would not want to hear in one or two years hence that the Government was not aware of how serious the problems were. It is better to wake up and take action now than later.

By the way, pressures are being exerted on the Senate by several of our colleagues to set up another Senate standing committee which would deal exclusively with the problem of native people in this country. Will it be necessary to go to that extreme to convince the government that not everything is fine and dandy in many services of the Indian Affairs administration? I do not think we will have to go that far. With a little good will and especially the government's assurance that the minister will deal effectively with the issues raised yesterday by Senator Steuart and Senator Adams, we could certainly proceed with the other stages of the bill.

I wonder if, having slept on it, Senator Tremblay could tell us now whether he has had an opportunity to talk to Mr. McKnight, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and whether the minister has made commitments in line with what Senator Steuart and Senator Adams had indicated. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the technical question raised yesterday about the correcting of errors in bills, we have, as requested, an opinion from Parliamentary Counsel. Perhaps this would be a good time to put that opinion on the record so that if the question comes up again we can refer to it.

I have a memorandum to the Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Lussier, from Mr. du Plessis. The subject is "Technical errors in bills." It reads as follows:

You have asked me to brief you concerning the correction of mistakes in the parchments of bills in various stages of their passage through both Houses. The following is, to the best of my knowledge, the current situation.

(1) There is no provision of law nor is there any provision in the Rules of the Senate or in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons that clearly allows for corrections of errors, no matter how small. Standing Order 126 of House of Commons gives a limited authority to the Law Clerk of that House "to revise" bills before third reading in that House. This Standing Order provides some authority to correct obvious errors but is limited in scope and there is no similar provision in the Rules of the Senate.

(2) Over the years, there has been a practice of making editorial corrections. They are never made by the Clerk of the Parliaments acting alone. They are usually made by the Law Clerks of both Houses acting together and then initialled by the Clerks of both Houses. I understand that the present Clerk of the House of Commons has delegated to the Law Clerk of that House the task of initialling such editorial changes.

(3) After Royal Assent, no mistake, no matter how minor, should be corrected by parliamentary officials without proper legislative authority.

(4) No guidelines have been established for deciding which errors are the proper subject-matter of clerical correction and which require parliamentary amendment. A good guide for clerical correction is to work by analogy to errors that the courts would feel comfortable in characterizing as "an obvious typographical error or slip of the draftsman's pen." Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2d), pages 128 to 130, deals with this topic. I attach copies.

I do not propose to put those copies on the record.

With respect to Bill C-102, the case of R.—

I do not know whether that is Regina or Rex. I cannot remember if it was a queen or a king in 1845.

An Hon. Senator: It was a queen.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Thank you.

I am going to take a moment to allow some of our erudite historians to get that on the record. Imagine my making that mistake when we are so close to her birthday! I will continue from the memorandum:

R. v. Wilcock, (1845) 7 Q.B. 317, 115 E.R. 509, referred to in Driedger, is, in my opinion, sufficient authority to allow for the correction of a date (a) where the date is wrong in fact, and (b) where the reference is clear enough to ascertain without doubt the correct date.

The situation that has arisen in the case of Bill C-102 illustrates a continuing problem that, I believe, should be remedied. There is clearly a need for a provision of law authorizing the Law Clerks of both Houses to make editorial changes in accordance with guidelines reflecting correct legal principles.

It is then signed by Mr. Raymond du Plessis, our Parliamentary Counsel.

Therefore, honourable senators, with that on the record, it seems to me that we should follow the recommendation of the chairman of the committee and of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my good friend, Senator Frith, is leading me into a path that I have tried to avoid in all of my years in Parliament; that is, that most discussions of procedure are an egregious waste of time. However, I cannot resist saying again that I am profoundly perplexed and quite filled with wonderment as to what benefit Senator Frith thinks that his intervention is accomplishing for the Senate, for this bill and for parliamentarianism.

If I wanted to go to the Archives up on Wellington Street and I walked up on the north side of that great thoroughfare and arrived at the Archives, and then someone such as Senator Frith said, "But you could get there by going up the south side," and then suggested that it would be better to return and go up on the south side, I could not accept that as being very good advice, either legal, geographic or travelwise.

It seems to me that there is nothing that suggests that a committee of the Senate, or, more precisely, the Senate itself, cannot amend a bill, whether it is with respect to a major, profound, matter or whether it is an indication that they have simply put in the wrong month. Why would it be better to say, "No, let us forget all about that," and go and get some clerk to scratch that out? The committee, an emanation of this honourable body itself, has done that; it has done that which a Senate committee should do; it has looked at the bill. It looked at it very carefully; there were excellent speeches and brief speeches—which was very good—and then the committee suggested an amendment. Honourable senators, why in the world should we hold back and say that it would be better to have the Clerk strike that out and, at the same time, ask the committee to rescind, to start all over again and follow a better course—namely, to have the Clerk perform that function?

Surely, if you are saying that the Senate should not be amending legislation, you are saying something very strange, unreasonable and far-fetched which that great and glorious Canadian, Sir John A. Macdonald, could not possibly understand. Nor can I understand it today.

I say to Senator Frith, let us go on with this procedure. The Senate committee has done magnificently under the distinguished chairmanship of my colleague, Senator Tremblay. Why go back and say, "Let us do it by a pencil stroke from a clerk"?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Macquarrie had decided that he was going to make that speech, no matter what, because, as other senators may have noticed, all I asked was that we look into this procedure and find out whether or not it is available. As I said a moment ago, we found out that it is very doubtful that it would be available. I therefore said that the Senate should go on and do what it is doing.

However, I did not want to interfere with Senator Macquarrie's tackle, even though I had already put the ball on the ground for a "safe catch." I think in football that is called "piling on." In any event, I am not blowing that whistle; I think we should go on, as Senator Macquarrie agrees, and as I already agreed today, and have the Senate make the amendment.

Senator Macquarrie: On a point of order, honourable senators, I am not accustomed to being accused of talking too much in this chamber. I have the greatest regard for Senator Frith. He is erudite, brilliant and charming, but I have never thought of him as being reticent or taciturn. I do not accept very cheerfully the suggestion that I am the one who likes to make speeches, whether I mean them or not or whether they have to be made.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to pile "it" on, too! Although I was never much of a football player, I did once play rugby quite well. Like Senator Frith, yesterday I wanted to make some remarks but held them until today, so I will now deal with them.

Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Macquarrie. If there are amendments to be made in committee—even amendments of this nature—they should be made by the committee. Some honourable senators are aware that although I supported the initial introduction of the so-called "Hayden formula" for pre-study in certain cases, I have strongly opposed its becoming a habit of the Senate, because I believe that it is in many cases doing through the back door what the Senate ought to do through the front door. Instead of making agreements with ministers or getting an undertaking that something will be done at a later date, when we feel that something ought to be done by way of amendment to legislation, we should do it that way—we should go straight through the front door of the House of Commons rather than through its back door. So it is in that light that I support the approach of Senator Macquarrie to things even of this minuscule nature. When amendments are to be made, let us do our job and make those amendments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not want to pile "it" on: I want to come to the rescue of Senator Frith; but that doesn't mean that I will be nice to everybody!

I think it is useful to have that opinion on the record for future problems. I agree with Senator Macquarrie that we should go ahead and send the amendment to the House of Commons—

Senator Frith: So do I!

Senator Flynn:—especially since this is the first amendment since 1984 that is not in confrontation with that House; it is really an amendment which is helpful.

Senator Frith: I knew there would be a catch!

Senator McElman: Could I ask Senator Flynn: How is it that the House of Commons has accepted many amendments made by the Senate during the current session? Were they bowing to a confrontational approach, or did they find a good basis for making those amendments as suggested by the Senate?

Senator Flynn: You are certainly opening a can of worms with that question!

Senator McElman: That's all right—you've got the worms; let's go fishing!

Senator Flynn: The answer to that question is obvious: The government had to compromise with the stubborn Liberal-dominated Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Tremblay speaks now, he will close the debate.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am petrified at the thought that a mere comment on my part could stimulate the creative imagination of some of my colleagues, as it did yesterday. Therefore, as the saying goes, "Once bitten, twice shy", I will limit myself to the strict minimum in order not to delay further the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

● (1420)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Senator McElman.]

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, bill, as amended, placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED—
SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the Bill be not now read the second time but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, it seems that everyone wants to be brief today. To be quite honest, before speaking to this order I had meant to complete the gathering of information that I began when we dealt with Bill C-22 to prove that, in fact, that bill was so bad that people would feel its influence for a long time. I must admit that I have not been able to complete the gathering of that information. However, I would like to make my point.

I shall use my own province of New Brunswick as an example. A month or so ago the new government of the province of New Brunswick brought in a budget in which they felt obligated to increase the fee charged to seniors in the Pharmacare Program from $3 to $6.84 per prescription. I have said publicly in New Brunswick, and I say it now, that I disagree with the government on that score. Nevertheless, I looked into their figures and the projections for their expenditures in that program and I find that what has happened is exactly what was stated by the minister of the previous government when we were studying Bill C-22. I find that increased pressure placed on seniors by that new budget of the Government of New Brunswick, which more than doubles the cost of prescriptions, is mainly due to the increased drug prices in 1987. The projection for 1988 is over $10 million.

The information I have received from other provinces points in the same direction. I do not think that the mover of this bill, or anyone else, and certainly not myself, is naive enough to think that the government of today will change its mind. They decided in their negotiations with the Americans on free trade that this was just one more way to sell part of this country to the Americans, and proceeded with their legislation. I pointed out that this would happen in the province of New Brunswick and that it will happen in all the provinces of Canada. The working poor and the aged are the ones who will be penalized. I am sure that this legislation will remain as a reflection of the four years this government was in power, and therefore I support the motion.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Cogger, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION FOR MESSAGE TO COMMONS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.:

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

“2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

(c) the recognition that aboriginal peoples constitute a distinctive and fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(d) the recognition of the multicultural nature of Canadian society, and in particular respect for the many origins, creeds and cultures as well as the differing regional identities that helped shape Canadian society; and

(e) the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union.”

(2)(a) The role of the Parliament of Canada to preserve and promote, and the role of the provincial legislatures to preserve and, subject to subparagraph (2)(b) to promote, the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph 1(a) is affirmed.

(b) The role of a province in relation to promotion applies from the time it is adopted by a resolution of the legislative assembly of that province.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph 1(b) is affirmed.

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

“25. Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, and until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the government of Canada shall, within six months after the vacancy occurs, call an election in the province or territory to which the vacancy relates for the purpose of filling that vacancy, and, notwithstanding the provision of section 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867, for a term of nine years.”

95B.(1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—SUBJECT MATTER
REFERRED TO AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE

Hon. H.A. Olson, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 17, 1988, moved:

That the subject matter of the potentially disastrous drought in Western Canada be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry

—to assess the magnitude and intensity of the damage;

—to invite witnesses to the committee hearings; and

—to report, with recommendations to the Federal Government, for assisting people adversely affected, especially Farmers and Ranchers.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words about this motion to refer the problem of the drought in Western Canada to the Agriculture and Forestry Committee.

Senator Argue: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Although there have been a number of comments made by me, and there were some comments by the government in response yesterday, I have to say that I do not believe that the government's response is appropriate for the intensity of the situation that exists there now.

I want to say at the outset that I will be brief, because I would like this motion to get to the committee as soon as possible so that they can get on with the business of trying to help the government design a program to deal with it. However, I am also keenly aware of all the things that the committee has to do to set up the logistics of the committee; to travel, if that is part of it; to call witnesses; to write a report, and so on. I certainly hope that the government will take its responsibility seriously and come in with an immediate relief program based on the kind of urgent consideration that I think it deserves.

● (1430)

I think it is appropriate for the Senate to consider this motion, because an entire region of Canada is suffering under the terrible drought that is now afflicting Western Canada. One thing we have been told over the years is that it is the responsibility of the Senate to represent regional interests in and convey regional concerns to the Parliament of Canada. Of course, it is also a fact that there are no members of the opposition from Alberta and Saskatchewan to raise these concerns in the other place. If representations are being made to the government, and I presume they are, by the members of the House of Commons, there is no publicity given to them, and therefore the producers that are involved do not know what is going on.

I am sure that some members are talking to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds) about this matter. The unfortunate thing is that under our political system—with all its advantages and with some weaknesses—they do not tell the producers what they are doing, what they are considering, or when they are going to come up with a program. Again, I think it is particularly appropriate for the Senate to be considering this problem.

The concern that this motion may be flawed, because it does not have a date on which to report, was raised with me earlier today outside of the chamber. I admit that such a date is missing, and that the motion also does not ask for authority for the committee to adjourn from place to place in Canada—that is, to hold meetings in the area where the drought is being experienced. I thought very carefully about whether I should ask the Senate to amend the motion to put in a date by which it was to report, and also to include authority to adjourn from place to place in Canada—in other words, so that it could hold meetings in Alberta, Saskatchewan and that part of British Columbia that is severely affected.

After I investigated the matter, I found that we are not obliged to put those particulars into a motion. I think such details should be referred to the steering committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. That steering committee can then decide if it wants to report to the Senate by a specific date and whether it wants to have the authority to adjourn from place to place in Canada. I do not believe that the committee, no matter how rapidly it tries to come to grips with this problem, can develop a timely program. The government has to come up with a program, an urgently developed program, to deal with the situation. The committee can consider the long-term implications. But there are thousands of cattle being shipped out of the area right now. They were shipped yesterday, the day before, and even last week.

The government said in its report yesterday that if the situation continued it would come up with a program. But we need one now. We need a program to move feed, particularly hay or fodder, into the areas where the brood cows are now starving, and that is not stretching it one bit. My cattle are not affected, so I am not crying for my own sake, but I have neighbours who have not stopped feeding their cattle since last winter because there has been no grass, none at all. Those cattle are indeed starving. They are losing weight day by day. That is why I say that the committee's recommendations would be of little immediate assistance. There simply is not enough time to go through that process.

Senator Marchand may wish to participate in this debate, because he told me earlier today that ranchers in his area of British Columbia are also shipping their cattle to areas that have experienced rainfall. They are willing to appear before the committee almost immediately to give an assessment of the situation today, along with their views on what ought to be done on a longer-term basis so that we can cope with drought emergency situations in the future.

I am also aware that the four western premiers are meeting today and that they have, according to news reports, two items of business on their agenda, one being Ontario's objection to the Free Trade Agreement. They are going to indicate to the Premier of Ontario that they do not appreciate his comments about what he is going to do about the Free Trade Agreement. The other item of business is the drought in Western Canada. They are meeting on a yacht someplace off the west coast to try to develop a program to deal with that.

I could say all kinds of things about that, but I really do not want to make any disparaging remarks. What I am interested in doing today is getting the government to look at the problem seriously and to act with the urgency that the situation deserves. That is why I am being very restrained in what I say today.

Honourable senators, when Senator Stewart was speaking yesterday on Bill C-77, he drew to our attention the fact that that bill has a provision for the government to act when there is a drought. In Part I of Bill C-77—and I know it is not the law yet, but it is there, and obviously part of the government's policy or it would not have brought it in—under "Public Welfare Emergency", it states:

"public welfare emergency" means an emergency that is caused by a real or imminent

(a) fire, flood, drought, storm, earthquake or other natural phenomenon—

The bill goes on to spell out all of the things that the Governor in Council will be obliged to do if it perceives a drought, a flood, or whatever.

Senator Tremblay: Only if the bill is passed.

Senator Olson: This must be government policy or it would not have introduced that bill. That is why I am asking the government to take its own advice and come up with a program to deal with this drought situation.

In case anyone is interested in some of the facts, some of the meteorologists have told us that the drought that is taking place on the southern Prairies of Canada is the longest and driest on record. The situation is even worse than it was back in the 1930s. I realize that we have developed ways and means of dealing with dry periods that are more advanced than those we had in the 1930s. For example, we have machinery that prevents soil erosion and drifting. We did not have such machinery then. We have seen improvements with new seed varieties that are more suited to the climatic and soil conditions that are there. But let there be no misunderstanding about how serious the drought is.

It started in 1984, and there has been little relief since then. We have now had two winters with very little snowfall. In the spring there was no runoff. The small amount of snow we did get evaporated. Normally in that part of the southern Prairies there are several feet of snow that melts in the spring. When the ground is frozen, we have what is known as a runoff that fills the summer waterholes. They provide water for the cattle on the range. That has been going on for years, but for the last two years there has been no runoff in the spring. In that area you do not get any runoff in the spring unless the ground is frozen. You can get fairly heavy rainfall, but the ground soaks that up like a blotter if it is not frozen.

A drought is a devastating experience for people who rely on their cattle herds for their income. Those cattle herds are now being dispersed, sold off, and it is not a matter of just simply going out and buying more females, whether they be calves or yearling heifers, as replacements. A brood cow herd is a herd of cows that has been kept in a certain area. The cows are familiar with their surroundings and are comfortable. They do not have blemishes, bad eyes, bad feet, bad udders, or whatever. All of those things have to be worked out of a herd before it becomes profitable for a rancher to keep it for raising calves and pursuing his livelihood.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, recently on television some of you may have seen films of dust storms which are again starting to occur. The soil is so dry it erodes and blows around—sometimes to the point where traffic on the highway comes to a standstill. It fills houses with dust and dirt. When a farmer looks at that, he sees his whole asset being blown away. Once or twice in my lifetime I have seen situations where the topsoil, that is, the top four to six inches, was blown away in a week. The topsoil is the loose, cultivated soil, so it can easily be blown away. People who understand this sort of phenomenon tell us it can take Mother Nature 500 years to produce one inch of topsoil. It is pretty clear what happens to a farmer when his topsoil is blown away—he loses the productivity of his farm.

I suppose the only compensating factor is that he, in turn, may get some topsoil which has been blown from his neighbour's farm to the south or to the west, depending on which way the wind was blowing. However, that is not where it all goes. Some of it blows into the riverbanks and coulees where it cannot be used for production of grass or any other farm product.

In the Prairies the thickness of the topsoil varies, but in most places it is four to eight inches. Underneath that is a different kind of soil, which does not have the capacity to produce vegetation.

It would be helpful now if the government were to give some indication of the kind of program it is going to establish and support. Cattlemen want to keep their herds, and they would go to some additional expense, such as buying feed while hoping for the rain—and we hope it will come tomorrow or next week or soon, at any rate—if they knew a program would be announced immediately, but when there is no announcement they do not know how long they will have to wait. What is clear is that if the sell-off gets much more intense, there will be a depression in prices, because the class of cattle that will be coming to market will be over-supplied and the price will go down. That is the situation those cattlemen will find themselves caught in. When the sell-off is over, the price will start to go back up again, and cattlemen will have to start buying them back at that level. That will happen some time later, either this year or next year. If they knew that the governments of Canada and the provinces were standing behind them to help them through this emergency, I think they would go some additional distance to try to hang on to those brood cows.

Much more could be said in trying to explain this to honourable senators, but I hope you will pass this motion fairly quickly so that we can get on with a consideration of this subject.

I also hope—and I say this sincerely—that the government will come in with a program that is going to be helpful both in terms of the transportation of hay and fodder into the area where these cattle need it and also in terms of the transportation required to take cattle out to other areas where there is some grazing. There have been some satisfactory rains in Manitoba over the last three weeks or so, an area up to then that was dry, but it has rained enough now so the grass is growing rather well. I know of some cattlemen who are shipping their cattle there now.

In the meantime, whether this motion is passed or not, we need a short-term program to be announced immediately, for the reasons I have explained today and on other days recently. I hope that honourable senators, and particularly senators from the prairie area, will support me in my effort to have a program announced now, because it is needed now, not next week or next month.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, needless to say, I am not about to make a protracted speech on agriculture, because I am not the best farmer in the best farming province in the country, which is Prince Edward Island, but I was moved by what Senator Olson said. I have always respected him as a man who knows this area—and I do not mean geographically, I mean industrially. He is an expert in these matters.

I would like him to know that it is not only the people of the Prairies who are concerned about this. In my part of Canada, as Senator Phillips will agree, the weather is a topic of conversation. Sometimes we wish it were sunny when we want to go on a picnic; and sometimes we wish it would rain when we are concerned about our gardens, but we do not really know what adverse weather is. I know of no really serious drought in Prince Edward Island. I know of no really serious problem with too much rainfall. In so many parts of Western Canada the whole climatic pattern is against the farmer. It is an old simplicity to say that Alberta is on the wrong side of the Rocky Mountains, but that is not Alberta's fault.

I want to assure the honourable senator that while I am not an expert in this, in the caucus of my party much concern and much anguish has been expressed about this situation, not just by the ministers but by the members, and not only by those from the west.

The great problem is, of course, what to do for the best. Just a few days ago I had a telephone conversation with some of my people who live in Manitoba. There was nothing they wanted to talk about more than the fact that, finally, rain had come, and we all rejoiced in that.

Honourable senators, this is a very important matter, and I am sure that senators who are far more knowledgeable than I will be able to make a valuable contribution to this debate. I can express concern, but I cannot readily provide a solution.

When I lived in Brandon, Manitoba, my landlord, Mr. Tinline, a most excellent man—I am sure Senator Olson has heard of him—as a young agriculturalist, played a major role in the soil rehabilitation program of the Prairies. It was his great fear, anxiety, indeed dread, that some day that terrible erosion, that terrible depletion of the good soil of the Prairies, would occur again. I was a little surprised and saddened—although the degree of suffering is not important, because we know this is a terrible situation—to hear Senator Olson say that, in terms of rainfall, the situation is worse now than it was in the mid-thirties. That is shocking. We thank him for his serious presentation of this grave problem.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words in support of the motion by Senator Olson. I confirm that just this morning I was in touch with the general manager of the B.C. Cattlemen's Association, Mr. Lorne Leach, who advised me of the current seriousness of the drought. He also informed me that he, on behalf of the cattlemen of British Columbia, has been in touch with the provincial and federal Ministers of Agriculture, suggesting measures that can be taken. I think Senator Olson has outlined some of those measures. Those measures should be taken soon.

Mr. Leach had mentioned that they not only want to look at the current situation but they want to take some measures that might be considered long term, for example, waterhole development. I do not know if senators here know anything about how waterholes are built in the rangelands of British Columbia, but waterhole development is very much a part of range management. In good years and normal years cattlemen are able to scoop out a piece of earth from the rangeland where they might see some dampness. Waterholes—at least, good ones—will generally last all summer.

● (1450)

At the present time you can almost walk across the South Thompson River because the water is so low. The waterholes on the rangelands are dry. Quite a few wells are dry. The cattlemen are having to haul water from various areas to keep things going, and that is costly. There are situations where they are now trying to move cattle to areas where there might be some grass, but it is a costly proposition to move cattle 100, 200 or 300 miles.

The drought area covers quite a large part of the interior of British Columbia. It is in the Cariboo area; it is in the Kamloops area; it is in the Okanagan; and it is a little in the Prince George area as well. If this body can see fit to pass the motion that Senator Olson has put forward, I am sure that fact could go a long way to indicating to the minister that urgent action should be taken. This is not confined to just the Prairie regions of the country. It includes a large area of British Columbia.

I would like to assure honourable senators that the ranchers in the interior of British Columbia would appreciate very much if something could be done.

I would also like to confirm something that Senator Olson mentioned. In my conversation with Mr. Leach, he said that he would be able to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on a moment's notice to make some representations and suggestions, which the cattlemen of British Columbia agree with. They know that this problem cannot be solved overnight. One of the greatest things that could happen is to have rain, but we have not had that. There have been rainfalls here and there, and perhaps pasture situations in some of the areas have improved, but not enough. There is still a dire need to do something on a short-term basis.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first, I would like to refer to the opening comments of Senator Olson. He stated that someone had suggested to him that there was no reference to a budget, and I agree with him. Obviously, if he is not going to spend any money, then he certainly does not need permission.

Another point that I would like to raise—and here I am trying to be helpful—is that it is not my intention to ask for a sunset clause. In the rules of the Senate it says that a sunset clause should be included in a motion, and I thought it might save Senator Olson time and inconvenience if he had put one in. Certainly I have no intention of trying to delay the progress of this very worthwhile motion on its way to the committee. Anything that can be done to help alleviate the tragic situation that the farmers in Western Canada are experiencing at this point should certainly be done.

Once again, I would like to re-emphasize the comments made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the effect that the government is very much aware of the problem. It has been monitoring it very carefully and is taking whatever steps it can to alleviate the problem. I am sure it will treat the situation with the same kind of care and attention that it has treated other problems that have arisen within the farming community in the past.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am a product of the Great Depression and the great drought. I was in office at the time; I was a minister of the Crown.

I remember the help that was given to the west. However, people made a lot of noise about it; they were not quiet. They were not quiet in Parliament; they were not quiet in the provincial parliaments. They were screaming, "Do something! Do something!" However, we did not quite know what to do.

I knew what the situation was out west at that time because I went out and saw it. Senator Olson has said to me, "Dave, you ain't seen nothing yet. It's much worse than it was then." I get around as much as anyone, and I do not remember anyone saying to me, "How are the westerners getting on with the drought?" Nobody talks about it; nobody says anything about it.

We have many methods of communication today. Not too many people read newspapers, but this situation should be aired on television. I am not particularly interested in what is happening in Beirut or Israel right now. I am interested in what is happening in my own country, and I would like to see this situation shown on television so everyone can see what is happening. I did see that some of the cattle were being moved out. I know what that means to a farmer. Sure, there are not as many farmers now as there were in the past, but they are there.

I think we have been negligent in that we have not been telling the story to the rest of Canada. I hold the communications media responsible for that. There is an obligation to let us know what goes on in every part of the country, good or bad. I know it is the bad news that attracts people, but this is bad enough for everyone to consider.

I think a message should go to the CBC and others that they are neglecting their duty in not letting the rest of the country see what is going on in the west and how these people are suffering.

As a farmer, that is all I can say now.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I support the motion put forward by Senator Olson. In my judgment, on Parliament Hill, in the field of agriculture, Senator Olson has no competition; he is in a class all by himself, and he is an expert. That should be clear to anyone who listened to him this afternoon. When he says that things are terrible out there, they certainly are.

I said to my friend, "Bud, don't feel you never get any attention in the Senate, because I heard your voice on a national news broadcast last night on CKO, and you were complaining about lack of action on the question of the drought." There is some attention being paid to the Senate, and I hope this motion will bring about even greater attention.

This is the worst drought certainly in living memory. Agriculture Canada said that last winter was surpassed in dryness only by the 1910-11 winter. If that is the case, this has been the driest winter in 77 years. Apparently, at the Lethbridge Agriculture Research Station total rainfall for the month of April 1988 was zero. There was no rainfall. How can there be less rainfall than zero? It is a tragedy out there. It is a terrible situation in Alberta. The western half of Saskatchewan is, I would say, about as bad as Alberta. So, it is a drought that reaches across half of Saskatchewan. However, just to make a general statement, in the eastern half there have been some recent rains that have helped a great deal.

● (1500)

The big danger now—and it is happening already, as you have been told by Senator Olson—is that the farmers and ranchers are desperate. They see their cattle starving; they do not want to see them starving to the point that they die; they want to salvage whatever they can, so the whole herd, built up perhaps over 20 or 30 years, goes off to market. The effect of one herd of cattle after another going off to market is that, of course, the price falls to rock bottom.

Then, Revenue Canada comes in and says, "Let's say that next year you sell all of your cattle. It is all current income. Revenue Canada will soak you for a very large tax payment because you have been in a desperate situation and have had to sell off all of your cattle. That is the law."

Therefore, honourable senators, it is time for action and for effective emergency action. There are things that can be done, and they have to be done not only for the ranchers and the farmers but sometimes for the towns and villages. The people in the towns and villages have no water, and they, too, must have water. The village of Limerick has been greatly in the news, and even sometimes in the national news, because the people have no water. Farmers have to haul water locally for their livestock. Now the town, too, is desperate and does not know whether to start digging wells or to buy pumping equipment to pump water from a long distance.

Honourable senators, action must be taken, and Senator Olson has spelled out the kind of action that needs to be taken. You cannot turn on the water taps; you cannot make it rain. But the government can say to those ranchers, "We will provide a herd maintenance program." Those words were used by a government instigating a program to deal with exactly the same type of situation back in 1980, when I first came into the cabinet. That was a controversial program at that time and not everyone liked it. If I remember correctly, it paid $35 per head for each cow that was maintained in the herd. Therefore, if someone had 100 cows, they received a few thousand dollars.

There were also provisions made for money to be used for the hauling of hay to the cows; there was money for the transporting of cows perhaps hundreds of miles to pasture so that the cows could have the benefit of grazing on a decent pasture.

One of the advantages of a program such as that is the signal that it sends out that the Government of Canada wants the herds maintained. It is not only the money, although that is important; it is not only the transportation, although that is also important: it is, rather, a feeling out there that if you are in this situation, your government, the national government, cares about you, believes your herd is important and wants you to maintain it. When that signal goes out, supported by a program, then action can be taken and action will be taken to support those herds.

There is really no alternative for farmers. The cattle are suffering, but the prospects for grain crops are also very low. The farmers are going out and are planting the seed in the soil where it will not germinate. You might say, "Why is it that farmers are dumb enough to seed grain where it will not germinate?" Honourable senators, farmers are not that dumb. They know that the grain will never grow if it stays in the bin. Also, the calendar says that it is time to seed, so the farmers go out and seed, and the crops have been growing in the ground, although sometimes in very dry soil. Therefore, the grain farmers are trying to cope with the situation.

However, a lot of the grain farmers are also livestock farmers and they need some support. Honourable senators, if we do not support the livestock producers now and if we do not support those grain farmers now, then we lose the herds and we lose the farmers. In that way, we destroy an economy, we destroy a community, and we destroy a way of life. Honourable senators, something needs to be done.

In 1980 there was a Conservative government in Manitoba, an NDP government in Saskatchewan, a Conservative government in Alberta, and a Liberal government in Ottawa. All of those governments acted collectively and something was done. Today, there is no collective action and there does not seem to be any prospect of any action being taken quickly. By the lack of action—

Senator Doody: Perhaps we should adjourn this debate and continue it next week so that we can obtain a reply for you.

Senator Argue: I do not care whether you adjourn the debate. It is up to you whether or not you do that. I do not think we should adjourn the debate.

However, honourable senators, that is the way things are, and instead of bragging about the nonsense that was put on the record yesterday as to what the government is doing, I think we should all be looking at this situation and doing something about it.

There was a drought in Western Canada in 1985, but it was not really a spring drought; it was a sort of summer and fall drought. The prospects in the spring were not too bad. Then the drought came on and farmers asked that action be taken, and some action was taken. My wife, Jean, organized a farm women's group and they took action. In fact, there was lots of grassroots action out in the west and, finally, a payment of $50 per cow was paid, and that helped. Honourable senators, this is the kind of action that is required, and required now.

Honourable senators, let me read to you what the government's action is, because it was put on the record yesterday by Senator Murray:

Agriculture Canada, through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration, has been monitoring drought conditions in Western Canada on an ongoing basis.

In other words, they have not been sleeping; they have been awake. That is good. Also, they have found out that it is not raining, so they are monitoring the situation. Isn't that great!

PFRA, which operates 86 community pastures,—

Some bureaucrat in Ottawa wrote this, I suppose.

—reports that forage growth has been slow—

Isn't that something? It is actually zero, but they say it has been slow.

—as a result of dry conditions and cool temperatures.

It would not matter if it were cold or hot; if it is dry, nothing will grow, and I suppose the temperature is not really much of a factor.

Grazing is not expected to be delayed longer than one to three weeks in most areas,—

Honourable senators, do they know when it is going to rain? Do they know that in two or three weeks the grass will be growing? Of course they do not know, and the grass will not be growing in that part of Western Canada unless it rains.

—although there are some pockets where it is more severe.

Such as the big pocket that is Alberta or the small pocket which is half of Saskatchewan. These, I suppose, are the "some pockets".

Hay and other feed supplies are still good—

Which is not true.

—and most producers are able to delay pasturing with no difficulty.

Senator Olson says that the cows are starving, but the official position of the Government of Canada and PFRA is that "most producers are able to delay pasturing with no difficulty."

Senator Murray then went on:

The first and most immediate concern for livestock is the lack of drinking water.

Et cetera, et cetera. Then he went on to say—and listen to this:

Through the Crop Insurance Program forage and livestock producers have the opportunity of purchasing financial protection against the possibility of reduced feed supplies.

Isn't that great?

In the event of a continued drought and crop insurance claim payments, farmers can use these funds to assist in defraying the cost of purchasing feed and/or moving feed and livestock.

In other words, honourable senators, wait until your crop ceases to exist; wait until crop insurance says that there is no crop; wait until you get a payment in October and then you can go and buy some feed. By that time the cows may all be dead, of course, because they will have starved to death; on the other hand, they may all have been sold. However, the official position of the Government of Canada—because that is what it says—is that if the drought continues, then:

... producers have the opportunity of purchasing financial protection against the possibility of reduced feed supplies. In the event of a continued drought and crop insurance claim payments, farmers can use these funds to assist in defraying the cost of purchasing feed and/or moving feed and livestock.

Honourable senators, the situation is very serious. Money and funds are required to take cattle to grazing at some distance away where that is the farmer's decision or the rancher's decision. Freight should be paid to move feed to the cattle. There should be a program maintaining the grain supplies that are in the elevators in local areas so that those grain stocks can be made available to livestock. I believe it is again time for the government to initiate a herd maintenance program.

Honourable senators, this is an emergency. Why is it not being looked into? Perhaps it is in the wrong region. Perhaps if we transferred the drought to Ontario we would hear a hell of a scream. We would see a much more powerful lobby than what we can get coming out of the west. If drought were likely in Quebec, the program would have been in place before the drought arrived and there would be no need for emergency measures. Even if that did not happen, it would not take three or six months until something was done about it—it would be done quickly. I say that, honourable senators, without complaint. That kind of fast action is required. It behooves the governments of Western Canada, the producers out there and other interested people to bring the problem before the federal government so that the pressure will be so great it will have to act. Let us hope that it will act quickly.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I do not wish to extend unduly this debate, but I do feel it important to underline most strenuously the words of Senator Olson, Senator Argue and Senator Marchand on this issue, which is almost impossible to explain if you have not been there. I think a great many people in Canada know that our agriculture sector is already in a state of financial crisis. On top of the financial crisis, we now have the potential for devastation in parts of our prairie community. As Senator Argue has said, it does not affect small pockets this time—it affects whole provinces or large portions of provinces. There are farmers in our area in southwestern Alberta who refer to their land as “the Sahara Desert with a fence,” and that is an apt description.

Honourable senators, we travelled down there last weekend. Visitors from other parts of the province said, “Well, you are going to get rain—look at those dark clouds.” Honourable senators, those were dust clouds—those were clouds filled with topsoil blowing off the areas of southwestern Alberta, and it will take more than a decade to replace that soil. We are talking about farmers who cannot wait for task forces—they cannot wait for federal-provincial meetings that result in something three weeks, four weeks or six weeks down the road. We are talking about people who need action now to have assistance in terms of feed brought to their cattle or immediate financial and transportation assistance by which to move these herds to an area where they can survive. Otherwise, we are not going to have just an agriculture crisis—we are going to have a social crisis of major proportions in those small towns and villages, and one which will encroach upon the cities. It may take months before the cities realize that. But if we do not have action for our livestock producers now, I shudder to think of the kinds of speeches we will be making in the fall.

Let us get this issue before our committee. I know that Senator Olson did not even want to have to make this motion. The government can act within the week to get things moving in the Prairies. I most strongly urge the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to carry that message, loud and clear, to the government so that we do not have to wait for even the initial steps to be taken before one of our committees.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I will not be too long this afternoon, but it would be wrong for me to sit here as a senator from Saskatchewan without endorsing what has already been said by those who have spoken on this serious issue. As one who was raised in Saskatchewan and started his business career in the height of the drought of 1935, '36, '37 and '38, I can say that it is difficult to visualize how we could possibly go back to those times. Yet, the other day I was driving my car and I literally had to stop myself from crossing a prairie road because of the tumbleweeds that were blowing across a road obscured by dust. Those are the symbols of a drought: tumbleweeds, and the fact that when you go outside you can just feel the grit in the air—and I am not speaking politically, although that might be encouraging!

I want to draw to the attention of honourable senators the impact not just upon the farmers but upon small businesses—upon those who make their living supplying farmers in the villages and hamlets surrounding the bigger cities. Big cities always manage to keep going—they have some industry; they have some civil servants with permanent salaries—but in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba literally hundreds of small villages are the lifeblood of those provinces. We used to classify them as “the two-elevator town,” the “three-elevator town,” and the big one, like the one Senator Argue hails from—Kayville—I wonder whether there is an elevator there yet.

Senator Argue: There is one.

Senator Buckwold: Kayville has one elevator, and it is filled up, sometimes, by the wheat grown by Senator Argue.

I draw to the attention of honourable senators that in the census of 1931 Saskatchewan was the third largest province by population in the Dominion of Canada. There was Ontario, there was Quebec, and there was Saskatchewan. We were larger than Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia. We had, in 1931, the same number of people, within a few thousand, as we have today, in 1988, and we keep talking about the progress of that province. Our people moved out by the tens of thousands just to survive. The scene that is imprinted indelibly in my mind is one of wagons and old trucks loaded down with beds and diningroom chairs—it is the scene of the people of Saskatchewan, literally like the Okies, moving on.

Honourable senators, I am not trying to be a tear-jerker and I am not trying to draw from you the kind of response that you might get from begging for nickles. This is a very serious problem. Not only will the farmers be faced with further devastation in addition to low prices, high interest rates and loans—we keep hammering away about those—but the small businessmen in these areas will be faced with similar disasters. I do not know how many of these small storekeepers, implement dealers and café owners can keep going. That is why I implore the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to try to impress upon those decision-makers, who I know will recognize the need, the absolute importance of action as soon as possible. Let us do something before the horse is out of the barn. We know that eventually the government will come through, that the door will be closed, but unfortunately, as I have said, it will be too late.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, so that we can pass this motion today, let us clear up the procedural point raised by Senator Doody. The rule that applies in this case is rule 83A. It refers to certain guidelines about financial procedures in Appendix III. In this case, the appropriate one is guideline 2:02, which states:

A notice of motion to establish a special committee or to authorize a committee to conduct a special study shall not refer to special expenses but shall set a date by which the committee is to report to the Senate.

I am sure that we will all give leave to Senator Olson to set a date so that he can comply with that guideline and the motion can go forward with no procedural encumbrance.

On the second point—that is, the power to travel—I believe that Senator Olson is quite right. Guideline 2:03 applies. The steering committee should decide if it wants to travel and then seek funds. I think it would be a good idea to put in a date so as to obviate any problem that might arise with that other guideline.

● (1520)

Senator Olson: With leave of the Senate, perhaps we could put in the date of October 31. I hope I will be able to talk the committee into filing some interim reports.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the motion be amended by including the date October 31?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, as amended?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 24, 1988, at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—MEETING OF MINISTERS OF AGRICULTURE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if a meeting between the ministers of agriculture from the four western provinces and the federal minister has been called to deal with the serious drought situation in western Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have the date of such a meeting. I think my friend is aware that a meeting will take place.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government give us an assurance that he will convey to the minister the urgency of this situation and that, in fact, it is worse today than it was yesterday; it is worse this week than it was last week; and that there is such an extreme emergency that each day's delay has very serious consequences for some people, who have already begun selling off their herds?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with great respect, I think the honourable senator should cease trying to convey the impression that nothing is being done by provincial and federal governments on this matter.

As I have indicated previously, there is a federal-provincial committee monitoring the situation carefully. There have been contacts at the ministerial level between Ottawa and the provinces, and there will be a meeting between the federal minister and his provincial counterparts.

The honourable senator tries to convey the impression that nobody in the federal government has heard about these conditions. I want to assure him that the interests of western Canada and the serious drought situation there are well known to the large and effective delegation of western Canadian members of the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: If that is true, there has been a long period of time—an unconscionable period of time—between the seriousness of the situation being realized and any action being taken. Before the leader gets that disgusted look on his face, I want to tell him that there are people out there right now—today, the day before yesterday and last week—who are wondering what the federal government is going to do about this situation. They are now faced with the problem of having no feed for their livestock. I do not know how I can get that through to the leader. All I was asking the minister to do was convey the urgency of the situation so that some action will be taken.

In case he does not know, I can tell him that the livestock auction sales in western Canada are now starting to fill up with brood cows, but that this is not the time of year to sell brood cows unless there is an emergency situation, such as the inability of farmers to feed them.

Day after day those cattle are losing weight. They are losing as much as three pounds to four pounds a day, and at the prices currently set that is costly.

I do not want to get into a speech—

Senator Argue: Go ahead.

Senator Olson: —but the government ought to move on this. I do not offer any apologies to the leader for trying to indicate that the emergency is now and yet no action has been taken.

I ask politely again if the leader would convey to the authorities in the federal government that the urgency is now, not some time later after the government has monitored the situation some more.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with great respect, it is not necessary to convey to the responsible minister, or to the elected representatives of the people of western Canada, the urgency of this situation. They are well aware of the urgency of the situation.

Senator Olson: I can advise my honourable friend that the livestock producers in western Canada have been given no indication of positive action of which they are aware; therefore, I should like them to know: When does the federal government intend to take its responsibility and do something about this situation?

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-102, An Act to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act, as amended.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, on Thursday last I gave notice that I would move third reading of this bill today, but in the light of some very important observations and questions raised by honourable senators opposite I have asked the minister's office to provide more information on these important matters. I think it would be helpful to stand this until tomorrow, at which time I will have that information, rather than have the Senate survive on the kind of insufficient information I might tend to give.

Order stands.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS AND MOTION
REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doyle, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax):

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments to the Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, to which the House of Commons has disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, on May 4 a vote was held in this chamber considering the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-60. That bill was sent back to the House of Commons and, after its being over there for some 18 days, a message was sent to this chamber suggesting that the Senate not insist upon its amendments. I was more than a little taken aback, as I am sure were other members of the committee, by what I will call "MacDonald to the power of 2," or "MacDonald squared," if you want to put it that way.

Senator Frith: Oh, she would resent being "squared".

Senator Sinclair: Well, you never know how these things will parenthetically work out until you try them. At any rate, in the other place, the "Honourable Flora MacDonald to the power of 2," if I can put it that way, said that our committee sat for only three days and heard 20 witnesses and that it did not have professional advice in this complicated matter. Well, I would suggest that any objective reading of the record of the Senate committee would indicate that there was more than "cursory examination" given to the bill. I could, however, be wrong. And maybe this bill does need more examination. Maybe it is required that the Senate take this bill to the people. Maybe it is required that the Senate committee travel. Maybe the bill should not be before the committee for three days, but for three months. I do not know if that is what she had in mind.

In any event, honourable senators, I would suggest that the message and the bill be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, quite obviously, if it is the wish of the Senate to send this bill back to the committee, then that is where it is going to go. It seems to me to be a rather tragic misuse of the powers of this place to so treat a bill that has been passed by all parties in the other place and has obviously got the consent of the elected people of all political stripes. If this place decides, in a fit of pique or a fit of disturbance over the minister's comments, that the Senate has not taken enough time to look at the bill, then perhaps the Senate should also think of the fact that the minister suggested that we accept the bill as it was originally presented and as, once again, it was passed at its second presentation in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I think it is most unwise for this house to take the position that it is obviously going to take on a bill of this nature. I am not going to go into the details of the bill. Those who served on the committee are very familiar with it. As to the suggestion that it has not been well considered, I think members of this place know differently. Not only this government but previous governments have tried for a long while to find a fair and equitable way to treat members of our artistic and creative community in this country. To find that they will be further delayed in receiving the kind of justice they so deserve, simply because of some fit of distemper of certain members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, is deplorable in my view. If, indeed, it is the wish of this house to send the bill back to committee, then obviously that is what will happen. But I have to advise honourable senators that, in my opinion, that is a very short-sighted course of action in terms of the future of this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators know how I feel about this bill. I have spoken about it in committee and in the house. As I said then, I believe the bill should pass.

● (1410)

However, concerning the procedure of sending it back to the committee, as a courtesy and for efficiency in the operation of the Senate and its committees, and to maintain a cordial relationship between the Senate and its committees—and I have said this on other occasions with regard to other bills—when the Senate adopts a committee report on a bill that is sent to the House of Commons with amendments, which are not accepted in the other place, and the Senate is asked to not insist on those amendments, it should be sent back to the committee whose report was first adopted to enable them to react to the message from the House of Commons.

As I said, honourable senators know how I feel about the merits of the bill itself; but as for sending it back to the committee, I believe that we ought to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Sinclair, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the motion, together with the Message from the House of Commons on the same subject, dated 17th May, 1988 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: In view of my feelings about the bill, I would prefer that someone else second it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will another honourable senator second it?

Senator Hicks: I will second it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: I shall ask for a voice vote again, because it sounded quite even.

Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.
And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

● (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wonder if Senator Sinclair can indicate to the Senate when he intends calling his committee together to try to move this subject along?

● (1430)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has a meeting scheduled for 5:15 this afternoon in Room 250 East Block, to consider further work of the committee. At that time we shall discuss matters pertaining to this and other subjects.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Cogger).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this matter was adjourned in the name of Senator Thériault for some time and it now stands in the name of Senator Cogger. While we realize the senator on our side did have it in his name for some time, we would like to have this matter dealt with more speedily now than we then dealt with it.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I appreciate Senator Frith's comments. Senator Cogger, as you know, is quite interested in this particular subject matter and has yielded to anybody who wishes to speak on the matter. I am sure that he still feels the same way. I know he intends to participate in the debate himself, and as soon as he returns I am sure he will be prepared to proceed.

Order stands.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-127, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, our colleague from Cape Breton, Senator Muir, originally intended to deal with Bill C-127, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, but, unfortunately, he and Mrs. Muir were injured in a car accident over the weekend. Therefore, I am somewhat in the position of being a backup quarterback to move the legislation along.

I was tempted to begin by saying that this is a relatively short and simple bill. However, last week, during a conversation I had with Senator McElman, we were laughing about the various times that this has happened in the Senate. Therefore, I should perhaps resist that temptation.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation, originally established in 1967, was allowed to make capital advances on the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the amount of $10 million. Then, in the 1970s, that figure was increased to $25 million. The amendment before us today will increase the amount to $50 million.

In 1984 Devco suffered a devastating loss with a fire in No. 26 colliery in Glace Bay. As a result, the federal government has invested the sum of $218 million to provide for a new colliery at Phalen and to expand the one at Victoria Junction. In addition, the federal government has moved on various other fronts to provide assistance to Cape Breton. These include the investment tax credit, the topping-up assistance program and Cape Breton Enterprise, which would become part of ACOA.

● (1440)

Devco, when it was established, had the function of presiding over the orderly closing of Cape Breton Mines. At that time it was anticipated that the market for coal from Cape Breton Mines would decline. However, events since that time have changed the situation and we now find that the demand for Cape Breton coal has increased. Sales in the year 1984-85 totalled 2.5 million tonnes and in the year 1987-88 will total 2.8 million tonnes.

Devco had a loss of $1.8 million in the year 1987-88; however, in the year 1988-89 Devco would have a profit of $13.1 million. That $13.1 million does not provide for the depletion and replacement of equipment.

The Phalen Colliery, as I stated, opened in the summer of 1987 and now provides between 650 and 700 jobs for coal miners, and when it reaches its full capacity it will be producing approximately 4.5 million tonnes per year. Unfortunately, honourable senators, the anticipated profit of $13.1 million will not meet the requirement for replacing and maintaining equipment below the surface and the surface infrastructure. Therefore, the federal government will have to provide funding to cover the cost of most of the $43.1 million required in ongoing capital expenditures. It is anticipated that Devco will have a requirement for capital advances of $37 million by the end of June 1988. Therefore, honourable senators, the necessity of amending the act to provide for capital advances in the sum of $50 million. I again mention the fact that Devco will have a requirement of $37 million by the end of June, and I hope that the Senate will have disposed of the matter by that time.

Thank you for allowing me to substitute for Senator Muir. I realize my remarks are not as interesting and that I certainly do not have the understanding of Cape Breton that Senator Muir has. However, I am sure that with some forbearance the Senate will be able to pass this legislation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Côtteau, for Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

RAILWAY SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-105, to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-105, the Railway Safety Bill is to make provision for securing the safe operation of railways. This bill confirms the commitment to safety as the first priority of the Canadian transportation system. There has been action to improve the safety of air, marine and road transportation through the Aeronautics Act, the Canada Shipping Act, new minimum requirements for offshore drilling rigs, navigational control for ships and tightening of security at airports. Bill C-105 extends that action to the railways.

The commitment to safety in transportation was set forth in section 3 of the National Transportation Act, 1987, which requires that:

The transportation system meets the highest practicable safety standards.

Bill C-105 before us now has been prepared to implement this policy for Canada's railways.

The Railway Safety Act will be followed by a bill to create a transportation accident investigation board. That independent board will be empowered to investigate accidents in all federally regulated modes of transportation, drawing upon expert staff to determine causes and to recommend means to prevent any recurrence.

To give some background, for many years the safety of Canada's railways has been regulated under the Railway Act. This act originated at the turn of the century when the railway system was rapidly expanding. At that time much of Canada's railway system was under construction to open up new territory and to encourage settlement. Lines were often speculative ventures with uncertain revenue prospects, built by small companies without adequate financial reserves. There was a strong temptation to cut corners on construction and operating costs, and legislation was needed to allow the government of the day to control these activities closely for the protection of the public and railway employees.

Whether the companies were big or small, their operations were a far cry from those of today. Trains were short, slow, few and far between. The environment has changed. Canada's railways now move massive volumes of freight to and from factories, mines, farms and ports to keep the national economy healthy. The trains themselves have grown enormously. Fifteen-thousand-tonne trains are now commonplace, compared to 200- or 300-tonne trains at the time when the Railway Act was first written. Today's large trains move faster and with fewer stops than ever before.

Railways are in the midst of the technological revolution. Sophisticated communications equipment and computer systems now control the movement of trains. A major new development will soon allow the transmission of train movement instructions directly by radio to computers on board locomotives. The government is providing funding to encourage this development known as the "advanced train control system". This and other technological advances offer significant improvements to railway safety. The railways are making large investments in high technology, with much more to come.

However, while the transportation environment and the railways have changed, the legislation has remained the same. The railway safety regulator is handicapped while working under the existing Railway Act, which was designed for another era. This fact was reflected in the report of the commission of inquiry into the Hinton train collision. Justice Foisy was concerned that government is not keeping pace with the need to modernize rules and regulations.

Currently, matters of safety regulation, economic regulation, accident investigation, and the assorted provisions governing telegraph systems and railway corporate affairs are all combined in one voluminous Railway Act. The combination of safety and economic regulation and accident investigation in one agency of government is no longer considered to be in the public interest. There is a potential for conflict amongst these responsibilities and, while no such conflict has been evident in the performance of the Canadian Transport Commission or its successor, the National Transportation Agency, it is the policy of the government to separate these responsibilities.

● (1450)

The Railway Act has placed too great an emphasis on detailed regulation of routine construction work, which today is covered by nationally accepted engineering standards. It has many anachronistic references to operating practices that disappeared from Canadian railways years ago. It also imposes on the railway rule-maker the review procedure for government regulations, which were designed to protect the rights and privacy of individuals, not to deal with technical aspects of railway operations. The government regulator and the industry face serious delays when making needed changes to operating rules simply because the Railway Act requires it. Mr. Justice Foisy in his inquiry into the Hinton train collision was sufficiently concerned about these delays to recommend specifically that the government "take immediate steps to make the uniform code of operating rules current and to maintain it in that condition." It is difficult, if not impossible, to do so under the provisions of the Railway Act.

Today's safety concerns focus on how railways operate and maintain heavy density main lines involving the movement of 15,000-tonne freight trains and passenger trains carrying hundreds of people; yet the Railway Act gives limited powers of inspection to professional engineers. "Rules and operations" inspectors, who are not professional engineers, are performing essential functions without the legal backing to enforce their decisions.

The penalties found in the Railway Act are absurd by today's standards. An engineer can be fined $8 for failing to blow his whistle at a crossing, while a multimillion dollar corporation may face a fine of $100. The Railway Act also contains the threat of punishment by hard labour—a harsh, outdated concept, some may say.

Honourable senators, the need is clear: Railways and the transportation environment are changing rapidly and the legislation must meet the challenge.

Under the Criminal Code, it is a criminal offence to drink and drive or to drive dangerously. The public has a right to expect that these prohibitions apply to all transportation; but while they apply to trucks, airplanes and ships, it is surprising to know that these offences do not apply to persons responsible for the movement of railway equipment.

This unusual situation probably occurred because the railway companies own and control the railway equipment and the tracks over which it moves, employ the people who operate the equipment and have their own police forces. The combination of railway operating rules and internal enforcement may have been the justification for an otherwise unacceptable omission.

While the railways' absolute prohibition against impairment on the job has been effective in minimizing the threat to public safety, railway operating employees work difficult hours and spend much of their time away from home. Research into the use of alcohol and drugs indicates that these working conditions create a high risk of substance abuse.

The public is exposed to the operation of trains as passengers, as motorists at grade crossings and as individuals living or working near railway lines. Train crews routinely control the movement of freight trains, which, to an increasing extent, carry a wide variety of dangerous commodities. It is essential that their vigilance is not in any way impaired by alcohol or drugs. For this reason the Criminal Code provisions that apply to truck drivers, ships' captains, aircraft pilots and every motorist should also apply to railway employees. This is an omission which the new legislation corrects.

There are certain fundamental principles on which the regulation of railway safety in Canada must be based: Safety regulation must be separated from responsibility for economic regulation and accident investigation; the roles and responsibilities of the regulator and railway management must be clearly defined; the regulator must have the power to protect public and employee safety; management must be responsible and accountable for the safety of operations; consultation is essential, including full public inquiries on important issues; regulation must be flexible and responsive in an environment of rapidly changing services and technology, especially where new technology will improve safety; unnecessary and unproductive regulation should be eliminated, and penalties for offences must be meaningful.

Bill C-105 has been drafted to deal with these many concerns, most importantly in the following ways. The Railway Safety Bill provides a clear focus on safety by placing in a single act all of the federal government's powers for the regulation of railway safety. Unlike the existing Railway Act, decision-making under this bill is concerned only with questions of safe railway operation, which, as defined in the bill, include the safety of the general public. By allocating those powers to the Minister of Transport and leaving the economic regulation of railways with the National Transportation Agency, the bill will achieve that needed separation of responsibilities.

The Railway Safety Act will give the government all of the powers necessary to ensure safety on the railways. For the construction, maintenance and operation of the system, the railways must satisfy the minister that each element has been planned, executed and controlled in a manner that is consistent with regulations and rules. The bill clearly makes the railways responsible for developing and implementing these measures and does not place the minister or government officials in the position to make management decisions. The minister will have the essential power to accept or reject management's proposals.

The Governor in Council will establish the basic regulations for the safety of the system without limitation on the power to determine the content of those regulations. The minister will have the power to impose rules of operation where railway companies have failed, for whatever reason, to develop rules that are acceptable and where these rules are essential for safe operation. The minister will also have the power to order companies to cease using, and to remove, structures which pose a threat to safety.

Honourable senators, these are extensive powers. In order to ensure their effective use, the bill provides for regular consultation by creating a railway safety consultative committee. The committee will include representation from the railways, railway unions, shippers, municipalities and the public; and will include persons having special interest or expertise in railway safety matters. Through the exchange of ideas and views, proposed regulatory changes can be carefully thought through in advance, using consultation to avoid confrontation.

Bill C-105 removes the anachronisms of the existing legislation and provides for the regulation of construction projects in keeping with safety requirements today. The powers of inspection under the Railway Safety Act will enable the government to monitor the safety of any of these projects at any time.

As to Justice Foisy's concern about keeping railway operating rules up to date, this bill provides a streamlined rule-making process, permits regulations and rules to incorporate and update technical information by reference and establishes time limits to encourage prompt decision-making by the regulator. The Foisy commission also called for the separation of rule-making and accident investigation and for prosecution for breach of rules, both of which have been provided for in this bill. Finally, Justice Foisy recommended that railway legislation require the reporting of employee medical conditions that might jeopardize railway safety. This provision is to be found in clause 35 of the bill.

By eliminating unproductive regulatory activities and simplifying the regulatory process, Bill C-105 will allow the government to redirect existing resources into more productive areas. Today the emphasis must be placed on inspection for compliance. With broadened powers of inspection, regulatory staff can be placed anywhere on the system where they are needed.

Inspectors appointed under the Railway Safety Act will have full power to order railways to stop any operation that might prejudice safety. There will be no compromise on this power, but, in response to industry fears about potential abuse, inspectors will be required to act through railway supervisory staff, when possible, and to notify the minister when an order of this nature has been issued. If requested, the minister will be in a position to judge if these powers are being exercised as intended and will be able to rescind any order that is inappropriate.

I mentioned the meaningless penalty provisions of the existing legislation. Bill C-105 provides for fines of up to $200,000 for corporations and up to $10,000, or imprisonment for up to one year, for individuals, along with the power to treat continued violations as separate punishable offences for each day incurred. These constitute substantial penalties to any organization or individual and fill the gap that exists in the current legislation.

It is a sad fact that threats to the security of transportation are an increasing problem worldwide. Bill C-105 provides powers that will help the government to react to any such threats to the Canadian railway system. We may hope that it will never be necessary to use these powers, but it is essential that they be available now to protect the system in the future.

● (1500)

Finally, Bill C-105 introduces a number of amendments to related legislation. Of particular importance are the amendments to the Criminal Code regarding the drinking or dangerous driving provisions, and amendments to the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act. On this latter act, Bill C-105 repeals the parts dealing with grade crossing improvements and grade separations but retains and improves these essential powers which allow the government to promote improvements to safety. In response to requests from Canadian municipalities, Part I of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act, which deals with the relocation of rail lines, has been retained.

The bill before you was prepared after thorough consultations with provinces, municipalities, railways, railway unions, shippers, shippers of dangerous commodities, owners of private railway equipment and, of course, public interest groups. The basic provisions of the bill have widespread support among the persons consulted, and amendments made to the original draft have accommodated many minor concerns raised by interested parties.

It may be of comfort to honourable senators to know that the safety record of Canada's railways is very good. Our perception of railway safety is often conditioned by the few major accidents that are so widely reported. I would like to reassure you that the railways are basically safe. Moreover, they are becoming safer. In seven of the last eleven years CP Rail has been the safest Class 1 railway in North America. Over the same period CN Rail has been consistently within the top six.

Although the record is good, it can be improved. To do this we must have an understanding of the problem. Of the total fatalities that occur in railway accidents, over 40 per cent are due to accidents at grade crossings. Almost without exception, these could be prevented by the motor vehicle driver. Another 40 per cent of the fatalities involve trespassers struck by moving railway equipment. The key to reducing this terrible toll is to educate motorists and children to the dangers of railways and to improve safety at grade crossings.

Bill C-105 makes provision for government to take action through continued funding of crossing improvements and grade separations, and through a new provision to allow the Minister of Transport to fund a wide range of safety-related activities, including educational programs, such as Operation Lifesaver, that are aimed at school children.

Honourable senators should also be aware that there are major efforts under way aimed at improving railway safety and protecting the public. The government established the Toronto Area Dangerous Goods Task Force and the Task Force on the Shipment of Dangerous Goods through the B.C. lower mainland. Both task forces, which involve provincial and municipal governments and public interest groups, are considering the risks and alternatives related to transporting dangerous commodities through urban areas. The results should be relevant to communities throughout the country.

As mentioned earlier, the government commissioned Justice Foisy to carry out a full investigation into the tragedy at Hinton. Justice Foisy's excellent report was released to the public, and the Minister of Transport also made public progress on implementing the recommendations. Significant changes have been made to rules governing hours of rest for train crews. The unsatisfactory "deadman pedal" has been prohibited and will soon disappear from locomotives, to be replaced by the more reliable and tamper-proof "reset safety control" device. Wherever possible, the recommendations of the Foisy Report have already been implemented. Other longer-term proposals are under active consideration. Justice Foisy's recommendations for legislative action are embodied in the bill now before us.

[Senator Spivak.]

There are many areas in which the government has acted to improve safety on our railways. Bill C-105 is an important step in continuing and accelerating the work. The Railway Safety Act will be the means to achieve that objective, and I am sure that honourable senators will assist by giving this bill speedy passage.

On motion of Senator Turner, debate adjourned.

EMERGENCIES BILL

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, that the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have received a letter from Senator Kelly, and I believe a copy was sent to Senator Doody.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in all modesty, I have to say that it is the other way round.

Senator Frith: That is only as it should be. He should have sent it to his deputy leader first.

The effect of his letter is that this bill should be referred to a Senate Committee of the Whole. If so, with consent, we can amend the motion accordingly and have it passed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, we have no problem with that. A time has been tentatively set for Wednesday, May 31. That time has to be confirmed with the minister's office, but I understand that he and his officials have agreed to attend on us at that time. If that is agreeable, there will be a Committee of the Whole on this particular bill at that time.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, for Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Since a date has not been agreed to, perhaps we can just refer it to a Committee of the Whole. Then the Committee of the Whole can be set up to meet the minister's schedule.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-74, An Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health.—(Honourable Senator Kenny).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask honourable senators opposite if they can give an indication of when this bill might go forward. It was introduced in this house by Senator Phillips on Tuesday, May 10, 1988. Second reading was proposed by Senator Robertson on May 17.

I can appreciate that honourable senators might have difficulties with a particular bill, but, in all fairness, a bill of this significance should be debated in this place. It is not possible to explain or defend the actions of a chamber that refuses to debate government legislation. I can well understand the reluctance of senators in some cases to agree with matters that are put forward by government, but this is a major piece of environmental protection legislation. I believe it deserves to be addressed.

Senator Kenny, in whose name this bill stands, could very well be absent on official and important business. I do not quarrel with that. All of us have occasions when we cannot be here. Nevertheless, he is only one star among a whole galaxy of stars on the other side. I am sure there is someone other than he who is capable of addressing this particular bill, and getting it into committee, or whatever it is that the Senate wishes to do. The time has come when this bill should be addressed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to accept, with as much humility and grace as I can, the compliment paid by the Deputy Leader of the Government in recognizing the superabundance of talent that we have on this side of the chamber.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I agree that we should never refuse to debate legislation that is properly before us, and I make it quite clear that we are not doing so here.

Senator Kenny was absent last week, except for Thursday. He is away again on public business until next week. He had asked for the opportunity to prepare some material for our caucus concerning his positions on some aspects of this bill. He wants to have done that by next week, when we meet on May 31. He is then prepared—and he told me this before he left—to deal with it at second reading next week in the hope that it will get to the committee that week. So far as I know, there are no other senators on this side wishing to join in the debate at second reading.

● (1510)

What it comes down to is this: it was debated first one week ago, and, if this plan is implemented, debate on second reading will have been completed by May 31 or June 1, which will be in approximately two weeks. As far as I am aware, it will go to committee then.

While that is perhaps a week longer than the government would wish, I can assure them that that is all it amounts to, and that there is no refusal to debate and no wish to delay the debate unduly.

Senator Doody: I thank Senator Frith for his explanation. I should point out that it was not my intention to indicate that Senator Kenny should be denied an opportunity to speak to the bill; of course, he and every other senator has a right to speak to the bill on second reading, in committee and on third reading. It simply seems to me that, for a chamber that is setting itself up as a responsible legislative chamber, it is not proper procedure to suspend debate for two or three weeks on a government bill because of the unavoidable absence of one of its members. There are others who could fill in nicely, I am sure, and do that which is necessary, which is the point that I was trying to make.

Senator Frith: Well, then, I should make it clear also that if anyone else wishes to debate this bill in the meantime, he or she may do so. Senator Kenny has accepted being the opposition's spokesman on the bill, and I think all senators would want to grant him that right and meet his convenience as to when he speaks on it.

Order stands.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

MOTION RE GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be; and

That, within 120 days after the adoption of this resolution, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should consider the advisability of tabling in the Senate the response of the government to this recommendation.— (Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am rising to support the motion. It seems that I am always supporting the government on their motions!

I should also like to support Senator Doody on his viewpoint that no legislation should be held up unduly by not being debated. In that Bill S-15 has been on the order paper since March 1, everyone certainly must have had time to consider it well. Perhaps we will get rid of it next week as well, and send it to committee.

Honourable senators, first, I should like to congratulate Senator Marshall and Senator Phillips, who, as two veterans of the last great war themselves, always consider the veterans, their widows and orphans, and always support any legislation that seems to be of benefit to this group of Canadians.

I, on behalf of this side of the house, wish to support the motion:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act in order to provide for the payment of an allowance, as defined under each of those Acts, to any Canadian veteran or qualified civilian of World War I, World War II or the Korean conflict, or to any widow or orphan of such a veteran or qualified civilian as defined in those Acts, whether or not such veteran or qualified civilian, widow or orphan has resided in Canada at any time since either of those wars or the Korean conflict, as the case may be;

The only thing I would say, honourable senators, is that the motion does not go far enough. I would also add, "That it is time that those veterans who served in Canada be considered for the war veterans allowance."

There have been many great veterans of our armed forces. Because they were so good at their jobs, they were kept here in Canada to teach other veterans. Whether they were in the air force, navy or army, they signed up for active service and wanted to go overseas, but, because they did such an excellent job as teachers and instructors, they had to stay here in Canada in those roles and did not have an opportunity to go to England or abroad. Because of that, today they, or their widows and orphans, are penalized. They are no longer eligible for the war veterans allowance, the aging veterans program or the VIP program, as it is now called—all those benefits that others are taking advantage of because they happened to have gone overseas for a short period of time.

I would like to see a section added by which the government would give the war veterans allowance to those veterans of the two great wars and the Korean conflict who served in the Canadian area for at least 365 days—put a limit on it!—so that they or their widows and orphans could receive some benefit.

I also think there could be a section to cover veterans who clean up after a war is supposedly over. For example, in Korea the war is still not "over," because an armistice was never signed; there was just an agreement between the officers. Many of our Canadians went to Korea, after that agreement between the north and the south, to help clean up the mess. Many of the mines that had been laid were still there and many of our soldiers were injured; but they are not eligible for pension because the war was apparently over. There should have been a time limit of one or two years after the deadline of 1953 so that they would still be eligible for a disability pension or war veterans allowance.

I understand that that happened in the first great war, and that a year or two afterwards the veterans who had gone overseas after the actual conflict or after the armistice had been signed were still eligible for war veterans allowance or disability pensions.

I would also have added a section to support the many Canadians who were in the clean-ups in Chalk River and Nevada and were exposed to atomic bombs, atomic energy and radiation and who have since died with leukemia or cancer. No doubt their diseases were caused by radiation, but that is difficult to prove. Nevertheless, the United States of America has passed legislation giving the benefit of the doubt to the veteran, so that, if a veteran who has died with leukemia or cancer was exposed to radiation in Nevada or anywhere else, his widow is automatically eligible for a war pension.

However, that is not the case in Canada. Here, we have no such legislation. Our veterans must go and fight their cases before the chief medical officer and try to prove to him that the reason they are suffering from leukemia or that their colleagues have died from the same disease is that they were exposed to radiation. However, the connection between radiation and these cancerous diseases is a hard thing to prove. The veterans get many differing medical opinions, and some of these opinions are that there might be no connection whatsoever; other opinions are that there could be a connection. Be that as it may, it seems that there is a very high incidence of death from leukemia among veterans who were involved in the Chalk River clean-up or the Nevada clean-up.

Honourable senators, perhaps I would also have added to this motion a section concerning the wives of veterans so that, after their husbands had died, their pensions would continue; they would retain their pension rights and their eligibility for war veterans allowance. Perhaps they could even receive free drug benefits, since many of the widows of war veterans pay exorbitant costs for their drugs today. They are in situations where they are often alone, paying rent and maintaining a household. When the main pensioner has gone, life is sometimes very difficult for widows and orphans left behind.

There are a great many areas the Department of Veterans Affairs should be looking at to help these veterans and widows of veterans, whose numbers, it should be added, grow fewer every year. If you read the monthly Legionnaire magazine, you will see on the last two or three pages lists of names of many of our Canadian heroes who are no longer with us. I think it should be kept in mind that the list of those eligible for benefits and pensions gets smaller and smaller every year.

Surely the time has come to give those veterans in Canada who did not have the opportunity of serving abroad, but who served here for at least 365 days, the opportunity to apply for War Veterans Allowance. Moreover, if they are 65 years or over, they should also be eligible for the aging veterans program or the VIP program. In that way, they could receive help with shovelling their driveways in the winter time and having the grass cut in the summer. Also, if they are disabled or crippled, they could be eligible for homemaker services as other war veterans are.

We are finding that there is a great need for more nursing home beds to be made available for veterans. A capital works program should be set up to take care of that need for beds as well as for chronic care units. Many of our veterans today are now senior citizens and are becoming disabled. No doubt the VIP program has helped to keep them at home as long as possible. However, many of them can no longer stay home. They need nursing care and chronic hospital care, but the beds are not available for them.

In the past federal governments thought it wise to assign a proportion of veterans' hospital beds to provincial governments. In retrospect, that action seems a little hasty, since those beds are now needed as hospital beds and chronic beds for the veterans themselves. However, I believe that some arrangement could be worked out with the provinces so that the necessary chronic care hospitals could be constructed on a joint basis, whether 75/25 or 60/40, and the needs of veterans could be taken care of, especially over the next five to seven years, when, as I see it, the need for such care will increase.

Honourable senators, I could go on and on about the things that our veterans should have. However, the motion before this chamber is with respect to those veterans who have not returned to Canada but are still living abroad. Let me say that that is at least a step in the right direction. We can look forward 120 days to when the Leader of the Government in the Senate will, I hope, bring back to this chamber a response from the government of the day on what action it intends to take concerning this matter. All I can say is that I hope the government will give this motion its full support.

I know that the minister himself would like to support it, because he, too, is a veteran; he believes in their case and always listens to their concerns. However, it is sometimes difficult for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to have his wishes accepted by cabinet as a whole. Therefore, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who seems to have great clout in the cabinet, to put his shoulder to the wheel and support the Minister of Veterans Affairs with respect to this matter. I am quite sure that, if he does that, we will receive a good report—perhaps in less than 120 days. In any event, I give full support to this motion of Senator Marshall's and Senator Phillips'.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, you will recall that yesterday in response to a question by Senator Doody it was indicated that a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would be held that evening at 5.15 to consider the future work of the committee.

One of the items we dealt with at that meeting was Bill C-60, and arrangements have been made for the committee to meet with the minister on Friday next at 2 p.m. in room 256-S. I hope that notices of that meeting will be circulated to you, honourable senators, before you leave your offices, although that may not be possible. In any event, that meeting has been set up and the minister and her staff will be available to appear before the committee at that time.

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—MEETING OF MINISTERS OF AGRICULTURE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he and his colleagues are aware that we are having another dry day in western Canada.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF JUSTICE—PROVISION OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, some weeks ago we were honoured and privileged to have appointed to this place a new senator from Newfoundland, the Honourable Gerald Ottenheimer. Senator Ottenheimer, who has lots of experience, is not in his seat today. I suspect that he is in Newfoundland with the Fisheries Committee. His appointment can probably be considered the first to the Senate under the Meech Lake Accord. We now have a new judge on the Supreme Court. Were the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord followed in the appointment of that judge, and was the province asked to present a list of names?

Senator Olson: That is a new interpretation!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that, although the Meech Lake Accord has not been passed by all the provinces and that although it is not in effect as yet, it was agreed by all the premiers who signed—

Senator Barootes: All?

Senator Bonnell: It was agreed by all the premiers who signed the document and by the Prime Minister that they would try to live within the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord until it was proclaimed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to appointments to the Senate, there is a political accord providing that appointments be made according to an interim procedure, even before the amendments are proclaimed. Therefore, as my friend has noted, in the case of the vacancy for Newfoundland, the Government of Newfoundland was asked to submit, and did submit, a list of names from among which the Prime Minister selected one; namely, Senator Ottenheimer. No such agreement was made with respect to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. However, since it is the most recent appointment—that of Mr. Justice Sopinka—that is of interest to the honourable senator, I would simply observe that the Attorney General of Ontario indicated in a media report today that he was indeed consulted by the federal Minister of Justice and that he thought that the appointment was, if I recall his exact description, “a first class appointment.”

Senator Bonnell: I have no doubt that the appointment is a first class appointment. The man has great experience; he is well qualified; and he will make an excellent Supreme Court judge. However, that is not my problem. My problem is that I had thought that there was some agreement—perhaps not a written agreement or a contract, but a kind of unwritten agreement—that the Prime Minister and the provincial government involved would submit lists for these appointments.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator's problem is that he has not read the accord. There is, as I say, a political agreement among First Ministers that the procedure for Senate appointments will take place immediately. However, the procedure in respect of Supreme Court appointments will not take place until the amendments are proclaimed. We are living within a spirit of national reconciliation in this country which, I am happy to say, is alive and well.

WESTERN ARCTIC (INUVIALUIT) CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Heath Macquarrie moved the third reading of Bill C-102, as amended, to amend the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, prior to third reading of this bill, I would remind you that Senator Macquarrie was asked to obtain some information regarding this matter. He has the information with him and I believe it would be worthwhile for us to hear it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It should be on the record.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I must say that I was torn between the benefit I would convey upon my colleagues by not making a speech as against the commitment I made earlier to inquire of the ministry as to matters raised by some of my colleagues. Today I am in that usual position of using the hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob, and I am sure honourable senators will know when I am being Esauvian and when I am being Jacobian.

I was interested in the remarks made at various stages of the debate on this small but, I think, valuable and important bill. I was pleased to have the privilege of attending the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology chaired by my distinguished colleague, Senator Tremblay. I was impressed by the remarks and questions of the various senators who took part. I was also favourably impressed by the two witnesses from the department who attended to provide information. In fact—and this is, by the way, not in the text—I have a high regard for the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I think he is bringing workmanlike attitudes and sensitive compassion to a most important portfolio. I saluted him when this bill was presented, because it seems to me that, in a way, legality is catching up with actuality and reality and there is much, in fact, to do in this particular area of our national concern.

Senator Macquarrie: My biblical interpreter here is identifying the tone of my remarks.

Senator Murray: Perhaps we should hear a few words of Esau.

Senator Macquarrie: The fact of the matter is that we had a request for an investigation into allegations of mismanagement of settlement funds by the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation and Canada's legal and moral obligations with respect to Canadian reindeer. Those are the two matters with which I will deal.

Yesterday I summoned the most up-to-date information and I received it not long ago. First of all, allegations of mismanagement of settlement funds by the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation have been raised from time to time as the agreement has been implemented. The government has given very serious consideration to these concerns, all the while keeping the intent and significance of this landmark agreement in mind.

● (1410)

One of the main objectives of the Inuvialuit Final Agreement was to give the Inuvialuit the right to manage their own affairs and a practical framework in which to get on with the job. That meant setting aside the paternalistic regime which had for too long ruled the relationship between the aboriginal people and the government.

Under the settlement, the government agreed to provide financial compensation to the Inuvialuit as part of the benefits package which was negotiated in exchange for the release of their claim to certain lands and rights. The agreement also made provisions for privately owned corporate structures to manage these funds for the beneficiaries—the Inuvialuit people themselves.

The IRC was established as the umbrella organization—the owner and controller of development, investment and land corporations for all Inuvialuit. The IRC and other corporations that were set up under the agreement are private corporations. Therefore, the government has no more authority over their affairs than it has over the affairs of any non-native private corporation. I think, honourable senators, we can all imagine the uproar that would greet any government intrusion in the latter case and wonder why native-owned corporations should be treated with any less respect.

The Inuvialuit investment strategy appears to be one of building a strong economic base through long-term investments in the renewable and non-renewable resource sectors. The people now own interests in Aklak Air, Northern Transportation Company Limited, various food services, tourism outlets, such as Guided Arctic Expeditions, and oil and gas investments.

The board and councillors of the IRC have also made other investments less directly related to the western Arctic, presumably in the interests of building a broadly-based portfolio for their owners. Such decisions are, quite properly, theirs to make. The value of those investments is also theirs to assess. The government has no grounds on which to question the decisions of the duly chosen officers of a private corporation.

The IRC is concerned about misunderstandings of its activities by the people it serves and about the possibility that it does not have the information it needs to clear up such misunderstandings. The corporation has already addressed that problem—a terrible expression!—by conducting an audit of its operation in order to improve communications with its members. Thus, honourable senators, in keeping with the constructive spirit of the final agreement, the representatives of the Inuvialuit are dealing independently with the concerns of their people.

Honourable senators, the second issue relates to Canadian Reindeer Limited. This matter was dealt with at some length by the minister, Mr. McKnight, during the second reading of the bill in the other place. I will simply summarize the main points here.

The dispute between the IRC and Canadian Reindeer Limited—a successful private company owned by an Inuvialuit, Mr. William Nasogaluak, who bought its assets from the Government of Canada in 1978—began in 1984. At that time half the grazing reserve that previously supported the herd was transferred to the Inuvialuit as part of the Inuvialuit Final Agreement. Mr. Nasogaluak, as a private Inuvialuit businessman, and the IRC, as a private corporation owned by all Inuvialuit, have since been unable to reach agreement on the use of these grazing lands by the herds.

The Justice Department advises that this is a dispute between two private parties and that Canada has no legal responsibility to settle the matter. Nevertheless, the government has put considerable effort into attempts to bring the two parties together over the past four years. The Government of Canada would like to see this unique Canadian enterprise preserved and has offered to set up binding, independent arbitration of the dispute. That offer has been refused.

Court actions have now been initiated and the government cannot impose a solution unless both parties agree to such government involvement. The government can, however, give meaningful support to the essential objective and the honourable intent of the Inuvialuit Final Agreement. The commemorative scroll presented in celebration of the settlement expressed confidence that the Inuvialuit Final Agreement will lead to a challenging future built on the traditions of the past. That is a significant challenge, honourable senators, and it is up to us to do what we can to support the Inuvialuit in every appropriate way as they grow to meet it.

After the useful discussions on Bill C-102 in this chamber, I urge the adoption of this bill at its final stage.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I listened with interest—I suppose that is one way of putting it, the kindest way to put it—to what was said by the honourable senator, which I am sure he got from the Department of Indian Affairs, which is under the stewardship of “Buffalo Bill” McKnight, the new Minister of Indian Affairs. And I am sure he got it from the Inuvialuit people, because it is the line we have heard for the last two years. It is as full of holes as a Swiss cheese and it is a cop-out—a terrible cop-out.

To begin with, it is a lie to say that because the Government of Canada handed over to the Inuvialuit or the Inuit of the western Arctic some federal funds it has washed its hands of any further responsibility. To say that the Inuvialuit must be treated just like anyone else and be given their independence is another paternalism of the federal government. I presume, then, that the government will take the same attitude when it hands over millions of dollars’ worth of federal funds to Indian bands all over Canada. But, honourable senators, I have never seen the government hesitate to stick its nose in or to send the Mounties in or to send the auditors in to check up on the way the Indian people spend their money within the bands or the national Indian organizations or the provincial Indian organizations.

From the headlines of the last two days we have seen that the RCMP are looking into the supposed handing over of some money that was given to the Indian people by the Government of Canada. According to the RCMP, this money may have been turned over to a Liberal candidate, John Munro, to help in his leadership race. The government says that it cannot interfere, that it gave that money to the Indians, that they are independent and that if they want to give the money to John Munro or Brian Mulroney or anyone else, “that is their business, not ours.” But the Government of Canada did not hesitate for one minute to send in the RCMP to see whether there was some wrongdoing that had been committed. The Government of Canada did not hesitate for one minute to send the RCMP to British Columbia, where they just finished an internal audit and examination of the handling of funds of another great Indian band out there. They have only just absolved the individual chief of that band of any wrongdoing.

Honourable senators, what has been told to us is not true and it is not factual. The Government of Canada regularly looks into the handling of money given to the aboriginal people, and so it should, just as it should look into the handling of money given to anyone else if there has been evidence of the mishandling of it. As to the listing of these successful companies by the honourable senator—and I am sure he did it in all good faith and sincerity, because this information was probably handed to him—that is what we want to look into. These are companies involving oil wells and other types of investments of money, which, as he said, have nothing to do with northern development.

I am not questioning their right to invest their money in any way they want to; nor is anyone else questioning it. But I do question this right if there is a conflict of interest at any point in the handling of this money. That is what I think must be examined. Serious allegations in this regard have been made by a number of people; the honourable senator is aware of this; he has mentioned it himself, and the Minister of Indian Affairs is also well aware of it. All I am saying is that the government had better look into this before it is too late.

• (1420)

According to what you have said, when the reindeer herd was taken over by Canada, and subsequently sold to its present owner, the grazing rights in the Tuktoyaktuk Peninsula went along with the herd. When the COPE Agreement was finalized, it was clearly understood—and this is not the fault of the present government—that a settlement would be made. It was well known that the COPE people—the Inuvialuit people—wanted that herd and wanted to take it over. It was understood that arrangements would be made, because the present owner literally owned the grazing rights for that great piece of land. That land was handed over—rightfully so—to the Inuvialuit. However, the grazing rights should not have been handed over. The grazing rights predated the handing over of that land.

The Department of Indian Affairs, under the Liberal government at the time, said that they would look after it. Shortly after that that government was defeated, and the department did not look after it. I do not know whether they tried and did not have time, but it was not looked after. That responsibility was then inherited by the new administration, and they have washed their hands of it and walked away from it.

I agree that Mr. McKnight has tried to get the two parties together. Of course the Inuvialuit will not agree to meet with the owner of the herd. Why should they? They only have to wait and they will starve that fellow out. They will then get the reindeer herd—or what is left of it—for next to nothing. In fact, they are offering to him less than half what the herd is worth.

I do not know if the government has a legal responsibility. I do not know if there is anything in writing. However, they do have a clear, moral responsibility to intervene. It is not good enough for the present Minister of Indian Affairs to say that he has no clout and that he cannot do anything. He did not have to bring this bill forward. He could have said to them, “Until you settle this, there will be no change in the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act.” He has all kinds of clout. He is working with them all the time. If he were dead serious, he would ask those people to go back to the bargaining table, and a decent settlement would be made with the present owner of the reindeer herd.

While I appreciate the honourable senator’s answering the questions that were posed by myself and other senators, I would once again ask that the Leader of the Government in the Senate go back to the Minister of Indian Affairs and say to him, “Look! Face your responsibility,” because this will blow up in someone’s face. I do not know how long that money will last, but I understand it is going pretty fast. Anyone, when receiving money, makes good investments and bad investments. People take their chances. If, in fact, there has been a serious conflict of interest, as has been charged, in my opinion that is a mishandling of money entrusted by the Government of Canada to the Inuvialuit. There should be better answers to these questions than we have heard today.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Balfour, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Steuart: On division!

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read the third time and passed, on division.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill S-16, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to open the debate on second reading of Bill S-16, which was given first reading last week in this chamber.

The urgent and vital issue of our abortion laws and, in particular, the protection of the unborn child has always been on my mind. I recall on December 8, 1981, when, on third reading of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I moved in the Senate an amendment to add a special clause stating that "nothing in this Charter precludes Parliament from legislating on the rights of unborn children." However, that did not pass. After the January 28 decision of the Supreme Court that a vacancy now exists in the criminal law of Canada as a result of that decision, I believe that it is high time to address this question—especially since section 251 of the Canadian Criminal Code has been struck down.

Daily almost 200 to 300 children are being killed in abortion clinics. That, I believe, is not only immoral but also intolerable.

The purpose of this bill is to reassert society's vital interest in its unborn children. That interest is as fundamental to the continued existence of our society as it is to the existence of the human race.

I should also add that according to our most recent national statistics the increase in our population is barely 1.7 per cent; and in the province of Quebec it is 1.4 per cent. If we examine this even further—as especially demographers tell us—the present generation will probably not replace itself at the present diminishing birth rate occurring in Canada.

In examining the legislative options open to us in the matter of abortion, I think we need to begin with facts rather than myths; the facts of biology, medical science, legal tradition and the law still existing in the Criminal Code of Canada, as well as the facts set forth in the Supreme Court decision of January 28.

● (1430)

Many of these facts are being ignored in much of the contemporary debate concerning this topic. In particular, the Supreme Court of Canada judgment, and especially because it involves not one written decision but four, has left itself open to misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Let us ask ourselves: What did the court actually say? The majority held that the system of abortion committees, established by section 251 of the Criminal Code, violated security of the person for many women. It also declared, however, that other procedures might be devised which would not conflict with the principles of fundamental justice. The decision did not establish that abortion is a right in Canada. Madame Justice Wilson did claim it to be so, but she was a minority of one; and no matter how close Chief Justice Dickson or Mr. Justice Beetz came to that position, they did not declare that such a right exists.

Of course, Mr. Justice McIntyre, relying on the analysis of the law of abortion by the Ontario Court of Appeal, said that no basis can be found in our history, philosophy or legal precedent for the idea that there is a right to abortion in Canada.

Justice Wilson was strongly in favour of the American position set forth in the Roe vs Wade decision under which abortion is a matter of right for a woman in the first trimester, then gradually the state acquires more and more interest in the developing child. However, as has been widely observed, any line of demarcation, such as 12 weeks, 20 weeks or 30 weeks, is entirely arbitrary. Justice Wilson discounts the value of the unborn child and the seriousness of abortion in the early stages of life.

Some would suggest that the bill before this house is in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Morgentaler's case. Some believe that the Supreme Court has made full, legal protection for children in the womb an impossibility. I believe they have failed to understand the full implication of the court's decision.

The judges who struck down the abortion law made pro-abortion statements. Chief Dickson wrote that:

... forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a fetus to term, unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.

Such a statement does not strip Parliament of its power to make laws protecting unborn children. I think it is of crucial importance for us in this chamber to understand the fact that the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada explicitly stated that they were not making a ruling on the constitutional rights of the unborn child. Nor did they make any findings on the nature of life in the womb.

I think it is clear why the judges have done this. In the fall of this year the Supreme Court of Canada will hear an application from Mr. Joseph Borowski, a former Minister of Highways in the Manitoba government. Mr. Borowski is asking the Supreme Court of Canada to find that unborn human beings are included in the term "everyone" as found in the Charter of Rights. If the Supreme Court agrees with Mr. Borowski that the term "everyone" includes unborn children, then children in the womb will enjoy a constitutionally-protected right to life. In that case, legal protection for the unborn would not simply be allowed; it would be required. In short, the Supreme Court judges have allowed themselves the right to agree with Mr. Borowski. By doing so, they have also allowed Parliament room to provide full legal protection to unborn children.

Furthermore, the judges spoke of the fact that restrictions on abortion are an infringement of the security of the person of women. What was also said, but is seldom quoted, is that the finding of an infringement of security of the person does not, of itself, render a law in conflict with the Charter of Rights. As the Chief Justice said:

Such a finding does not end the section 7 inquiry.

The Chief Justice was referring to the fact that a law is only invalid if it infringes the security of the person, and if that infringement takes place outside the principles of fundamental justice.

As you will recall, section 7, the section of the Charter under which the old abortion law was found to be invalid, states:

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

This phrase "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" keeps alive the right of Parliament to protect human beings in the womb.

Many of our laws impose hardship on certain individuals, and many of our laws infringe the security of the person of many people. The mere fact that a law abridges the right to security of the person does not, of itself, render a law invalid under the Charter of Rights. Consider that every law which imposes a jail term infringes the liberty and security of the person of those who are sent to jail. Yet our courts have no problem upholding such a law as valid under the Charter.

In order for a law to be invalid, it must not only abridge one's security of the person; it must also conflict with the principles of fundamental justice. Thus, there is a two-part test in determining the constitutionality of any abortion law.

I believe this indicates the way in which a law protecting all unborn children can be held as valid by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice that the rights of some be restricted in order to protect the lives of other human beings. The Criminal Code outlaws murder. That law certainly restricts the liberty and security of certain persons, such as those who live with and care for infirm relatives, and whose lot would be improved if they could end the life of that person. Yet murder laws are certainly valid under the Charter, and I think the reason is simple: It is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice to protect human life, even though doing so may impose hardships on other individuals.

Similarly, we today have enough knowledge and we have the power and responsibility to decide when the life of a human being begins and to ensure that from that moment on our laws give that human being full protection.

Now let us look at the scientific evidence. I believe we must consider what modern science tells us about the nature of life in the womb, and we must ensure that our laws are consistent with the findings of medical science. It is a scientific fact that from conception a zygote is a unique human individual with an identity and life distinct from that of either of its parents. In its genetic code it has all the information that it needs for the production of a complete and mature human being. All it needs to do is to continue developing. The zygote is real life. It is actual life. It is human life. Of course it possesses potential, as does the new-born baby and as does any person until one reaches the termination of one's life. So I believe that one should never speak about the unborn as potential life but as life which has potential.

The rapidly developing science of fetology continually reveals to us new things about the unborn baby, even in the first hours after conception. As Sir William Liley, a professor of perinatal medicine and World Health Organization consultant for maternal health and child health testified at the Borowski trial in May 1983, "New knowledge was revealed about the unborn baby even in the first hours after fertilization." I would like to say more about this matter later in my speech this afternoon.

But now I want to make this statement: I believe that abortion is the taking of human life. If that is so, how can it be justified? Some people argue that many women must choose between abortion and carrying a child and living in poverty. Well, efforts urging extensive programs of social action to reduce poverty are to be applauded and supported, but still the basic fact remains that we do not allow people to kill those dependent on them because they are living in poverty or for any other circumstantial reason.

I think you would all agree with me that respect for human life is fundamental to our society. We insist that all human beings possess an intrinsic dignity and a basic right to existence. Such a right is not negotiable and it is not to be qualified. It is not to be affected by public opinion polls or anything of the sort. Canadians will not and cannot justify killing the handicapped, the infirm, the mentally deficient or people of a particular race, colour or creed. Canadians will not withdraw their protection from any class or category of human beings. We refuse to consider killing the elderly because they are old and weak. For this very same reason we must not regard life as optional at the other end of the spectrum, the beginning of life. We have rejected capital punishment in our society. We, therefore, cannot possibly justify taking the lives of the most innocent and the most vulnerable of human beings.

Some people are willing to allow abortion for so-called "serious therapeutic reasons." Well, there are no therapeutic reasons for abortion, and that point is held by medical specialists. An abortion is not therapeutic for the mother and it certainly is not therapeutic for the baby. The day when the child in the womb could be regarded as an antagonist of the mother is long past, even though the Justices of the Supreme Court make reference to a woman's access to medical treatment when her life is in danger. More than 20 years ago Dr. Allan Guttmacher, a leading American advocate of abortion on demand, declared, "Today it is possible for almost any patient to be brought through any pregnancy alive, unless she suffers from a fatal illness such as leukemia, or any other cancer, and, if so, abortion would be unlikely to prolong, much less save, life."

In the 1983 Borowski trial, Professor Liley stated that he was unaware of any medical complications or condition that would be regarded as absolute grounds for terminating a pregnancy. Allowing abortion for so-called therapeutic reasons is simply to allow them under false pretences. The overwhelming majority of induced abortions are not done for purely medical reasons. Statistics tell us that they are performed for social and economic reasons or because of pressure from parents or boyfriends or husbands. I have experienced such circumstances in my 35 years of medical practice. Unfortunately, one patient, who succumbed to the pressures from her relatives and her parents, later committed suicide. So the law must not allow such abuse of women. No one should allow such abuse of pregnant women, for either their health or their babies'.

One of the myths I wish to destroy today is that of "the mother versus the child." As I just mentioned, virtually all abortions performed in Canada since the change in the abortion law in 1969 have been performed for social or other reasons, and not for health reasons at all. There are some medical treatments that are necessary in an attempt to save the life of the mother and which will indirectly result in the death of her unborn child. For example, a pregnant woman who develops cancer of the uterus will be treated either surgically or with chemotherapy. The purpose of these medically recognized treatments is to remedy her cancer. They are necessary to save her life, but they invariably result in the death of her unborn child. Such treatments are recognized as good medicine, and they are consistent with the best moral view, which is that we must always do our best to save the lives of both the mother and the child. Such treatments have always been permitted under law, and Bill S-16 explicitly allows for such treatments.

The obligation of members of my own profession has always been to heal the sick. Pregnancy is a normal thing. It is not an abnormal condition. A woman who is pregnant is not thereby in a condition requiring a surgical procedure. Pregnancy is not a disease. Physicians should return to the age-old tradition of Hippocrates, who predated the Christian era by 400 years.

● (1450)

The Hippocratic oath, which I also took upon graduation from medical school at the University of Toronto in 1951, required me and my classmates, my colleagues, to preserve human life, not to destroy it. It is scandalous that doctors have become licensed executioners in our society today. It means a betrayal of everything that they have stood for and sworn to uphold.

Furthermore, no gestational law is morally acceptable. Some people would consider abortion under 24 weeks, but, even under the restrictions of the old section 251, 89 per cent of abortions in Canada were done in the first 12 weeks.

Some people argue that, if abortions were to be prohibited, women would simply go to illegal clinics. While some of them would do so, most would not. Instead, they would carry their baby to term. The pre-1969 statistics of illegal abortions and the deaths resulting from them were utterly fraudulent and were part of the pro-abortion campaign of propaganda and deception.

I believe that the law has a teaching function. To legalize acts of violence means that those who do the legalizing become participants in the crime. Moreover, truth is perverted. That is why legal, "frontstreet" abortions are considered worse than illegal, "backstreet" abortions.

Furthermore, the rejection of the right to kill the unborn is not the view of some religious sect, but is a defence of the dignity of the human person.

This battle has been fought for over 4,000 years, though never as intensely as today in Canada.

Abortion is the killing of a human being innocent of any crime. No human being or group of human beings has the right to kill another human being except in self-defence. This general principle finds expression in natural law, the Sacred Scriptures, the Christian and Moslem traditions, Mosaic law as well as in other religious traditions. Abortion is against the objective, moral order. It is not a Catholic or Christian issue. The Sumerians condemned abortion 4,000 years ago. So did Hammurabi in the 18th century B.C., and, as I mentioned earlier, the Greek physician, Hippocrates, in the year 400 B.C., who encased the condemnation in a medical oath—"Thou shalt not administer abortion-causing drugs or instruments." This oath entered the general stream of western civilization until it was, unfortunately, cast aside in many medical schools in the 1960s and 1970s with the coming of the permissive society.

Again, I state that human life begins at the moment of conception, that is, when the ovum is fertilized by a male sperm. In that moment a unique and separate individual exists and, as I mentioned earlier, contains a full genetic code which will determine its physical characteristics, even to the colour of its eyes. With modern technology, medical scientists have been able to confirm, at ever earlier stages, the various features of this human life. By 1983, for example, medical instruments had become so sophisticated that they could ascertain the independent production of blood by the fetus at 17 days. These instruments detected the heart beat at 24 days and registered brain waves at 35 days. Only a decade or so ago it was thought that the brains of pre-born babies did not become active until two-thirds of the way through pregnancy.

Honourable senators, these facts were mentioned, as I said earlier, by Sir William Liley, who testified at the Borowski trial in Regina in May 1983. It is useful to remind ourselves of that case. In other words, scientific evidence definitely confirms that life begins at conception. Now that this is clear, all talk about so-called rights to terminate a pregnancy, as the euphemism has it, I believe, should cease.

It is worth relating that the question of when human life begins was answered once and for all during the Borowski trial in Regina in May 1983. Arguing the case for the defence of the unborn, Morris Schumiatcher called nine expert witnesses to answer the question of whether the unborn are human beings or not.

Sir William Liley—the professor I mentioned earlier, who was knighted for his pioneering work in amniocentesis—was called as a main witness. He pointed out that the unborn child is not part of his mother's body, but a separate person who dictates his own growth and when he is to be born. Long before the time when an abortion would be performed his heart begins beating and brain activity can be recorded.

Dr. Jerome Lejeune, professor of fundamental genetics at the University of Paris, testified that:

At the moment of fertilization the whole symphony of life is ready to be played out.

He noted that he had never heard any discussion of when a cat's or a cow's life begins. On purely scientific grounds, he could not understand why there should be any controversy over this question with regard to human beings. Dr. Lejeune reiterated that human life begins when an egg is fertilized, the time when all the genetic information necessary and sufficient to build each and every one of us is transformed.

Under cross-examination, Mr. Schumiatcher's witnesses were repeatedly pressed to say that the unborn constitute only potential life. They all refused to agree to that. Sir William Liley said that the term is meaningless in biology. There is either life or there is not, and, if it is the offspring of human parents, it belongs to the human species and no other.

Much has been made recently of difficult cases. It is often suggested by people of good will that abortion must be available to victims of rape or incest. We must be realistic about the magnitude of this problem.

Pregnancy caused by rape, however, is a rare occurrence. A number of factors are said to contribute to this: The short period each month during which a woman is fertile; the use of contraceptives such as a birth control pill; the physical and psychological condition of rapists, which results in many such attacks being incompleting; and the fact that a woman's physiology is such that intense stress caused by fear interferes with ovulation and can make pregnancy impossible. So rare is pregnancy caused by rape that in a scientific survey of 3,500 consecutive rapes treated in hospitals in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area no cases of pregnancy occurred. That study took place over a ten-year period.

● (1500)

Be that as it may, we must take account of the fact that some pregnancies do arise under horrible circumstances. Rape and incest do result in some pregnancies. What is our reaction, as a caring society, to any woman who finds herself in that position? We are challenged to provide a solution which is compassionate and loving, a solution which is in keeping with the dignity of human life. We recognize that such a woman has been through a brutal experience. We must then offer her every assistance and support that we can.

By legalizing abortion for such women, however, we would simply be adding to their trauma. We would be telling them that our solution to their problem is to give them the opportunity to kill their own child. That is no help at all. Killing one's own child brutalizes a woman, regardless of who the father of the child is. Abortion cannot undo the trauma of rape or incest. It can only add another trauma. One act of violence cannot undo another act of violence.

Instead, we should and must commit ourselves as a society to creating and financing social programs which will help these women. This will be a mark of our concern and true compassion.

In the name of justice we do not impose the death penalty on those guilty of incest or sexual assault. If that is fair and just, how can we turn around and suggest that the death penalty should be imposed on an unborn child—on the innocent child whose life was created by the criminal act?

The value of a human life is not determined by the circumstances of one's conception. We do not place greater value on a person because the parents planned the pregnancy. No, we must value and protect all human life as equal, regardless of age, of parentage or social status.

Yet the proponents of abortion suggest that we should treat some human beings as having more rights than other human beings. The advocates of abortion suggest that the law should allow for the killing of a child in the womb if that child is handicapped. Bill S-16 rejects any such approach, as any just and humane law must.

The handicapped are as fully human as you or I, and their lives deserve the full protection of the law. To reject this is to endorse the principle that one's right to life varies according to one's abilities and talents. Such a philosophy is characteristic of the most brutal and inhumane regimes that our civilization has ever seen. It would allow for the killing of an untold number of people, for where would we draw the line? Who would decide what abilities and characteristics are needed to be deemed worthy of protection?

Do honourable senators think that one of the world's greatest pianists, who was born in Poland, Arthur Rubinstein, should have been born? Let us listen to what he said, as printed in Time magazine of February 25, 1966:

My mother did not want to have a seventh child so she decided to get rid of me before I was born. Then a marvellous thing happened. My aunt dissuaded her, and so I was permitted to be born. Think of it! It was a miracle!

That, I believe, is a profound and stunning testimonial for us to remember from Arthur Rubinstein.

In the February 23, 1988, issue of the Medical Post, published in Canada, Mr. Colin Muncie, a Toronto journalist, wrote the following:

I was born what used to be called an illegitimate child, a term that from the time I first understood it I considered absurd, because there are no illegitimate children; only illegitimate parents. I was no source of joy when a period was lost and I was found. I was the cause of panic, scandal and shame to all concerned. The simplest, easiest and quickest way to forestall that little problem was by an abortion—me. Fortunately, free-standing abortion clinics were not around back then, and as a result I am here today . . . Had the Morgentaler mentality been free and unfettered by the law in 1939, as it now is in Canada, I undoubtedly would have been “untimely ripped” from my birth-mother’s womb. Instead, because of the conservative laws of the puritanical country and times I was born into, I lived to be adopted by wonderful parents who had already raised nine natural children of their own, and who all loved me as I loved them—as family. I bless them today for what they gave me: Their caring, their respect for life and their name. This man Morgentaler and his ilk are no heroes to somebody like me—a fetus who escaped the abortionists. This man some would place on a pedestal, would have denied me my life, and my children’s lives and their children’s lives. For a fistful of dollars and what I consider a dubious “principle”, abortion on demand, he would destroy generation upon generation . . . But I do believe that those who tout Dr. Morgentaler as one of the great men of his time should take a moment to pause and listen. If they do, they may hear a small voice through the din of all those shouting that they alone have God on their side in this issue. It is a voice crying in the womb: “What about me? What about me?” I say it is a legitimate question to ask.

Honourable senators, let us pause and listen to that voice—the voice of the unborn human being within its mother’s womb. We must never forget that abortion is an act of violence. To legalize abortion is to legalize acts of violence. Our whole society will be corrupted if the law itself becomes an instrument of corruption. We must protect our laws from that terrible fate.

I urge honourable senators and I urge our government to take up this challenge of protecting the unborn human being with unrelenting determination, perseverance and responsibility. This will be our greatness as a nation and our contribution to the dignity of life, the fundamental and ultimate human right from which will flow harmony and justice in our society.

Honourable senators, if there is wisdom among us, and I believe there is, and if there is the will, as I believe there should be, and if there is experience, as I know there is, and if there is compassion, as I am sure there is, then let us mobilize these qualities and employ them as legislators in the best way to defend and preserve human rights and fundamental freedoms. I therefore urge honourable senators to take up this challenge with a deep sense of urgency, responsibility and determination. This will then be, I believe, another great opportunity for the Senate to save and serve all our people.

I call upon honourable senators to support Bill S-16.

[Senator Haidasz.]

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION FOR MESSAGE TO COMMONS—DEBATE CONTINUED

present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society;

(c) the recognition that aboriginal peoples constitute a distinctive and fundamental characteristic of Canada;

(e) the recognition of the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union.

(2)(a) The role of the Parliament of Canada to preserve and promote, and the role of the provincial legislatures to preserve and, subject to subparagraph (2)(b) to promote, the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph 1(a) is affirmed.

2. This said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25. Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, and until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the government of Canada shall, within six months after the vacancy occurs, call an election in the province or territory to which the vacancy relates for the purpose of filling that vacancy, and, notwithstanding the provision of section 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867, for a term of nine years."

Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the mover, Senator Frith, presented this motion on May 3 and I then adjourned the debate. He has not budged; he has remained rather silent for several weeks and I said to myself that he perhaps thought that his resolution would best be forgotten. I was hoping that he would finally get the idea to delete it from the order paper.

I do not really see the reason for this motion. I read what he said in his presentation on May 3. So that honourable senators can judge the reasons that seem to have motivated Senator Frith, I shall quote from page 3277 of the Debates of the Senate for that day what I consider to be the gist of his statement. If by chance he thinks that I should quote more, I will gladly do so because his speech, if it can be called a speech, takes about a quarter of a page.

This is what Senator Frith said:

I think that there is good reason, on constitutional amendments, for Parliament, that is, the Senate and the House of Commons, to try to speak with one voice, or, at least, to explore that possibility.

Senator Frith was suggesting the possibility of coming up with a single text.

I do not think that we can explore that possibility formally without advising the other place of what we have done. That is the reason for this motion. It is to send a message to them to tell them what the Senate has done with a resolution that was tabled in the House of Commons by the government and then tabled separately here in the Senate.

One would then have to presume that the House of Commons does not know what went on in the Senate. However, on April 25, a few days after our decision on April 21 to adopt an amended resolution different from the one passed by the House of Commons, the same resolution appeared in the Order Paper of the House of Commons. In other words, the Government presented again the resolution that the House of Commons had adopted on October 23, 1987.

I don't see how we can inform the House of something that has been on the Order Paper for weeks, especially now that it has just started its second debate on the motion. When he opened the debate last week the Minister of Justice mentioned that the Senate had not adopted the same text as the House and he invited the House, in accordance with Section 47 of the 1982 Constitution, to adopt once more the same resolution.

There is therefore no need to inform the House of something it knows already. Secondly, in the Rules of the Senate, Section 105 states that the Journals of the Senate may be searched by the House of Commons, as the Journals of that House may be searched by the Senate. There is communication between the two Houses.

Perhaps Senator Frith's idea stems from the rather extraordinary argument he came up with when Mr. Trudeau appeared before our Committee of the Whole on the subject of the Meech Lake Agreement, to the effect that those who think that section 47 abolishes the Senate's absolute veto in constitutional matters are misreading it. He suggested that the text could be read to mean that by adopting a resolution which differs from that of the House of Commons, the Senate gains back its absolute veto. After learning that the Senate had acted, the House could no longer ignore its difference of opinion with the Senate.

If that is truly his intention, if the Senate simply wanted to adopt a resolution in different terms, his motion to send a message to the House of Commons changes nothing. We have passed a resolution. That can be proven any time, if that is Senator Frith's argument.

You are adding absolutely nothing to the fact that the Senate decided on April 21 to send a message pertaining to a decision which, as I have stated, the House of Commons is already aware of.

Do you want to start all over again? Do you want to repeat to the House of Commons what you already said? Do you want to ask the senators to repeat what the majority of the Senate already said on April 23? Do you want to repeat the whole process? Do you want to rub it in?

That is really the only reason I can think of for this motion. Of course I remember the debate we had on April 20 and 21, when I introduced a motion that said what we had adopted and stated we had no objection to the text approved by the House of Commons, should it decide to disagree and adopt the same text it approved in October.

You will recall what happened when I introduced my motion. The first time, I was told: It's too soon. The next day, it was too late. The third time, it was still too soon.

Three times I tried to have a message that was different from what we had said so far, that we were approving a text that differed from the one approved by the House of Commons.

I really don't see the point of this message. It is not in order, because it is repetitive. As we all know, we are not supposed to move the same motion during one and the same session. Rule 47 contains a provision in that respect, but the precedents we find in Beauchesne's are even more specific. Normally, this is not a motion that could be presented because it is repetitive. We have already approved this text. We don't have to make the same decision twice. Actually, the problem we were facing when the debate ended on April 21 was to find out whether the Liberal majority in the Senate agreed with the Liberal minority in the House of Commons. The Official Opposition in the other place, after presenting the Senate's amendments to the original text, ended up supporting the text proposed by the government. I think that is the question we should consider in the Senate.

Here, they are repeating themselves. Do they want to challenge the House of Commons again, by saying that despite the position taken by the Liberals in the House of Commons, the Senate is sticking to its guns? Is that what they want to say? Then we should say so in no uncertain terms. Let us say that despite the fact the House of Commons is about to approve again the same resolution it approved previously in October 1987, we intend to maintain our position, we want to keep our amendments, even if we no longer have a say in the matter because of section 47, which has abolished—whatever Senator Frith may claim to the contrary—our absolute veto over constitutional matters and replaced it with a six-month suspensive veto.

If an issue ever needed clarification, this one certainly does. I remember there was considerable indignation about the fact that my motion said to the House: We have adopted this resolution and we invite you to give your approval. Obviously, by adopting this text, we hoped the House would approve it as well. It did not and decided to reconsider the original resolution. The Opposition Parties, which made their positions clear in the course of the debate last week, have indicated their position has not changed and that they will again and definitively support the Government's text, without amendments, when it comes to a final vote.

So I really don't see what Senator Frith wants to accomplish with this motion to send a message to the House of Commons. First of all, I consider it to be insulting, and I think the motion is unnecessary. By raising the issue again, unadorned, without the requisite qualifications and without the alternative I submitted to the Senate on April 21, which was declared out of order, it is of course out of the question that we on this side would support the motion.

I thought that perhaps we could move an amendment, but for the time being, I personally have no intention of doing so. I repeat that this move by Senator Frith is irregular and unnecessary. It is vexatious and comes close to being insolent and is, in any case, very insulting to the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I was about to move the adjournment of the debate. However, if Senator Frith wishes to speak, he may do so.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was rising to reply and close the debate. It is well known on the other side that we wanted a vote on this order this week. I have told that to the leadership on the other side and to Senator Flynn. This item has been on the order paper since May 3.

There is the additional fact that the House of Commons started debate on the reintroduced resolution last week, I believe, and will be debating it again next week. If we are going to do this, we should do it now, because there is no point in our sending it back after they have concluded the debate on the reintroduced resolution.

Those are the reasons I expressed to Senator Flynn, without much persuasive effect on him. Senator Flynn did not understand why we wanted the vote, but I believe he understood why it should be done this week. Therefore, we will oppose any further adjournment of the debate.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am almost terrified of the remarks made by the Honourable Senator Frith. Apparently, the new rule is that he sets the time schedule. I am not sure what rule that comes under, but it is one of those frequent changes that he makes in the rules for his own convenience.

I should point out that there are a number of items on the order paper that we on this side would like to have dealt with. For example, I am very interested in Bill C-103, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. That bill has been standing on the order paper for some time. I would have liked a vote on Bill C-60 the other day, but that has to wait until it is convenient for Senator Sinclair. Bill C-74 stands on the order paper for the convenience of Senator Kenny.

I have no hesitancy and no regret in moving the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not trying to set the rules my way. Senator Phillips has been around this chamber longer than I, and he knows very well that these questions do come up. Occasionally, both sides do want something dealt with. We discuss it, and we give each other notice of our intention to refuse a motion to adjourn the debate. I did so in this case. I followed the traditions of the Senate. I have nothing to add. I am prepared to make some comments about Senator Flynn's comments—

● (1530)

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Frith:—but he says, "No!" He does not want those, and that is fine.

Senator Flynn: Not today.

Senator Frith: Then there is nothing else to add.

For those reasons, and the reasons that I have expressed to the leadership on the other side and to Senator Flynn for some time now, we will ask for a vote on the motion to adjourn the debate.

MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: It sounds even to me!
And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with respect to the main motion for a message to the Commons, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the words "that House" in the second line of the first paragraph and replacing them by the following:

"that notwithstanding that the Senate has, on 21st April, 1988, authorized the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution in the terms of the following Schedule, the Senate does not oppose a proclamation of an amendment in the terms of the Resolution adopted by the House of Commons on 26th October, 1987, if the House should adopt again the same resolution in the same terms."

● (1610)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the words "that House" in the second line of the first paragraph—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if it is agreeable to my friends opposite, we would accept the previous vote's being applied to this motion in amendment.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, no! These are two entirely different propositions. I do not see how the Deputy Leader of the Opposition can presume that all of his colleagues will necessarily vote against the amendment that has been proposed by Senator Nurgitz. This is a very important amendment, and if my friends opposite vote against it they will find themselves in direct opposition to the position taken by their counterparts in the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I make no more presumptions than the Leader of the Government does, who apparently is making the presumption that there will not be the same vote on his side either. So, if any honourable senators wish to disagree with either the Leader of the Government's presumption or what he thinks is my presumption, they can do so. However, I take it that—

Senator Murray: I want the fans of John Turner to have an opportunity to stand up.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Frith: And we are saving you the opportunity of sending a message that would indicate support of the "killer amendments" of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as we have just had a vote, if it is agreed, perhaps we should lock the doors and record this vote right away.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

MESSAGE TO COMMONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are ready for the question on the main motion.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Are you not going to close the debate?

Senator Frith: I did not want to impose on you.

Honourable senators, Senator Flynn and I have been discussing the main motion for some time—that is, since the motion was originally put. We have failed to persuade each other to change our positions. He has put his position forward; I put my position forward earlier. I do not think there is anything I can add, because there is nothing new in the debate except Senator Flynn's reference to rule 105, which states:

The Journals of the Senate may be searched by the House of Commons, as the Journals of that House may be searched by the Senate.

If it is the objective—as it is my objective with this motion—to be sure that the House of Commons knows what the Senate has done with the amendment to the Constitution by resolution tabled in this house, then the Senate should send to the House of Commons a message indicating what we have done rather than rely on the fact that we may or may not have searched the records. That is the reason for the motion and that is why I ask honourable senators to support it.

• (1620)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Has Senator Frith closed the debate? We were not warned.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, the Honourable Senator Frith moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.: That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform the House that the Senate proposes the proclamation of an amendment . . .

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it. And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Would honourable senators agree to having the vote forthwith?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the wish of honourable senators to have the doors locked now? I wish to have a consensus here. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please lock the doors.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, could we agree that the vote will be the same as the previous one?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Then I declare the main motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 31, 1988, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Charles McElman: Explain!

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, as you are aware, the subject matter of the drought situation in western Canada was referred to the committee on Thursday, May 19, 1988. We have an opportunity to hear from the Minister of Agriculture at 3.30 p.m. today. There was a suggestion that the minister could appear before a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday if he were unavailable today; he is available today and the committee would like to hear from him.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

EMERGENCIES BILL—RESOLUTION INTO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE AT 6 P.M., TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1988

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That, notwithstanding Rule 12 of the Rules of the Senate, the Senate do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole at 6:00 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday next, 31st May, 1988, to consider the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody advised me that he had arranged for the minister to appear at 6 p.m. on Tuesday next. Honourable senators will recall that we agreed it would be appropriate for the Senate to consider this important legislation in Committee of the Whole and to ask for the attendance of the minister. We also had discussions about whether it would be possible to have the Committee of the Whole sit in the evening, if necessary. Senator Doody arranged for the minister to appear at 6 o'clock on Tuesday, that suiting the minister's schedule. I told Senator Doody that I had not been able to discuss the matter with our principal spokesman on this bill, Senator Stewart, and that we would not want to proceed if he could not attend.

I know of no reason why he will not be able to attend and, obviously, we want to suit the convenience of the minister and those senators who are most interested in this piece of legislation. Senator Doody felt that he should at least make the arrangements and give advance notice of this meeting. I repeat that I know of no reason why we would be unable to suit the convenience of the minister, but we may not be able to guarantee that we will not ask for another date, if it should turn out that this date is not suitable for senators on this side.

Senator Doody: I can only add, honourable senators, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to try to anticipate the whereabouts of every senator who might be interested in a particular subject or project at a particular time. When it was suggested by honourable senators opposite that the Committee of the Whole would be the most appropriate forum for this particular hearing, I acceded with some reluctance—to be mild about it. I am not convinced that it is the proper forum, but, in any event, I went along with it at that time. It was also suggested that an evening session might be most appropriate.

I conveyed that message to the minister, who agreed to be here at 6 o'clock on Tuesday evening. Realizing that the schedules of ministers are not always easily adjusted, I did take the opportunity to make that arrangement with him. I sincerely hope that those senators who are interested in this matter can be in the chamber then. In any event, that is the time that has been arranged.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not want to leave the impression, as apparently I have with Senator Doody, that I felt that we should not discuss this matter in Committee of the Whole unless we had checked with all senators to make sure that it met with their convenience. That is not my position at all. When we set dates for this sort of thing, including dates for votes and so on, we try to suit the convenience of those persons most interested. I want to suit the convenience of the minister. I merely add this as a caveat: I think we should also consider the particular senators who are interested.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 31st May, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

ACTING OPPOSITION LEADER IN ABSENCE OF OPPOSITION LEADER AND DEPUTY LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen is away on the business of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Incidentally, the meeting at 6 o'clock on Tuesday of the Committee of the Whole would also conflict with the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but that is another consideration which I am sure we can work out.

In addition, I have to leave now for a speaking engagement in Cobourg. I wish to advise honourable senators that in our absence Senator Petten will be the Acting Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: Send a message to the House of Commons!

Senator Frith: If Senator Doody is asking for leave to send a message to the House of Commons to that effect, I am prepared to grant leave.

If there are any procedural nitpickers—and I am sure there are not!—Senator Petten ought to have leave to occupy the seat of the Leader of the Opposition, since the rules provide that he is not permitted to speak unless he rises in his place.

[Senator Doody.]

This being his place until further notice, I take it he has such leave.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS UNDER

SEVEN-PROVINCES-50-PER-CENT-OF-THE-POPULATION RULE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I shall supply him with a photocopy of a newspaper clipping from the Globe and Mail that I have in my possession. Would the Leader of the Government ask one of his experts to refute an argument made by the eminent Professor of Law, Dr. Bryan Schwartz? Dr. Schwartz said that there are almost no amendments that can be made under the seven-provinces-50-per-cent-of-the-population rule after Meech Lake is passed. I know there are probably disagreements with that.

I would be grateful to the Leader of the Government if he could give a more satisfactory answer than last time, when he said, "Well, you don't understand." I wish to understand, and I would like a careful answer to a question that is honestly meant.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I don't doubt that the question is honestly meant. However, I do not know what the honourable senator expects of me. If he is looking for a legal opinion, he should seek one from a lawyer in private practice or from a lawyer who is acting for his party. Surely he cannot expect me to impose upon the law officers of the Crown and ask them to provide an analysis of an opinion that turns up in the "Letters to the Editor" column in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, this opinion directly contradicts things which—

Senator Flynn: Who cares, other than you?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Flynn, you may not care about the effect of the Constitution on the country—

Senator Flynn: I do not care what you say.

Senator Gigantès: But as a new Canadian—

Senator Flynn: And you look like one, too!

Senator Gigantès:—I do not have your habit of not worrying about the viability of this country. Like Mr. Robertson Davies, I worry about Canada.

If this article contradicts statements that the Leader of the Government has made here in this chamber, I think they should concern him since they are contradictions of things he has said.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this would not be the first time that I have been contradicted in public, even by eminent authorities. I am sure that it will not be the last time. With the greatest of respect to the letter writer in the Globe and Mail, I cannot be expected to impose upon the law officers by asking them to produce an analysis or an opinion of a letter to the editor. As the honourable senator suggests, that opinion may come from someone eminent in the field, but—and I am trying to find a way to say it and not sound arrogant—it is irrelevant.

Senator Gigantès: Would the Leader of the Government get an opinion from a public servant other than a law officer of the Crown?

Senator Flynn: Not for you.

Senator Gigantès: Or is this subject not a subject that we can discuss any longer? Are you trying to preclude discussion of the effects on the country of the Meech Lake Accord?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not trying to preclude discussion about anything. The opinion of the professor expressed in a letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail is hardly one that Parliament or the government is required to take official notice of. I cannot help my honourable friend. The Senate chapter on Meech Lake is closed.

● (1410)

Senator Gigantès: However, Canada is not closed, I hope, and its Constitution is not closed. Is the minister saying to me that, if I took each of these questions and asked one of them for some 30 seconds per meeting, he would reply to me, "The chapter is closed"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is surrounded—

Senator Flynn: He does not understand!

Senator Murray: —in the Liberal caucus by Queen's Counsel to the left of him, Queen's Counsel to the right of him, Queen's Counsel all around him. I see a number of them here today. Let him seek a legal opinion from them as to the bien fondé of the opinion put forward by the professor.

Frankly, I do not wish to lecture the honourable senator on procedure, but this is not a proper matter for raising on the Orders of the Day. I should not be expected to comment, nor should the public servants or law officers of the Crown be expected to comment, on opinions in a letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, may I raise a question of privilege? In the discussion that has just taken place the Honourable Senator Gigantès commented that he was a new Canadian.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Yes.

Senator McElman: Senator Flynn interjected, "And you look like one, too!"

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator McElman: There is an inference to that, honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Well, it's yours!

Senator McElman: Please, let me finish the point.

Senator Flynn: That's not your problem.

Senator McElman: It is; it is the problem of the Senate.

If I heard correctly, I would like Senator Flynn to take the opportunity to clear away any misconception that might be placed upon his remarks—

Senator Flynn: Which misconception?

Senator McElman: —as to how new Canadians might look. That is an inference that this Senate should not permit on its record.

Senator Flynn: Which misconception do you have about what I said? I meant that he does not know much about Canada. That is what I meant.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Or especially about Quebec! That misconception is wrong.

Senator Gigantès: —since this matter of privilege concerns me, I should like to say that, if what Senator Flynn said can be interpreted as meaning that I do not look like him, I am quite prepared to accept that gratefully.

Senator Flynn: I had hoped that you would say that.

Senator McElman: I insist that there is an inference—

Senator Flynn: I insist that I said—

Senator McElman: I have the floor. Will you sit down? I have the floor! For once, obey the rules of the Senate and sit down! You cannot stand when another senator is standing and speaking.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Call "Order!"

Senator McElman: I am speaking to a question of privilege. You sit down.

Senator Flynn: So am I!

Senator McElman: You are not. I am speaking on a question of privilege. You should have the courtesy to clear the Senate record of any disparaging remarks that you made. You get away with too much!

Senator Flynn: And you do, too!

You said that there was a misconception. I asked you, "What misconception?" You did not answer. I explained what I meant by saying that Senator Gigantès looks like a new Canadian. That has been cleared; yet you come up again and try to continue the debate on this matter, which is of no concern to you.

Senator McElman: Oh?

Senator Petten: But it is.

Senator Flynn: It is of no concern to you, as such. I have cleared my problem with Senator Gigantès. He has said that he does not want to look like me. I am happy that he said that, and that should be the end of the matter.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, the matter is not only of concern to me; it is of concern to all senators and it is of concern to all Canadians, when someone uses his place in this chamber to make a remark that should not be made and leaves an inference that should not be left. I was trying to do the courteous thing to my honourable friend and give him an opportunity to say that he meant no affront to any new Canadian.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I made that clear. The affront was only to Senator Gigantès. I said he does not know much about Canada and he does not know much about Quebec. I repeat that that was all that I meant, and that is the end of it. I do not see why you should question my view. If you don't like it, you can lump it!

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, since I am, unfortunately, involved in this controversy with Senator Flynn, I should like to point out that he did not say that I did not know, except when he said it the second time. Originally, he said I didn't look like himself, presumably—in other words, an older Canadian, which, of course, I grant immediately.

He also suggested something about Quebec, and I concede immediately that, although I am a Quebecer, I am not what he would call de vieille souche francophone. I bitterly regret that my blood is tainted!

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

INCLUSION OF CANADA'S FRESH WATER RESOURCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, perhaps I might change the subject and get Senator Flynn off the hook, which I am always doing for him.

Senator Flynn: You are going to hang yourself!

Senator Bonnell: I would not hang either myself or Senator Flynn; he is too good a friend of mine.

However, honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand that one of the greatest resources of this country is being given away to the United States of America under tariff clause 22.01 of the Free Trade Agreement—namely, our fresh water resource.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate confirm that in fact the fresh water of Canada is part of the Free Trade Agreement? In the past it has been denied by others that water was included in this agreement. However, apparently under tariff clause 22.01, water is included in the agreement.

senators, I can only say that the interpretation on which the honourable senator is basing his question is really nonsense.

Having said that, when the vote comes I invite him to vote in favour of the reference of the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs so that he will have an opportunity to satisfy himself as to the agreement and the bill that would give it effect in this country.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I notice that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has not made a denial in this matter. I also note that a recent article in the Toronto Star stated:

According to former federal trade negotiator Mel Clark and Don Gamble, executive director of the Rawson Academy of Aquatic Science, a non-profit water research body, it could mean that the provisions of the trade deal override federal or provincial restrictions on the export of water.

Honourable senators, since water is a resource and we must sell our resources to the Americans at the same price as we charge Canadians, and since we do not charge Canadians for fresh water, we then have to give our fresh water free to the Americans.

I would therefore like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to confirm or deny that we are giving away our richest resource—namely, our fresh water—to the Americans.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have said that the interpretation upon which the honourable senator based his question is nonsense. May I add to that that the assertions and the assumptions that the honourable senator is making are so farfetched as to be ludicrous. As I said, I invite him to satisfy himself on those points by accelerating the reference of this bill to the Foreign Affairs Committee for pre-study so that he can go into this matter in all the detail he would like and obtain the answers he is seeking.

● (1420)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government answer the question? Is the fresh water resource included in the negotiations we are now committed to with the United States or is it not? Never mind all the gobbledegook of going to other things. Did you negotiate fresh water deliveries to the United States or did you not?

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Olson: Then why didn't you say so?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the minister has just said that our water resources are not part of the agreement. I ask that he read, in his spare time, tariff clause 22.01 of the tariff schedule to the agreement, which includes water.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have answered the question. I do suggest that my friend take advantage of an early opportunity to ask detailed questions about the agreement and about the bill.

RAILWAY SAFETY

BILL C-105—REQUEST FOR DRAFT REGULATIONS

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am seeking information regarding Bill C-105, which deals with the safe operation of railways. Clause 18 says, in part, that the Governor in Council may make regulations with regard to "hours of work and rest periods to be observed by" certain workers and with regard to "the control or prohibition of the consumption of alcoholic beverages and the use of drugs by those persons." I would like to know whether the draft regulations are ready. If so, may I see a copy of the proposed regulations? The reason I would like to see them is that they may make a difference to the type of speech I make in the debate on this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I note that my honourable friend has, himself, taken the adjournment of the debate on second reading of this bill. We look forward to hearing from him during that debate. I take it for granted that, when the second reading is concluded, it will be the wish of honourable senators that the bill go to committee, at which time my friend will have an opportunity to put questions about the possible regulations to the appropriate minister and/or his officials.

Senator Turner: Honourable senators, I have consulted with legal people, professors of law, drug experts and alcohol experts and they all tell me the rules and regulations are a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If that is so, it will make a difference in the type of speech I make. I have 50 pages on rules and regulations pertaining to drugs and alcohol, which is a speech in itself. I could speak all next week on this subject.

Senator Phillips: Go ahead!

Senator Turner: I want to know whether the rules and regulations are ready so that I can take a look at them.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is a requirement that the Minister of Justice must certify that any government bill coming before Parliament is in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I assure the honourable senator that proposed regulations are examined very carefully by the law officers in the same light—that is, to ensure that they are in conformity with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As for the detailed regulations that may be brought in under this act when it passes, he will have to inquire of the minister and/or his officials when this bill goes to committee.

Senator Turner: Our experience with Bill C-22 indicates that once a bill is passed the rules and regulations are changed—drug prices went up! Therefore, I am suggesting that once this bill is passed in this house there will be no way anyone will be able to change the rules and regulations; so I request the information now.

(Later)

Hon. Charles Turner: May I have an answer to the question I asked the leader of the Senate a few moments ago?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the answer is that I do not have the regulations. I cannot understand why the honourable senator, who has taken the adjournment on second reading of this bill, who will be debating this bill perhaps today, who will be going, I assume, to committee with this bill, and who will have the opportunity to question the minister and/or his officials on the regulations, persists. He knows that the usual course is that a statute gives regulation-making authority to the Governor in Council and that the regulations normally come in after the act is in force. The honourable senator is treating this matter as if some precedent were being established here. A precedent would be set if the regulations were published before the bill was passed.

Senator Turner: Honourable senators, after almost 20 years in Parliament, in both the House of Commons and the Senate, I have found that, once the rules and regulations are proclaimed, the concept of a bill is changed, to the detriment of the Canadian public. That is why, on behalf of the railroad brotherhoods of Canada, I am requesting this information.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

INCLUSION OF CANADA'S FRESH WATER RESOURCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on digging further into the situation regarding our great resource of water, I have discovered that apparently the intention of the Government of Canada was that water would be specifically excluded from the Free Trade Agreement. In fact, when the question arose when Mr. Reisman was the Canadian negotiator, his response was that water was to be excluded.

Nevertheless, apparently the government decided that it was so important to have the agreement that it allowed water to be included. That is one of the reasons why we did eventually come to an agreement. In an article published in the Toronto Star of May 21, 1988, it is stated:

...Canada had planned to have the trade agreement specifically exclude water, but that last-minute U.S. pressure led to a decision at the highest levels of government in Canada to abandon plans for an exclusion.

The final text includes some exemptions, for example on the export of raw logs. It contains other provisions for special treatment, such as in cultural industries and national security. But there's no mention of water.

ENERGY

GEORGES BANK DRILLING MORATORIUM—PREPARATION OF LEGISLATION FOR NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another question which is also very important to Canada. It has to do with the fishing rights off the Georges Bank, one of the richest fishing grounds in the world. I understand that there has been a moratorium on oil drilling to the year 2000 on the Georges Bank to protect our fisheries off the Atlantic coast.

It is my understanding that there is now a bill before the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia that is intended to protect that fishing ground against oil drilling until the year 2000.

Mr. Ken MacInnis, a lawyer for the NORIG—"No Rigs on Georges Bank"—lobby group, says that the proposed legislation being put forward is ridiculous. He calls it a "menacing act" and says it "puts the onus on fishermen to keep an offshore moratorium against drilling on Georges Bank intact beyond the year 2000."

● (1430)

It is not the fishermen who are doing the drilling; it is the oil companies that are doing the drilling. To put a moratorium on the fishermen so that they will not drill until the year 2000 is not good enough. We need to put a moratorium on the oil companies.

I ask this question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate because Mr. MacInnis, the lawyer, accuses the provincial government of allowing Ottawa to draft the legislation and to present it to the Nova Scotia Legislature. Is the Government of Canada preparing legislation for the Province of Nova Scotia? Is it only the fishermen who cannot drill, and will the government allow the oil companies to keep drilling on Georges Bank and ruin the fisheries?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot resist the opportunity to observe that the Nova Scotia Legislature, the home of representative and responsible government in this country, adjourned for the summer yesterday, having passed the Meech Lake Accord.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will permit me to express my great pride and satisfaction in that achievement and event of yesterday.

The Nova Scotia legislation, to which the honourable senator refers, was, indeed, presented by the Nova Scotia minister on May 13 with a view to inhibiting offshore exploration on Georges Bank until the year 2000.

The Honourable Senator Bonnell is correct, as is Mr. MacInnis, in stating that the Nova Scotia bill seeks to mirror amendments to the federal legislation to implement the Canada-Nova Scotia Accord, which is Bill C-75.

If I am not mistaken, that legislation is presently before a legislative committee of the other place, and one expects that in the normal course of events it will arrive in this house where my honourable friend will have an opportunity to debate it and ask questions in committee about its purport and effect.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

STATUS OF HEAVY WATER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to refer to the question Senator Bonnell asked a few minutes ago regarding water. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether heavy water is within the ambit of the Canada-U.S. free trade pact.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Water as a beverage is within the ambit of the Free Trade Agreement. So far as heavy water is concerned, there are several warehouses full of it in Cape Breton. The previous government continued to turn it out, although there was no foreseeable market for it. We have had to close those plants—and this is a matter that will be debated later today—and have established Enterprise Cape Breton with a view to providing alternative employment for Cape Bretoners, an initiative which is having outstanding success, I am happy to report.

CANADA WINTER GAMES, 1991

REQUEST BY PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FOR ACOA FUNDING

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the Canada Winter Games, 1991, and a request by Premier Joe Ghiz for funding, but before putting my question I wish to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for inviting us to meet yesterday with the directors of ACOA, an energetic group of good businessmen from the four Atlantic provinces—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): And women.

Senator Bonnell: And women. That group can certainly add to the drive of those four great provinces.

However, I was rather disappointed, as I told the minister privately yesterday, that the minister did not grab that opportunity to give equal representation to the four Atlantic provinces. There are five representatives from New Brunswick; five from Nova Scotia; five from Newfoundland; and three from Prince Edward Island, plus the APEC representative, making four in all. It happens that we have the leadership from APEC. That was the congratulatory note.

I read in the local paper of Wednesday, May 11, 1988, that the Honourable Joe Ghiz, who supports the Leader of the Government in the Senate very well and speaks well of him abroad and at home,—

Senator Steuart: So far!

Senator Bonnell: —is looking to the Honourable Lowell Murray for some funds through ACOA to assist in constructing a rink and a regional centre of some sort for the Canada Winter Games, 1991.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us if these funds will be made available for those games?

It will be almost impossible for the 125,000 Islanders to put forth any great expenditure of funds for that one occasion. Perhaps the leader could tell us now what funds he intends to make available so that I can go back to Prince Edward Island and tell Premier Joe Ghiz what a great fellow the Leader of the Government in the Senate is.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, all of us rejoice in the selection of Prince Edward Island as the site for the winter games. We are confident that they will be at least as successful as the games that were held a couple of years ago in Cape Breton.

That being said, I should point out that the federal government is already quite substantially committed in a financial way to assisting those games through my colleague, Mr. Charest, the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Premier Ghiz and I have spoken about whether ACOA funds would be available for the execution of a concept that would be more permanent than, and go beyond, the winter games. This has involved, as the honourable senator may know, some controversy on the Island involving the city of Charlottetown and various other interests.

In any case, my reply to Premier Ghiz and to the honourable senator is that, when all of these matters have been finally sorted out on the Island, the agency will be happy to entertain a proposition from Prince Edward Island in the sense referred to by Premier Ghiz. As usual, he will not be disappointed with the response.

Senator Bonnell: We could settle these things this afternoon, if the leader could guarantee a certain amount of money. We could settle this matter today, if the leader could tell us what was available and we could tell him whether we wanted a trade show building with a rink included, or whether we wanted just a rink, or whether we wanted to have that building in the Exhibition Grounds so that it could be used by all Prince Edward Islanders for trade shows, and so forth. So much depends on how much the leader can loosen the purse strings in Ottawa through ACOA or other means.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am waiting precisely for my friends in Prince Edward Island to decide what it is they want to do and to make a proposition. We will consider this with great sympathy and seriousness, as I have told the premier.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on 25th May, 1988.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, Bill S-7, to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee several months ago; as I am sure its sponsor, Senator Bélisle, would say, probably far too many months ago. I wish to express my regret, on behalf of the committee, that it has taken us as long as it has to deal with this bill, but senators will recall that at the same time we were being pressed to deal with Bill C-84 and Bill C-55. The committee felt it was imperative to give government bills higher priority than private bills.

I wish to remind honourable senators that the organization generally known as Opus Dei is described in the bill as "a secular jurisdictional institution of the Roman Catholic Church." The committee heard evidence that Opus Dei has been active in Canada since 1957. It was incorporated as a non-profit organization under Part III of the Quebec Companies Act and has operated that way for some 30 years. In 1982 the organization was constituted as a personal Prelature of the Church under the Church's Apostolic Constitution Ut Sit. The committee heard that it was that change in canon law regarding the status of Opus Dei that prompted it to apply for a change in its civil legal structure in Canada.

The corporation sole originated as a common law device in England that was associated with the ecclesiastical offices of the Church of England. By "corporatizing" a church office, property ownership and succession could be dealt with independently of the person who held that office for the time being. Canada adopted the device for occasional use, but in this country a corporation sole may be created only by an act of Parliament or of a legislature.

The "corporation sole" in the religious or non-profit sector has never been provided for in any federal law of general application and is not in general use. However, as part of its historical role of incorporating religious institutions or organizations by private act, the Senate has in the past approved private bills to create corporations sole—for example, the "episcopal corporations" of the Roman Catholic Church and similar entities in other churches. A search of the index of private legislation reveals that 20 corporations sole have been created in this way to date; 15 are Roman Catholic or Ukrainian.

an Catholic bishops—"episcopal corporations", and the other five incorporate offices of equal stature in other churches.

Public offices are also occasionally given the legal structure of a corporation sole by statute. Thus, the Governor General's Act creates a corporation sole of that office. Section 5 of the Veterans Land Act provides that the director is a corporation sole for certain purposes. In Ontario the office of Lieutenant Governor was made a corporation sole by provincial statute in 1980.

Honourable senators will recall that during the debate on second reading of this bill a few senators voiced strong opposition to the application because of the nature of the activities of Opus Dei in Canada and elsewhere. Similar objections were expressed by some members of the committee during its study of the bill. However, as chairman of the committee, I felt that it should confine itself to the legal aspects of the application for incorporation.

In approaching this issue, the committee found that there were few precedents and no statutory guidance. Honourable senators may recall that previous governments drafted and tabled legislation in the late 1970s and again in the early 1980s that would have modernized federal corporation law for non-profit corporations and put in place certain standard requirements. Unfortunately, that legislation—there were three government bills originating in and passed by the Senate and at least one in the House of Commons, Bill C-10 in 1980—all died on the order paper. Since that time there appears to have been no movement to bring in successor legislation. The current statutory framework for non-profit corporations is simply inadequate. It does not even contain provisions specifying accountability and disclosure requirements.

These questions arose in relation to Bill S-7. The committee noted the lack of financial disclosure requirements in the bill, and therefore devised and passed amendments requiring the corporation to file with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs annual financial statements that would be publicly available. The committee considered these to be minimum requirements. The applicant indicated to the committee that he had no objection to such amendments.

Because Opus Dei has operated for a number of years under general corporation law, the Regional Vicar explained why the organization is seeking incorporation by private bill as a corporation sole rather than under the Canada Corporations Act as a federal non-profit corporation with the usual three-member board of directors. He asserted that the office of regional vicar was analogous to that of a bishop and that, since the corporation sole had been used from time to time to incorporate the office of bishop, the office of the regional vicar should be dealt with in the same way. The argument advanced by the petitioner to the effect that a corporation sole was needed to conform to the requirements of canon law was not regarded as persuasive. It was felt that applicants for corporate status should adhere to the principles and requirements of general application to all non-profit organizations. Unfortun-nately, as I have said, those requirements have not been set out in a modern context in statutory form.

As I mentioned earlier, the 20 previous corporations sole created by private act related directly to religious institutions at the level of a bishopric. The Regional Vicar stated that his office was analogous to that of a bishop, although the petition stipulated that the institution is "secular." The committee felt that the use of a corporation sole in this case might extend what has been until now a very limited use of this unusual legal device, and several members were uncomfortable with such an extension.

In the result, and despite the misgivings expressed by various committee members, which misgivings are caused by the lacunae in our corporate law, the committee has passed Bill S-7 with amendments.

However, I wish to advise honourable senators that there was complete unanimity in the committee that Parliament should no longer be required to act in the sort of statutory vacuum that appears to exist with respect to corporations sole.

Whatever the decision of the Senate might be with respect to Bill S-7, the committee has instructed me to request the Senate to advise the government in the strongest possible terms to proceed as quickly as possible with new legislation respecting the incorporation of non-profit and religious organizations. Furthermore, in doing so, the government should consider very carefully whether there is any continuing justification for the type of corporation sole considered here. If the government decides there is still such a necessity, then it should set out in the new legislation all the necessary safeguards and limits upon its use.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, Bill S-7 has been before the Senate since April 2, 1987, nearly fourteen months. I opened the debate on second reading on April 7, 1987, when a long series of adjournments began.

● (1450)

[English]

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I understand that other senators would like to speak to this at the report stage before the debate is closed. I believe someone would like to take the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I am speaking on the report just tabled by the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, on a point of order, if Senator Bélisle continues speaking—where is Senator Flynn? I would like to display my ignorance in his presence.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is all right, we can accept it.

Senator Gigantès: If Senator Bélisle now speaks, does this close the debate?

Senator Doody: No. Senator Bélisle did not open the debate. This is a debate on the report tabled by the chairman of the committee. I am certainly glad Senator Flynn is not here.

Senator Gigantès: I always regret his absence.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Would you please put the motion for the adoption of the report?

Senator Neiman: I move adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, Bill S-7 has been before the Senate since April 2, 1987, nearly fourteen months. I opened the debate on second reading on April, 1987, when a long series of adjournments began. We first adjourned until May 26, 1987, exactly one year ago, when Senator Hébert made a speech in which he made it abundantly clear that he did not like Opus Dei. After a second adjournment, debate was resumed on June 2, 1987. On that day, it was Senator Le Moyné's turn to explain that he didn't like Opus Dei. Neither of the two speakers considered the substance of the bill. Subsequently, Senator Corbin adjourned the debate until June 17, 1987, when after a speech in which he told us he didn't like Opus Dei either, he moved for further adjournment.

On June 29, 1987, after a few brief explanations, I was allowed to make a speech in which I responded to several objections and clarified many of the questions raised in the previous speeches. Then Senator Corbin adjourned the debate once again, this time until September 16, 1987, when he finally finished the speech he had started three months earlier. A further adjournment was requested, this time by Senator Stollery, who three weeks later declined to speak to the bill.

Finally, the bill was read a second time on October 27, 1987, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

This year, the committee sat four times to examine the bill: February 23, when the petitioner and his advisers were present, on March 8 and on May 5 and 12. Earlier, the chairman of the committee explained that the committee had been held up by other bills, and I understood.

At the last sitting, as we were just informed, the committee approved Bill S-7 with several amendments.

One cannot claim the bill has not been very carefully examined. The two senators who voiced their objections publicly in committee, Senators Hébert and Gigantès, have had all the time they wanted to examine every aspect of the bill. They informed us of all their objections which, I may add, were more theological than legal in nature and were based on their dislike of an institution of the Catholic Church, in this case Opus Dei, but were unable to convince either their colleagues in the Senate or those in committee, which is not surprising.

[English]

Honourable senators, since Confederation some 102 private bills have been tabled in the Senate on behalf of various religious bodies of different denominations, and, as the chairman has said, 23 religious organizations have been approved. All of those bills were adopted. Moreover, they were adopted relatively quickly and without anyone ever remotely considering the possibility of scrutinizing the beliefs or convictions of the petitioners.

It is only a few years since Canada enshrined in its Constitution a Charter officially recognizing freedom of religion. Yet we now witness members of this house taking advantage of their parliamentary prerogatives to criticize publicly the religious traditions of an official institution of the Roman Catholic Church, thus violating the principle of the separation of church and state, of religious beliefs and political opinions.

My colleagues, who are opposing the enactment of Bill S-7, are doing so for reasons that have nothing to do with the substance of the bill or with the law of this country.

During the last three meetings of the committee our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel and the Chief of the Legal Division in Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada repeatedly stated that the bill is perfectly consistent with Canadian law and that the request of the petitioner is fully justified. So as to appease the apprehensions of a few senators, they proposed—and the committee endorsed, with explicit consent of the petitioner—amendments aimed at providing for greater transparency in the financial operations of the corporation that the bill creates. These amendments constitute a legislative precedent, since none of the private bills previously adopted in this area contain similar provisions. This legislative precedent thus imposes on the corporation that we are being asked to create requirements that go beyond those generally imposed by law on corporate bodies.

[Translation]

Honorable senators, it seems to me it is high time, after nearly fourteen months of study, that we decided to adopt Bill S-7, which contains a petition that, according to our committee, is entirely justified and justifiable.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn this debate in my name. I promise Senator Bélisle that I shall speak on this on Tuesday next.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada

Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts.—(Honourable Senator Graham).

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, first, I should like to thank Senator Murray for his introduction of Bill C-103. As will become apparent, I do not agree with everything that he said, as I am sure he will not subscribe totally to everything that I am about to say.

● (1500)

It is now nearly four years since the Prime Minister, speaking in Halifax, stated:

A Progressive Conservative government will give the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion a specific legislative mandate to promote the least developed regions of Canada.

In October of 1986 the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, ACOA, was introduced in the Speech from the Throne. The government stated that ACOA was "constituted to facilitate and coordinate all federal development initiatives in the area."

ACOA was given its mandate in June of 1987. That mandate reads as follows:

Coordination and planning of all federal activities contributing to the economic growth of the region; in particular, procurement, training and skills development, job creation, technology infrastructure development and local investment, promotion and responsibility for federal small and medium-sized business and industrial development policy and programs in the region.

The mandate is impressive. It is expansive. But I am disappointed that the mandate is not reflected adequately in the legislation before us today.

Clause 13 of the act states in part:

In carrying out its object, the Agency may,—

Among other things—

—(a) in concert with other concerned departments and agencies of the Government of Canada, formulate plans and integrated federal approaches to support opportunity for economic development of Atlantic Canada;—

AOCA "may" do that; on the other hand, it may not. It might have been more helpful in addressing the concerns of Atlantic Canadians if this section of the legislation was more explicit by instructing all departments of government to provide assistance whenever the need arises. In Atlantic Canada, poverty and unemployment must be addressed with every policy instrument at hand.

Clause 4 of Bill C-103 states:

The purpose of this Part is to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada and, more particularly, to enhance the growth of earned incomes and employment opportunities in that region.

The objectives are commendable, but some concerned people believe that the government may be backing away from specific goals of regional development, such as reducing regional disparities and unemployment throughout Atlantic Canada, and most particularly in the most disparate areas of Cape Breton, Newfoundland and northern New Brunswick.

Honourable senators will know that previous governments continuously reaffirmed their commitment to regional economic development. Recognition was given to the confluence of economic forces which contributed to slow and uneven growth. It was understood that disparities would not be overcome overnight. For this reason the resources of several departments—DRIE, Transport, Energy, Mines and Resources, Supply and Services, among others—were marshalled to help address regional problems. Each department was to pull its weight in the national attack on regional disparities.

I have two specific concerns about a single regional agency with a single funding source. First, there is the danger that line departments with crucial regional responsibilities will not discharge their responsibilities. They might have a tendency to say, "Go to ACOA."

To illustrate this point, I suggest we look at the Canadian Job Strategy. This strategy was to reintroduce flexibility to the programs of Employment and Immigration. Instead, we have seen cutbacks, eligibility restrictions and a decreased emphasis on job creation. It is illogical, in my judgment, that the short-term unemployed must become long-term unemployed before qualifying for retraining assistance. The Canadian Job Strategy is not regionally sensitive and has been shown to be ineffectual in Atlantic Canada. Again, ACOA "may, in concert with other concerned departments, . . . formulate plans" to address this problem, but I believe that the legislation could be more explicit in this respect.

Second, I am concerned that ACOA's annual budget of $200 million represents not new, additional money, as is claimed, but, instead, a ceiling on regional development funding in Atlantic Canada. Honourable senators will know that the Industrial and Regional Development Program, IRDP, was the largest funded program within DRIE. The government will also acknowledge that the sunset clause in the IRDP legislation takes effect in five weeks' time, at the end of June.

In his speech last week, Senator Murray made reference to the IRDP initiative. He did not say that new applications for funding would not be accepted after June 30 of this year.

During the fiscal years 1985 to 1987, IRDP funding was worth $23.5 million to Newfoundland; $4.2 million to Prince Edward Island; $28.9 million to Nova Scotia; and $59.2 million to New Brunswick. My point is that the term "new money" is meaningless if this program is not renewed in some fashion. I am sure Senator Murray will want to address that question.

Senator Murray also told us that in the past year ACOA has approved approximately 1,100 applications for funding and given assistance in the order of $161 million. Those statistics are impressive, but it is my understanding that a very large part—perhaps close to 100 per cent of this money—was allocated under programs which predate ACOA. If that is true, I am not impressed.

Rural areas are placed at a particular disadvantage by this legislation. The IRDP tier system had its faults, but at least it allowed for a delineation of modern and slow growth areas. Honourable senators will know that the worst ravages of regional disparities are found in the small and isolated communities across the region. The ACOA legislation does not recognize this reality, in my opinion. For example, communities like Dominion and Arichat will see their proposed development projects subjected to the same criteria as those in Moncton and Halifax.

The vast majority of Atlantic Canadians who live in rural areas work in the primary resource industries. Bill C-103 holds no specific promises for fishermen, farmers, woodsmen or the men who mine coal, zinc, potash and iron ore in Atlantic Canada. The government was apprised of this shortcoming in the legislation during committee study in the other place. So far, the government has not responded.

A fundamental principle of regional development is the necessity of meeting basic infrastructure needs. Local initiatives are hampered by a lack of infrastructure. Private investment from outside the region will simply not materialize if infrastructure is not in place. The impact of technology and the ease of mobility, which the skilled labour force enjoys, has taken the demands for infrastructure beyond roads and industrial parks. In addition to capital infrastructure assistance to industry, we must look at community level infrastructure which enhances the quality of life for our residents and signals investors from afar that we will no longer tolerate the serious environmental degradation evident in our towns and cities. Broader regional goals in telecommunications and transportation infrastructure must be addressed. Given the importance of infrastructure upgrading to the region, it is unfortunate that Bill C-103 does not contain a commitment in this area.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, Part I of Bill C-103 is an attempt to respond—but is not an adequate response—to the economic problems of Atlantic Canada. Its shortcomings, however, pale in comparison to Part II—that section dealing with Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and the dismemberment of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In his speech Senator Murray made just passing reference to this section of the bill, and that undoubtedly was deliberate. I am sure he wants to save some ammunition for later. However, he did suggest that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation “addresses the special needs of Cape Breton.” Those Cape Bretoners opposed to relegating to the history books 20 years of success in initiating community growth through Devco are not pleased, by any stretch of the imagination.

Clause 33 of the bill states, in part:

The objects of the Corporation—

That being the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation—

... are to promote and assist ... the financing and development of industry on the Island of Cape Breton to provide employment outside the coal producing industry and to broaden the base of the economy of the Island.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the words “to provide employment outside the coal producing industry.” Rather than introducing a separate bill to eviscerate Devco, the government is attempting another sleight of hand.

This year, honourable senators, it is worthy of note that Devco celebrates its twentieth anniversary. In the intervening two decades it has recorded impressive gains in performance and made outstanding contributions to the economy of Cape Breton.

Devco was formed in response to economic events in Cape Breton in the mid-1960s which, as one observer put it, threatened to turn the Island into a slum. Cape Breton was already in serious economic distress when the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation—the Island's largest employer by far at the time—announced its intention to close down its coal mines, thereby eliminating some 6,500 jobs, which represented approximately 14 per cent of the Island's total employment.

The economic and social disruption of the shutdown would have been so devastating to Cape Breton that the government could not let it happen. Devco was therefore established to take over Dosco's mines and to provide jobs and new industries outside the mining sector.

Devco's mission was succinctly defined by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, in the House of Commons when he was speaking on the motion introducing the corporation's enabling legislation:

To acquire, reorganize and rehabilitate certain coal mining works and undertakings on Cape Breton Island, to conduct coal mining operations in the Sydney coal field and to promote and assist the development of industry on Cape Breton Island to provide employment outside the coal producing industry and to broaden the base of the Island's economy.

That speech was made in 1967. I believe it is acknowledged by everyone concerned that Senator MacEachen was the individual most influential in and responsible for the establishment of Devco.

Honourable senators, in order to deal with the separate tasks of rationalizing the coal industry and promoting new industry on Cape Breton Island, the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act provided for two divisions to be set up within Devco: namely, the Coal Division and the Industrial Development Division.

On a personal note, after the corporation was established, I happened to be the first employee on the ground in Cape Breton when Devco was preparing to take over the employees and assets of the old Dominion Coal Company. Senator Murray's father, the late Danny Murray, had been the chief inspector of mines for the province of Nova Scotia. Danny Murray was one of the most respected individuals in the coal mining industry anywhere in Canada, and I shall always be grateful for his friendship and wise counsel during that transitional period.

The Coal Division is responsible for the reorganization and operation of coal mining and related works in Cape Breton.

The purpose of the industrial development division is to promote and assist the financing and development of industry on the Island of Cape Breton; to provide employment outside the coal-producing industry; and to broaden the base of the economy on the Island.

In the late 1960s the global demand for coal in both industrial and power generation markets increased substantially, resulting in serious shortages and much higher prices. It appeared, moreover, that these improved markets for coal were the beginning of a trend rather than a short-term phenomenon. Accordingly, Devco undertook an internal review to reassess the prospects of Cape Breton's coal resources in light of the new conditions.

Based on this reassessment, Devco has directed its efforts to restoring the coal mining industry of Cape Breton and making it self-supporting. This goal has not been easy, but, as a result of significant investments in mining improvements and commendable efforts by the coal miners and management of Devco, much progress has been made in achieving that goal. Preliminary estimates show that the Coal Division's operating losses in fiscal year 1987-88 were under $2 million, and projections are that in the current year Devco will in fact at last achieve an operating profit.

The size and operations of Devco over these years have grown dramatically. The assets of the Coal Division at the end of fiscal year 1975-76 were $108 million. At the end of fiscal year 1986-87 the coal division's assets stood at $553 million, and today, with the completion of the new Phalen colliery, they are close to $600 million. In the mid-1970s coal sales generated revenues of approximately $50 million; today, annual sales are approximately $200 million.

Through the Industrial Development Division, Devco has become an entrepreneur on Cape Breton Island, demonstrating that Cape Bretoners can develop the economy, own and operate industry, and create employment. Devco has instituted bold ventures in rural industry sectors, specifically in agriculture, fisheries and tourism—bold new ventures which continue to see real, measurable, positive effects on the economy. Devco does not view development as a narrow goal. As the corporation's brief to the Legislative Committee on Bill C-103 states:

Not only must industrial initiatives be in the best interests of Cape Bretoners, they must also improve upon the quality of life on the Island. Economic development is treated as a broad concept; it engages more than financial and managerial resources; it includes the development of individuals and of the overall community.

As an example of Devco's innovative work in the industrial development division, the tourism industry on Cape Breton Island has seen tremendous growth since the early 1970s, when Devco was the largest developer of tourism facilities on the island. Most of these facilities have been sold to private interests, as Devco has shifted its focus on tourism to marketing and promotional activities. Their success in this regard is unprecedented. Employment levels in tourism exceed those of coal and steel combined, and Cape Breton Island, as a region of Nova Scotia, receives the largest portion of tourism dollars in the province—even outdistancing the metropolitan area of Halifax. While recognizing these successes, one must also realize there is much left to be done.

The Industrial Development Division continues to fulfill its mandate by doing what the Coal Division cannot do in many of those communities whose history and economy are deeply rooted in coal. Among other things, the Industrial Development Division provides urban and industrial infrastructure, supports entrepreneurial development programs and supports local, self-help organizations.

We must underline and emphasize that the corporation is not two separate divisions with two mutually exclusive mandates. In reality, the mandate and the direction are the same: to modernize and diversify the Cape Breton economy.

The corporate mandate may be protected in legislation, but it is corporate policy that determines the results. The Cape Breton Development Corporation has, through policy decisions, chosen to be socially responsible to the people of Cape Breton Island.

• (1520)

Bill C-103 does not recognize the historical link between the two divisions of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. It also does not recognize that for thousands of rural Cape Bretoners the Cape Breton Development Corporation has meant, and continues to mean, the Industrial Development Division.

Merely exorcising the Industrial Development Division's powers from the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act does not ensure the continuance of that corporation's former direction or social responsibility. Devco has a social contract with the community that can be denied only if we are prepared to go back to the industrial society that existed in the nineteenth century and early twentieth century.

When Devco officials appeared before the Legislative Committee last March, in Port Hawkesbury, the Chairman of Devco, Dr. Teresa MacNeil, spoke of the special characteristics of Devco. She said, in part:

The social conscience of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has long been possible by the work it assigned to the Industrial Development Division . . . It is possible, through program retention, to duplicate the current activities of the Industrial Development Division. That is not a problem. However, in so doing, the essence of the Cape Breton Development Corporation is being lost.

Reflecting on these comments from the chairman of Devco, I was reminded of an old maxim: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

I want to examine for just a moment what I view as the detrimental aspects of the provisions of this bill dealing with the creation of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. The future of the coal industry, and, indeed, most resource sectors of the Atlantic economy, depends upon innovative technologies which facilitate the development of new products for the marketplace. For instance, Devco has a joint interest in a carbogel plant at Victoria Junction. Using the flexible mandate of the Industrial Development Division, Devco was able to lever private investment in its development of coal-water technologies. The vice-president of the Industrial Development Division, Keith Brown, testified before the Legislative Committee, when it met in Port Hawkesbury, that Bill C-103 was in fact delimiting legislation. He said:

The question is what happens after there are two corporations? Does the Coal Division have the powers to do that type of joint venture? We think legislatively they do not.

I caution honourable senators that a potentially more disturbing outcome may occur.

With reference to the original Devco legislation of 1967, the mandate of the Coal Division remains unamended to this day. For this reason Mr. Brown also stated:

If you are taking all that developmental legislation away from the Cape Breton Development Corporation, then legislatively it leaves a coal company without the legislative ability actively to mine coal.

So, as a result, Devco will not only be limited in its ability to enter into joint ventures, but it may also be prevented from corporate expansion into other coal-based activities. The government has clearly ignored the fate of the Coal Division.

What the government is really doing is giving back to Cape Bretoners the old Dominion Coal Company. The last thing in the world that Cape Bretoners want back is anything that even remotely resembles the old Dominion Coal Company. Down there it is an absolute no-no! The Cape Breton Development Corporation will become strictly a coal company that is commercially driven. What we could be witnessing here is the thin edge of the wedge in a move towards privatization. Cape Bretoners will want to ask what the end result will be. How much of the labour force will be eliminated? Who or what will offset the effect on the Cape Breton economy?

The situation could be 1967 all over again, but with a very different twist to the scenario. Once again, coal production could be back in private hands on Cape Breton Island with work force levels drastically reduced. But this time, according to this legislation, we will no longer have an Industrial Development Division to soften the blow.

Some honourable senators may recall the report of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee which was released in September 1985. A major recommendation of the committee was that a new agency, Enterprise Cape Breton—not Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation as this legislation envisages, but Enterprise Cape Breton—be created as a subsidiary of Devco. Senator Murray suggested in his speech last Wednesday that the present configuration of agencies is a response to the petitions of Atlantic Canadians.

Honourable senators, I have here copies of letters addressed to federal ministers de Cotret and Murray signed by the Cape Breton Industrial Area Community Futures Committees—a group representative of citizens of all walks of life and all political stripes. I want to quote from just two of these letters. The first one is dated December 3, 1987, and is addressed to “Minister Robert de Cotret, Department of Regional Industrial Expansion.” It reads, in part:

Dear Minister de Cotret:

Further to our earlier communication concerning the future of the Industrial Development Division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the public meeting referred to in our letter was held in Sydney on December 1, 1987. Enclosed are copies of the registration sheets from the session. Approximately two hundred fifty people from all areas of Cape Breton and representing a broad cross section of business, labour, municipal, and community leaders were in attendance. The meeting expressed its strong support for the retention of the Industrial Development Division and the legislation enacting it.

To this effect the following motion was accepted from the floor and passed unanimously:

Be it moved that the meeting empower the Chairman and regional representatives of the Community Futures Committees to communicate with the Minister responsible for Devco strongly endorsing the retention of the Industrial Development Division of Devco and further confirming with the Minister the peoples' desire to see the Industrial Development Division expanded to promote increased industrial development on Cape Breton Island.

It is signed by the meeting chairman, Reverend John Capstick; John Currie, chairman of the Northside Community Futures Committee; Mayor Bruce Clark, chairman of the Glace Bay and Area Community Futures Committee; and Charles Campbell, chairman of the Sydney and Area Community Futures Committee; and, of course, the signatures of approximately 250 leading citizens of the area are here as well.

Next, I would like to quote from a letter dated January 21, 1988, from Mr. C.A. Campbell, chairman of the Sydney and Area Community Futures Committee, addressed to Senator Murray. I shall not read the entire letter, but it does say:

Our concerns may be outlined as follows:

- There is no opportunity for on-going involvement in the decision making process by the community;
- In fact, the structure proposed in the legislation, mitigates against the process of local decision making;
- The Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be restricted from any participation in coal related industries.

Honourable senators, these civic leaders from various municipalities in Cape Breton have urged the minister to respect the integrity of the Devco legislation. The citizens' pleas have obviously fallen on deaf ears.

Before closing, I want to comment briefly on the initiative to create a Department of Industry, Science and Technology, to be known by the acronym DIST, out of the ashes of DRIE. Once this reorganization is complete, the government will have in place DIST, ACOA, the Western Diversification office and special regional funds for northern Ontario and outlying areas of Quebec. Clearly, DIST will be responsible for industrial development in the heartland of Canada, in addition to guiding national science and technology policy. The dangers to Atlantic Canada are clear. Limited resources—$200 million annually for five years—will be targeted to small and medium-sized businesses in Atlantic Canada while funding for the major economic activities of the future remains in the most prosperous regions of the country.

• (1530)

I noted earlier that we must build from our strengths. Yet Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation cannot promote diversification within the coal producing industry of Cape Breton. In an absurd twist, though, its parent, ACOA, may fund new coal ventures outside Cape Breton Island.

Bill C-103 implies that the Industrial Development Division of Devco will continue as a new corporation with all its former power and ability. The new corporate structure of this "continued"—and that is the legislative word that is used—corporation, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, does not imply that the Industrial Development Division will continue as its former self. As a part of Devco, the Industrial Development Division currently reports to a board of directors with a chairman. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will report to the president of ACOA, headquartered in Moncton. This is not a "continued" corporation as the bill implies, but a totally new structure, unlike other Crown corporations in Canada.

Clauses 34(3) and 34(4) further weaken the former structure of the Industrial Development Division by giving the minister responsible for ACOA the ability to direct the Crown corporation, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. This removes the flexibility of the corporation to make decisions on its own, independently of government, as the Industrial Development Division has been able to do.

Honourable senators, I find very little in Part II of this bill worthy of support and I have deep concerns about the destruction of Devco.

For 20 years the economic fortunes of Cape Breton have been closely tied to those of Devco. Devco remains the major employer and generator of economic activity on the Island. Its continued operations are crucial to the future industrial and economic development of Cape Breton.

I will close with a comment from a Cape Breton Post editorial of May 12, 1988. In response to the question "Why change DEVCO now?", the paper responds: "It's a good question, and the government hasn't answered it."

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

May I also, at the same time, ask what is the intention of the opposition with regard to this important bill? I had formed the impression that we would be able to refer the bill to committee last week. That was not possible. This is the last sitting day of this week. Does the honourable senator know whether the opposition will have one speaker or several speakers next week, and when we may expect to be able to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Senator Petten: It is my understanding that we will be prepared to speak on Tuesday. Unfortunately, I was not here yesterday so I did not have an opportunity to speak with Senator MacEachen directly, but it is my understanding that Senator MacEachen will be ready to proceed on Tuesday. That is why I adjourned the debate in my name.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-NINTH CONFERENCE, GUATEMALA CITY, GUATEMALA

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 17, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-ninth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, held at Guatemala City, Guatemala, from April 11 to 16, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to take a few moments to present the report of the Seventy-ninth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held on April 11 to 16 in Guatemala City. I seek the agreement of the Senate to table the report. I say that because the report is some 26 pages long and it has an appendix that consists of another 10 or 12 pages. That is in one language. It will, no doubt, amount to another 30 or 40 pages in the other official language. I think that tabling it would suffice, in that it would then be available, if any honourable senator wished to read it, and we would be able to save the expense of printing it. Copies are also available.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Report tabled.

Senator Nurgitz: Perhaps I may continue with a few brief comments about the report. As honourable senators are aware, the central aim of the IPU, the Inter-Parliamentary Union, is to advance the cause of peace and international cooperation by supporting the objectives of the United Nations. At the present time some 109 countries belong to this association. Next year, 1989, marks the centenary of the union and special celebrations are planned at each of the two regular conferences to commemorate this event.

At each conference countries may submit proposals for agenda items for the following conference. Approximately one year ago the World Commission on Environment and Development released its report, popularly known as the "Brundtland Report." Canada has strongly supported both the commission and its report. Our Minister of the Environment, the Honourable Thomas McMillan, in speaking to the United Nations General Assembly, said:

Just as Canadians originally called for the Commission, generously funded it, and supported its work throughout, we are also consulting one another about how to act on its findings.

At the fall 1987 Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference Canada successfully proposed the inclusion of a debate in Guatemala City on the follow-up to the Brundtland Commission.

In addition, the agenda included the following subjects: peace and development leading to purely defensive military strategies; peace and development in Central America; and the current world situation.

Prior to our departure, the delegation received interesting and informative briefings from officials in the Department of External Affairs, the Department of the Environment, the Canadian International Development Agency and the International Development and Research Centre. Upon our arrival in Guatemala City, we had an excellent briefing on Canada-Guatemala relations by His Excellency Raymond Chrétien, our Ambassador, Ms. Dilys Buckley-Jones, our Chargé d'Affaires, and several staff members at our embassy in that city. Throughout our stay we received invaluable help and assistance from embassy officials. I should like to make particular mention of Mr. Bob Brack, who attended our daily breakfast caucuses and the conference proceedings.

On behalf of the delegation, I should also like to express our thanks and appreciation to the public servants who worked with us both here in Ottawa and in Guatemala.

Special mention should be made of Stephen Knowles and Barbara Reynolds. Throughout the pre-conference period, in making the necessary arrangements, and at the conference itself, the constant attention given by these two individuals added greatly to the effective performance of the Canadian delegation. Both Stephen and Barbara are well known in that international community, and Canada is the envy of many a country because of their unfailing dedication and expertise.

As well as the debate on the previously mentioned topics, there was an informal meeting on the health and well-being of the elderly chaired by Congressman Claude Pepper of the United States. I might add that Congressman Pepper was celebrating 50 years of membership in the IPU, having attended his first conference in 1938. "Long-term health care" was the subject discussed at this meeting on the elderly.

I wish to pay special tribute to the outstanding contribution of our colleague, Senator Thériault, himself a former provincial health minister. He delivered a moving and passionate speech about how Canada has provided long-term health care for its aging citizens. Delegates from many parts of the world remarked on his valuable contribution.

● (1540)

As you know, our Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Joe Clark, announced last November that the Canadian government had decided to restore bilateral aid to Guatemala. In order to see at first hand how Canadian money is being spent, our delegation arranged to visit two aid projects. The first project sponsored by Plenty Canada involved the introduction of soya beans—which are high in protein—into the diet of Guatemalans. The second was a food and health assistance program for widows and orphans of villagers killed in guerilla fighting.

The statutes of the Inter-Parliamentary Union state that its purpose is to promote personal contacts between members of all parliaments; to unite them in common action to establish and develop representative institutions; and to advance the work of international peace and development. Honourable senators, I feel that our report will demonstrate how this purpose is being met.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 31, 1988, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 31, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE LATE HONOURABLE PAUL C. LAFOND, D.F.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it is my sad duty to pay tribute to our colleague, Senator Paul Lafond, who passed away last Friday and whose funeral took place this morning in Hull.

When Paul Lafond was appointed to this chamber in 1970, he was in excellent company. Other new senators included the former Premier of Alberta, Senator Ernest Manning, our colleague, Senator Molgat and the eminent Senators Thérèse Casgrain and Eugene Forsey.

[English]

It would be fair to say that Paul Lafond's arrival in the Senate was somewhat overshadowed by the eminent company of new senators who came to the Senate at the same time. But when, on Friday, after eighteen years, he left us, he was one of our best known and most respected colleagues on Parliament Hill, in Canada and abroad. The reports of his committee on Defence Policy have been among the highlights of recent Parliaments.

Less known outside our immediate circle in the Senate was the care, patience and good humour with which, for some years, he coordinated committee schedules in this place—surely one of the most thankless tasks ever visited upon a colleague.

[Translation]

Before being appointed to the Senate, Paul Lafond had for many years been a key member of the national organization of the Liberal Party of Canada. For twenty years, from 1948 to 1968, Senator Lafond held the position of general secretary of the Liberal Federation of Canada. In that capacity he helped organize the conventions that saw the leadership of the Liberal Party go from Mackenzie King to St. Laurent, from St. Laurent to Pearson, and from Pearson to Trudeau. With his passing, another page in our history has been turned.

[English]

My cabinet colleague, the Honourable Flora MacDonald, was Paul Lafond's counterpart at national Conservative headquarters for many years. She spoke the other day warmly and with great regret of her political rival and good friend.

[Translation]

Beyond party lines, there is one thread that runs through all the stages of Senator Lafond's career and that is the armed forces.

From 1940 to 1945, he served as an officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force. His exploits over the Atlantic earned him the Distinguished Flying Cross.

Later, after his arrival in the Senate, Paul Lafond presided over the proceedings of the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. He demonstrated his intellectual independence, criticizing the cuts made at the Department of National Defence, although they had been made by his own government.

I remember his trenchant and perhaps far-sighted comments in 1983, when he described the pitiful state of our armed forces. He said drily that our navy might be able to fend off an attack by St. Pierre and Miquelon!

He again demonstrated his independence and the fact that he was a man of deep convictions when he voted against the 1982 constitutional amendment presented by his government.

[English]

This morning at the funeral mass in Hull the presiding priest spoke of Paul Lafond's commitment to Canada and of his service to this country. He also emphasized Paul Lafond's attachment to his own corner of Quebec and Canada. He spoke of Paul Lafond's concern for the poor and the unfortunate of that city and region, of the leadership he gave as chairman of the annual fund-raising campaigns of Centraide, of his work for les oeuvres du Cardinal Léger.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am sure everyone in this Chamber will want to join the government in offering our condolences to Stella, Senator Lafond's wife, his two sisters and his friends.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to associate the members of this side of the house and the members of the Liberal caucus and myself with the words of tribute that Senator Murray has so appropriately paid to the memory of the late Paul Lafond.

It does not seem, to me at least, that 18 years have passed since Paul Lafond was summoned to the Senate, having served for many years previously as an important official in the National Liberal Federation. It was during that period of his career that I had occasion to work with him on various electoral matters. At that time he established himself as an extremely competent person, who enjoyed the confidence of his party and the party leaders. That certainly was demonstrated by the finesse and delicacy he showed in organizing very complicated leadership conventions.

His interest in politics had obviously prepared him for the active career he followed in the Senate. In a sense, it is unfortunate that the work of the Special Committee on National Defence has not received the wide currency in Canada that it deserves. The work is well known among defence specialists, but his conclusions are not as well known among the general public as a whole. Of course, Senator Lafond was a key person in that particular work.

I should like to conclude by referring to Paul Lafond's war service. He served for a number of years in the Royal Canadian Air Force and was decorated with an important award, which he wore most modestly but which was an indication of an achievement in service that not many attain. It is most unfortunate for all of us to have lost his presence, because he has been associated for so many years with the Ottawa scene.

I join with Senator Murray and others in expressing our deep sympathy to his widow, family and friends.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, the two senators who have preceded me have covered very well the career of our lately departed friend, Senator Paul Lafond. I need not go over that ground, but there are one or two points referred to by both of them that I would like to make brief comments upon, just the same.

First, Paul Lafond was, throughout his life, a citizen of Hull. But operating from that community so close to the national capital he became a true Canadian who comprehended this country as a whole, as a unit, and was more concerned with Canada as a whole than he was with its several parts—although, as Senator Murray said in referring to the oration of the presiding priest at his funeral this morning, he became well known for his concern for the poor and unfortunate people in the community in which he was brought up and in which he commenced his education.

I should also like to refer to Senator Lafond's war service, though much has already been said. He was doing research with the RCAF when war broke out. He became an officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force and served as such for five years, winning the Distinguished Flying Cross—no mean accomplishment. From that time on he continued his interest in Canada's armed forces—not only the air force but all of Canada's armed forces as an integrated defence unit. This was what enabled him to preside so well over the Committee on National Defence when it was a subcommittee of our Committee on Foreign Affairs and when it then achieved the status of a special committee of this house.

I am also glad that Senator Murray referred to, and Senator MacEachen continued to speak of, his service for 20 years as General Secretary of the National Liberal Federation.

Our system of Parliament, towards which our system of government is responsible, depends on party organization. Largely, the stability of our government owes a great debt to political parties. Those who serve them do a great service not only to their party but also to the country. As Senator Murray pointed out, Senator Lafond did not operate in an antagonistic manner with his opposite number in the Progressive Conservative Party. He was a professional person in this respect as well. That is something which in these times our political parties urgently need. As has already been said, he discharged those duties well.

Finally, in this chamber he will largely be remembered for the service he rendered as chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence. The committee has issued four reports already. The first was entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces." We have already seen some progress towards implementing the recommendations that that report made—not as rapid progress as those of us who are on the committee would have liked, but some progress—and some of us on that committee feel that we deserve some credit for having made a strong statement advocating policies which have been followed since then.

The second report had to do with Maritime Command. Here, again, we made the recommendation which resulted in—I do not say that we were the only ones, though—the beginning of the acquisition of the Canadian patrol frigates. We also recommended the acquisition of further submarines. However, we did not at that time consider nuclear-powered submarines, and that is a matter to which this particular committee has not yet addressed its attention. Our second and third reports had to do with Canada's territorial air defence and the fourth one with military air transport.

• (1410)

Shortly after we began what will probably be the committee's final study, an investigation into Canada's land forces, Senator Lafond's health caused him to retire as chairman of the committee. It then became my unhappy duty, honourable senators, to succeed him as chairman, and I am doing my best to bring the final report to a conclusion, with the able assistance of the senators who have been so faithful in supporting the work of the committee. I hope that we may be able to append to the report at that time a summary, together with a cost-updating, of all of the recommendations that we have made in our series of reports covering the whole of Canada's armed forces.

Honourable senators, perhaps I have spent a little too much time talking about these matters, but I have done so deliberately, because I say to you, honourable senators, that had it not been for Senator Paul Lafond's intimate knowledge of Canada's defence forces and his more personal knowledge of the key players who occupied the position of Chief of the Defence Staff and other top positions in all three services in Canada's forces, I do not think the committee would ever have made the progress that it did in putting together those reports. His personal hand was very active in the writing and composition of the reports and in thrashing out with the other members of the committee the recommendations that were made. Truly, Senator Paul Lafond was eminently qualified to do this job, and I regret exceedingly that he did not survive long enough to see the completion of our fifth and final report.

To all of this, honourable senators, I would add one other thing: While Senator Lafond concerned himself primarily with matters of defence, he was himself a most calm and placid man. No one would have called him warlike in any way, and when he addressed himself to the subject of the armed services of Canada, he was concerned about their defensive aspects—their preservation of Canada's security and perhaps Canada's sovereignty as well. We shall miss his leadership; we shall miss his pleasant personality; we shall miss the calmness with which he presided over committee meetings and dealt with his colleagues. I join the two honourable senators who have preceded me in extending my condolences and those of the other members of the Defence Committee to Madame Lafond and other members of Senator Lafond's family. Farewell to a great senator, a great Canadian and a great citizen.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I would like to intervene at this point, if I may, because of a very long acquaintance with Senator Lafond. This acquaintance came about originally in the late 1950s in the depth of a Tory government reign, when Senator Lafond was Executive Secretary of the National Liberal Federation, and I think our colleague, Senator Davey, also had some official position at that time.

Senator Lafond's experiences and my own in this chamber followed somewhat parallel paths inasmuch as we came here as Liberals who had laboured in the political vineyards and had ended up being not large "L" Liberals but small "I" liberals and independents. I think that progression exemplifies the modifying influence of a span of years in this chamber, and I hope that it will set an example as to how both Paul and I felt this chamber should operate.

Paul's significant contribution as chairman of the Subcommittee on National Defence, which later became the Special Committee on National Defence, should not be minimized. I am quite familiar with the reactions to the reports of that committee amongst those who are knowledgeable and concerned with national defence, both in academe and in Reserve Forces capacities. The cumulative effect of those four reports forms the basis of the consciousness of this country today in military matters, and for that we owe Paul a debt of infinite gratitude.

Paul was, first of all, a Canadian. You need only look at his distinguished war record for evidence that. Second, he was an ardent Quebecois, and you need only to look at his stand on the constitutional issue of 1982 for evidence of that. Third, Paul was a small "I" liberal, and that is an order I would fully endorse.

If I may, I would like to quote from a poem by a mid-nineteenth century poet, Adam Lindsay Gordon, which, I think, rather epitomizes Paul as I see him now, in retrospect:

Question not, but live and labour
Till yon goal be won,
Helping every feeble neighbour,
Seeking help from none;
Life is mostly froth and bubble,

[Senator Hicks.]

Two things stand like stone,
Kindness in another's trouble,
Courage in your own.

To Stella I send my personal sympathy and prayers.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable colleagues, I am privileged to offer some words of respect and appreciation for the life and labours of our late colleague, the Honourable Paul C. Lafond, D.F.C., with particular reference to the Special Committee on National Defence, of which we heard something this afternoon. Unfortunately, I did not know him in his other role or his other activities, but I must say that I am unbounding in my admiration for the way in which he conducted his duties as chairman of that committee. In the first place, he was an excellent chairman. He knew how to give every committee member room to breathe and he knew how to bring out the best of the information that was available from the witnesses who appeared before us. He had a gift for synthesizing this mass of material into the concise and, in my opinion, effective reports that the committee issued from time to time. Make no mistake about it, Paul Lafond was the original animator and driving spirit behind the work of that committee. It reflects his leadership; it reflects his influence; it reflects his good judgment, and all that can be found by those who look at the reports with attention and with informed opinion.

• (1420)

I was a member of the committee, but I can tell you that it was Paul Lafond's committee. He was the man who led us through the work we had to do. I think he made a contribution—which is perhaps not as widely recognized as it should be—in bringing the question of national defence once again into the arena of public debate and consideration. It had languished for years in the shade.

While it is true that Senate reports are not what one would call "best-sellers," his reports had a significance that is still reflected in the discussions that take place on national defence in this country today. The recommendations contained in those reports are reflected to some significant extent in the white paper and certainly in other policy pronouncements that are being made from time to time with respect to that very important aspect of our public affairs.

I think Senator Lafond's gift was to provide a platform for those who wanted to discuss this topic, a forum for opinion to develop, and a focus on the essential points involved in the development of national defence policy. It seems to me that, along with those other important and significant contributions which he made to political life in this country, the contribution he made as chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence will stand as a tangible memorial to the part he played in the evolution of Canada as a self-respecting and as a self-reliant nation. We have every reason to be satisfied and proud of the record he leaves as a Canadian parliamentarian and as a leader in the affairs of our nation.

I would like to add these words of appreciation and respect to those that have already been offered and to express to his wife and those he leaves behind our sincere condolences.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of previous speakers.

I first met Senator Paul Lafond when he was General Secretary of the Liberal Party. He was most kind and helpful and always ready to lend a helping hand to those of us who were not as well versed in the political field as he. Under pressure, he was one in a million, never losing his cool and steering the rest of us on the right course.

I remember on one occasion a meeting went on too long. The next day the same group was assembled to continue the meeting. After an hour, an alarm clock went off in a drawer. Senator Lafond, as chairman of the committee, said, "Gentlemen, the meeting is over," and he returned the clock to the drawer. The meeting the following day went smoothly and quickly.

As has already been mentioned, he served with distinction in the RCAF from 1940 to 1945 and was awarded the D.F.C.

Honourable senators will remember his devotion to his work here in the Senate as Liberal caucus chairman, as a member of various committees and as chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence. The excellent reports of that committee were due in no small part to his dedication and tenacity.

I will long remember him. With his passing, Canada has lost a distinguished son and I a great and dear friend. To his wife, Stella, and his sisters I extend my most heartfelt sympathy in their sad loss.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, most of the things we think of in connection with Paul Lafond's life in the Senate have been said, and very appropriately said, but I would not like the day to pass without adding a few comments of my own.

To begin with, I did not know him—as I am sure the great majority of you did—when he was carrying out his work as an active member of a political party, but I did know him extremely well in committee work here. He and I were both members of the Canada-United States Parliamentary Group which studied Canada-U.S. relations. We also worked together on the Special Committee on National Defence from its inception.

There are one or two points that have already been made but could still be emphasized. One was his extreme modesty. His modesty did not prevent him from being able to lead. I am thinking at the moment of his chairmanship of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence. He showed all the qualities of leadership in a very quiet way and without any force or obvious effort. We all followed him cheerfully and he got extraordinarily good results. He earned the respect not only of the members of the committee but he also earned the great respect of the members of the armed forces. His reports had considerable influence on the trends developing in national defence.

A second thing we should remember is that under previous governments the Canadian Forces had been let slide to a far less respectable level over the recent years before the Special Senate Committee on National Defence was established. The strength of the armed forces had been greatly reduced and the equipment was obsolescent or obsolete. In fact, the Canadian Forces were suffering badly.

In spite of this, in travelling around the country with the committee, one of the constant surprises to us was the fact that we were fortunate to be able to attract the finest Canadian men and women to the armed forces. Whenever the committee travelled, we met hundreds of members of the armed forces. In our discussions, we expressed quite often our great pleasure to see the extremely high quality of young Canadians who joined the armed forces.

A third point is that, of his own choice, Paul Lafond chose to sit with our independent group. I will not say that he was unencumbered with political loyalty, because he was a Liberal, but I will say that he wanted to sit with us and to be his own master in the matter of his decisions on the issues in the Senate.

Finally, I should like to say that he was, undoubtedly, a very, very good friend. He never carried his feelings on his sleeve; it was never too obvious what he was thinking, but he was a reliable, constant and warm friend we were lucky to have. He will be greatly missed in the chamber; he will be very greatly missed in the nation; and he will certainly be sadly missed by all of us here who were his friends.

I would like to add my word to the expressions of sympathy and condolence that we are sending to Stella, his wife, and his sisters on his death.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to join in the very well deserved tributes paid this afternoon to our colleague Paul Lafond.

Although we met through politics, I wish to speak now as a friend. My first dealings with Paul go back to the time when I was active in politics in Manitoba myself and he was a party worker. As in any organization, there were chairmen, former colleagues here, Senator Connolly, Senator Stanbury who is still with us, but in fact, the one we worked with was Paul Lafond. When we had to make a contact in Ottawa, Paul Lafond represented the Liberal Party in Ottawa for us.

As Senator Murray pointed out, the Honourable Paul Lafond and I later entered this Chamber on the same day, as it happened, in October 1970. Afterward, we worked together very often. That was how I could admire Paul Lafond's talent, such a calm man, who never got angry but was always at work, always on time for committees and totally reliable and always good-humoured. He was a man of keen intelligence and great spiritual depth. We have all lost a great man today. I wish to express my most sincere condolences to his wife Stella and his whole family.

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I wish to join with those who have already spoken in tribute to the memory of the late Senator Paul Lafond. Like Senator Molgat, I would like to speak briefly of Senator Lafond as a friend.

I will say at the outset that if Paul were here today he would be dreadfully embarrassed by all the fine things being said about him. He was a self-effacing man. Our acquaintanceship began more than 35 years ago, when Paul was general secretary of the party here in Ottawa and I held a similar office in the province of New Brunswick. He had some experience, while I was very green upon entering the field. He was of tremendous assistance to me. We did have something in common to begin with—we were both five-year veterans of the RCAF.

Honourable senators, I should say that our acquaintanceship of those early days soon blossomed into a relationship of mutual respect and solid friendship. Although we did not always agree on all issues, our friendship matured and strengthened over all those years and was one that I cherished greatly.

Some senators will recall that the idea of a separate committee on defence was first proposed by another great friend of Paul Lafond's, the late Senator Hamilton "Hammy" McDonald, who worked towards that end for some years here and was unable to see it accomplished. But Paul Lafond picked up that torch and often gave credit to "Hammy" McDonald for originating the idea. However, as has been said, Senator Lafond performed as chairman of that committee and gave leadership of a style and substance that could be equalled by very few.

Senator Lafond was a person of courage, integrity and great principle. As a senator he was dedicated, effective and could be termed in every way a full working senator.

I join with others in expressing condolences to Stella and to the other members of the family. I would like to add that there is one other of our acquaintances who should also have our condolences today, and that is the former Clerk of the Senate, Robert Fortier. He was a lifetime friend of Paul Lafond and is suffering his loss very deeply. I should tell honourable senators that during Paul Lafond's illness it was Robert Fortier who attended as often as possible to his personal needs and who proved of such tremendous assistance to Stella. A man whom we know and respect, Robert Fortier, is hurting today as few others are.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, for Hon. Dan Hays, chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 31, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

In compliance with the Order of Reference of Thursday, May 19, 1988, your Committee has heard a good overview of the drought conditions in Western Canada by the Minister of Agriculture and his officials.

Your Committee, recognizing the serious nature of the drought and its damage to Canadian livestock producers, recommends that prompt action be taken by the federal government to provide relief in the form of:

1. transportation assistance to pay a portion of the costs of transporting forage to drought-affected areas;
2. transportation assistance to pay a portion of the costs of moving livestock to and from any available grazing areas; and
3. transportation assistance to pay a portion of the costs of transporting water to areas affected by the drought.

The extent of federal transportation assistance should be at least equal to that under the 1980-81 Herd Maintenance Assistance Program and should be determined in conjunction with the provincial governments.

Further, your Committee recommends that

4. a special deferred income tax arrangement be implemented. This arrangement would allow livestock producers to sell their livestock inventory and then to repurchase the same dollar amount of inventory, within a reasonable time frame, with special tax treatment. The sale proceeds from livestock inventory sold due to drought conditions would be considered as taxable income in the year in which the livestock inventory is repurchased.

Your Committee recommends that the federal government give urgent consideration to such initiatives.

Respectfully submitted,

E.W. BAROOTES
for
DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Barootes, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

I do so in the absence of the chairman of the committee, Senator Sinclair.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 31, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, your Committee recommends that Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by striking out paragraph (g) and substituting the following:

"(g) The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of fifteen members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is authorized on its own initiative to consider all matters of a financial or administrative nature relating to the internal management of the Senate."

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 31, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Proposals from several organizations requesting the establishment of a standing committee on the environment were referred to your Committee for consideration.

Your Committee examined the proposals and, in the process, reviewed the responsibilities of the present committees in the Senate.

While environmental affairs are under the specific jurisdiction of the Standing Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, it is the opinion of your Committee that the Rules of the Senate of Canada are flexible enough to permit the following committees to investigate environmental matters namely, the Standing Committees on Foreign Affairs; Transport and Communications; Social Affairs, Science and Technology; Agriculture and Forestry; and Fisheries.

Your Committee acknowledges that environmental quality is a very important subject. It has concluded however that, in view of the present number of standing, special and joint committees, it is not feasible to create an additional standing committee at this time.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit at seven o'clock in the evening today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

If I have leave, and if honourable senators wish, I will give a brief explanation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: This meeting had been set up for some time before it was contemplated or known that the Senate would be sitting for special purposes as a Committee of the Whole at six o'clock this evening. Since the committee has a former Deputy Minister of National Defence coming before it, and since we have put him off for other reasons on at least one previous occasion, I am loathe to do so again. Therefore, I would like permission to sit at seven o'clock this evening to hear this witness.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Hicks is aware that it was his deputy leader who proposed that the Senate deal with the Emergencies Bill in Committee of the Whole rather than having it referred to the Special Committee on National Defence. I find it rather strange that the Defence Committee would want to meet at the same time as the Committee of the Whole is sitting.

I suggest to Senator Hicks that we follow the procedure as laid out by his deputy leader last week. He was insistent that the Scroll be followed very closely, and I think we should do that this week.

Senator Hicks: I should like to reply to the Honourable Senator Phillips. It is not a question of the Special Committee on National Defence having decided that it wanted to sit when the Senate was sitting. We chose a time. In the 16 years that I have been in this chamber, I cannot recall the Senate's having a special sitting commencing at six o'clock in the evening. The Special Committee on National Defence has had great difficulty in arranging meeting times. We have had enough trouble accommodating our witnesses. This is a former deputy minister whose evidence we are anxious to hear. It will be difficult for us to rearrange this meeting.

More importantly, let me point out that the mandate of this committee expires in mid-December of this year. We have attempted to follow a schedule that would have enabled us to complete the taking of evidence before the end of May. We are now running up to June 22, because the Minister of National Defence, for whom we set aside a special meeting, was not able to come to that meeting. The next date that he could give us was June 22.

We are going to have little enough time to meet our deadlines, and I am reluctant to dispense with a hearing even though I acknowledge the importance of the Committee of the Whole. May I point out, however, that that meeting starts at six o'clock. We will all have an opportunity to hear the submission that the Minister of National Defence makes in this chamber before we go to the Committee on National Defence for its own meeting.

I hope that the house will give permission. But since I do not think this is a matter of life or death, I will quite cheerfully abide by the wishes of honourable senators.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I feel I want to follow the wishes of the Honourable Senator Frith.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to say a word regarding the six o'clock meeting time, which is not only unusual but is unique. As I understand it, the time was worked out between the sponsor of the bill and the minister's office. It was a time that appeared to be convenient for these people. In discussing it with my opposite number across the way, we agreed that an afternoon or evening session would be acceptable to the Senate. However, it seems that we have managed to come up with a sitting time that is neither afternoon nor evening. To that extent, I apologize to the Senate. I can only say that the decision was not mine but was arrived at in a most circuitous way; nevertheless, I take the responsibility for it.

I have taken the liberty of asking the Senate staff to provide us with a variety of food, which will be available in the Reading Room prior to six o'clock. In some small way, this may make up for the inconvenience of not having access to the restaurant, which does not open until 6 p.m.

With regard to the meeting of the Special Committee on National Defence, it would be a nice gesture if the committee members could be here when the Minister of National Defence is appearing before us, since obviously his concerns and views should be the concerns and views of the committee. There need not necessarily be a conflict here: The Committee of the Whole sits at 6 o'clock; Senator Hicks is talking about 7 o'clock. It may well be that we will be through by that time. However, I suspect that that is not so. This is a matter of great concern to many senators, and I expect that the minister and his support staff may be expected to stay longer than that. In any event, that is the situation as it now is, and I offer it to the Senate.

• (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have a motion. Does Senator Hicks wish to amend his motion to say, "after the Committee of the Whole has sat"—and in the event that it lasts too long, he will cancel it?

Senator Hicks: If we delay the sitting until after the Senate rises, we do not need any special permission. I would like to see the opinion of honourable senators taken on the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is a motion by the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a)—

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Leave is not granted!

The Hon. the Speaker:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit—

Senator Flynn: Leave is not granted!

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted? Leave was granted earlier.

Senator Hicks: Leave was granted earlier.

Senator Bélisle: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes; leave was granted earlier.

Senator Hicks: Leave was granted earlier. Before I made my statement, I said, "If leave is granted, and if honourable senators wish, I will make an explanatory statement." Leave was granted, and I proceeded to make my explanatory statement.

Senator Phillips: But the Chair did not call for leave. Therefore, I had no opportunity to comment.

Senator Hicks: Well, surely the honourable senator means that he did not take advantage of the opportunity that he had.

Senator Phillips: No; I respect the Chair. It is the Chair's duty to ask for leave and it did not.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will put the motion to the—

Senator Phillips: No, you cannot!

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat—

Senator Phillips: You cannot do that!

The Hon. the Speaker: —with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit at 7 o'clock in the evening today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator MacEachen: Adopt the motion!

Senator Phillips: Has the Chair asked for leave?

The Hon. the Speaker: Well, I did ask for leave after Senator Hicks put the motion, and leave was granted.

Senator Phillips: Leave was not granted!

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it is a strange situation when an explanation is offered after leave, theoretically, has been granted. If leave has been granted, you do not really need an explanation, do you? If you have leave, then that is all there is to it.

My understanding was that Senator Phillips wanted to hear the reasons for this unusual meeting time and then wished to make up his mind whether or not to grant leave. Having heard the explanation, he has decided that he does not want to grant leave, and that is the end of the matter.

Senator Hicks: With respect, honourable senators, I do not think that is right. Surely, the request for leave has to do with dispensing with notice; that is all. The leave was granted to dispense with notice, and I then made the motion. If honourable senators do not want to grant the motion, then they vote it down; it is as simple as that.

As I have said, I do not think that this is a matter of life or death—I will be quite cheerful whatever the outcome is—but I would like to test the views of honourable senators.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I would point out that the normal procedure followed in this chamber is for the Speaker to rise and ask if leave is granted. I do not believe that procedure was followed. Therefore, there was no opportunity to refuse leave.

Senator Hicks: But you were not refusing leave for me to make the motion now. You gave me leave to make the motion now, thus dispensing with the notice. That is what the leave amounted to! You now do not like the substance of the motion that I made, or you do not like the explanation that I gave in support of it. That is quite understandable to me. You must simply vote the motion down, then; that is all.

The Hon. the Speaker: My understanding, honourable senators, is that leave was granted. I asked if leave was granted. I agree with Senator Hicks that we can either vote down the motion or approve it.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator MacEachen: No.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion to adjourn the debate please say “yea”?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those contrary will please say “nay”.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must say that the “nays” have it.

Will honourable senators agree to dispense with the reading of the main motion again?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Doody: It is not entirely a pleasure.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the motion please say “yea.”

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the motion please say “nay.”

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

[Senator Hicks.]

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to, on division.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on 25th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, with all due respect, I should like to say that the remarks of the honourable chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs argue for the rejection of this bill. However, after arguing for the rejection of this bill, the honourable chairman, no doubt out of the kindness of her heart and wishing to be accommodating, recommends that we adopt it, and I should like to illustrate that. In her remarks on page 3495 of the Debates of the Senate, Senator Neiman said that the purpose of S-7 was to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei. She then pointed out that Opus Dei, in its request, describes itself as “a secular jurisdictional institution . . .”.

Senator Neiman went on to tell us that this institution was incorporated as a non-profit organization under Part III of the Quebec Companies Act and has operated in that way for some 30 years with no problems. Senator Neiman then continued, and I quote:

In 1982 the organization was constituted as a personal Prelature of the Church under the Church's Apostolic Constitution Ut Sit. The committee heard that it was that change in canon law regarding the status of Opus Dei that prompted it to apply for a change in its civil legal structure in Canada.

In the very next paragraph of her speech, the chairman pointed out that what the Senate was being asked to do was to grant a charter for a corporation sole, which has traditionally been a way of incorporating religious institutions. To that purpose, the Senate in the past has approved private bills to create corporations sole.

The chairman went on to tell the Senate that there were 20 precedents for this action and every single one of those precedents was to create episcopal corporations around a Catholic bishop and to incorporate offices of “equal stature” in other churches.

Honourable senators, it was quite clear from the evidence presented to the committee that the Regional Vicar does not have equivalent status with a bishop, because before the Regional Vicar can operate in a bishopric he must have the permission of the bishop. He is not, therefore, equal to the bishop since he has to ask for the bishop's permission to operate.

In other words, honourable senators, if we agreed to pass this bill, we would be creating a precedent that is different from the 20 previous precedents. We would be granting something which, so far, we have granted only to bishops or to people of equivalent stature, and this Regional Vicar does not have equivalent stature.

In her remarks the chairman also said that we had imposed some fairly stringent disclosure requirements in the bill. However, according to testimony given before the committee as to how Opus Dei operated before its incorporation, these disclosure requirements are obviously meaningless, because Opus Dei has operated, so far, with the help of numbered corporations into which various individuals or organizations—we don't know which—have deposited money which Opus Dei has used. If Opus Dei continues to operate in this way, drawing the majority of its funds or of its facilities from numbered corporations—not as a transfer to itself but with the right to use funds through the various numbered corporations, then the disclosure procedures and requirements we have proposed will, in effect, disclose nothing very much. Therefore, these procedures we have proposed would be meaningless.

We were also told by the chairman in her remarks that the argument advanced by the petitioner as to why the corporation sole was needed, namely, to conform to the requirements of canon law, was not regarded as persuasive. Let me say at this time that it is in fact the only argument, because they have been able to operate without being incorporated by the Senate. Before being proclaimed a prelature under canon law in 1982, this organization operated under the Quebec Companies Act, and since then it has operated without any obstacle or difficulty.

Honourable senators, I fail to see—and it was not obvious from any of the evidence given before the committee or from anything that the chairman herself said—in what way we would hamper the operations of Opus Dei or make them more difficult if we refused to grant this petition to allow for the incorporation of this organization as a corporation sole. Personally, I don't see what their problem is and therefore I don't see why we should give them a cure for or a solution to a non-existent problem.

Honourable senators, I quote again from the chairman's remarks to the Senate, at page 3496 of the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, May 26, 1988:

As I mentioned earlier, the 20 previous corporations sole created by private act related directly to religious institutions at the level of a bishopric. The Regional Vicar stated that his office was analogous—

—that is, not equal—

—to that of a bishop, although the petition stipulated that the institution is “secular.”

Honourable senators, a bishopric is not secular, and a secular institution cannot be analogous to a non-secular institution.

The chairman then went on to say:

The committee felt that the use of a corporation sole in this case might extend what has been until now a very limited use of this unusual legal device, and several members—myself included—

were uncomfortable with such an extension.

Honourable senators, what I am arguing is that we have 20 precedents, but these 20 precedents do not apply to this case.

Further on, the chairman said:

... the committee has instructed me to request the Senate to advise the government in the strongest possible terms to proceed as quickly as possible with new legislation respecting the incorporation of non-profit and religious organizations. Furthermore, in doing so, the government should consider very carefully whether there is any continuing justification for the type of corporation sole considered here.

In other words, the committee does not actually believe there is any justification for this kind of corporation sole. Opus Dei has been able to operate without being a corporation sole, so why should we create this corporation sole? If things have to change—and at some point in legislating or in logic one must stop somewhere, this is a good point to stop, because we are being asked to extend the scope of our legislation to grant equivalent status to something that is neither a bishopric nor of equal status with a bishopric.

● (1510)

Therefore, in view of the contradictory message that appears in what the chamber has received from its committee, which is to say, "We do not really like this, but do it all the same!", I urge honourable senators to send the bill back to the committee for reworking.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate last Thursday it was my understanding that an honourable senator on this side of the house wished to take part in the debate. I have ascertained that this is not so.

[Senator Gigantès.]

As I have no intention of taking part in the debate at this time, I would be perfectly happy if it were given second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Murray speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, naturally I regret that Senator MacEachen, the Leader of the Opposition, has decided not to participate in the debate on second reading. No doubt we will have the opportunity to hear from him either in the committee hearings or at third reading of the bill.

Senator MacEachen: Or in the hinterland.

Senator Murray: Or in the hinterland; that is possible.

I do know that a notice of motion has been placed by our colleague, Senator Graham, which, I presume, we will have an opportunity to discuss in a day or so, calling on the National Finance Committee to divide Bill C-103 into two bills. We greeted this notice of motion silently and without prejudice to our right to discuss its procedural acceptability when the matter is called as well as the merits, if any, of proceeding in this way.

I thank Senator Graham for his very thoughtful contribution to the debate the other day. If I may in a personal way, I extend thanks to him for one or two personal references he made in the course of his speech. It is very difficult for me to take an aggressive or adversarial position toward Senator Graham's speech, considering the fact that he has made such kind remarks about my late father in the course of it. Those remarks are appreciated by me and by my father's numerous progeny, to whom I shall send copies of Hansard, and, indeed, they would have been appreciated by my father, coming as they do from an honourable senator from whom he had a great deal of admiration and regard.

Honourable senators, with the exception of Senator Graham's comments on the Industrial Development Division of Devco—and I shall come to those in a few moments—Senator Graham did not really have very much to say in defence of the status quo. He said nothing to deny the need for a new approach to regional development in the Atlantic provinces, and he said nothing in contradiction of the facts that I had earlier set out or in disagreement with the analysis.

Although he did not say so, I take it that he does not disagree too strongly, at any rate, with my contention that the dismantling of DREE was one of the mistakes of the previous government and the creation of DRIE was an error in concept and a failure in operation. There was the inevitable and unfortunate confusion that resulted between regional development policy as such and industrial policy.

I also said in my opening remarks—and I heard no argument from Senator Graham or anybody else on this point—that the incentive programs in their design and operation had become excessively bureaucratized. Certainly that was the experience of the business community in the Atlantic provinces and it was the analysis that greeted the present government when we began to hold serious discussions in the region as to what should be done.

There is also a more long-standing criticism in the region that national programs are deficient in that so often they fail to take account of regional differences and regional needs. So very little has been said in the course of this debate in disagreement with the concept of ACOA, an agency located in the region, whose decisions will be made in the region, and which will be assisted by a public and private sector advisory board drawn from the region; an agency that has a strong mandate to coordinate federal economic development policies in the region, an advocacy role to pursue the interests of Atlantic Canada and unprecedented flexibility to design and carry out programs that are suited to this region.

After we get second reading of this bill, it shall be my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I look forward to testifying before that committee and to examining in detail with the members of the committee the provisions of the bill—the flexibility, the authority, the resources and the autonomy it provides to pursue the interests of economic development in the Atlantic provinces.

The minister has the authority to make regulations, to create new programs, to co-finance national programs with other departments and to create areas of special opportunity within the region. I look forward to discussing the implications of all this with members of the committee when I appear before them.

Meanwhile, one or two points made by Senator Graham, I believe, require some comment from me now. He expressed his concern "...that ACOA's annual budget of $200 million represents not new, additional money, as is claimed, but, instead, a ceiling on regional development funding in Atlantic Canada." I thought that "old money" and "new money" arguments had been laid to rest some months ago, but since they have arisen again let me make a few comments for the record.

The Prime Minister's commitment on June 6 last year was that the $200 million per year allocated to ACOA over the succeeding five years would be over and above the ongoing expenditures on regional development in the Atlantic provinces. I took that to mean—and it does mean—that this $200 million per year is over and above federal spending on the business incentive programs that were in place last June—that is, the IRDP, the Atlantic Enterprise Program, Enterprise Cape Breton and so forth.

Thus, the honourable senator will find in the 1988-89 estimates that the figure for ACOA is not $200 million but, if my memory serves me correctly, $306 million, which reflects the fact that ACOA has inherited some of these business incentive programs that were in place.

The commitment for an additional $200 million for ACOA to spend on regional development would be over and above federal spending on the economic and regional development agreements, the ERDAs, with the Atlantic provinces. I should state here that there is perhaps $1.5 billion, in ballpark figures, in federal money now in force in the various ERDA subagreements and related agreements in the Atlantic provinces. ERDA's spending is continuing. A number of ERDA subagreements expired at the end of March 1988. Some new agreements will be put in their place; these, for the most part, have been negotiated and I and my colleagues will be announcing them in the next little while. The vast majority of the ERDA subagreements now in force will expire at the end of the present fiscal year, that is, at the end of March 1989, and as the minister responsible for ERDA in the region, I have begun a process of discussion and negotiation with the premiers of those provinces that will lead to new federal-provincial economic development agreements.

Therefore, the $200 million given to ACOA is over and above the business incentive programs and it is over and above the federal-provincial ERDA agreements. The $200 million a year is also over and above that part of the spending of federal line departments and agencies that might be described as regional development—the Ministry of Transport; the Department of Fisheries and Oceans; the Department of Employment and Immigration; DRIE itself, and its successor with its sectoral expenditures and its assistance to projects where the eligible costs are more than $20 million. All of those line departments continue their spending, and at least some of their spending can be described as regional development spending.

In brief, the $200 million per year allocated to ACOA for new programs, largely to foster entrepreneurship, to encourage small and medium-sized business, is not, as the honourable senator fears, a ceiling but is an add-on to the total regional development spending, which, far from declining, is increasing in the Atlantic provinces.

The honourable senator also mentioned the IRDP. As he points out, that business incentive program sunsets—if one can use the word "sunset" as a verb—on June 30. I should point out, however, that the ACOA Action Program, featuring incentives to business and business-related activities, which I announced on February 15, has effectively replaced the IRDP in the Atlantic region. The ACOA Action Program has increased the eligible sectors. It has increased the kinds of assistance available to business and business-related activities and it has increased our flexibility to apply the program.

Senator Graham also criticized the fact that Bill C-103 does not contain a commitment to the provision of what he calls "basic infrastructure." Honourable senators, it is true that the emphasis of ACOA is on strengthening the private sector, on encouraging small and medium-sized enterprise and on increasing jobs and incomes in the Atlantic region. The emphasis will be on entrepreneurship, on innovation, on technology, on competitiveness and on productivity. I do not disagree with Senator Graham's statements about the importance of infrastructure, but that is not principally what ACOA and Bill C-103 are all about.

I do note, as he knows, that considerable sums have been spent by the federal government in the past 30 years on infrastructure. More will be spent. The infrastructure projects are, as he knows, largely within provincial jurisdiction, and the appropriate vehicle for these is a federal-provincial agreement such as an ERDA subagreement. As I have indicated, there are a number of ERDAs now in place in the four provinces and under some of these expenditures are made on various kinds of infrastructure, and that will continue to be the case.

Honourable senators, let me say a word about ACOA and about the action program that I announced on February 15, which will be considerably supplemented when this bill passes Parliament. The action program is a consolidation of the existing programs, particularly IRDP and the Atlantic Enterprise Program. It has increased assistance and provides it to a broader range of business and business-related activities; so we are helping not only commercial operations but non-commercial operations that provide support and services to business.

As an indication of the interest the program has solicited in the region, I should tell the honourable senator and others that from February 15 to May 13 over 2,000 applications were received by the agency under this program. Two hundred have been withdrawn or rejected and 492 have been approved, for a total authorized contribution of $48.1 million, making possible business investment in the region of over $166 million.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, what these investments involve is the creation of over 1,700 jobs—new jobs—in the Atlantic region and the maintenance of over 1,600 jobs.

As an indication of the interest in this program, during the month of April alone 865 new applications were received by ACOA compared to 85 applications received the previous year under the old IRDP and AEP programs.

From May 2 to May 6—just one week—ACOA received 200 new applications. We are now dealing with ten times the number of applications compared to the number that DRIE had to deal with a year or more ago. I was told the other day that as of May 20 there were 1,735 active applications in process. So, honourable senators, there is a great deal of interest on the part of the private sector in the Atlantic region. It is obvious to us that ACOA and the ACOA program is meeting the need there.

I want to pause just for a moment on those statistics. We had projected that we would be dealing with something in the order of four times the number of applications that our predecessors had dealt with; it turns out, as I said, that we are dealing with ten times the number. We pledged to improve the turn-around time in dealing with these applications, and we have kept our word. We have delegated authorities and done everything possible to honour that commitment; but I must appeal to the private sector and others for their understanding and patience. The response to this program has been far in excess of anything we had imagined. The staff are doing a

[Senator Murray.]

Herculean job in dealing with these applications, and their tremendous commitment to the success of this agency is preserving our credibility with the private sector, which is making applications in such unprecedented numbers; but we have to staff up in the next little while to deal with this vastly increased rate of applications from the private sector.

I don't know whether, when the time comes, Senator Graham intends to debate the motion of which he gave us notice today, but I suppose we can deal with the merits of it at that time if it is procedurally acceptable. However, I should, for the record, make a few comments in response to what he had to say about the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the proposed creation of the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

First of all, I think I should state for the record that it was the Donald report of the 1960s that led to the creation of Devco. That report had, in fact, recommended two crown corporations, as the honourable the Leader of the Opposition will recall. It had recommended one crown corporation to run the coal mines and one to promote industrial development. The government of the day decided otherwise. It decided to create one crown corporation, Devco, with a Coal Division and an Industrial Development Division, but essentially they have operated as separate bodies.

I am not sure whether Senator Graham would agree with that assessment. Indeed, at one point in his remarks he stated that they had operated as one, certainly with a single mandate, but my attention was drawn to an article, originally written in 1974 and updated in the 1980s, in a publication of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, by Roy George, which states:

Although Parliament had set up a single Crown corporation to cover both mining and industrial development, contrary to Donald's advice, it prescribed that DEVCO should operate in some respects as if it were two organizations. The act directed that there should be two divisions: the "Coal Division" to be responsible for coal mining operations, and the "Industrial Development Division" to stimulate the non-mining sector of the Cape Breton economy. Each was to have its own vice-president, its own budgets (to be approved by the government), its own set of financial statements, and its own grants from government, and no financial switching between the two divisions was to take place.

Further in the same article, Mr. George states:

Parliament created DEVCO as a monster with two bodies joined to a single head. Each was to have its own vice-president, keep its own accounts, and receive separate votes of money. This arrangement was Parliament's way of compromising between the forces that wanted, like Donald, two separate organizations (Robert Stanfield, then Premier of Nova Scotia, was in this camp), and those who wanted one organization (an arrangement supported by the United Mine Workers, among others).

It was a strange arrangement and promised administrative friction and inefficiency. The situation was made worse because the accommodation initially available to DEVCO made a geographical split of the two divisions unavoidable; and since its life was expected to be limited, and it was reluctant to be seen to be squandering funds on building accommodation for itself, DEVCO did nothing to bring the two divisions together. Apart from having a common board and president, there has been little contact between the two divisions. Attempts have been made in the past to reduce this gap, and a very determined effort seems at present to be underway, but the gap between the two divisions remains. Almost certainly, this has mitigated against efficient administration (each division for instance has had its own accounting organization), though how serious this has been is difficult to assess.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Could the minister identify Mr. George? I just do not know who the person is.

Hon. Henry Hicks: He is a Professor of Economics at Dalhousie University—

Senator Murray: I would add, “a respected Professor of Economics at Dalhousie University.”

Senator Hicks: —and Dean of the Faculty of Administrative Studies.

Senator Murray: And, as Senator Hicks says, the Dean of the Faculty of Administrative Studies.

The article I have quoted appeared in a publication entitled “Public Corporations and Public Policy in Canada”, Tupper and Dern. As I said, the original article was written in 1974, but it was updated sometime during the 1980s.

Senator Stewart: Can you provide copies?

Senator Murray: I can either photocopy this or obtain a copy of the book from the Library of Parliament or the IRPP.

Senator MacEachen: He is way off the mark, no matter where he is from.

Senator Murray: The honourable the Leader of the Opposition will have an opportunity to contradict, if he can, the statements made by Professor George.

Senator MacEachen: I shall!

Senator Murray: There are one or two more of them I should like to place on the record before I take my seat.

Senator McElman: Call him as a witness!

Senator Murray: Essentially, he says they operated as separate bodies. I must say that, listening to Senator Graham, I could not help but ask the question: What has the Industrial Development Division of Devco done under the Devco roof that it could not have done as a separate crown corporation? Indeed, what has it done under the Devco roof that it has been unable to do under this bill as the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation? Contrary to what Senator Graham has said, there is nothing to prevent the new ECBC from becoming involved in downstream coal and coal-related activities, such as carbogel. The new ECBC may not get into the production of coal or into the coal mining business—that activity is reserved for the Cape Breton Development Corporation—but there is nothing to prevent its getting into downstream activities, and I hope it does encourage those kinds of resource-based activities.

Honourable senators, I do not for one moment deny the contribution that the Industrial Development Division of Devco has made and I appreciate the obvious support of confidence that this division enjoys among its clientele. I appreciate what the honourable senator and others have said about its sense of social responsibility. But social responsibility is not something that is legislated. Social responsibility is a function of the people who are setting the policy, sitting on the board and running the management of an organization. The honourable senator has no reason to believe that there will be any less sense of social responsibility under the new dispensation than there was under the old.

Like any similar organization, Devco and the IDD have had mixed reviews. Professor George, if I may come back to him, identified four phases in Devco's approach to industrial development. He took the periods from 1967 to 1971, from 1972 to 1976, from 1977 to 1979 and then from 1980 onwards. The last three periods, he says, differ only in their emphasis and really could be seen as subdivisions of one major change. To summarize, Professor George says that Phase I:

... must be judged a woeful failure. The corporation would certainly like to forget it.

As for Phase II and most of Phase III, he says:

... the current achievement in terms of “steady” full-time jobs, or their summation in part-time equivalents, is under one thousand but probably not far short of it.

He adds:

This is small compared with the hopes held by many people when DEVCO was established.

In this article I noted the following conclusion by Professor George, and I want to put this on the record because Professor George does give quite a balanced assessment of the record of Devco and of the Industrial Development Division. In reference to Devco, he says:

By 1973, it had come close to the targets set for it in respect of the size of the mining industry, employment having been approximately halved and output reduced to about one third or one quarter.

Senator MacEachen: It had no target.

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition says that it had no target—

Senator MacEachen: That is right.

Senator Murray: —but I suggest to him that there was certainly a target in the Donald report. I have the recollection—and perhaps it is faulty and the honourable senator can correct me if I am wrong—that the government of the day did establish some target as to the reduction of employment in the coal industry. Well, we shall see. Continuing with the conclusion contained in Professor George's article, he states:

It was therefore left with a small industry, but it was also an inefficient and high-cost one. Attempts to provide alternative employment for Cape Bretoners had come to nothing, the industrial firms that had been enticed into the Island with all the money Devco possessed having died without trace.

Then the corporation got its act together. Aided by favourable markets for coal, it built up a mechanized industry with high efficiency measured in terms of output per man-shift, though it is still a high-cost operation, far from providing a commercial return on capital. And its industrial development programme, though not yielding the result originally expected of it (at least in part because those expectations were unrealistic), has caused the start-up of small, grass-roots activities that may build up to something worthwhile in the future and restore the long-lost confidence of Cape Bretoners.

Later, in the same article, he says:

The corporation can certainly take some credit for the enviable position it is now in. Though it has not led Cape Breton "to an era of progress" as Donald thought possible if the government supported his recommendations, its achievements in coal seem quite good compared with what the public expects from a public organization. Since 1971, its industrial promotion activities have been imaginative and consistent with the spirit of the local community, and it has avoided the disasters to which Canadian public industrial promotion agencies seem to be prone.

That, as I say, is quite a balanced assessment of the work of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and of the Industrial Development Division, in particular, and I commend it to honourable senators for their reading.

I think I should also point out that the concept of separating the Industrial Development Division from the Coal Division originated not in Ottawa but in Cape Breton. I refer honourable senators to the report dated September 1985 of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee, chaired by Dr. Teresa MacNeil, who is now the chairperson and acting president of Devco. First, that advisory committee noted that one of the problems in Cape Breton was the barrier to the development caused by the confusion of the multiplicity of the development agencies. The advisory committee recommended, first, the establishment of a new development agency, Enterprise Cape Breton, independent in matters of policy, management and operations from the coal side of the corporation, Devco. The committee recommended, second, that the ECB should become a one-stop shop to the degree possible by encompassing the Industrial Development Division of Devco and DRIE.

In the event, honourable senators will be aware that at the time it would have taken legislation to create the crown corporation. The government was faced with the duty of closing the heavy water plants, as well as the problems posed by other economic reverses in the area, and wanted to act swiftly, so it was decided by cabinet order to create Enterprise Cape Breton as an agency of DRIE, to transfer to it various DRIE and DRIE-delivered programs and to make it the focus of economic development in Cape Breton.

I should say that Enterprise Cape Breton has been a successful agency. A good bit of the business it has done has been attracted to Cape Breton by the existence of the investment tax credit and other incentives. Indeed, the richest incentives that are available anywhere in Canada are available in Cape Breton. From June 6, 1987, to the end of April of this year Enterprise Cape Breton had approved 120 projects for an authorized contribution of over $51 million—and this to make possible business investment in the Enterprise Cape Breton area of over $153 million and involving the creation of more than 900 jobs. Again, the interest continues to be at a high level on the part of the private sector. In the month of April alone there were 79 new applications. The agency has some 124 applications now in process.

• (1550)

With the creation of ACOA, Enterprise Cape Breton was transferred to us from DRIE. To the government, it seems only logical that we should bring the Industrial Development Division of Devco, which is an organization involved in regional development, into the ACOA family as well.

I emphasize that IDD, which will be continued as Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, is coming with its powers, its resources, its programming, its flexibility intact and its role in Cape Breton very well understood. We are seeking to rationalize the roles of Enterprise Cape Breton, the present agency, and the Industrial Development Division of Devco, which will be known as Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. It has had, and will continue to have, powers that no other agency has. We seek to eliminate overlaps; to facilitate "one-stop shopping," as recommended in the report of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee; to improve services to Cape Bretoners; and to make federal economic development activities on Cape Breton Island more efficient and effective.

I repeat that nothing is being lost. I think it is possible for a great deal to be gained under this dispensation. The Honourable Senator Graham seems to fear the fact that the minister—I presume not this minister but a hypothetical future minister—might abuse his authority to direct the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. The fact of the matter is that the Governor in Council has always had, under the terms of the Financial Administration Act, the power of direction of Devco.

Becoming part of the ACOA family will enable the IDD, as Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, to exert a greater influence over government policies as they relate to Cape Breton. That is certainly my intention, and I believe that that intention can be better realized through this reorganization.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I believe firmly that Senator Graham and others will see that this is a positive step for Cape Breton. I ask for their cooperation and support in ensuring that the reorganization of the federal economic development effort in Cape Breton pays dividends in terms of increased economic activity, increased employment and increased earned incomes in Cape Breton. That is the purpose of ACOA; it is the purpose of this legislation as it applies not only to Cape Breton but to the entire Atlantic region. I ask honourable senators for their support of this bill at second reading and I look forward to discussing it in more detail when I appear as a witness before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. I share his enthusiasm for ACOA. I hope, as he does, that it will be highly successful in its activities in the Atlantic provinces.

I notice in the media that there still appears to be a great misunderstanding in the Atlantic area, particularly with municipalities. The misunderstanding is that this is to be an agency that will involve infrastructure. My understanding is that it will not; that it is for industrial development. Is that correct?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the main thrust of the agency is to encourage the growth of the private sector in the Atlantic region, to encourage entrepreneurship, small and medium-sized business productivity, competitiveness, and so forth. The means at hand for assisting with various forms of infrastructure—highway construction, for example—is the use of federal-provincial ERDA agreements. It so happens that they also come under our responsibility. As the honourable senator knows, there are a number of such agreements now in force. We will, no doubt, negotiate others in the future.

The distinction I wish to make is between those federal-provincial agreements, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the funds that have been allocated to ACOA with the express purpose of strengthening the private sector in the region.

Senator McElman: I am sure the Unions of Municipalities in each of the four provinces are apprised of the mandate and the terms of reference for giving assistance. In order to avoid, as has often been the case, misunderstanding, and indeed recrimination, particularly at the municipal level, may I suggest that more attention be given to emphasizing the purpose of this agency? It is in the interests of the area and of all of us that there be a good understanding, which does not yet appear to have gotten through in the Atlantic area.

This is merely a suggestion that I hope the minister will find acceptable.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point made by Senator McElman. I have had occasion to meet and talk with several of the municipal leaders in the Atlantic region. I agree that a much more effective communications program needs to be undertaken in order to acquaint them and others who are interested and concerned with the precise mandate of this new agency.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Murray, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill C-127, An Act to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.—(Honourable Senator Graham).

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, Bill C-127 is a very brief bill designed to amend section 19(2) of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act in order to raise the limit of the amounts of working capital that the government may advance to Devco. Under the bill's provisions, the existing limit of $25 million would be raised to $50 million or to such other amount as may be established by an Appropriation Act or other act of Parliament. I thank Senator Phillips for his introduction to this legislation.

The reasons for an increase in the limit on government advances to the corporation are not difficult to see. In fact, such an increase is arguably long overdue. The present limit has been in force since 1975. Inflation alone has more than halved its value over the intervening period.

As I mentioned in speaking to Bill C-103 in the Senate last week, the size and operations of Devco have grown quite dramatically over these years. To illustrate this fact, it is worthy of note that the assets of the Coal Division at the end of fiscal year 1975-76 were $108 million, and with the completion of the new Phalen Colliery those assets would be valued at close to $600 million. Coal sales have gone from approximately $50 million in the mid-1970s to an estimated $200 million in 1988.

• (1600)

Much tribute must be paid to the coal miners and management. Productivity in coal mining grew from 2.5 tonnes per man-shift in 1967-78 to 6.8 tonnes in 1986-87. At the same time preliminary estimates show that the Coal Division's operating losses in fiscal year 1987-88 were under $2 million and projections are that in the current year Devco will achieve an operating profit.

Currently the corporation is promoting the commercialization of technologies, such as circulating fluidized-bed processes, which make possible the clean burning of high-sulphur coal. Adoption of such technologies hopefully will open new opportunities for Devco and possibly enable it to reduce its heavy reliance on traditional markets.

Larger operations entail higher inventory levels, which, in turn, apply a need for higher levels of working capital. Moreover, in light of the possibility of unforeseen future requirements—given the nature of coal production and distribution and international market conditions—the provision in the bill to add some flexibility to the limit on capital advances by allowing the limit to be raised through parliamentary appropriations is a sensible one. Allocating funds through an appropriation vote is simpler and more direct than having to amend Devco's act every time the corporation's working capital requirements exceed the legislated limit.

Much has been said about the original mandate of Devco with respect to future coal developments on Cape Breton Island. As I recall, targets were never set with respect to either the reduction or the expansion of the work force or coal production. Indeed, those recommendations were left largely to the board of directors and the management of Devco.

As an example in this respect, I refer to the House of Commons Debates of June 15, 1967, at page 1553, at the time when then Minister Pepin was introducing the legislation covering the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I read from that page as follows. He said:

On December 29, 1966, the government . . . following careful consideration of the Donald report and its recommendations, the receipt of views of interested persons and organizations, and discussions with the government of Nova Scotia, announced in consort with Nova Scotia certain basic points of policy. The Minister of National Health and Welfare—

who was Mr. Allan J. MacEachen—

and I went down to the area to listen to the views of the people. We have received many views since then, just as other ministers had received many views before. As I say, on December 29 in consort with Nova Scotia we announced certain basic points of policy. May I spell them out?

I will refer to just one of those basic points, Point 10. He was referring to the possibility of a new mine opening, which had been discussed both in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and by those who were interested in this particular problem. It states:

The opening of a new mine at Lingan has been a matter of much controversy. In view of the government undertaking of October, 1965 and of Doctor Donald's strong recommendation against it, the government agreed to allocate sufficient money to fulfil its own commitment but to leave to the crown corporation the decision as to how these sums can best be used in the interests of the community.

Devco has been in operation for 20 years. As was stated in the brief by the corporation to the legislative committee on Bill C-103 in Port Hawkesbury on March 8 of this year:

Through its successes and its failures it has developed substantial institutional experience and has become very much part of the fabric of Cape Breton.

Devco's development mission has been difficult, and clearly much more needs to be done. Economic conditions in Cape Breton remain hard and the Island's development lags far behind that of the rest of the country. The labour force participation rate in Cape Breton last year averaged 54.7 per cent compared to 66.2 per cent for the country as a whole, reflecting the lack of adequate employment opportunities on the Island. Cape Breton's unemployment rate for April of this year was 17.5 per cent—more than twice the national average. The incomes of Cape Bretoners remain at less than four-fifths the national average. Devco's expanding operations are vital to the future development of that part of Canada.

It is important, therefore, that Devco's growth and competitiveness not be hobbled for lack of working capital. To this end, the bill's proposal to increase the limit on advances of working capital to Devco deserves to be supported.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move that Bill C-127 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin—

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, would it not be compatible to send it to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, in view of the fact that we have just sent the earlier bill there?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I would have no objection to the suggestion made by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, but my understanding of the rules is that this is a corporate matter. Therefore, it would normally go to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. However, I would be quite happy to have it go to the National Finance Committee if that is the wish of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the honourable senator wish to send it to the National Finance Committee or the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

RAILWAY SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-105, An Act to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Turner).

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, today I am in a charitable mood, and I wish to help out my good friend, Senator Doody, and get this bill, Bill C-105, out of the barn and on the rails—especially on the narrow gauge rails in his beloved province of Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I wish to commend Senator Spivak for introducing Bill C-105, which, hopefully, ensures the safe operation of railways and amends certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Well, honourable senators, as far as it goes, Bill C-105 is a poor excuse for the type of legislation that the railway worker sincerely believed was in the mill. But, as my friends in the industry tell me, it is better than nothing. On Sunday I received a few phone calls and the comment I heard on the telephone was, "What else can we expect from this government?" The morale of the CNR employee is, once again, going down the tube. Three slices of bread may be better than the whole loaf at this time. This is the way the employees of the CN and CP are looking at this bill.

Mr. E.G. Abbot of the Canadian Railway Labour Association and Mr. Ron A. Bennett, the Canadian Legislative Director of the United Transportation Union, appeared before the minister and the House of Commons Transport Committee to express their general feelings on Bill C-105, the Railway Safety Bill. We all welcome the introduction of legislation which, on the surface, appears to address many of our concerns and the concerns that all railroaders have had with maintaining and improving rail safety in Canada. However, I am sorry to say that this bill will not do it. We, of course, have some concerns with respect to certain clauses of the proposed legislation, and the union officers look forward to being part of the consultative process.

In the meantime, we wish to congratulate the minister and the government on taking the first small step towards a safer railway industry in Canada. As members of the brotherhood—and I am still a member—we feel that the provisions of Bill C-105 represent a very small step forward for all concerned with the safe operation of the railway systems across our great country.

Honourable senators, we do not wish senators to conclude that the brotherhood does not fully recognize or appreciate the strength inherent in Bill C-105. However, it is very small and we wish there was more. We all hope that, through the consultative process and by means of constructive criticism by the railways workers through their union leaders, this safety bill can be improved even further in many ways and to the benefit of all the parties, the governments, the railways, the workers and the taxpayers who, after all, will pay the shot in future years.

Honourable senators, back in the year 1941, when I was hired on the CNR, I was sent to Toronto to write an examination on the rules during a five-day examination period. The examination lasted from 8 a.m. until 6 p.m. each day. This examination was held in the rule car, and when I returned to make my three trial trips, beginning with my first day for pay, the rule instructor, the master mechanic, the engineer, the conductor, the trainman and yardman, to my amazement, constantly impressed on each new employee that the name of the game on railroads was the word "safety." The idea was constantly expressed to me: "Don't make any mistakes in your railroad career and possibly lose an arm, a leg or perhaps your life." This was the word; this was the railroad bible.

After the depression years of the "dirty thirties", both railroads began hiring new employees, beginning in the summer of 1939. With the declaration of war by Canada on September 10, 1939, and with the gearing up of all industries in a total Canadian war effort, the railroads began to move the thousands of troops and war equipment across all the provinces of Canada. Even as each day dawned, crews on and off the jobs, and especially in the bunk houses, would discuss the problems of making their particular section of the railways a much safer place to work. Therefore, it was very easy to see that the companies and the workers had thoughts of safety uppermost in their minds. The word was: Move the troops and the war material the fastest way possible, consistent with the very magic word, "safety." We had "ship-by-rail" and safety committees which met each month. At those committees, safety was fully discussed and every employee was expected to attend.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association and the United Transportation Union have been in the forefront of promoting safety by working with the railway companies of Canada. The Canadian Railway Labour Association is comprised of 12 railway unions that collectively represent approximately 60,000 workers employed by the three major companies and a number of smaller short-line railways which operate freight or passenger trains from coast to coast in Canada. The unions represented by the Canadian Railway Labour Association are as follows:

- The United Transportation Union
- The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers
- The Canadian Signal and Communications Union
- The Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees
- The Transportation and Communications Union
- The Brotherhood of Railway Carmen
- The International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers
- The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers
- Rail Canada Traffic Controllers
- Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Transport and General Workers
- The Sheet Metal Workers' International Association

Honourable senators, these are a great group of men doing a fantastic job day in and day out, 24 hours per day, seven days per week.

The policy direction of the Canadian Railway Labour Association is decided by the senior officers of all the aforementioned railway unions, after consultation with the various locals across Canada. The unionized railway employees subject to the proposed Railway Safety Act are all represented by the member unions of the Canadian Railway Labour Association.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association supports the introduction of the Railway Safety Bill, Bill C-105. Our association, however, has some serious concerns with certain aspects of the proposed legislation.

As honourable senators are now well aware, the United Transportation Union represents men and women working in various positions in the running trades across our nation and in the U.S.A. In Canada we represent conductors, trainmen, yardmen and other classifications all across the Canadian railway system, including the two national railways which are, of course, the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

We believe it is fair to state that the United Transportation Union is an organization which has, throughout its history, spent a considerable amount of time, effort and money promoting issues not only connected with the health, safety and comfort of our members but also for the benefit of all Canadians. Our union has large and sophisticated legislative and protective departments, which are headquartered in Ottawa, with branches and representatives in every local across Canada. The interests of the legislative department specifically include the promotion of issues, training and programs designed to enhance the safety of all railway operations. The legislative department, in conjunction with the protective departments in every local across Canada, encourages preventive programs designed to eliminate safety hazards before they become accidents, in fact, long before an accident can happen which would result in the loss of an arm, a leg or a life.

Furthermore, representatives of all of our brotherhoods participate in safety committees every month at each and every level in every railway company across Canada. We therefore believe it can fairly be said that our union has a sincere, demonstrated and long-standing commitment to safer railway operations across our country.

The philosophical thrust of this legislation is clearly reflective of the government's objective to deregulate transportation in Canada. That objective was already established by the enactment of the National Transportation Act, 1987, which became law on January 1, 1988. The major thrust of the National Transportation Act was to abolish the Canadian Transport Commission and to introduce a new, deregulated economic environment into Canada's transportation systems. Let me say, honourable senators, that it is not working very well. The philosophy which will apply to Canada's entire transportation system of rail, truck and airlines is that a competitive framework will be to the advantage of the users of the transportation systems and will ultimately result in the various modes of transportation becoming more effective as they strive to meet the competitive demands of the marketplace, both intermodally and intramodally. In sum, the survival of the fittest.

Honourable senators, I made similar remarks to these during the debate on Bill C-18 and Bill C-19, and I am sorry to say that my predictions are coming to pass. Last Saturday, in the Toronto Star, there was an article about what Bill C-18, the National Transportation Act, was doing to the trucking industry across Canada.

Unfortunately, in our opinion, the same basic philosophical assumption underpins the Railway Safety Bill. This assumption is that the railways will ensure an adequate level of operational safety in their own interest and that if there is any deviation from the broad safety objectives set out in the regulations introduced pursuant to the proposed Railway Safety Act, then the monetary fines set out in the act for such violations will ensure compliance. The motivation is self-interest and the deterrent is monetary fines. The government believes that the self-interest of the railways and the threat of momentary fines will ensure that the railways will operate at an acceptable level of safety. I am sorry, but it will not happen. The Canadian Railway Labour Association does not share this philosophy or belief. We believe that the level of railway safety will deteriorate over time and will be determined by the economic health of the railways. In our view, public and employee safety should not be in any way correlated with the economics of the railways at any particular point in time.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association is also deeply concerned about the concentration of power in the Minister of Transport by the Railway Safety Bill. A long-standing concern of our association with the Railway Act and the former National Transportation Act was the conflicts of interest created by the same Canadian Transport Commissioners legally seized with the power and authority to regulate the railways economically, to ensure public and employee safety by regulation and to conduct investigations into the cause of railway accidents.

• (1620)

In addition, our association held the view that, under the quasi-judicial structure of the Canadian Transport Commission, the Minister of Transport and Parliament were powerless to set policy direction for the suppliers of transportation in Canada. In our opinion, a quasi-judicial, non-elected body such as the Canadian Transport Commission should not have been given the power, either directly or indirectly, to shape transportation policy in Canada for the past 20 years. This was never the intent of the McPherson Commission, on whose report the National Transportation Act was based. We will also comment on the many clauses of the Railway Safety Bill dealing with the consultative committee, medical and optometric information, the amendments to the Criminal Code, the assessment of fines and imprisonment for violations of the act and the possible introduction of drug testing for certain railway employees.

You would think, honourable senators, by what the minister wants to do to us that we were all criminals. We do not believe that what he is trying to do is very conducive to morale problems on the railroads of Canada.

We have already stated that, in our opinion, a quasi-judicial body such as the Canadian Transport Commission should not have been isolated from the Minister of Transport and Parliament concerning the general policy direction of transportation in Canada. We also believe that the Canadian Transport Commission should not have had the responsibility for the regulation of railway safety and also the duty to conduct inquiries into the cause of railway accidents. The regulators could be indirectly called upon technically to investigate themselves, a clear conflict of interest. Though all our associations, however, have made this point, they cannot cite an actual case where this conflict of interest was demonstrated by the Canadian Transport Commissioners. Also, some quasi-judicial body should not have been given the authority without policy direction from the Minister of Transport or, preferably, Parliament to shape the economic destiny of the railways. The pendulum has now swung completely in the other direction by the Railway Safety Bill and the National Transportation Act, 1987. These two pieces of legislation make all roads lead to Rome. The Minister of Transport will have more power than any of the Caesars in the history of the Roman Empire. Imagine the Honourable John Crosbie having all that power!

Almost all the delegated economic regulatory powers contained in the National Transportation Act, 1987, whether exercised by the National Transportation Agency or otherwise provided for, are all, by some legislative mechanism or other, under the direct or indirect control of or subject to control by the Minister of Transport—a lot of power to give one man. The same minister, the Minister of Transport, will also have all the unfettered power to regulate rail safety pursuant to the Railway Safety Bill. The word “minister” is referred to in the Railway Safety Bill in excess of 150 times, in addition to the powers delegated in the bill to the Governor in Council, which, in reality, is the Minister of Transport.

The government, pursuant to the National Transportation Act, 1987, advocates a lean and mean, survival-of-the-fittest transportation economic policy. The Minister of Transport is responsible for this legislation. Pursuant to the Railway Safety Bill, the same minister, the Minister of Transport, must also ensure that the railways show due regard for the importance of rail safety. In our respectful submission, even if the Minister of Transport had two heads, he would find great difficulty wearing these two conflicting hats.

Any conflict of interest in the structure of the Canadian Transport Commission previously referred to pales in the light of the untenable position the Minister of Transport will be placed in if the proposed Railway Safety Act becomes a reality as it now stands. Under the old Canadian Transport Commission, the Minister of Transport, when questioned in the House of Commons on rail safety, could simply avoid the issue by referring to the quasi-judicial body, the Canadian Transport Commission, seized with the responsibility for rail safety pursuant to the existing legislation. Under the new proposed Railway Safety Act, this defence will not be available to the Minister of Transport. Ministerial responsibility to Parliament will include the day-to-day effectiveness of the hundreds of regulations, directives, rules, orders, et cetera, concerning rail safety in Canada. Conflicts and questions not resolved or answered by the minister's staff responsible for railway safety will, no doubt, eventually find their way to the floors of the House of Commons and the Senate. In our opinion, this is not the way to run a railroad.

The floors of the House of Commons and the Senate are not the places to debate the day-to-day problems involved in the safe operation of Canada's transcontinental railways. This, unfortunately, in our opinion, will become the reality because of the way the proposed Railway Safety Act is structured. We can foresee the opposition parties calling for the resignation of the Minister of Transport every time there is a violation of a safety rule or a rail accident. This could well be on a daily basis. In sum, notwithstanding the obvious conflict of interest created by the economic objectives of the National Transportation Act, 1987 and the concept of rail safety, which, in our opinion, will be governed by the economic health of the railways under the proposed Railway Safety Act, the proposition that the same minister, the Minister of Transport, will be directly answerable for both pieces of legislation creates an untenable and unworkable situation.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate in my own name.

On motion of Senator Turner, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN NAME OF SUBCOMMITTEE—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 19, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a change in the name of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens, approved by the parent Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on Tuesday, December 1, 1987, and in order to make the mandate of the subcommittee compatible with the new responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs as Minister of State for Senior Citizens.

He said: Honourable senators, authority was given to me by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to expand the name of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens so that the committee's responsibilities would be compatible with the new responsibilities of the Minister of Veterans Affairs as Minister of State for Senior Citizens.

Under the mandate of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology committee, senior citizens are not specifically mentioned. However, I was under the impression that, since health and welfare, an element which covers a wide area, is mentioned, adding “senior citizens” would be in order.

The purpose of my inquiry is to glean some clarification as to where the committee stands in this regard. Indeed, the matter may be simplified if I simply remove this inquiry from the order paper. My discussions with Senator Molgat have raised a problem which should be clarified in the chamber. I apologize for not speaking to the chairman of the Social Affairs committee beforehand.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I personally do not see any problem in the matter if the Senate agrees. The only difficulty which would arise would be when we come to the definition of what the responsibilities are in terms of various committees. "Senior citizens" do not appear directly as a responsibility of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Admittedly, when you seek to find where senior citizens might be dealt with, the logic would be, quite obviously, that their concerns should be the responsibility of that committee.

The question is really whether the Senate has any objections to the matter. It was brought to my attention and that is the only reason I mentioned it to Senator Marshall.

As we all know, no committee can give to a subcommittee any powers which it does not have itself. It can only extend to a subcommittee powers which it holds by virtue of a reference from the Senate. There is no specific mention of senior citizens, but, by logic, that is where this responsibility belongs.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, in an attempt to clarify the issue that was raised, I would like to point out that the list of subjects to be referred to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is not restrictive. It says:

... relating to social affairs, science and technology generally, including:

And then the list follows. That is my first point, which is basically what Senator Molgat said.

Furthermore, we have a Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs as an offshoot of the Committee on Social Affairs, and if we want to expand the name of the subcommittee, the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology does not give the subcommittee new powers. It merely changes its name, which means that when a referral is made by the Senate to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, any question concerning senior citizens may be referred to the subcommittee.

If I am not mistaken, that is the function of a Senate committee and the subcommittees under its jurisdiction. It has no powers except in so far as the Senate refers a question to the committee, whether it happens to be a bill or any other subject. In fact, it is not a question of power but of convenience, as Senator Marshall pointed out.

Personally, I don't see any problem, except that the Senate should say there is no problem. Substantially, I don't see any problem at all, either with the name or with the kind of powers that are implicitly conferred, since there are none.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, since I am not entitled to speak a second time, I want to ask Senator Tremblay a question.

[Senator Marshall.]

Does the subcommittee intend to conduct a special inquiry on senior citizens? If it does, then there might be a problem. In fact, I don't think the order of reference was made to the standing committee.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, to answer this question I suppose we could go so far as to say that when the Senate referred the book it had a blue cover but was the equivalent of a kind of Green Paper—

Senator Molgat: They are all blue!

Senator Tremblay: —on child benefits and old age benefits. The entire document was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology about two or three years ago. One might say that in that case, the order of reference was implicit.

In fact, the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has submitted its final report on child benefits, which was discussed here in this Chamber. I quite agree that if Senator Marshall's plans include further study of the subject of senior citizens, I think the senator would have no objection to asking the Senate to refer this question for consideration. I think that would simplify matters.

I did point out, I may recall, that implicitly there had already been an order to refer the subject to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

[English]

Senator Marshall: I point out to Senator Molgat that the committee has already heard witnesses give evidence pertaining to matters relating to senior citizens.

The only issue, as I see it, is a requirement for a change in the name, and that would have to be dealt with by Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, because this matter does not appear in the standing orders.

Senator MacEachen raised this matter in the first place and he probably has a valid point.

• (1640)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I noticed the decision of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to create a subcommittee on veterans affairs, and then to add a further mandate, namely, senior citizens. The purpose of Senator Marshall's inquiry is to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that the parent committee has created a subcommittee and has given it a new mandate entitled "senior citizens".

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is established to deal with social affairs, science and technology generally, including veterans affairs, Indian and Inuit affairs, cultural affairs and the arts, social and labour matters, health and welfare, pensions, housing, fitness and amateur sports, employment and immigration, consumer affairs and youth affairs. The question that one immediately asks is whether it is within the power of the senior committee to strike a subcommittee on each of these subjects which are included within its mandate. That could lead to a proliferation of 12 subcommittees all derived from a committee without any reference to or supervision by the Senate.

I think that is a mouthful in itself to one who is at all interested in some discipline in the operation of the Senate. Maybe one should not be interested in such an old-fashioned practice as maintaining discipline in the operation of any body in 1988, but, in addition to that, the senior committee has now added to its list of responsibilities the additional subject of senior citizens. Presumably there is no limit to what this senior committee can do in proliferating subcommittees and in adding new subjects, any one of which could possibly be strained to fit under the general rubric of health and welfare.

I just say: Draw it to my attention and permit me to forget about it as quickly as possible and never ask me to approve it, because I think I would have to oppose it on the grounds that there must be some order and discipline in the operation of a Senate committee, even though it has many subjects deriving from its mandate.

As Senator Hicks said earlier today on another matter, I do not feel deeply about this, but I feel somewhat irritated from the logical point of view that a senior committee can proliferate, without asking permission of the Senate, and then draw the fact to our attention. As I said, draw it to our attention and we will forget about it, but don't ask us to approve it.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not want to belabour the point, but there was a special committee struck to consider a subject matter which fell under the responsibility of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and the Senate approved that. I am thinking of the Special Senate Committee on Youth. The responsibility for youth falls under the mandate of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, but that subject was not referred to that committee; a special committee was struck with added expense and causing more people to cut themselves into pieces to attend all committee meetings.

Honourable senators, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the inquiry and we will go back to the drawing board.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations), pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 26, 1988, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. The purpose of this motion and the occasion for my speech is to ask my colleagues to agree to a pre-study of Bill C-130, an act to implement the Free Trade Agreement signed with the United States, as far as Canada is concerned.

It is hardly necessary for me to take the time of honourable senators in speaking to the importance of this bill or of this subject matter. The Deputy Leader of the Opposition was heard to say a few days ago that this was one of the most important pieces of legislation to be presented in Canada since the Second World War, and he was right.

There has been no shortage of debate and discussion in the Senate and in its committees on the subject matter in general. Honourable senators will recall the monumental work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which began a study in March 1974 on our relations, particularly our economic relations, with the United States and which produced three volumes on the subject, Volume I in December 1975, Volume II in January 1978 and Volume III in March 1982. Those studies concluded by recommending in favour of a free trade treaty between Canada and the United States.

Prime Minister Mulroney announced on September 26, 1985, the intention of the present government to attempt to conclude a Free Trade Agreement with our neighbours to the south. Negotiations commenced on June 17, 1986. The elements of the Free Trade Agreement were agreed to on October 4, 1987, and the official signing of the legal document took place on January 2, 1988.

The elements of the agreement were tabled in this place on October 6, 1987, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on November 5. So the subject of free trade has a long history in recent years in this chamber, and in the Foreign Affairs Committee in particular.

With regard to the agreement presently under consideration, the Foreign Affairs Committee has met 34 times since last November for 62 hours. It has heard 71 witnesses. It has produced one report, or a quasi-report, and I am not sure yet who wants to acknowledge parentage of that report, but it has made a very valuable contribution, particularly to a discussion of the constitutional authority of the federal government in this regard.

So it seems to me, given that history, honourable senators, that nothing could be more logical than to send Bill C-130 to the Foreign Affairs Committee for pre-study. The government would like to see the Senate get a head start, as it were, on the parliamentary process by pre-studying this bill. Naturally, we are interested in that the pre-study could, and probably would, expedite the consideration of the bill, which, in turn, would expedite our preparations, as a government and as a country, for its implementation.

• (1650)

I understand that in the United States Congress the bill is expected to be voted upon by this fall at the latest. In view of the study that is now being given to the Free Trade Agreement by our Foreign Affairs Committee, it seems to me that that committee is in an excellent position to give a thorough study to the provisions of this bill. I do not say that it is an unduly complicated bill, and some have argued that the important thing is the principle: Do you want a free trade treaty with the United States or do you not?

Nevertheless, the legislation to implement such an agreement is very far-reaching. If I am not mistaken, the bill would amend 27 existing statutes. It is not for me or for anybody here, I suppose, to comment on a debate that has hardly begun in the House of Commons, but I do observe that it has already taken on quite a partisan character. As we well know, one party in that place is opposed in principle to a free trade arrangement with the United States. Another has undertaken to tear up the agreement if it takes power. Consideration of the matter seems to be threatened by delays occasioned by various parliamentary tactics, procedural disputes and the like. When they will get to the substance of the bill and how they will deal with it, if and when they do, who knows?

Therefore, it seems to me, honourable senators, that the Senate can and should take up the substance of this free trade bill, do it now by way of a pre-study and perform a valuable service to Parliament and to the country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to Senator Murray's historical overview of the free trade negotiations, the activities of the Senate, comments in the House of Commons and the omission of the comments of the Minister of International Trade with respect to the Senate. I think he has raised an important point that requires, to some extent, a comment from me. I would like to adjourn the debate and return to the matter at an early opportunity.

Senator Murray: Well, he didn't say no!

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 6 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

EMERGENCIES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE ADJOURNED

Pursuant to order adopted by the Senate on Thursday, May 26, 1988, the Senate was adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, the Honourable Senator Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I ask leave to invite the Honourable Perrin Beatty, Minister of National Defence, and Messrs. Snarr and Molot, his advisors, to participate in the deliberations.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, before we ask the minister to come in I should like to make a suggestion regarding a method we have employed in the past which would facilitate the work of the Committee of the Whole on this particular bill.

Would it be agreeable if we asked our whips to establish a steering committee that could do some of the work required to plan for the meetings? For example, do we need other witnesses? If that is agreeable, we could have a smaller committee than we had for the Meech Lake hearings. In this case, five and three might be an appropriate number.

Senator Phillips: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition if he envisages the Committee of the Whole continuing for some time, or are we going to have one session only?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have no way of knowing. It is not my intention to have a long set of hearings. However, I do think it might be worthwhile to have a steering committee consider whether or not we need additional witnesses and to plan the work of the committee. It proved useful in the case of Meech Lake and it might be useful in this case.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps I can add something that may be useful in coming to a decision on the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

On the assumption that the bill might have been referred to the Special Committee on National Defence, as was Bill C-76, the national office of the Red Cross organization have written to me and submitted a brief. I have not known how to reply to them. I now propose that I shall write and tell them that the bill is being dealt with in Committee of the Whole of the Senate and that I have handed their correspondence over to the chairman of that committee. It may well be that we will have to hear these people, who, I think, are anxious to come before a committee.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that is a slightly different vision of the activities of this committee than I had believed was the intention of the Senate when I discussed this matter with my counterpart. I thought the minister would be the witness for this committee and that there would not be a parade of witnesses. That may very well still be the case, and perhaps a smaller committee would be necessary to talk to the Red Cross and others. Toward that end, I see nothing wrong with having the whips and chairman meet to discuss the forming of a subcommittee or a steering committee, or any other committee.

At this point I can say that I did not envisage a parade of witnesses through the Committee of the Whole on this particular piece of legislation.

Senator MacEachen: I do not personally envisage a parade either. There may be a number of witnesses. For that reason it occurred to me that the task of discussing the question of witnesses could be delegated to a steering committee. Consequently, I was suggesting that the whips be empowered to select the members from each side under the chairmanship of the chairman of the committee.

Senator Doody: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion? Is that a motion you are making, Senator MacEachen?

Senator MacEachen: I would make it a motion.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator MacEachen that a steering committee be established, being five and three, and that the whips be empowered to select the members. Is there any further discussion? There being no further discussion, are you ready for the question?

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

The Chairman: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. Would you like to have a standing vote?

Senator Bosa: Why don't you call the vote again?

The Chairman: I am not empowered to call it again unless that is the wish of the committee.

Senator Barootes: Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion to make. Why don't we entertain the minister, receive his thoughts and then make the decision that the honourable senator wishes following that? If we have satisfaction from this level, we may not need a vote. If we do not have satisfaction, perhaps, then, that would be the appropriate time to say we will form a steering committee or subcommittee.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that is what I had in mind. We may be heading into a procedural wrangle or a vote that may not be necessary. I am not suggesting it will not be necessary. It may well be that we will have other meetings and other witnesses in this forum or another forum, but perhaps we could forestall the vote, or the confrontation or whatever, until after we hear the minister. Then we could decide what course of action the committee should take.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, that is agreeable to me. I understood that the deputy leader had agreed previously to the notion of a steering committee. It was a surprise to me that a number of "nays" were uttered from the other side.

Senator Doody: I had, honourable senators, and then I heard that the numbers were back to five and three and the steering committee was to be the same sort of committee that would be preordained and preorganized. As I say, it may not be necessary to take a vote on the numbers and on the times and so on, but if it is the wish of the committee to do that, then that is what we will do. However, we would be better served by asking the minister to come before us now and then deal with the procedural aspects later.

Senator MacEachen: It is the government that wishes this bill. Therefore, it might begin to show some cooperation in accommodating the committee rather than taking this attitude.

Senator Doody: I do not think the government is taking an attitude. The government is trying to accommodate the committee. We have tried to accede to the requests of the Senate in asking the minister to attend before us at the earliest possible opportunity. That he has done. He is now waiting outside the chamber. He wants to answer any questions that senators may have. Whatever the Senate wishes to do, obviously history and tradition point in the direction the Senate should take.

The government is not trying to be uncooperative. I thought we were trying to be most accommodating. I cannot quite understand what the problem is. If it will facilitate the movement of this bill through the Senate, then it will be three and five or eight and three or whatever. I just do not think it is necessary to get into that phase of it right now.

The Chairman: Is it your wish, honourable senators, to defer the matter for now and return to it later?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1810)

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, P.C., Minister of National Defence, Mr. W. Snarr, Executive Director, Emergency Preparedness Canada and Mr. H.J.L. Molot, General Counsel, Advisory and Administrative Law Section, Department of Justice were escorted to seats in the chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to welcome the Minister of National Defence to our chamber this evening, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, and his officials, Mr. Snarr and Mr. Molot.

In the event that honourable senators wish to ask questions directly of the officials, it will be necessary to have leave of the Senate to do so. If so, then I request that leave at this point. Certainly the minister is prepared to answer any or all questions honourable senators might have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Doody.

Mr. Beatty, I want to add my words of welcome on behalf of the committee. I believe it is your first visit to the Senate. Following our normal procedure, we will hear your opening statement, if you have one, and then proceed to questions, if that is agreeable.

Hon. Perrin Beatty, Minister of National Defence: I thank you very much.

The Chairman: You have the floor.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you very much, honourable senators. It is indeed my first opportunity to appear in Committee of the Whole in the Senate. Those of us who sit in the House of Commons often eye covetously seats in the Senate. This one is a temporary gift from the Senate which I will be glad to surrender back to you later this evening, but I am honoured to have the opportunity to be here.

It is a tremendous pleasure for me to be able to be before you today on Bill C-77, the Emergencies Bill that is designed to replace the War Measures Act with comprehensive and properly safeguarded emergencies legislation.

I was saddened to learn that the Canadian people, and, more especially, the Canadian Forces, lost a good friend last Friday. Senator Paul Lafond had served his country with great distinction both in the RCAF during World War II, when he won the Distinguished Flying Cross, and in the Senate of Canada. Never forgetting his military service and the need to improve Canada's defence capabilities, he chaired the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence and guided the committee through four studies, with one yet to be completed on Canada's Land Forces, leaving his mark on Canadian history.

[Translation]

The recommendations of his distinguished committee are very familiar to me and as Minister of National Defence, I was guided by their wise proposals in preparing the White Paper.

My wife, the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Forces join me in offering Mrs. Lafond and the members of his family our most sincere condolences.

[English]

Honourable senators, I read with considerable interest the record of the debate which took place in this chamber on second reading of the bill. Honourable senators have raised a number of points which merit careful consideration, and I will do my best to respond to these concerns during this evening's deliberations.

Permit me to summarize briefly what I consider to be the major features of the bill.

The Emergencies Act will enable the federal government to fulfil its constitutional responsibility to provide for the safety and security of Canadians during "national" emergencies. This responsibility stems from the "peace, order and good government" clause of the Constitution and the so-called "emergency doctrine," which has been elaborated by both British and Canadian courts since Confederation.

The bill will provide the government with appropriately safeguarded authorities to deal with four types of national emergencies: public welfare emergencies; public order emergencies; international emergencies and war emergencies. It will enable the government to act quickly to minimize injury and suffering in a national emergency and, at the same time, ensure that the exceptional powers acquired are no greater than those absolutely necessary to deal with the situation. In other words, there will be proportionality between the severity of the emergency and the response of the government.

[The Chairman.]

The bill will enable the government to mount a national response when a major disaster or situation involving public disorder either extends beyond the boundaries of the single province or exceeds the capacity of the province to deal with it effectively.

It will enable the government to react to a serious international emergency by instituting, in concert with our allies, appropriate and gradual pre-emptive and preparative measures designed to stabilize the situation and prevent further deterioration. Under current legislation, the only option open to the government would be the much more provocative step of invoking the War Measures Act.

The Emergencies Bill will remove the need to deal with national emergencies by hastily introducing ad hoc legislation during the confusion and disruption, which is characteristic of the early stages of a national emergency.

Finally, it will help to improve the national standard of emergency preparedness by stimulating emergency planning within the federal government and in cooperation and consultation with the provinces.

[Translation]

I would like to take a moment to review in more detail some of the federal-provincial aspects of this bill. In a federal state where jurisdiction is divided between two levels of government, each vested with its own area of jurisdiction and exclusive responsibilities, the cardinal principle in normal times must be that neither shall infringe upon the rights of the other; that is, that each shall respect the boundaries of its own jurisdiction.

The emergency doctrine affirms that in times of national crisis the federal government may, on behalf of the country as a whole, act in areas which are normally within the legislative competence and jurisdiction of the provinces. The problem, then, is how best to centralize control while achieving the close degree of federal-provincial cooperation necessary to integrate responsibilities and coordinate efforts to provide for the safety and security of Canadians.

[English]

The absence of any legal requirement to consult with the provinces before exercising federal powers under the emergency doctrine has been the subject of some comment by several groups which have examined the issue in the broader context of constitutional reform. Studies such as the Task Force on Canadian Unity, the 1976 "beige paper" of the Quebec Liberal Party, the report of the Canadian Bar Association Committee on the Constitution, and a report of the Standing Committee of the Senate, the Goldenberg report, reached a common conclusion, namely, that federal-provincial cooperation and consultation is a vital factor in designing any new approach for dealing with national emergencies in Canada.

Bill C-77 has been carefully drafted in close consultation with the provinces. It represents a consensus of the views of the territorial, provincial and federal governments. The bill that has flowed from that consensus will, I believe, protect and respect legitimate provincial interests, while allowing the federal government to fulfil its responsibility to deal effectively with national emergencies.

Under Bill C-77, the provinces must be consulted before a national emergency is declared. Subsequently, the federal government must exercise its emergency powers with a view to achieving concerted action with the provinces. In the case of a public welfare or public order emergency in which the effects of the emergency are confined to a single province, the federal government may declare an emergency only after the province concerned has indicated that its capacity to cope has been exceeded.

In response to a point raised by Senator Hicks, let me reassure honourable senators that the consultation provisions will not impede the federal government in responding in a timely manner to emergencies requiring a national response. For international or war emergencies, areas which are of clear federal jurisdiction, the bill calls for consultation only "to the extent that is appropriate and practicable to do so in the circumstances." Even for peacetime emergencies there is nothing resembling a provincial veto, except where the emergency is confined to a single province and where the sole ground for federal intervention is the inability of the province to cope with the situation. In these circumstances, the act defers to the judgment of the province as to its capabilities. Even here, however, if the effects of the emergency have national implications, the federal government could intervene in spite of provincial objections.

Perhaps even more important than the federal-provincial dimension of emergencies legislation is the question of the balance between adequate authorities, on the one hand and the preservation of fundamental rights and freedoms, on the other. A large portion of Bill C-77 is devoted to provisions that construct a comprehensive regime of both judicial and parliamentary safeguards against the misapplication or abuse of emergency powers. The act will be subject to both the Canadian Charter of Rights and the Bill of Rights and must have regard to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The balance between authorities and safeguards which has been struck in Bill C-77 represents the product of extensive public consultation and thoughtful recommendations from public interest organizations. In particular, I might mention the contribution made by the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the National Association of Japanese Canadians and the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee.

● (1820)

Several of the organizations which presented briefs expressed their satisfaction with the process that permitted their views to be heard and, in very many cases, to be acted upon favourably.

[Translation]

The mainstay of the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms is the Charter, and under C-77 the normal mechanisms for applying Charter protections will be upheld.

Section 33, the notwithstanding clause of the charter, has not been used in the bill and cannot be invoked by Order-in-Council. The added protection of the Bill of Rights is of particular significance since some provisions of the bill are not duplicated by the Charter, for example the protection of the right to the enjoyment of property and the provision for a fair hearing for the determination of rights and obligations.

[English]

Bill C-77 is subject to both judicial and parliamentary sanctions. Any limitation of Charter rights which a government might consider necessary in a national emergency would be subject to at least two channels of judicial review. In the first place, the Governor in Council could be challenged in court to demonstrate that there were reasonable grounds for declaring an emergency, as well as reasonable grounds for each of the orders or regulations made pursuant to the declaration.

Second, under section 1 of the Charter, the government could be challenged to demonstrate that Charter limitations imposed were "reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society". It is difficult to imagine a government going ahead with measures if there were any doubts about its ability to justify its actions in court.

There are many features of this emergencies legislation that will ensure that the government will be accountable to Parliament and, through Parliament, to the people of Canada for its use of emergency powers. The list is long, but if you will bear with me I would like to summarize the key ones ad seriatem:

- application is confined to "national emergencies" which are precisely defined in the bill;

- specific powers are set out for four types of national emergency, each of which is also precisely defined;

- following invocation of the legislation, the government must come before Parliament without delay, with an explanation of the basis for its action and with a report of its consultations with the provinces, and seek Parliament's confirmation of the declaration of emergency;

- if Parliament is not in session, it must be recalled, and, if dissolved, must be called at the earliest opportunity to consider the government's emergency actions;

- both houses must approve the declaration;

I might just depart from my text here, honourable senators, to say that it was a matter of some contention when this bill was before the House of Commons committee as to whether or not we should include a veto on the invocation of the legislation for the Senate. One can easily see circumstances where a majority in the House of Commons would be in favour of proceeding and the Senate might not. We took the decision that we were protecting civil liberties of Canadians; that this double veto was defensible and necessary and that the refusal by either house—either the Senate or the House of Commons—to approve the declaration would result in its being struck down. It is a double parliamentary protection for the rights of Canadians.

To continue the list:

- all orders and regulations must be promptly tabled in Parliament;
- a review committee of both houses, with all-party representation, must be struck to continuously monitor the government's use of the legislation;
- either house can initiate a motion to revoke or amend the declaration, or any order or regulation;

Again, honourable senators, let me depart here from my text. Let us visualize a situation where both houses of Parliament have approved the invocation and then, after that, it has been tested in the courts and the courts have found that what was being done by the government was legal and proper and that the government was capable of justifying the fact that an emergency existed and was able to demonstrate that in all cases what it was doing was consistent with what was acceptable in a free and democratic society. Let us go one step further and say that, even if there had been an attempt, for example, to have it struck down in the House of Commons and the House had voted to leave the measures in the legislation in force, the Senate would be capable of putting down a motion to revoke or amend the declaration or any order or regulation—again, giving that double scrutiny.

- the government must have the continued support of both houses for its actions, since a revocation or amendment motion is effective if passed by either house;
- the declaration automatically expires after a set period unless renewed by Parliament;
- on continuation of a declaration, all active orders and regulations must be confirmed by Parliament;
- the review committee must report regularly to Parliament, and in any case must report whenever a motion to revoke or continue a declaration is tabled;
- there is no automatic closure on debate of motions of confirmation, revocation or continuation of a declaration;
- if there is a need for secret orders or regulations, they will be subject to review and possible revocation or amendment by the review committee meeting in camera.

Honourable senators, this might apply in cases where action had to be taken about specific installations that were essential in wartime, for example, where it would not be possible to indicate publicly where those installations were.

- a comprehensive inquiry must be conducted following the termination of an emergency, and reported on within one year.

Honourable senators, if, in spite of this exhaustive system of constraints and safeguards, anyone suffers loss or damage as a result of the government's use of its special powers, that person will be able to obtain compensation. The legislation provides for a compensation process which the government is obliged to put in place and which includes an appeal process overseen by a federal judge acting as an "assessor." If someone is not satisfied with the compensation provided by this administrative process, then he or she is free to seek redress through the more formal, judicial route under the Crown Liability Act.

During second reading debate, several honourable senators raised questions about the powers which Bill C-77 grants to the government during a war emergency and, in particular, how these powers differ from those of the War Measures Act. I can understand these concerns, since a simple comparison of the bare statements of the powers in the two pieces of legislation—clause 40 in Bill C-77 and clause 3 in the War Measures Act—suggests that there is not much difference. Let me assure you that the difference between the two pieces of legislation is very great indeed, and in fact represents much of the reason why Bill C-77 is a longer, more complex piece of legislation.

The War Measures Act incorporates almost no safeguards. Bill C-77 includes a structure of safeguard upon safeguard which taken together render misuse of the legislation virtually impossible. Let me review some of these.

[Translation]

First, with regard to the definition of a war emergency, C-77 removes application to "insurrection", and by incorporation of the general definition of national emergency, confines application to situations which seriously threaten the ability of the government to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada. In addition, the latter definition adds the important provision that the situation must be such that it cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada.

Thus the field of application of Part IV of C-77 is narrower than that of the War Measures Act. Under the War Measures Act, the declaration is conclusive evidence that the invocation is necessary; under C-77 the government must justify invocation to Parliament, and furthermore, its action is challengeable in the courts since there must be "reasonable grounds" for invocation. Under the War Measures Act, the only constraint on specific measures is the Charter.

Under C-77, there must be "reasonable grounds" for the necessity of all measures taken, and they are put under continuous scrutiny by Parliament with specific procedures for amendment or revocation of the orders or regulations on which the measures are based.

The War Measures Act has no time limit. C-77 limits the duration of war powers to 120 days, and they can only be renewed if Parliament is persuaded that renewal is necessary.

Both the War Measures Act and C-77 are subject to the Charter, but only C-77 is subject to the additional protection of the Bill of Rights.

[English]

Under the War Measures Act, one could conceive of the government claiming in a particular case that the discriminatory internment was "reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society," arguing that the terms of section I of the Charter were met. But Bill C-77 rules out this loophole unequivocally.

Honourable senators, I stress that point in particular. Never again in Canada will we have the travesty where Canadian citizens are incarcerated in internment camps based upon their country of origin or their racial and ethnic heritage. It is specifically forbidden under the terms of this legislation, unlike the case with the War Measures Act where the rights of hundreds of Canadians have been abrogated in the past.

The War Measures Act makes no provision for compensation for losses suffered by individuals as a result of the application of the act. Bill C-77 includes a compensation regime. Thus, while the bare engine under the hood of Bill C-77 may look a lot like the War Measures Act, the vehicle has vastly improved steering, brakes and speed controls and operates at all times under the watchful eyes of parliamentary and judicial traffic cops.

Let me respond briefly at this time to a few specific points raised during debate by Senator Stewart, although I suspect that honourable senators may want to explore these important matters in more detail later. The senator raised three questions, all in relation to measures taken by order in council during a war emergency. These were: conscription, internment and the imposition of new taxes. First, with regard to conscription, our advice is that this would be legally possible by order in council under Part IV of Bill C-77, but whether it would also be politically feasible is a question that can only be answered at the time. In addition to the various constraints on such action which I have already touched upon, there is additional Charter protection which forbids forcing Canadian citizens to leave the country. Thus, to send conscripted troops overseas, the test of section 1 of the Charter would have to be met. Internment by order in council would be possible in a war emergency under Bill C-77, but, again, only if reasonable grounds for its necessity were present and the Charter conditions were met. Habeas Corpus would continue to apply and continued detention would be challengeable under section 1 of the Charter. As I mentioned earlier, discriminatory internment would not be possible under Bill C-77 under any circumstances, since clause 4 specifically rules out the use of Bill C-77 for internment on the basis of race, national origin and so on.

Finally, with regard to taxation, I am pleased to say that I can give a short, unequivocal answer. Taxes cannot be imposed by order in council. The Constitution sets out quite specific procedures for levying taxes and a bill is always required. I think, honourable senators, that that is all I need say about the detail of Bill C-77. I am sure that you will want to explore more deeply specific areas of the act's purview.

I conclude, before inviting any questions or comments from honourable senators, by offering one other personal note. The last time the War Measures Act was invoked, October 1970, it was a case of considerable concern for members of Parliament on all sides of the house. It was an instance, as well, where there was great agonizing among all Canadians. Each one of the political parties represented in Parliament gave a good-faith commitment to Canadians that they wanted to see that odious act, the War Measures Act, scrapped for all time, and to ensure that in future, while the government would have the powers to respond in an effective way in times of emergency, the basic civil rights of Canadians could never again be abrogated in the way they were taken away in the past under the War Measures Act. That was October 1970. It is now 1988, some 18 years later. I believe that all political parties, all parliamentarians have an obligation to deliver on that commitment and to do so in good faith and with expedition. I think Canadians have a right to expect that we will pass this legislation and a right to expect that we will put in place a regime which will give the government the powers it needs to protect the integrity of Canada, our survival in times of crisis and individual safety in cases where individuals might be put in jeopardy and ensure that we will have at all times adequate protection of the civil liberties of every Canadian. If we can pass this legislation, and do so before more time elapses, then we will have done credit to Parliament and we will have honoured the commitment made in good faith by each of the political parties so many years ago.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. If honourable senators have any questions, I would be pleased to receive them.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I am sure we appreciate the minister's exposition of the bill and his emphasis on safeguards. First, I would like to ask: Is it not true that the Canadian Charter of Rights, the Canadian Bill of Rights and the International Covenant apply now in the case of the War Measures Act?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, it is not true. The Canadian Charter of Rights applies in the case of the War Measures Act, but the Bill of Rights does not apply. However, the Bill of Rights will apply in the case of Bill C-77.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Where is that provided outside the preamble?

Mr. Beatty: Subsection 6(5) of the War Measures Act excludes the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): And you are contending that without explicit provision in the operative clauses of this bill the Bill of Rights will prevail?

Mr. Beatty: Yes. I am sure that the honourable senator is aware that there is in the preamble specific reference to the Bill of Rights, which specifically ensures that it will apply. However, without specific exclusion the Bill of Rights would apply in a statute such as this.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You have emphasized at considerable length and in detail the safeguards in this bill, and you have talked about wiping out the odious War Measures Act. In what particulars do the powers delegated to the Governor in Council under this legislation differ from the powers of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act when a declaration has been made in the situation contemplated under clause 38 of this bill, other than those protections afforded under the Charter of Rights, the Bill of Rights and the International Covenant?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, Senator Stewart is referring to the declaration of a war emergency. I mentioned some cases where there are substantial differences between Bill C-77 and the War Measures Act. For example, under the War Measures Act, it was legally possible to incarcerate Japanese Canadians based on their racial origin.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have already set that aside. I accept that point; indeed, I mentioned it in my speech on the motion for second reading.

Mr. Beatty: That is specifically excluded in this bill.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What I am asking is: Aside from those exclusions, how do the powers differ?

Mr. Beatty: It would differ as well because of the application of the Bill of Rights, which does not apply in the case of the War Measures Act.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, what you are saying is that simply by enacting that the Bill of Rights and the Covenant would apply as limitations on the War Measures Act you could have achieved virtually the same result.

Mr. Beatty: Not at all. The most disgraceful application ever of the War Measures Act was the incarceration of, for example, Japanese Canadians. Simply applying the Charter of Rights and—

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The Covenant.

Mr. Beatty: —the Bill of Rights—

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): And the Covenant.

Mr. Beatty: —and the Covenant would not necessarily guarantee that that sort of incarceration based on ethnic heritage could not take place.

● (1840)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But you can incarcerate Canadian citizens on any ground other than those specified in clause 4(b).

Mr. Beatty: Could you repeat the question?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Incarceration on grounds other than those specifically excluded in clause 4(b) would be permissible under the proposed legislation, is that correct?

Mr. Beatty: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Does that include internment?

Mr. Beatty: Yes, for example, internment of prisoners of war.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What about Canadians suspected by the Governor in Council or, perhaps, the Minister of Justice—as during the Second World War—of being security risks?

Mr. Beatty: It would depend, obviously, on how it was defined. In the case of the Second World War, the security risk was based on the individual's ethnic heritage.

[Mr. Beatty.]

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am not talking about that. I am talking about Canadian citizens who are not Japanese but ordinary Canadian citizens born in this country, such as the Mayor of Montreal. Could the Mayor of Montreal have been interned under this proposed legislation?

Mr. Beatty: You would have to, Mr. Chairman, establish reasonable cause and it would be testable as well under the Charter in the courts.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are saying seriously that, under this provision, all those persons interned, incarcerated or detained—whatever term one wishes—could bring their cases to trial in court on the facts of their particular cases.

Mr. Beatty: Absolutely, and that is the least they have the right to expect.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am not arguing the point, I am just trying to contemplate the situation in the courts.

Mr. Beatty: When you look on the deprivation of an individual's liberty as incarceration in an internment camp, we, as parliamentarians, must bend over backwards to ensure that the rights of the subject are protected.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I do not think you are confronting my question directly. As I see what would happen, there would be the declaration of an emergency and then an order in council would be made authorizing defence-of-Canada regulations, or whatever the term would be, and under those regulations, in turn, there would be other regulations. One of those other subordinate regulations might say that the Minister of Justice or his deputy could utter an order authorizing the internment of a particular person on security grounds. The interned person then would have a right to a writ of Habeas Corpus. He would get that writ and go into court. At that point the agent of the Minister of Justice would appear and display the order. The question is: Will the person who is challenging his own detention be able to require the government to disclose the facts on the basis of which the detention order against him had been made?

Mr. Beatty: To the court, yes. What is more, if you had a sweeping regulation of some sort that purported to allow classes of individuals to be swept up, as opposed to one individual, that very regulation itself could be tested before the courts.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I should like to ask the minister if he has asked his officials specifically about the kind of situation to which I am now referring, or is he just answering out of what seems to be common sense?

Mr. Beatty: In the preparation of the bill, we have gone over every single clause of the bill. I have pursued the question of how we can build in protections for individual Canadians throughout, and what we have in the legislation before the Senate today is the most comprehensive set of protections for civil liberties that has ever existed in this sort of legislation.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You can say that, but I am trying to find out just what the protections really are.

Mr. Beatty: Absolutely, and that is why, senator, I went to considerable pains in my opening remarks to respond to some of the misapprehensions you have.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Perhaps we are getting too defensive. You have told us that conscription could be introduced without a decision by the Parliament of Canada, but you question whether conscripted persons could be sent outside Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. Beatty: That is right. Of course, a decision based on any regulation which the Governor in Council makes under the bill is testable on a number of grounds before the courts and also in both houses of Parliament. If there were an attempt to use this legislation to avoid putting in an ordinary bill dealing with conscription, members of either house, the House of Commons or the Senate, could put a motion to nullify the order.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But the presumption is reversed. In the situation your bill will create, the Governor in Council will bring in conscription. Later, perhaps many weeks later if Parliament is dissolved, Parliament will have a chance to review what the government has already done, but by then the boys and girls will already be in uniform in camps. It is going to be difficult to unscramble that situation.

Mr. Beatty: As a former joint chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, I have some considerable sensitivity to the abuse by government of delegated legislation. Having had a good deal of experience over the years, I can tell the honourable senator that I am not aware of a single instance which came before the committee while I was joint chairman in which the protections were as sweeping as they are here, and, indeed, if one looks at the powers we have today under the War Measures Act, the powers that are here are considerably more circumscribed or restrained. In the case of the War Measures Act, one might ask oneself why governments would not have used the old War Measures Act for conscription.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): We are not here to defend the War Measures Act; rather, we are trying to do what was not done in the case of the War Measures Act in 1914 or in 1939.

Mr. Beatty: Absolutely.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is why I suggest we should not be defensive. Would you repeat the grounds on which you asserted that military personnel could not be sent overseas.

Mr. Beatty: It is because of the provisions of the Charter.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Specifically what section?

Mr. Beatty: Section 6(1).

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What does that state?

Mr. Beatty: It states:

Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada.

The emphasis, as is pointed out to me, would be on the word "remain."

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You have legal advice that section 6(1) does not mean, simply, that ordinary Canadians—those who are not in the special status of members of the armed forces—have the right to remain in Canada? Does section 6(1) refer to members of the Canadian Armed Forces?

Mr. Beatty: It is absolutely inclusive. That is the advice I have received.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You say that new taxes could not be imposed, but, of course, the government has a continuing right to tax, not to impose new taxes, so new money will be going annually into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That would not be the case in the United Kingdom where they have to re-enact their finance bill each year.

Let us turn to appropriations. Under what situations could the Governor in Council authorize appropriation from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, without prior resort to Parliament, if this bill were to become law?

Mr. Beatty: That would occur in reasonable circumstances which would have been provided for by Parliament.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): When you say "reasonable circumstances," do you mean there has to be a prima facie case.

Mr. Beatty: Yes. The government has the power now to reallocate funds within the funds provided for by Parliament.

• (1850)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes, I understand that.

Mr. Beatty: But you could not simply divert the funds from one particular vote of Parliament to something that was totally unrelated to it without violating the law.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): We know that; but what you seem to be saying now is that under this proposed act there could be major new appropriations without specific parliamentary authorization and quite aside from the provisions of the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Beatty: Let us take a look at what in fact we are saying. Senator, you suggested that we would be able to impose the right to tax by order in council. That is wrong.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am not asserting that.

Mr. Beatty: You did previously.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): No, I did not; I asked that question.

Mr. Beatty: You asked it rhetorically, and the answer is that you cannot do that.

Secondly, with delegated legislation, yes, you do have the ability—with all sorts of delegated legislation—to create new organisms or to create bodies which need to be funded. That exists in statute after statute in our law. There is nothing novel about that at all. To suggest that there is something somehow peculiar in the case of Bill C-77 is simply wrong.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are saying that with this new act on the statute books Appropriation Acts of the kind that are now required would be necessary in every circumstance?

Mr. Beatty: The same rules would apply in the future that apply now.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Are you saying that there is no change in the—

Mr. Beatty: Pardon?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I want to make sure I am not interrupting, because I want you to get the best information that is available to you from your officials.

I want to know what difference this measure would make with regard to the appropriation of funds by the Governor in Council. We know there are certain circumstances, such as with Governor General's Warrants, under which this can be done. What new abilities will the Governor in Council have to appropriate funds if this bill becomes law?

Mr. Beatty: None that is novel in any way.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Then why is it provided in the bill that in the case of an international emergency there can be appropriation?

Mr. Beatty: What clause are you referring to? Are you referring to clause 36?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Would you look at clause 30(1)(j), which states:

the authorization of expenditures for dealing with an international emergency in excess of any limit set by an Act of Parliament and the setting of a limit on such expenditures;

Mr. Beatty: That is simply the ability to top up things like revolving funds and so forth.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Oh come! It states:

the authorization of expenditures for dealing with an international emergency in excess of any limit set by an Act of Parliament—

That is a little more than topping up.

Mr. Beatty: I am advised that the only case where such limits are placed is in acts dealing with revolving funds, for example. It does not say "appropriation," incidentally, in that clause.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I would be interested in hearing the distinction.

Mr. Beatty: An example, senator, would be that the Export Development Act or the Defence Production Act may have limits in terms of the amounts of money that can be spent under those acts, quite apart from any amounts of money that might have been voted and appropriated by Parliament. This would allow one to waive the limit, but would be consistent with the appropriation powers of Parliament. Parliament would have appropriated the funds for that purpose.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Clause 40(1) states:

While a declaration of a war emergency is in effect, the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

Would appropriation be possible by order or regulation under that clause?

Mr. Beatty: No, because there is a constitutional requirement that there be a bill to appropriate funds. The Constitution supersedes the provisions of the bill.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I understand that, but surely a government—not a government in which you were a member, of course—would argue that an order made under this clause would be adequate.

Mr. Beatty: That is a novel construction, senator; you are right that I would not argue that. I would be very surprised if anyone else did.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): A similar argument was made during the First World War, not with regard to the appropriation of money but in relation to putting aside the provisions of a statute.

Mr. Beatty: I missed World War I, and my memory may be faulty there, but, as a parliamentarian, one thing I know is that the development of parliamentary democracy stemmed in large part over the issue of control of the purse. Precedents are well established in jurisprudence, and the long struggle for the development of parliamentary democracy would forbid precisely that.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I want your word on the record, and that of reliable authorities, that, in fact, we are not setting aside the great tradition to which you referred.

Mr. Beatty: Absolutely not, senator.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): All right. When I say "All right," I am thanking you for what you have said; I do not mean I necessarily agree.

I was pleased when you were explaining the measure that you said candidly that in many of the situations contemplated it would be necessary to rely upon the peace, order and good government clause. As we know, this is a clause which has been used to take over matters which normally are under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

Would it be possible under clause 40(1) to forbid provincial borrowing in foreign money markets?

Mr. Beatty: The advice I receive is that it may be.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Can we get a definitive answer? I ask that question because that was an important constitutional question in the fall of 1939.

Mr. Beatty: I suppose if one were to look at hard cases, and if a province wanted to borrow money from a country with which Canada was at war—

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Something of worry to the Government of Canada would be the matter of foreign exchange controls. It might want to intervene to prevent Nova Scotia, for example, from disrupting its emergency planning with regard to the control of foreign exchange.

I am asking if the Governor in Council could intervene under this provision to say that a provincial government could not borrow U.S. dollars or British pounds.

Mr. Beatty: I will seek legal counsel on that, senator.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I think it would be helpful if we had an answer to that question.

Let me ask you this—

Mr. Beatty: I can convey that advice to you rapidly. The advice I have received is that it would be possible.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you for that answer.

You say that you have examined all of the possibilities. You assert that you believe that this bill would be adequate to permit the Government of Canada to do what would be necessary in the case of an international emergency or a war emergency. You have extolled planning. Does the government have an emergencies book? Have you starting drafting orders in council under this bill?

Mr. Beatty: Work in this area, senator, has been in place for the last 20 or 25 years.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, in a sense, you do have a war book or an international emergencies book?

Mr. Beatty: Yes, senator, we do have the elements of it, I gather.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is why you are convinced that this bill provides you with an adequate foundation for any order or regulation that you might need.

Mr. Beatty: I am convinced, because my advisers from the Department of National Defence and Emergency Preparedness Canada have looked at what the needs would be in a time of crisis and have satisfied themselves that powers that would be essential to them to carry out their responsibilities would be there.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): When he was speaking to us on April 28, Senator Kelly made reference to what he called "the 1970 incident," and he said:

I think the best that can be said of the events in 1970 is that when the government went to the cupboard, the only thing available was the War Measures Act, a very blunt instrument designed, as its name suggests, for wartime use.

You have just told us that you tried to anticipate every requirement. Do you have draft orders or regulations for the kind of situations to which Senator Kelly referred?

Mr. Beatty: You are referring to a situation analogous to the October 1970 crisis?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am referring to whatever the situation was about which Senator Kelly spoke when he moved second reading.

Mr. Beatty: One would like to be privy to all of the information that the Government of Canada then had at hand. On the strength of what I have seen, senator, it was the usual criminal processes that were used that were helpful in terms of dealing with the killers of Pierre Laporte and the kidnappers of James Cross. I think the invocation of the War Measures Act in that instance was unjustifiable. I agree with the late Don Jamieson that, on the strength of anything that I have seen, the justification for the invocation was not there. I believe that in a similar circumstance the ordinary provisions under the Criminal Code and ordinary police procedures would have been adequate to deal with such a crisis.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are saying, therefore, that this bill really would not apply in a case of insurrection, real or apprehended. Do you think that this bill would not apply to a genuine case of insurrection, real or apprehended?

Mr. Beatty: I am saying that, if there were a public order emergency, the bill specifically applies such that essential services could be restored or restrictions could be placed upon freedom of assembly. We could provide protection for vital points in cases where there was civil disorder. The question you asked previously related to the October 1970 crisis. I cannot comment on what information was available to the government at the time. Mr. Turner then said he hoped that one day all Canadians would know the basis on which the government took the decision it did. I do, too, but, on the strength of what I have seen to date, I could not have justified to cabinet or to the Canadian people the invocation of the War Measures Act.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): We talked earlier about the delegation in an emergency to the Governor in Council of matters that normally fall under the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. Have you consulted with the government of the province of Quebec, for example, on the matter of censorship or control of provincial borrowing?

Mr. Beatty: Throughout the whole of the writing of the bill, which literally extended over a period of years, there was close consultation with all of the provinces. Indeed, we received representations from the Province of Quebec that I believe were made public before the House of Commons committee.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are telling us that the government of the province of Quebec is completely satisfied with the provisions of this bill relating to situations in which the Governor in Council would be exercising powers that are normally under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Beatty: Yes. What I am saying, senator, is that we invited from each of the provinces an expression of any concerns it had. A number of concerns were expressed by a number of different provinces, the vast bulk of which concerns were dealt with through modifications to the initial draft of the bill. My understanding is that the Government of Quebec is satisfied with this bill, as are the other provincial governments.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Is the government of the province of Quebec satisfied with the specific provisions for dealing with what was thought of in 1970 as insurrection, real or apprehended? Does the Premier of Quebec think that this will give you an adequate legal regime for dealing with that kind of situation?

Mr. Beatty: I personally met with the minister responsible from Quebec. A succession of meetings have been held at the officials level. We have received official correspondence from the Government of Quebec, and it was not the Premier of Quebec who responded to the letter but the appropriate minister. He was speaking on behalf of the Province of Quebec, indicating the satisfaction of the Government of Quebec with the sort of changes we were looking at.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that other senators want to ask questions. May I ask one more?

The Chairman: All right.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I wanted to ask a question concerning the Parliamentary Review Committee. Subclause 62(1) makes a provision for a committee of both houses. Then, subclause 62(2) states:

The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in the House of Commons.

Reading those two subclauses together suggests that the participation of one senator would be adequate to constitute a joint committee. There is no rule, either here or elsewhere, with regard to the proportion of members on joint committees. This matter was debated when the joint committee on Meech Lake was being set up. We thought that the present government was very unreasonable in the stand it took with regard to the number of senators who would be members of that committee. One member from the Senate would suffice to make a committee qualify as a joint committee. In the present Parliament, that could be a Conservative senator. Perhaps in another Parliament, a Liberal senator—or even, possibly, an NDP senator, if the NDP had a majority in the House of Commons. I do not want to distract you with that—

[Mr. Beatty]

Mr. Beatty: It tantalizes me, senator, when you mention an NDP senator.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let us think of the problem without having particular parties in mind. It seems to me that something might be done to this part of the bill to ensure that both sides of the Senate would be represented on that committee.

Mr. Beatty: Senator, in designing this particular provision of the bill, we did not attempt to fix what would be the absolute number of members from the House of Commons, for that matter. We did try to provide that there would be representation from each of the political parties in the House of Commons. It would also be possible, presumably, that representation of the Senate might involve independent senators. One would hope that reasonableness would apply in any case where the two houses are called together to meet with one another.

When you say, senator, that you felt that the government of the day was unreasonable in terms of the number of senators included in the Meech Lake committee, I could say that members of the NDP probably felt that the government was unreasonable, too, in terms of the number of senators included, but for different reasons.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You make my point, namely, that reasonableness is a highly subjective test. It seems to me that to plead reasonableness is almost as unreliable as pleading goodwill as a basis for procedure.

● (1910)

Mr. Beatty: Senator, as long as you are here, I am sure there will be goodwill and there will be no difficulty with that.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Come now!

Mr. Beatty: In many elements of parliamentary and constitutional procedure in the past we have resisted setting up very rigid structures which are not capable of being adapted to particular circumstances. I do not think it is unreasonable to expect there would be goodwill in a national crisis or that reasonableness would apply.

In the provisions of this bill—many of which I mentioned to you earlier—we have built a panoply of protections for civil liberties, a structure which ensures involvement by members of the House of Commons and senators that is unprecedented. I cannot think of a single piece of legislation that has come before Parliament in my 16 years as a member of Parliament which has built in so many checks and balances to protect civil liberties, using both the courts and Parliament.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are pleading that the provisions for parliamentary surveillance here are sweeping and, indeed, highly detailed. You do not rely upon reasonableness when you come to other major provisions in that same clause. The bill says, “within three sitting days” and “within seven sitting days.” There the bill is very specific. However, in subclauses 62(1) and (2), you rely on reasonableness.

Mr. Beatty: Senator, we could write all sorts of additional rules for the committee and constrain the committee much more than we have done. We have tried to stick to the essentials here. I believe we have struck a formula which ensures proper parliamentary scrutiny and involvement, but also gives sufficient flexibility to deal with the specific circumstances of the day.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Our differences have been adequately recorded. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue this point.

The Chairman: The next senator on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Neiman.

Senator Marsden: I would like to deal with the public welfare emergency sections. I do not bring to the question the kind of knowledge or parliamentary experience that Senator Stewart does. However, I am interested in how this might apply to a number of situations. As I am sure you know, one has to imagine what might occur in order to understand how this will apply.

In responding to Senator Stewart about the internment situation, you referred specifically to subclause 4(b) and the basis on which people can no longer be interned—race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability. I believe those items cover all grounds in the Charter.

There are a number of grounds that are not covered in the Charter. How do you think this bill would apply in a situation which is currently facing the country in relation to disease in human beings, and that is the current ferment on the subject of AIDS? There are people who take very extreme positions about what ought to be the situation of those who are HIV positive or, in fact, have the disease. Would it be a correct interpretation of this section to suggest that, should a government accept that kind of argument, people might be interned, and, given that AIDS affects all kinds of people from all classes, but is heavily concentrated at the moment in homosexual people—and sexual orientation is not a protected ground under the Charter, nor is it in this bill—that such people might be detained or interned? Paragraph 8(1)(g), for example, would allow the government to establish emergency shelters and hospitals. We are not necessarily talking about internment camps. Would detainment in that case be possible as a public welfare emergency?

Mr. Beatty: Senator, you are referring to the public welfare provisions. There is no power of internment whatsoever, and that sort of situation would not apply. You would indeed have the ability to establish emergency shelters or hospitals.

In a case where a natural disaster destroyed the housing of hundreds of thousands of people—because of an earthquake, for example—you would be required to set up immediately provisions to provide for shelter, for hospitals and so on for the people who are affected. That is what this provision is designed to deal with.

Senator Marsden: Does not paragraph 8(1)(a) say that the Governor in Council might regulate or prohibit travel to or from a specified area where necessary for the protection of the health or safety of individuals? As I said, we are not talking about internment camps, but this would allow the government, I assume, to confine people to these hospitals or emergency shelters when it considered the situation to be a public welfare emergency, or am I misinterpreting that? In other words, could the unprotected grounds in the Charter be the basis for this kind of action on the part of the government?

Mr. Beatty: Paragraph 8(1)(a) is designed to deal with a situation where, for example, a natural disaster took place, where public safety would be jeopardized by people moving into the area which was struck by the event, and we would be able to proscribe travel into that area.

Senator Marsden: I understand that. The whole point of this discussion is to think of situations to which it might apply. Clause 5 clearly says that a public welfare emergency means an emergency that is caused by a real or imminent disease in human beings, animals or plants. AIDS could be an imminent disease in human beings.

One examines the failure of other nations to protect the civil liberties of people who are affected, and, in fact, to cause them a great deal of harm. One wants to be sure that nothing of that nature would be possible in this country.

Mr. Beatty: Indeed, and I fully share your concern. The courts would find that such a stretching of those provisions would go well beyond the intent of Parliament. Even if you attempted to claim that you were setting up a quarantine of some sort for people smitten by disease, if you were able to get around the provisions that specifically proscribe internment based on mental or physical disability, you would still collide with the provisions of the Charter—section 1 of the Charter and the mobility provisions in the Charter.

Senator Marsden: Are you telling me that sexual orientation, for example, is protected under the Charter?

Mr. Beatty: I did not think the argument you were making was that a government would attempt to claim that sexual orientation is ipso facto a threat to public health in some way. If you were claiming that you were trying to maintain a quarantine of some sort and trying to stretch the provisions of a law to provide for that, it would be more likely you would be trying to apply it in cases where somebody had been demonstrated to be infected. Even in that case I do not believe that would be permitted.

Senator Marsden: In fact, the argument you say I was not making is the one I was making. If someone was clearly infected and a danger to the public, that is covered under existing law, provincially and federally.

Who would have thought that Canadians would intern other Canadian citizens of Japanese origin? I am trying to think of a situation we would not anticipate. Suppose a government decided that there was an imminent problem because of the spread of a terrible disease, and it decided that certain categories of people should be detained. Then let us suppose that those categories were so classified on grounds that you have not mentioned in subsection 4(b). What would follow from that, in your view?

● (1920)

Mr. Beatty: The advice that I received is that we would be going through such a legal gyration and stretching of the legislation in an attempt to avoid the provisions of the Charter that it would be thrown out by the courts. That is the best advice that I have received. If I can offer my non-lawyer's legal opinion—it is worth what you pay for it—the patent absurdity of an attempt by a government to use such provisions in that way would be turned back by the courts very quickly.

Senator Marsden: Let's hope so.

Can you tell us briefly where, in the last few years in Canada, you think a public welfare emergency might have been declared and where, therefore, this clause of the bill would have been useful?

Mr. Beatty: Yes, I certainly can give an example. You will recall the Mississauga derailment, where there was a potential for a chemical spill which could have seriously damaged the health and threatened the lives of individual Canadians. Say that that had taken place in Prince Edward Island and the resources of the province were stretched so thin that it was impossible for them to respond. It might be necessary for us to use the federal authority to bring in resources from other provinces. That would be an example of a situation where this legislation would be put in place.

Another example would be if there were a serious earthquake in the lower mainland of British Columbia devastating that area, and the consequences were such that it was too acute for the Government of British Columbia alone to be able to deal with. The federal government could intervene and bring in resources from other provinces as a result.

Virtually every other developed country has emergencies legislation to deal with natural disasters and other emergencies like this. Canada, for some reason, simply has a lacuna in the law. If that sort of devastating disaster were to take place in Canada today, our choice would be either not to respond and allow the suffering and loss of lives, or to act illegally and attempt retroactively to validate illegal actions.

Senator Marsden: So that the discussions which your colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has been having about the possible removal of animals suffering because of the drought could presumably be a situation where the federal government would step in, if necessary?

Mr. Beatty: You would have to look at the definition of "national emergency." First, you would have to demonstrate that it was a national emergency. It would have to meet that test.

Second, you would have to look at the definition of "public welfare emergency." Certainly "drought" applies there; "disease, accident or pollution" is mentioned there also. It states:

—and that results or may result in a danger to life or property, social disruption or a breakdown in the flow of essential goods, services or resources, so serious as to be a national emergency.

You are asking me to give you an opinion in a hypothetical case. I would be surprised if it were to apply in a case like that.

The sort of case where it would be far more likely to apply would be in the case of an incident, similar to the one in Bhopal, taking place in, say, the province of New Brunswick, where you desperately need to bring resources in quickly; the lives of people are in jeopardy; and the immediate effects of a disaster may be confined to one province, but that province may not itself have the ability to respond with the resources within the province itself. In that case, the federal power would have to be used on an emergency basis without wasting time, and you would be able to commandeer resources in other parts of the country and bring them in as necessary to restore conditions and protect people.

The Chairman: Next is Senator Neiman.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Minister, you have reassured me with regard to many of the questions I had respecting Bill C-77, but I have a couple more on which I would like to hear your comments.

In your list of the most important features within the bill, you mentioned that, if Parliament is not in session at the time the emergency is declared, it will be recalled at the earliest possible opportunity.

I have been looking through the bill and I do not see a time specified with respect to recall. Have I missed it?

Mr. Beatty: Let me just find the appropriate section, and I would be pleased to respond.

I believe what you are referring to is clause 58(2), which states:

If a declaration of emergency is issued during a prorogation of Parliament or when either House of Parliament stands adjourned, Parliament or that House, as the case may be, shall be summoned forthwith to sit within seven days after the declaration is issued.

Senator Neiman: In the definition of "public order emergency" it specifies that it arises from "threats to the security of Canada", and that, in turn, is being given the meaning assigned by section 2 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act.

I do not have a copy of that act before me, but I wonder, on the one hand, how broad that definition may be or, on the other hand, how secretive it may be. There are criteria that deal with such matters as subversion or foreign influenced activities, but how specific can we consider this particular definition?

Mr. Beatty: We are searching now for a copy of the CSIS Act, because it was incorporated by reference. If I can find it, I would be pleased to put it on the record.

As a former Solicitor General, I have had a good deal of experience with the CSIS Act. One of the things that was specifically provided for there, for example, is the right to legitimate dissent, and that is specifically protected by Parliament.

We incorporated by reference this definition because it represented the most recent time that Parliament had been engaged with the issue of what in fact represents a threat to the security of Canada. The CSIS Act was the product of extensive deliberations both in committee and in both houses.

There is also a provision within the CSIS Act which sunsets the act and brings it back for reconsideration by Parliament next year. Any changes which are made by Parliament to the definition of threats to the security of Canada and the CSIS Act—whatever Parliament deems at that time to be appropriate in dealing with the whole issue of counter-terrorist and counter-subversion, and so on—would be automatically incorporated by reference in this legislation as well. We did not want to attempt to refight the battles of the CSIS Act with emergencies legislation, but say that whatever is decided by Parliament with regard to the statute which is most designed to deal with this whole issue would be incorporated by reference.

Let me put the definition on the record. It states:

“threats to the security of Canada” means

- (a) espionage or sabotage that is against Canada or is detrimental to the interests of Canada or activities directed toward or in support of such espionage or sabotage,
- (b) foreign influenced activities within or relating to Canada that are detrimental to the interests of Canada and are clandestine or deceptive or involve a threat to any person,
- (c) activities within or relating to Canada directed toward or in support of the threat or use of acts of serious violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state, and
- (d) activities directed toward undermining by covert unlawful acts, or directed toward or intended ultimately to lead to the destruction or overthrow by violence of, the constitutionally established system of government in Canada, but does not include lawful advocacy, protest or dissent, unless carried on in conjunction with any of the activities referred to in paragraphs (a) to (d).

One of the distinctions I would stress here is that while the CSIS Act may give to CSIS the responsibility, if you look at subversive activities or if you are dealing with the issue of foreign directed activities within Canada, the scope is relatively broad as it relates to the generation of intelligence by CSIS.

● (1930)

Where it would differ in this bill is that you must demonstrate the fact that a situation is so grave as to constitute a national emergency. It may well be that, in instances where there is foreign-directed activity in Canada, it is appropriate for the government to keep an eye on it to make sure they know what is happening. However, one would have a very hard time indeed, in many instances, in demonstrating that such activity constituted a national emergency, which is defined in clause 3 as being:

... an urgent and critical situation of a temporary nature that

(a) seriously endangers the lives, health or safety of Canadians and is of such proportions or nature as to exceed the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it, or

(b) seriously threatens the ability of the Government of Canada to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada and that cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada.

So, senator, that definition of “national emergency” again tempers and constrains the definition under the CSIS Act.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Minister, you mentioned that the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and of other federal statutes, such as the Bill of Rights, will override and safeguard the various provisions of this bill. However, the bill, as it is presently drawn, leaves the reference to the Charter and to the Covenant and the other statutes solely in the preambular clauses of the bill. I know that the Canadian Bar Association, which is one body to which you referred, and I think perhaps the Attorney General of Alberta, recommended very strongly that you put those references into the body of the statute. This has been done with respect to other statutes; for instance, the Freedom of Information Act and the Young Offenders Act.

It would seem to me that this particular bill is of more importance and significance than those other statutes, and I wondered why it had been decided not to incorporate reference to those protective, overriding rights in the body of the bill itself.

Mr. Beatty: Senator, owing to the fact that, as Solicitor General, I amended the Young Offenders Act, I am searching my memory as to whether there was a provision therein that specifically incorporated the provisions of the Charter of Rights. I accept your word that there was, although I do not recall it at this time.

Senator Neiman: That was my advice, and I stand to be corrected on that also, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Beatty: The advice that we had in drafting the bill was that it was not necessary to do that; that the provisions of those protections to which you referred would apply to this bill without further reference to them anywhere in the bill. In the case of the War Measures Act, provisions of other statutes were excluded from applying in that case.

The Charter of Rights, for example, would apply and take precedence over other legislation unless precluded from doing so. The same would apply in the case of the Bill of Rights.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Minister, even under section 1 of the Charter itself exceptions can be made, and it is my understanding that the Charter provisions in any case, if they are included in the preamble to a bill, simply serve as a guidepost, whereas, if they are incorporated into the bill itself as part of a definition—for instance, of “national emergency” or whatever the case may be—they then become an essential ingredient of the definition.

Mr. Beatty: Senator, in the case of the Charter of Rights, it specifically states within the Charter itself that it applies to other statutes. The power of the Charter of Rights to apply to this particular bill stems from the provisions in the Charter itself. You say that there are provisions under which one could suspend, if you like, the powers of the Charter. I understand that it would make no difference whether or not we made specific reference to the Charter in a separate clause of the bill. The ability to suspend the powers of the Charter, or to circumscribe the powers of the Charter, is provided for in the Charter itself.

The same applies here. The best legal advice that I can get from the Department of Justice—and I, as a non-lawyer, transmit it to you—is that it would have been, at best, redundant to include those provisions and in any event totally unnecessary. The provisions apply unless it is specifically stated that they do not apply.

Senator Neiman: Very well. That, in itself, is reassuring, Mr. Minister. If I may conclude by perhaps supporting an observation of Senator Stewart's with respect to clause 62 regarding the composition of the parliamentary review committee, I would certainly much prefer to see that clause stipulate that all parties—and even independent members, as you yourself suggested—be represented from both houses, because, on the one hand, I see that you have said that in the House of Commons the membership will be drawn from a party having at least 12 members, whereas you made the comment yourself that within the Senate you might choose an independent member. I have no problem with that whatsoever, but I do think that, in both houses, whatever parties there are—or independent members as the case may be—should be represented on such a committee.

Mr. Beatty: Senator, in the past you and I have served on joint committees together and certainly the experience has been an edifying one for me. As a member of the House of Commons, I felt that it was a useful experience to serve on a joint committee. Certainly, the reason that, over opposition from some quarters in the House of Commons, I wanted to build in the double veto, for example, to give the Senate the power to nullify a decision of the House of Commons to allow us to invoke this legislation was that I am convinced that the integrity of this place should be maintained and that it has an important role in terms of protecting the civil liberties of Canadians.

The real issue here, I suppose, is whether it is necessary to write down in minute detail all of the structures of the committee or whether we should expect that, as Senator Stewart was saying, good will and common sense should apply.

[Senator Neiman.]

During my years in Parliament I suppose there have been instances when I may have questioned whether or not good will and common sense applied in all cases. However, for the most part, I think the two houses have worked well and in close collaboration, and I would expect that any other member of the House of Commons who assumed my responsibility at a different time as Minister responsible for Emergency Preparedness would also feel that the Senate had something to offer on this committee and would draw on the resources available to it.

Senator, the legitimacy of the process—the fact that we are asking Canadians to entrust us with extraordinary powers which affect their civil liberties—requires that we demonstrate to them that we are operating in a way that is open, above-board and proper. Therefore, a procedure which was clearly designed to circumvent the spirit of the legislation itself, which was designed to ensure a joint parliamentary committee, would, by its very nature, damage public support for anything the government was doing. I think it would be self-defeating if the government attempted to do that.

By the same token, however, it would be possible for the Senate, acting irresponsibly, to strike down the will of the majority of the elected representatives in the House of Commons. The best protection against that would have been to exclude the Senate, and that was argued to me by members of the NDP. I do not believe that senators will act irresponsibly. I believe that we have a responsibility to show goodwill to one another, and I am confident that, if such a committee were set up, both houses would consult with one another and would set up a committee that was fully representative of both bodies.

Certainly, I am quite prepared to leave on the parliamentary record that that was my intention at the time the bill was passed.

Senator Neiman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

● (1940)

The Chairman: At the moment there are no other questioners on my list, but Senator Stewart has indicated that on the second round he would have a question.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, it develops now that I have one question more than I anticipated. But first I wonder if I could have the assurance from the minister that he would check the blues and correct what I am sure he did not intend to say, that I was advocating that it was sufficient to rely on reasonableness and goodwill when delegating these enormous powers. I think he said exactly the opposite of what he intended to say. I am sure he will want to correct that remark.

I would like clarification on two points. First, when talking earlier about conscription the minister told us that it would be legally possible under this act to introduce conscription by order in council. As I understood the minister, he said that it would not be possible under an order made under this act to send conscripted persons outside Canada to Norway or Alaska, for example, because of section 6(1) of the Charter, which says, "Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada." Did I understand that point correctly?

Mr. Beatty: Section 6, yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Does that mean that Parliament itself by statute cannot authorize that conscripted persons or persons in the armed forces be sent outside Canada?

Mr. Beatty: Parliament would have to demonstrate that the conditions of section 1 of the Charter were being met.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Then why couldn't the same demonstration be made in the case of persons being sent outside Canada by order in council under this statute?

Mr. Beatty: One would have to demonstrate that the conditions were being met. If one could demonstrate that the conditions were—

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Then you are saying that by law there would be no difference, that provided the demonstration was made in each case, an order under this statute would have the same effect as a statute explicitly and directly authorizing the government to send armed forces personnel overseas.

Mr. Beatty: You would be required in either case to meet the provisions of section 1 of the Charter. I believe that during World War I we used the powers of the War Measures Act in order to conscript. Of course, the provisions of the Charter did not exist at that time, but, if it had applied, you would have had to meet the provisions of section 1. Under Bill C-77, there is the additional requirement of reasonable grounds.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So what you are saying is that, when this bill becomes law, the power of the Governor in Council will be the same as the power of Parliament with regard to sending persons outside Canada. In other words, the test is the same in both cases.

Mr. Beatty: If the provisions of the Charter are met, yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So we are giving to the Governor in Council all the power that the Parliament of Canada itself has, both with regard to conscription and to sending persons outside Canada?

Mr. Beatty: Provided that reasonable grounds can be demonstrated by the Governor in Council for doing so.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The answer is that the powers are the same because the limitation is the same in both instances.

Mr. Beatty: Except that there is the additional constraint under the provisions of Bill C-77 of demonstrating the necessity. That constraint on Parliament would not exist if it were passing a conscription bill.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You say "demonstrate the necessity." Where is that explicitly required in this bill?

Mr. Beatty: It is required under subclause 40(1), where it says, "... believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency."

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, that subclause applies if there is a prima facie case, but that is quite a different thing from what you are talking about. It does not mean that a court must find that it is necessary. It means simply that if the minister of the day believes that he has reasonable grounds—

Mr. Beatty: There must be an objective test with the very invocation of the statute in the first place. The invocation of Bill C-77 itself is contestable in the courts.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, we can go on digging this well for a long time, but I do not know that we will get much more water. I want to turn to another question. It is one that I raised when I spoke on second reading of the bill. Bill C-77 provides that an order in council made under it could not be used to change the terms of Bill C-77. We know that it was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada during World War I that an order in council made under the War Measures Act could be used to set aside the provisions of statutes, not just orders or regulations but statutes made by Parliament itself. According to subclause 4(a), an order or regulation may not be used to set aside part of this statute. However, that subclause implies that an order or regulation could be made to set aside the provisions of other statutes. Is that a correct deduction?

Mr. Beatty: I am told that it might be possible in instances where it was directly relevant and necessary to deal with the emergency provided for under this statute.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So your answer is yes, by an order in council or a regulation made under this act, statutes enacted by Parliament could be set aside. You are asking for that power?

Mr. Beatty: The advice I have received is that there was during World War I an instance in which the courts found it appropriate under the War Measures Act to extend powers and to alter the provisions of the statute law using an order under that act. Under this proposed statute, anything done would have to be directly relevant to the purposes of the statute, would be contestable in terms of the various checks and balances provided in the statute, and would be subject to scrutiny by Parliament and could be nullified by Parliament at any time. I am advised that it is far from certain that even under those circumstances the courts would, today, with the provisions of the Charter and the other provisions that have been put in place since World War I, find that such an action would be possible.

● (1950)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I do not think anyone would argue that what was done during World War I with regard to military exemptions was not relevant. Your answer seems to imply that you would be content to accept, for greater certainty, an amendment to clause 4(a) so that it would read: "...altering the provisions of this or any other act." You would be happy to accept that?

Mr. Beatty: I would not be prepared to see amendments made which would delay the progress of this bill.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, delay would be the only ground on which you would object to that amendment?

Mr. Beatty: There may be specific instances where it is necessary for the Governor in Council to use such powers, properly safeguarded by Parliament and by courts as provided for in the statute. But, at this point, reopening the bill and going in, as you say, for greater certainty, if that is the concern, would, I think, do a disservice to Canadians. The bill has been before Parliament now for almost a year. The time has come for Parliament to deliver on the commitment it made some 18 years ago to repeal the War Measures Act and to put modern legislation in its place.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You seem to imply that if we take, say, half the time that you took in the other place it will be reasonable, and I would be prepared to accept that.

Mr. Beatty: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether Senator Stewart was simply throwing that comment out facetiously or whether he intended to have a serious reply from me.

I think the members of the House of Commons took their responsibility very seriously as, indeed, did the government. The government tabled the bill at the end of June. I announced my intention to have such a bill on June 5 in the defence white paper. I tabled it before the summer recess. I left it out for public scrutiny and invited public commentary. We had extensive hearings in the parliamentary committee. A large volume of amendments were made to it. The elected representatives of the people, I think, did their job exceptionally well.

The real question comes down to whether we, as members of Parliament, both houses, are prepared to honour a commitment that was made in good faith and to act, or whether we are prepared to delay the progress of this bill and to have opened up the possibility that Canadians could either be forced to deal with a crisis for which there is no appropriate authority on the part of the government to deal with, or that the civil liberties of Canadians could once again be abrogated in the way they have been abrogated in the past by using this odious War Measures Act which is on the books today.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I do not want any misunderstanding. You say that the government introduced the bill in June of 1987. It was passed by the House of Commons on April 27, 1988. It is now just a little over the month later; yet you seem to be suggesting that we are already delaying the bill.

Mr. Beatty: No, I was not suggesting that, senator. Certainly, I would not try to put words in your mouth and I know you would not try to put them in mine. I am not suggesting you are trying to delay the bill. I am suggesting that you should not delay the bill.

[Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That seems to be not war, invasion or insurrection apprehended, but delay apprehended. I suggest that it is unreasonable to apprehend.

Mr. Beatty: Any delay, senator, would be unreasonable. We should proceed.

The Chairman: Since there are no other questioners, Mr. Minister, it is left for me to thank you very much on behalf of my colleagues for the time you have spent with us, which is now almost two hours. We very much appreciate that you made yourself available to appear along with your officials. I hope that you have found your first venture into the Senate a pleasant one and we look forward to having you with us again on some other occasion.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we should now clear up the matter that was before us and put into suspended animation prior to the minister's entering the chamber. There had been a discussion regarding the establishment of a steering committee. We became involved in the beginning of a vote and then it was my understanding that there was no need for a vote and that the matter could be settled by agreement.

Senator Doody: I gather from speaking with Senator Stewart that there is a desire to have at least one more and perhaps other witnesses appear before the committee. To that end, I think the suggestion of Senator MacEachen is a sensible one and we should ask the two whips to set up a steering committee. The numbers involved in the committee and so on will be the same as they have always been in this place. I see little point in pursuing the cause of justice and equity. I will let it go at that.

The Chairman: I suppose that depends on how one defines "justice and equity."

Senator Doody: We had a discussion a moment ago about fairness and reasonableness and I do not want to plough all that up again.

Senator Petten: Mr. Chairman, the numbers are five and three.

The Chairman: The suggestion is five and three.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I think we have had an example of how dangerous it is to use figures in this place. Senator Doody has implied that I indicated that there would be at least one more witness. Technically, he is correct, but the implication is that one, perhaps two more witnesses will be heard. I did not wish to convey that impression.

What I have in mind, honourable senators, with regard to this bill is that, since the government is asking for such extreme powers, such great powers, we ought to know precisely what powers we would be giving the government if the bill passes. We can satisfy ourselves on that by hearing a reasonable number of witnesses. I do not want to say "at least one," because that seems to imply that later this week the minister's impatience will be satisfied.

Senator Doody: I did not mean to imply that "at least one" meant one; nor did I try to define the word "reasonable."

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we will ask the two whips to establish a steering committee, to put forward the names of the members and that the numbers will be five and three?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

---

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

TUESDAY, May 31, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1989, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, May 19, 1988 submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From Agriculture Canada:

- Mr. Frank Claydon, Assistant Deputy Minister, Policy Branch;
- Mr. Dan Fenety, Director General, Priorities and Strategies Directorate Grains and Oil seeds Branch;
- Mr. Terry Pender, Administrator, Special Canadian Grains Program.

Supplementary Estimates (A), 1988-89 totalling $113.9 million is a special estimate to augment the budget of one program only, the Special Canadian Grains Program (SCGP). This program was first announced by the Prime Minister two years ago for the 1986 crop year and later extended by the Minister of Agriculture for the 1987 crop year. The program is intended to cushion Canadian farmers as a result of falling world prices brought on by actions of the United States and the European Community.

When the program was first announced, $1 billion was allocated to cover losses for the 1986 crop year; $300 million through Supplementary Estimates (B), 1986-87 and $700 million through Supplementary Estimates (A), 1987-88.

For the 1987 crop year, $1.1 billion has been allocated: $800 million through Supplementary Estimates (D), 1987-88, and an additional $300 million through the Main Estimates, 1988-89.

The reason for Supplementary Estimates (A), 1988-89 is that $113.9 million of the $800 million appropriated last fiscal year, for the 1987 crop year, was not spent and therefore lapsed. In order to spend the money this fiscal year, it must be reprofiled or shifted to the current fiscal year, and this requires Parliamentary approval.

This meeting of the National Finance Committee represents its fourth review of the Special Canadian Grains Program through the supplementary estimates. The meeting dates and report numbers are shown below:

December 18, 1986: Supplementary Estimates (B), 1986-87 - Fourth report of the Committee.

March 12, 1987: Supplementary Estimates (A), 1987-88 - Sixth report of the Committee.

January 27, 1988: Supplementary Estimates (D), 1987-88 - Sixteenth report of the Committee.

In each report, the Committee commented on aspects of the program and how it changed from its coverage for the 1986 crop year to coverage for the 1987 crop year.

In requesting the current supplementary estimates, there is no change to the program since the request is simply to reprofile the amount from the last fiscal year to the current fiscal year.

When questioned with respect to differences between the actual and anticipated outlays, officials stated they were due to delays in the development of computer software to operate the program and concerns that overpayment might be made to Ontario soybean producers because of the considerable difference in prices between the 1986 and 1987 crop year. The department continues to expect to make all payments by the end of June 1988.

Officials indicated to the Committee that in 1987-88, the Department was allocated $4 million for administration but used only $3.2 million. They also indicated, however, that there is a chance the department may have to request the additional $800,000 through final supplementary estimates to cover these administrative expenses.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND — REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE ON MESSAGE FROM COMMONS AND MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS

TUESDAY, May 31, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Doyle dated 18th May 1988 and the Message from the House of Commons dated 17th May 1988 relating to certain amendments to Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, 24th May 1988, examined the said motion and Message and now reports as follows:

Background Information

On 24th March 1988, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce presented to the Senate its report on Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof. The report, which recommended that the Bill be amended in clauses 2 and 26, was formulated after hearing evidence from 22 groups of witnesses and receiving written submissions from 40 groups in addition to letters and telegrams from interested parties.

The weight of evidence received from those groups with concerns about Bill C-60 revolved around two main issues: the introduction of a new right for visual artists called an exhibition right and the lack of provision in the Bill for further exceptions from copyright.

With respect to exhibition rights, art exhibitors were concerned about the potential inhibition of curatorial freedom that could be exercised by rights holders. Exhibitors were also concerned about the administrative burden connected with determining and locating the owner of the exhibition right to a work of art. The Committee also heard evidence concerning failure to reach an agreement between artists and exhibitors on a new form of the exhibition right. The Minister of Communications, the Honourable Flora MacDonald, noted before the Committee that a revised definition of "artistic work", a term used in the exhibition rights clause, would be included in the second phase of copyright amendments.

Thus, a majority of the Committee believed it was advisable to recommend the withdrawal of clause 2 respecting exhibition rights.

Regarding the lack of provision for user exceptions from copyright in phase one of copyright reform, the Committee heard evidence from a number of user groups. Among them, those representing educators and librarians were concerned about their ability to negotiate equitable fees for use of copyright material without knowledge of what specific exceptions the Government intended to introduce in phase two of copyright reform.

Pending determination of what specific exceptions would be provided to users of copyright material, a majority of the Committee recommended postponement of the provisions of Bill C-60 providing the statutory foundation for the establishment of the collective administration of copyright. It was, therefore, recommended that clause 26 of the Bill be amended to provide such postponement.

The Committee's report was accepted by a majority in the Senate and Bill C-60 was sent back to the House of Commons with the Senate's suggestions for amendments. The House of Commons rejected the Senate amendments. It adopted a motion moved by the Honourable Flora MacDonald, Minister of Communications, that a message be sent to the Senate to this effect. The motion and the message were referred by the Senate on 24th May 1988 to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Committee decided to hear evidence from the Minister of Communications, on the Message from the House of Commons.

Evidence

In her appearance before the Committee, the Minister indicated that the Department of Communications has been holding consultations with creators and users of copyright material regarding possible exceptions for educational use of copyright materials. She further noted that draft provisions had been discussed and consensus seemed to have been reached on all but one issue. Consensus was reached on: manual copying of works; the use of copyright materials in exams; the use of live performances for educational purposes; playing a radio or television in the classroom; collectives giving teachers and students permission to use copyright material; and use of material outside a collective's repertoire. The outstanding issue that remained was that of taping off-air of radio and television programs.

The Minister stated that consultations have also been taking place between creators and users of copyright materials to discuss possible exceptions for library uses of copyright materials. Consensus has reportedly been reached on the following issues: library liability for photocopies made on self-service machines and by librarians on behalf of patrons; copying of damaged library material; copying of special works; copying of out-of-print works; copying of sheet music and the application of fair dealing to commercial research.

The single copy exception remains the only major outstanding exception and discussions on this matter are continuing, according to the Minister.

With respect to an ephemeral recording exception, the Minister indicated that there is agreement between creators and broadcasters on the need for such an exception but that the conditions for this have yet to be worked out. Another meeting on the matter between interested parties is scheduled for 2nd June 1988.

When she appeared before the Committee, the Minister also indicated that officials of her department would be willing to consider an alternative form of the exhibition right clause for stage two of copyright reform that was agreeable to both artists and exhibitors. The Minister gave a commitment that consultations between artists and curators and managers of museums would be undertaken with the purpose of arriving at some agreed upon exhibition right for stage two of copyright reform.

The Minister further stated before the Committee that stage two of copyright reform would likely be introduced in September or October of the current year.

Conclusion

The evidence presented by the Minister of Communications to the Committee indicated that progress has been made toward resolving outstanding issues between users and creators of copyright material. This includes agreement on most of the exceptions from copyright to be provided to users in stage two of copyright reform. The lack of information regarding such exceptions was cited by the majority of the Committee in its recommendation in its previous report regarding the postponement of the establishment of collectives.

In light of the Minister's evidence regarding agreement on copyright exceptions, and in view of the short time horizon before stage two is introduced, the Committee no longer feels that this postponement is necessary and therefore recommends that the Senate not insist on amendment 2 of its report on Bill C-60.

Further, given the commitment by the Minister to allow consultations between officials and artists and curators and museum managers to arrive at an agreed upon exhibition right for stage two of copyright reform, the Committee recommends that the Senate not insist on amendment 1 of its report on Bill C-60 which called for the deletion of clause 2 respecting exhibition rights.

Respectfully submitted,
